
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

Cornell University Library

BOUGHT WITH THE INCOME FROM THE SAGE ENDOWMENT FUND
THE GIFT OF
Henry W. Sage
1891

H. 216226.

26/VIII/07

5901

AP
4
A16++

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE

1907

VOLUME LXXII

PUBLISHING OFFICE
95 FETTER LANE, E.C.

1907

T

AP
4
A16++

As 1622-6

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LXXII

ARTICLES

	PAGE
Aesthetics, the Essentials of	249
A Green Goose and a Hero	604
Amesbury Abbey, Wilts, Excavations at	556
Art, A Vanishing	606
Attitude, the Worth of	490
Barnes, William	510
Beaconsfield as Plagiarist	632
"Blessed Damozel, The"	365
Blood Royal, Tincture of	514
Blunderbore	340
Bookseller, the Incomplete	486
Boulevard, the Eternal	387
Catechisms and Statues	489
Censorship of Plays, The	508
Censorship Problem, the Solution of the	628
Character in Dialogue	560
Children, Sayings of	93
Church Music	537
Church of Santa Maria della Consolazione at Todi, Italy	605
Elethian Muse, The	15
English Association, The	71
Fielding Anniversary, The	389
France, Contemporary	631
Gutteridge, Joseph, Weaver and Savant.	391
"Haberdasher"	513
Impatience	364
"Jaunt"	464
Journalism, Inspired	271
Literary Epochs	536
Literature and Stocks	633
Literature, the New	581
Literature, the Woman's Point of View in	462
Lying in Fiction	410
Mad Dogs	555
Manners, on the Decay of French	509
Mark of the Beast, The	342
Marriage of Panurge, The	607
"Max"	411
Measure for Measure	162
Moreau le Jeune	534
Musing, Irresponsible	365
Nursery Rhymes	341
Paris, Vanishing	316
Plea for Gusto, A	605
Poet, A Great Elizabethan	487
Poet, A Neglected	384
Poet, Minor, A Plea for the	603
Poetry and Passion	603
Pronunciation	437
Propagandist as Critic, The	459
Reverence	512
Rhodes Scholar, Impressions of a	72
St. George, England's	390
Salome, Strauss and Sathanas	483
Salons, the Paris	483
Sancho Panza at Geneva	550
Shakespearean Rag Bag, The	582
Shakespeareomania	582
Shelley as Proof Reader	118
Shirts and Shetels	293
Some Protests and an Appreciation	190
Soul of the Valet, The	412
Spluttering Flame, The	581
Tilt, Julia, Poetess and Woman	580
Tone and the Word, The	485
Vampire, The	488
Virtues, the Seven Deadly	314
Wordsworth, William and Dorothy. Unpub- lished Letters to Samuel Taylor Coleridge	141
Zangwill's Jews, Mr.	436

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Pages	19, 44, 98, 123, 147, 170, 194, 218, 275, 323, 347, 371
-----------------	--

BOOKS RECEIVED

Pages	20, 45, 78, 101, 125, 149, 172, 197, 222, 277, 301, 326, 349, 374, 398, 422, 445, 470, 493, 518, 542, 565, 590, 614, 638
-----------------	--

THE BOOKSHELF

"Apocalypse of St. John." H. B. Swete	102
"Artists, Italian, Stories of the, from Vasari."
E. L. Seeley.	22
Bailey "English History from Original Sources"	590
Barnicott (R.) "Plymouth in History"	173
Baynes (H.) "The Way of the Buddha"	46
Bearne (Mrs.) "Heroines of French Society"	495
Beet (J. A.) "Manual of Theology"	278
Blackie's English School Texts	358
Blackie's Latin Texts	350
Bon (Gustave le.) "The Evolution of Matter"	495
"Book Prices Current"	46
Bréal (K.) "A New German and English Dic- tionary"	446
Brierley (J.) "Religion and Experience"	150
"Buddha, the Way of the," Herbert Baynes	46
"Crime, the World of," F. Goron	126
Cunynghame (H. G.) "European Enamels"	21
Davies (E. O.) "Theological Encyclopedia"	22
Dictionary, A New German and English. Karl Bréal	446
Dole (C. F.) "Theology and Civilisation"	22
"Enamels, European," H. G. Cunynghame	22
"Evolution of Matter, The," Gustave le Bon	495
"Fiji to the Cannibal Islands, From," Beatrice Grimshaw	198
"Fleur de Neige," Ellen C. Hainselin	374

THE BOOKSHELF—continued

"Fungi, Text-Book on," George Massée	46
Gamble (W.) "Penrose's Pictorial Annual for 1906-7"	198
"Geography, Elementary Studies in," H. J. Mackinder	374
Grothwohl (M. A.) "Lectures Françaises"	590
Gilman (L.) "The Music of To-morrow and other Studies"	126
"God, the Knowledge of," Dr. Gwatkin	22
Goron (F.) "The World of Crime"	126
"Greek Worship, the Elements of," S. C. Kaines Smith	21
Green-Armistage (A. J.) "Maid of Honour"	46
Grimshaw (B.) "From Fiji to the Cannibal Islands"	198
Gwatkin (Dr.) "The Knowledge of God"	22
Hainselin (E. C.) "Fleur de Neige"	374
Handley (F. W.) "Life and Evolution"	150
"Heroines of French Society," Mrs. Bearne	495
"Historia Amoris, A History of Love Ancient and Modern," Edgar Salus	22
"History, English, from Original Sources, 1155- 1485," Morgan and Bailey	590
"Horticulture, the Principles of," W. M. Webb	374
Hull (E.) "A Text-Book of Irish Literature"	78
Ishbel, "The Old Roof Tree"	22
"Lectures Françaises," M. A. Grothwohl	590
"Le Petit Grandpère et La Petit Gaudinère," Kate Weber	374
"Life and Evolution," F. W. Handley	150
"Literature, Irish, A Text-Book of," Eleanor Hull	78
Mackinder (H. J.) "Elementary Studies in Geography"	374
"Maid of Honour," A. J. Green-Armistage	46
Massée (G.) "Text-Book on Fungi"	46
"Milton, Blackie's School," A. E. Roberts	374
Morgan, "English History from Original Sources"	590
"Music of To-morrow, the, and other Studies," L. Gilman	126
Pachen (J.) "Du Positivisme au Mysticisme"	46
"Penrose's Pictorial Annual for 1906-7," Ed. by William Gamble	198
"Plays for Acting or Class Reading, Little"	374
"Plymouth in History," Roger Barnicott	173
"Poetry, Victorian, the Main Tendencies of," Arnold Smith	494
"Positivisme au Mysticisme, Du," Jules Pachen	46
Racine's "Athalie"	494
"Religion and Experience," J. Brierley	150
Roberts (A. E.) "Blackie's School Milton"	374
"Roof-Tree, the Old," Ishbel	22
Salus (E.) "Historia Amoris"	22
"Science, Crown of," Morris Stewart	22
"Science Year-Book and Diary for 1907," Ed. by B. F. S. Baden-Powell	150
Seely (E. L.) "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari"	22
Smith (Arnold), "The Main Tendencies of Victorian Poetry"	494
Smith (S. C. Kaines), "The Elements of Greek Worship"	21
Stewart (Morris), "Crown of Science"	22
Swete (H. B.) "The Apocalypse of St. John"	102
"Theological Encyclopedia, The," E. O. Davies	22
"Theology, A Manual of," Joseph Agar Beet	278
"Theology and Civilisation," C. F. Dole	22
"Vianney, John, the Blessed, Curé d' Ars," Joseph Vianney	150
Webb (W. M.) "The Principles of Horticul- ture"	374
Webster (K.) "Le Petit Grandpère et La Petit Grandmère"	374

CORRESPONDENCE

Pages	20, 45, 75, 98, 123, 148, 171, 195, 220, 254, 275, 298, 323, 347, 371, 397, 419, 443, 468, 492, 517, 541, 564, 588, 612, 636
-----------------	---

DRAMA

Aeschylus and Barker at Terry's Theatre	321
"Adrienne Lecouvreur" at the New Royalty Theatre	192
"Antony and Cleopatra" at His Majesty's Theatre	17
Berr, M. Georges, at the New Royalty Theatre	145
Bradfield College, the Drama of	611
Coquelin and Molière	121
Court Theatre, "Two Plays at the"	42
Hankin's Mr. St. John, Comedy at the Court	442
Hankin's Mr. St. John, Comedy at the Stage Society	169
"Hidda Gahler" at the Court Theatre	252
His Majesty's Theatre, At	540
Irish Players Again, The	610
Lavedan's "Le Marquis de Priola," at the New Royalty	97
"Maitre des Illusions de la Vie"	563
"Philinderr, The," at the Court Theatre	144
Playboy of the Western World, The	586
Realism at the Court	369
Stage Society, The	320
Stage Society and the Moscow School of Drama, The	585
"Sunken Bell, The"	416
Vachell's Mr. Comedy at the Playhouse	274
"Van Dyck," at His Majesty's, The	297

FICTION

A. (Colonel), "The Ultramarines"	318
Adams (S. H.) "The Mystery of Stewart E. White"	441
Allen, "His Neighbour's Landmark"	516
"All that a Man H.," Coralie Stanton and Heath Hosken	369
"Amalia," Graham Hope	168
"American Girl in India, A," Shilland Brad- ley	345
"And the Moor Gave up its Dead," Eric Har- rison	535
Appleton (G. W.) "The Duchess of Pontifex Square"	192
Applin (A.) "The Chorus Girl"	492
"Animal of the West," John Trevena	291
"Artistic Temperament, The," Jane Wardle	293
"Average Man, The," A. C. Fox-Davies	610
Bagot (R.) "Temptation"	216
Bulby (H. C.) "Springtime"	95
Barnes-Grundy (M.) "Marguerite's Wonderful Year"	41
Barnett (J.) "The Prince's Valet"	441
"Barony of Brendon, The," E. H. Lacon Watson	272
Barr (A. E.) "Love will Venture in"	410
Barr (J.) "The Witchery of the Serpent"	610
Barr (Robert), "A Rock in the Baltic"	274
Barrett (E.) "The Oiling Hasband"	227
Barron (E.) "The Triple Seal"	416
Baynton (B.) "Human Tilt"	192
"Bazin's Gold," Ernest Cornish	41
Begbie (H.) "The Vigil"	516
"Belated Sins, The," Arthur Colton	235
Bennett (A.) "The Ghost"	143
Bennett (E. B.) "The Leaven of the Phari- sees"	465
Benson (E. F.) "The House of Defence"	515
Bindloss (H.) "The Dust of Conflict"	168
"Bird's Nest, A," Mary Findlater	144
Bottoms (Phyllis), "The Imperfect Gift"	393
Bower (M.) "Wrestlers, The"	464
Bradley (S.) "An American Girl in India"	345
Bredt (G. H.) "From One Man's Hand to Another"	401
"Bunch of Blue Ribbons, A," George Morley	346
Burgess (W. V.) "Cheshire Village Stories"	251
Burgin (G. B.) "Watch Woman"	584
Burnham (C. L.) "The Opened Shutters"	168
"Butterfly, A," Baroness D. von Goldacker	235
Byatt (H.) "The Flight of Icarus"	232
"Call, The," Desmond Coke	609
"Calore Girl, The," Harry Tighe	96
"Captain Desmond, V.C.," M. Diver	415
Carling (G.) "Richard Elliott, Financier"	610
Carter (J. E.) "The Offenders"	41
Chambers (R.) "The Fighting Chance"	121
Chambers (R. W.) "The Tracer of Lost Per- sons"	345
"Charles Edward," Harrison G. Rhodes	167
"Cheshire Village Stories," W. V. Burgess	251
"Child of Promise, The," Nita Svett	465
"Chorus Girl, The," Arthur Applin	492
"Clarice, the Story of a Crystal Heart," Nar- cisse L. de Polen	168
Cleeve (Lucas), "Nathan Todd"	609
Coke (D.) "The Call"	609
Coletick (H. T.) "The Ministry of David Baldwin"	368
"Colonel Dameron," Percy White	562
"Colonel of the Red Hussars," J. Reed Scott	192
Colton (A.) "The B-lted Seas"	295
"Conflict," Constance Smedley	227
Cornish (E.) "Bazin's Gold"	47
"Country House, The," John Galsworthy	251
Courlander (A.) "The Sacrifice"	95
Crockett (S. R.) "Little Eson"	217
Croker (B. M.) "The Spanish Necklace"	192
Cromarsh (H. R.) "The Secret of Moor Cot- tage"	320
Crosbie (M.) "Disciples"	318
"Daft Days, The," Neil Munro	562
Darley Dale, "Naomi's Transgressions"	569
Dawc (C.) "Her Highness's Secretary"	271
Deane (M.) "The Other Pawn"	251
Delannoy (B.) "The Moneylender"	492
"Deyncourt of Deyncourt," Daisy Hugh Price	368
"Diaries of Three Women of the Last Century," Ed. by Evelyn St. Leger	614
Dickinson (H. N.) "A Story of Oxford"	561
Dill (B.) "My Lady Nan"	163
"Dinevah the Beautiful," Elliott O'Donnell	391
"Disciples," Mary Crosbie	318
Diver (M.) "Captain Desmond V.C."	415
"Doctor Gordon," Mary B. Wilkins	296
"Doctor Pons," Paul Gwynne	516
Douglas (Theo), "One or Two"	319
"Dragon's Wife, A," E. Peronnet Thompson	345
Drake (M.) "The Salving of a Derelict"	41
"Dreams of Simon Usher, The," Algernon Gis- sing	316
"Duchess of Pontifex Square, The," G. W. Appleton	192
"Duke's Dilemma, The," Sir William Magnay	96
"Dust of Conflict, The," Harold Bindloss	168
"Eight Secrets, The," Ernest Ingersoll	295
Elkington (E. Way), "The Two Forests"	121
Ellis (Mrs. Havelock), "Kit's Woman"	144
"Evolution of Katherine," E. Temple Thurs- ton	271
"Eton Manor," Archibald Marshall	216
"Fighters, The," Lady Violet Gruville	442

FICTION—continued		PAGE	FICTION—continued		PAGE	FICTION—continued		PAGE
"Fighting Chance, The." Robert Chambers		121	Marshall (A.) "Exton Manor"		216	"Ten Years' Agreement, The." Constance
Findlater (M.) "A Blind Bird's Nest"		144	Mason (A. E. W.) "Running Water"		205	Evans Jones		394
Fletcher (J. S.) "The Queen of a Day"		515	Mathurin (Mrs. F.) "Petronel of Paradise"		368	Thompson (E. P.) "A Dragon's Wife"		345
"Flight of Icarus." Henry Byatt		252	Maxwell (W. B.) "Odd Lengths"		415	"Three Weeks." Elinor Glyn		635
"Flying Cloud, The." Morley Roberts		394	Meade (L. T.) "The Home of Silence"		395	Thurston (E. Temple) "The Evolution of Fogazzaro (A.) "The Man of the World"		394	"Memories of Ronald Love, The." Mary E. Mann		191	Katharine"		273
Forster (R. H.) "The Mistress of Aydon"		96	"Midsummer Day's Dream, A." H. B. Marriott		143	Thurston (Katharine C.) "The Mystics"		416
"Fort Amity." A. I. Quiller-Couch		441	Watson		168	Tighe (H.) "The Caloré Girl"		96
"For the Week-End." Handasyde		539	Miller (Esther) "Living Lies"		538	"Towing Path Bess." Richard Pryce		296
"Fortune's Fool." Fred E. Wynne		415	"Millionaire and the Lady, The." Gertrude		368	"Tracer of Lost Persons." R. W. Chambers		345
Fox-Davies (A. C.) "The Average Man"		610	Warden		368	Trevela (J.) "Arminel of the West"		393
"Fraulein Schmidt and Mr. Austruther." By			"Ministry of David Baldwin, The." H. T. Cole-		96	"Triple Scar, The." Elwyn Barron		416
the Author of "Elizabeth and her German			stock		368	Turenne (R.) "The Last of the Mammoths"		442
Garden"		561	"Mistress of Aydon, The." R. H. Forster		96	"Twelfth Hour, The." Ada Leverson		344
"Free Solitude, A." Alice Perrin		297	Mitford (Bertram) "The White Hand and the		492	"Two Forces, The." E. W. Elkington		121
"From One Man's Hand to Another." G. H.			Black"		492	Tytler (S.) "Innocent Masqueraders"		634
Breda		491	Mitford (G. G.) "Izelle of the Dunes"		96	"Ultramarines, The." Colonel A.		318
"Gallant of Gascony, A." Philip L. Stevenson		349	"Money Lender, The." Burford Delannoy		492	Underhill (E.) "The Lost Word"		144
Galsworthy (J.) "The Country House"		251	"Monsieur de Paris." Mary C. Rowsell		368	"Under the Pompadour." E. W. Jennings		273
"Ghost, The." Arnold Bennett		143	Morley (G.) "A Bunch of Blue Ribbons"		346	"Undertow, The." Robert Knowles		274
Gissing (A.) "The Dreams of Simon Usher"		346	Munro (Neil) "The Daff Days"		562	Urquhart (M.) "The Wheel"		295
Glyn (Elinor) "Three Weeks"		635	Murray (D. C.) "The Penniless Millionaire"		192	Vachell (H. A.) "Her Son"		415
Goldacker (D. von) "A butterfly"		266	"My Lady Nan." Bessie Dill		168	"Vigil, The." Harold B. Gile		516
"Golden Hawk, The." Edith Rickert		216	"My Neighbours." E. G. Steven on		41	Warden (F.) "The Man With the Amber
"Great Cranborne Conspiracy, The." John			"Mystery, The." Stewart E. White." S. Hop-		441	Eyes		344
Oakley		467	kings Adams		441	Warden (G.) "The Millionaire and the Lady"		538
"Great Plot, The." William le Queux		491	"Mystics, The." Katharine Cecil Thurston		416	Wardle (J. one) "The Artistic Temperament"		295
Greville (Lady Violet) "The Fighters"		442	"Naomi's Transgression." Darley Dale		369	Watson (E. H. Lucan) "The Barony of
Grossman (E. S.) "A Knight of the Holy			"Nathan Todd." Lucas Cleeve		609	Brendon"		272
Ghost"		318	"Nearly Five Millions." W. Pett Ridge		440	Wemyss (G.) "The Younger Woman"		297
Gwynne (Paul) "Doctor Pons"		516	Nichard (J. G.) "The Lonesome Trail"		610	Wharton (E.) "Madame de Treymes"		465
Hales (A. G.) "Maid Molly"		344	"Nonconformist Parson, A." Roy Horniman		394	"What Might Have Been"		216
"Hampshire Vaguettes, Old." By the Author			"None So Pretty." By the Author of "A Dis-		614	"Wheel, The." M. Urquhart		295 of "Mademoiselle Ixe"		296	crepant World"		614	"Which Woman." G. B. Buein		584
Handasyde "The Week-End, For"		539	Norris (W. E.) "Harry and Ursula"		120	"Whirlwind, The." Eden Philpotts		95
Harrison (E.) "And the Moor gave up its			Oakley (J.) "The Great Cranborne Conspir-		467	"White Fang." Jack London		274
Dead"		515	acy"		467	"White Hand and the Black, The." Bertram
"Harry and Ursula." W. E. Norris		120	"O'leiving Husband, The." Frank Barrett		297	Mitford		492
Hay (A. G.) "Malcolm Canmore's Pearl"		406	"Odd Lengths." W. B. Maxwell		415	White (Percy) "Colonel Davenport"		562
"Her Highness's Secretary." Carlton Dawe		273	O'Donnell (B.) "Dinevah the Beautiful"		394	White (S. E.) "The Mystery"		441
"Her Honour." Robert Machray		368	"Offenders, The." J. E. Carter		415	"Wife's Revenge, The." George R. Sims		319
"Her Ladyship's Silence." Marie Connor Leigh-			"One of the Grenvilles." S. Royse Lysaght		415	Wildbridge (O.) "Margery Manstey"		516
ton		395	"One or Two." Theo Douglas		319	Wilkins (M. E.) "Doctor Gordon"		296
"Her Son." H. A. Vachell		415	"Opened Shutters, The." Clara Louise Burn-		168	William on (W. H.) "A Race for a Crown"		584
"Hill of Dreams, The." Arthur Machen		273	ham		168	Willocks (M. P.) "The Wingless Victory"		319
"His Neighbour's Landmark." Alien		510	Orczy (Baroness) "The Tangled Skein"		54	"Wingless Victory." M. P. Willocks		319
Hocking (Silas K.) "The Silent Man"		345	"Other Pawn, The." Mary Deane		251	Winter (J. S.) "The Love of Philip Hamden"		96
"Home of Silence, The." L. T. Meade		395	"Our Lady of the Beeches." Baroness von		367	"Wisdom of the Serpent, The." Constantine
Hope (Graham) "Amalia"		168	Hutton		367	Ralli		466
Horniman (R.) "A Nonconformist Parson"		394	"Outer Darkness, The." K. H. Wright		96	"Witchery of the Serpent, The." James Barr		610
Hosken (H.) "All That a Man Hath"		369	Oxenham (J.) "Rising Fortunes"		538	Woods (M. L.) "The Lover"		516
"House of Defence, The." E. I. Benson		515	Oxenham (J.) "The Long Road"		345	"Wrestles, The." Marion Bower		464
"House of Rest." Mrs. Fred Reynolds		216	"Painted Rock." Morley Roberts		296	Wright (R. H.) "The Outer Darkness"		96
"Human Toll." Barbara Baynton		192	"Parson Croft." Norman Innes		492	Wynne (F. E.) "Fortune's Fool"		415
"Human Trinity, A." Ronald Macdonald		345	"Passing Down the Avenues." L. Rutherford		466	"Yankee Napoleon, A." John F. Macpherson		466
Hutton (Baroness von) "Our Lady of the			Skey		466	"Younger Woman, The." George Wemyss		277
Beeches"		367	Pasture (Mrs. H. de la) "The Lonely Lady of		144
"Imperfect Gift, The." Phyllis Bottome		393	Grosvenor square		144
Ingersoll (E.) "The Eight Secrets"		295	Paterson (A.) "John Glynn"		414
Janes (N.) "Parson Croft"		492	"Penniless Millionaire, The." David Christie		192
"Innocent Masqueraders." Sarah Tytler		634	Murray		192
"In Situ. Pupiani"		95	Perrin (A.) "A Free Solitude"		297
"In the House of the Eye." W. A. Mackenzie		274	"Petronel of Paradise." Mrs. Fred Mathurin		368
"Invader, The." Margaret L. Woods		516	Pett Ridge (W.) "Nearly Five Millions"		440
Irvine (A. M.) "Roger Dinwiddie: Soul Doc-			tor"		95
tor"		635	Philpotts (Elen) "The Whirlwind"		584
"Izelle of the Dunes." G. Guise Mitford		96	"Pilgrimage." C. L. Lawrence		168
"Jan Digby." Ambrose Pratt		441	Polen (N. L. de) "Clairice"		441
Jennings (E. W.) "Under the Pompadour"		273	Popham (F.) "A Summer Holiday"		96
"John Glynn." Arthur Paterson		414	Porter (H.) "The Second Bloom"		441
Jones (C. E.) "The Ten Years' Agreement"		394	Pratt (A.) "John Digby"		308
"Just Fate, A." George Long		539	Price (D. H.) "Dayncourt of Dayncourt"		441
"Kiddy: a Story of Oxford." H. N. Dickinson		501	"Prince's Valet, The." John Barnett		296
"Kinsman, The." Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick		143	Pryce (R.) "Towing Path Bess"		515
"Kit's Woman: a Cornish Idyll." Mrs. Have-			Queux (William Le) "The Great Plot"		491
lock Ellis		144	Queux (William Le) "The Secret of the		320
"Knight of the Holy Ghost, A." Edith Searle		318	Square"		441
Grossman		274	Quiller-Couch (A. T.) "Fort Amity"		584
Knowles (R.) "The Undertow"		296	Ralli (C.) "The Wisdom of the Serpent"		299
Koebel (W. H.) "The Return of Joe"		442	Reynolds (Mrs. F.) "The House of Rest"		216
"Last of the Mammoths, The." Raymond		584	Rhodes (H. G.) "Charles Edward"		169
Turenne		465	Rhoseon (O.) "Sweet Rogues"		496
Laurence (C. E.) "Pilgrimage"		491	"Richard Elliott, Financier." George Carling		610
"Leaven of the Pharisees, The." E. B. Bennett		395	Rickert (E.) "The Golden Hawk"		216
"Legal Practitioner, A." Christian Tearle		344	"Rising Fortunes." John Oxenham		394
Leighton (M. C.) "Her Ladyship's Silence"		217	Roberts (Morley) "The Flying Cloud"		296
Leverson (A.) "The Twelfth Hour"		168	Roberts (Morley) "Painted Rock"		274
"Little Eason." S. R. Crockett		274	"Rock in the Baltic, A." Robert Barr		635
"Living Lies." Estuier Miller		610	Irvine		308
London (Jack) "White Fang"		274	Rowell (M. C.) "Monsieur de Paris"		205
"Lonely Lady of Grosvenor square, The." Mrs.			"Running Water." A. E. W. Mason		95
Henry de la Pasture		144	"Sacrifice, The." Alphonse Courlander		634
"Lonesome Trail, The." John G. Niehardt		539	St. Leger (E.) "Diaries of Three Women of		41
Long (G.) "A Just Fate"		345	the Last Century		192
"Long Road, The." John Oxenham		144	"Salving of a Derelict, The." Maurice Drake		90
"Lost Word, The." Evelyn Underhill		96	Scott (J. R.) "The Colonel of the Red Hussars"		320
"Love of Philip Hamden." John Strange		440	"Second Bloom, The." Helen Porter		345
Winter		415	"Secret of Moor Cottage, The." H. R. Crom-		320
"Love will Venture In." Amelia E. Barr		440	marsh		320
Lysaght (S. R.) "One of the Grenvilles"		415	"Secret of the Square, The." William le		320
Macdonald (R.) "A Human Trinity"		345	Queux		345
Machen (A.) "The Hill of Dreams"		273	"Silent Man, The." Silas K. Hocking		319
Machray (R.) "Her Honour"		368	Sims (G. R.) "The Wife's Revenge"		466
Mackenzie (W. A.) "In the House of the Eye"		274	Skey (L. R.) "Passing Down the Avenues"		297
Macpherson (J. F.) "A Yankee Napoleon"		466	Smedley (C.) "Conflict"		95
"Madame de Treymes." Edith Wharton		465	"Spanish Necklace, The." B. M. Croker		369
"Madness of Gloria, The." Fred Whishaw		344	"Spring Ice." H. C. Bailey		41
Magnay (Sir William) "The Duke's Dilemma"		96	Stanton (C.) "All That a Man Hath"		346
"Maid Molly." A. G. Hales		466	Stevenson (E. G.) "My Neighbours"		408
"Malcolm Canmore's Pearl." Agnes Grant Hay		191	Summers (D.) "A Man's Love"		441
Mann (M. E.) "The Memories of Ronald Love"		394	"Summer Holiday, A." Florence Popham		466
"Man of the World, The." Antonio Fogazzaro		168	"Sweet Rogues." Owen Rhoseon		465
"Man's Love, A." Dorothy Summer		344	Syrett (Netta) "The Child of Promise"		584
"Man with the Amber Eyes, The." Florence			"Tangled Skein, The." Baroness Orczy		491
Warden		344	Tearle (Christian) "A Legal Practitioner"		216
"Margery Manesty." Oswald Wildbridge		516	"Temptation." Richard Bagot
"Marguerite's Wonderful Year." Mabel Barnes-		41
Grundy
Marriott-Watson (H. B.) "A Midsummer Day's		143
Dream

FINE ART

Amateur, the Apotheosis of the	370
An Arrival	586
Borisoff, Alexander	217
British Masters at Shepherd's	340
Burlington House	467
Charles James, the Late	170
Drawings of the Nineteenth Century, French	193
Illustration, the Decay of	18
International Society, The	42
Masters, the Old	74
New Gallery, The	417
Non Angeli ed Angeli	539
Paintings and Pausies	128
Pictures, Chatter about	396
Portraits, Modern	9
Romance and Symbolism	46
Strangers Within the Gates	635
Traits and Tendencies at Suffolk Street	321
Water Colours, Modern	395

THE LIBRARY TABLE

"Æneid, Stories from the." H. L. Havell	409
Alexandre (A.) "Sir Edward Burne-Jones"	269
"America, British North, The Far West, The Home of the Salish and Dene" C. Hill-Tout	409
"Aran Islands, The." J. M. Synge	482
"Art, the Year's." 1907	248
"Athens, Ancient, Life in." T. G. Tucker	188
"Atoneament and Personality." R. C. Moberly	482
Baden-Powell (Maj.-Gen.) "Sketches in Ma- king and East Africa"	293
Bailey (C.) "The Religion of Ancient Rome"	435
Beebe (C. W.) "The Log of the Sea"	118
"Beecher, Sir William, R.A." W. Roberts	602
Benham (W.) "The Tower of London"	214
Benson (Father) "Papers of a Pariah"	314
Books printed for Private Circulation, Cata- logue of. Bertram Dobell	38
Bradley-Birt (F. B.) "The Romance of an East- ern Capital"	39
"Bramtree and Bocking." M. Cunningham and S. A. Warner	292
"Burne-Jones, Sir Edward." Arsène Alexandre	209
"Barton, the Real Sir Richard." Walter Paelps Dodge	627
Burton (W.) "Porcelain"	13
"Byron in Italy, With." Anna B. McMahon	92
Campbell (W.) "Canada"	554
"Canada." Painted by T. Mower Martin, de- scribed by Wilfrid Campbell	554
Coleridge (E. H.) "Don Juan"	92
"Collectanea." Charles Crawford	532
"Companions in the Sierra." Charles Rudy	482
Cook (A. J.) "The Higher Study of English"	292
Coutts (F.) "King Arthur"	603
Crabbe, George, "Poems." Ed by A. W. Ward	118
Crawford (Charles) "Collectanea"	532
"Criminal, the Making of the." C. E. B. Russell and L. M. Rigby	13
"Crome's Etchings." Henry Studdy Theobald	138
Crosland (T. W. H.) "The Beautiful Teetotaler"	459

THE LIBRARY TABLE—continued

	PAGE
Cruso (H. A. A.) "Sir Walter Raleigh" . . .	139
Cunningham (M.) "Baintree and Bocking" . . .	292
Cust (Lionel) "Van Dyck" . . .	162
"Dancing, A History of." Reginald St. Johnston	91
Dacey (E.) "The Egypt of the Future" . . .	109
Dobell (B.) Catalogue of Books Printed for Private Circulation . . .	38
Dodge (W. P.) "The Real Sir Richard Burton" . . .	627
"Don Juan." Ed. by Ernest H. Coleridge . . .	92
"Drama, The Old Cornish." C. Peter Tourstan	118
Dressler (F. A.) "Moltke in His Home" . . .	139
"Dublin." Samuel A. Osoory Fitzpatrick . . .	627
Earle (Mrs. C. W.) Letters to Young and Old . . .	39
"East and West Indian Mirror, The." Trans. by J. O. J. de Villiers . . .	213
"Eastern Capital, The Romance of An." F. B. Bradley-Birt . . .	39
"East to West, From." Sir Hubert Jerningham	161
"Egypt of the Future, The." Edward Dacey . . .	189
Elkington (E. Way) "Adrift in New Zealand" . . .	138
"English, The Higher Study of." Albert J. Cook	292
Finn (F.) "Ornithological and other Oddities" . . .	508
"Fisherman, the Complete." Walter M. Gall- chun . . .	314
Fitzpatrick (S. A. O.) "Dublin" . . .	627
Fox-Davies (A. C.) "Heraldry Explained" . . .	363
Gilchrist (W. M.) "The Complete Fisherman" . . .	314
Gillet (L.) "Raphael" . . .	269
"Greedy Book, The." Frank Schloesser . . .	92
Grey (Sir George) "Polynesian Mythology and Ancient Traditional History of the New Zealanders" . . .	386
Hadow (G. E. and W. H.) "The Oxford Treasury of English Literature" . . .	339
Havell (H.) "Stories from the Æneid" . . .	409
"Heraldry Explained." A. C. Fox-Davies . . .	363
Higinbotham (H. N.) "The Making of a Mer- chant" . . .	339
Hill-Tout (C.) "British North America" . . .	407
Hilly, C. "The Steps of Life" . . .	435
"Hindustan under Free Lances, 1770-1820" . . .	507
"Hokusai." Edward F. Strange . . .	14
Holdich (Sir Thos.) "Tibet the Mysterious" . . .	13
Hutton (E.) "Perugino" . . .	189
Jerningham (H.) "From East to West" . . .	161
Johnson (J. P.) "Tae Stone Implements of S. Africa" . . .	555
Johnston (Reginald St.) "A History of Dancing" . . .	93
"King Arthur." Francis Courtt . . .	603
Lees (O. N.) "Scenes and Shrines in Tuscany" . . .	533
"Letters to Young and Old." Mrs. C. W. Earle	39
"Literature, English, The Oxford Treasury." G. E. and W. H. Hadow . . .	339
"Log of the Sun, The." C. William Beebe . . .	118
"London Topographical Record" . . .	602
"Lucknow Veteran, Recollections of A, 1845- 1870." Maj.-Gen. J. Russell . . .	14
McMann (A. B.) "With Byron in Italy" . . .	92
Macneil (J. K.) "Twilight and Darkness" . . .	458
"Malek and East Africa, Sketches in." Maj.- Gen. Baden Powell . . .	293
Marquis (I. G.) "Presidents of the United States from Pierce to McKinley" . . .	387
Martin (T. M.) "Canada" . . .	354
Masefield (J.) "A Tarpaulin Muster" . . .	435
Masterman (C. F. G.) "Frederick Denison Maurice" . . .	603
"Maurice, Frederick Denison." C. F. G. Mas- terman . . .	603
"2835 Mayfair." Frank Richardson . . .	450
"Merchant, the Making of a." Harlow N. Higinbotham . . .	339
"Ministerial Priesthood." R. C. Moberly . . .	482
Moberly (R. C.) "Atonement and Personality" . . .	482
Moberly (R. C.) "Ministerial Priesthood" . . .	482
"Modern Painters." John Ruskin . . .	363
"Moltke in His Home." F. A. Dressler. Trans. by Mrs. C. E. Barrett-Leonard . . .	139
"Monisms, Concepts of." A. Worsley . . .	627
"New Zealand, Adrift in." E. Way Elkington . . .	138
"Omar Khayyam, Rubaiyat of." Trans. by Geo. Roe . . .	13
"Ornithological and other Oddities." Frank Finn . . .	508
"Papers of a Pariah." Father Benson . . .	314
"Parson's Burden, The." By the author of "The Perplexed Parson" . . .	339
"Pass, The." Stewart E. White . . .	386
Paterson (M.) "Peggotts, or the Indian Contingent" . . .	459
"Peggotts, or the Indian Contingent." Margaret Paterson . . .	459
Penfield (F. C.) "Wanderings East of Suez" . . .	507
"Perugino." Edward Hutton . . .	189
Peter (T. C.) "The Old Cornish Drama" . . .	118
"Polynesian Mythology and Ancient Traditional History of the New Zealanders." Sir George Grey . . .	386
"Porcelain." William Burton . . .	13
"Port Arthur in a Destroyer, Before." Trans. by Captain R. Grant . . .	248
"Presidents of the United States from Pierce to McKinley." T. G. Marquis . . .	387
"Pusey, Dr." G. W. E. Russell . . .	603
"Ralegh, Sir Walter." H. A. A. Cruso . . .	139
"Raphael." Louis Gillet . . .	269
"Religion of Ancient Rome, The." Cyril Bailey Richardson (F.) "2835 Mayfair" . . .	450
Rigby (L. M.) "The Making of the Criminal" . . .	13
Roberts (W.) "Sir William Beechey, R.A." . . .	602
Rodocanachi (R.) "The Roman Capitol in Ancient and Modern Times" . . .	189
Roe (G.) "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam" . . .	13
"Roman Capitol in Ancient and Modern Times." E. Rodocanachi . . .	189
Rudy (K.) "Companions in the Sierra" . . .	482
Ruggles (Maj.-Gen. J.) "Recollections of a Lucknow Veteran, 1845-1876" . . .	14
Ruskin (John) "The Stories of Venice, Unto this Last and Modern Painters" . . .	363
Russell (C. E. B.) "The Making of the Crimi- nal" . . .	13

THE LIBRARY TABLE—continued

	PAGE
Russell (G. W. E.) "Dr. Pusey" . . .	603
"Savage Club, The." Aaron Watson . . .	602
Schloesser (F.) "The Greedy Book" . . .	92
"Scotia, the Voyage of the." By Three of the Staff . . .	14
"Shakespeare, the Works of William." Ed. by Sir Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall . . .	213
Sherring (C. A.) "Western Tibet and the British Borderland" . . .	13
"Steps of Life, The." Carl Hilty . . .	45
"Stone Implements of S. Africa." J. P. Johnson . . .	555
"Stones of Venice, The, Unto this Last, and Modern Painters." John Ruskin . . .	363
Strange (E. F.) "Hokusai" . . .	14
Synge (J. M.) "The Aran Islands" . . .	482
"Tarpaulin Muster, A." John Masefield . . .	435
"Teetotaler, the Beautiful." T. W. H. Crosland Theobald (H. S.) "Cromes's Etchings" . . .	138
"Tibet, the Mysterious." Sir Thos. Holdich . . .	13
"Tibet (Western) and the British Borderland" Charles A. Siering . . .	13
"Tower of London, The." Canon William Beauchamp . . .	214
Tucker (T. G.) "Life in Ancient Athens" . . .	138
"Tuscany, Scenes and Shrines in." Dorothy Neville Lees . . .	533
"Twilight and Darkness." J. K. Macneil . . .	458
"Unto this Last." John Ruskin . . .	363
"Van Dyck." Lionel Cust . . .	162
Villiers (J. A. J. de) "The East and West Indian Mirror" . . .	213
"Wanderings East of Suez" Frederick C. Pen- field . . .	507
Warner (S. A.) "Baintree and Bocking" . . .	292
Watson (Aaron) "The Savage Club" . . .	602
White (S. E.) "The Pass" . . .	386
"Women Types of To-day." Da Libra . . .	292
Worsley (A.) "Concepts of Monism" . . .	627

LITERARY CAUSERIES

Beowulf, Burns and Co.	142
Berthelot, M.	317
Classics, Cheap, the Mystery of the . . .	271
Garden Memories	191
Going Up Top	40
Hic Jacet	94
Jama, Mr. Henry, the Development of . . .	214
Literary Haggis a l'Anglaise	413
Literary Made Dishes	73
Literature, Air and Space in	167
Mental Shocks	439
On James Lee's Wife	342
Style, A Canon of	119
Style, Prose, the Psychological Elements of . . .	392
With Double Tongues	250
Wit in Poetry, the Place of	16
Woman's Chance in Literature	366
Writing, the Game of	294

THE LITERARY WEEK

Pages . . . 3, 27, 51, 83, 107, 131, 155, 179, 203, 229, 259, 283, 307, 331, 355, 379, 403, 427, 451, 475, 499, 523, 547, 571, 595, 595, 619
--

MISCELLANEOUS

Jaded Intellectuals	270
Shavians from Supernan	573
Some Doctored Dilemma	139

MUSIC

Gibbons, Orlando	587
Groves Dictionary, the New	322
Handel's Indebtedness	18
Musical Genius and Religion	193
Piano Recitals	217
Queen's Hall Orchestra, The	127
Richter Celebration, The	562
Second Performance, A	43
Symphony Orchestra, The London	418
Wagner's The Ring of the Nibelungen, the Ethics of	193

POETRY

"An Island Legend." Eleanor Norton . . .	453
"A Portrait." R. S.	501
"A Song from the Suburbs." Douglas Goldring . . .	429
"Ben Jonson." A. H. Fisher	525
"De Profundis." Althea Gyles	525
"Earth's Weird." G. M. Hoyt	621
"Fear." St. John Lucas	381
"Flame and Ashes." Althea Gyles	309
"Foggy Noon." John Freeman	525
Imitations from "A Morte de Don Joao." Guerra Junqueiro. More Adey	549
"In the Forest." Wilfrid Wilson Gibson . . .	269
"La Beauté." A. D.	549
"La Ciel est Par-Dessus le Toit." More Adey . . .	549
"Logic and Lie." John P. Wainwright . . .	15
"May." R. D.	477
"May." Wilfrid L. Randall	477
"Palmyra." A. D.	501
"St. Valentine's Day." Nora Chesson	131
"Shadow Nets." Olive Douglas	294
"Sonata." R. S.	573
"The Beloved." Evelina Howard	477
"The Green River." A. D.	621
"The Miller's Song." Pamela Tennant . . .	477
"The Rain." R. S.	501
"The Storm." Olive Douglas	357
"The Traitor." A. D.	597
"The White Pavilions"	231
"To a Silent Poet." A. D.	403
"To E. J." Robin Flower	39
Verlaque, Paul, From. "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles." John B. Wainwright	573
"Windows." St. John Lucas	597
"Youth to the Sea." R. S.	501

REVIEWS

	PAGE
"Adriatic, The Shores of the. The Italian Side." F. H. Jackson . . .	186
"Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer—Personal." Col. James P. Robertson . . .	36
"Æneid of Virgil, the." Trans. by James Rhodes . . .	6
"Æchylus in English Verse." A. S. Way . . .	182
"Anna, British General, the Naives of." A. Werner . . .	263
"Africa, South, the Times History of the War in" . . .	551
"Alcohol and the Human Body." Sir Victor Horsley and Mary D. Sturge . . .	600
"Anglo-Saxon Race, Origin of the" . . .	246
"Apollo." S. Reinach, trans. by Florence Simmonds . . .	137
Archer (W.) "The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen" . . .	288
Aria (Mrs.) "Costume, Fanciful, Historical and Theatrical" . . .	255
"Aristophanes, the Comedies of." Trans. by Benjamin Bickley Rogers . . .	574
"Artists of Bologna, the Women." Laura M. Ragg . . .	291
"Balzac, Honoré de." Ferdinand Brunetiere . . .	30
"Bards of the Gael and Gail." George Sigerson . . .	135
Baring (M.) "A Year in Russia"	506
Barker (J. E.) "The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands" . . .	57
Barrington (Mrs. Russell) "The Life, Letters and Work of Frederick Leighton" . . .	91
Beebe (C. W.) "The Bird: Its Form and Function" . . .	431
Beeching (Rev. Canon) "Poems of Herrick" . . .	157
"Beddoes, Thomas Lovell, the Poems of." Ramsey Colles . . .	360
Bell (G. L.) "The Desert and the Sown" . . .	210
Bell (H.) "The Historic Thames"	590
"Benedict Kavanagh." G. A. Birmingham . . .	188
Besant (Sir Walter) "Medieval London, Ecclesiastical" . . .	113
"Bird, The: Its Form and Function." C. William Beebe . . .	431
Birmingham (G. A.) "Benedict Kavanagh" . . .	188
Bisland (E.) "Life and Letters of Latendro Heara" . . .	88
"Blake, the Real." Edwin J. Ellis	232
Blunt (W. S.) "Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt" . . .	598
"Boigne, Memoirs of the Comtesse de, 1781-1814" . . .	532
"Book of Alaska, A." Wilbur Underwood . . .	89
Bradby (G. F.) "The Great Days of Versailles" . . .	35
Breasted (J. H.) "Ancient Records of Egypt" . . .	116
"Britain, the Dawn in." Charles M. Doughty . . .	267
Britton (Rev. W. P. Carlyon) "A Treatise on the Law Concerning Names and Changes of Name" . . .	433
Browne (E. G.) "A Literary History of Persia from Firdaws to Sadi" . . .	9
Browning (Thomas) "The Fall of Napoleon" . . .	482
"Brown, Thomas Edward, the Mass Poet." Selwyn G. Simpson . . .	109
Brunetiere (F.) "Honoré de Balzac"	30
Budge (E. O. W.) "The Egyptian Heaven and Hell" . . .	116
"Bunbury, Sir Charles J. F., the Life of." Mrs. Henry Lyell . . .	90
Burne (Maj.-Gen. Sir O. T.) "Memories" . . .	163
"Burns, Robert, the Poetical Works of, with Life and Notes." William Wallace . . .	53
"Byron et le romantisme Français." Edmond Estève . . .	552
Calthrop (A.) "The Life of Sir Tobie Matthew, Bacon's Alter Ego" . . .	456
Calthrop (D. C.) "English Costume"	244
Caivert (A. F.) "The Prado"	622
Campbell (G. M.) "Paul the Mystic"	361
Campbell (Lewis) "Paralipomena Sophoclea" . . .	207
Canning (The Hon. A. S. G.) "Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays" . . .	86
Carroll (J. S.) "Prisoners of Hope, An Exposition of Dante's Purgatorio" . . .	114
Chambers (B. K.) "Notes on the History of the Revel Office under the Tudors" . . .	54
"Church, A Free Catholic." J. M. Lloyd Thomas . . .	289
"Church and State in France 1300-1907." Arthur Galtou . . .	357
"Churchill, Lord Randolph." Lord Rosebery . . .	133
Clarke (Maud M.) "Nature's own Gardens" . . .	500
"Classics, a Last Ramble in the." Hugh E. P. Platt . . .	30
"Classics, the German"	211
"Classics, Newnes Thin Paper"	1
"Classics, Temple Greek and Latin." A. F. Cole . . .	233
Clerici (G. P.) "A Queen of Indiscretions" . . .	55
Clinch (G.) "Memorials of Old Kent" . . .	454
"Coins, the Yorkshire and Old and Prehistoric Halifax." H. Ling Roth . . .	7
"Coins in the Indian Museum Calcutta, Catalogue of the." Vincent A. Smith . . .	430
"Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta, Catalogue in the." H. Nelson Wright . . .	549
Cole (A. F.) "Temple Greek and Latin Classics" . . .	233
Coleridge (Hon. S.) "Songs to Desideria and other Poems" . . .	89
Colles (R.) "The Poems of Thomas Lovell Beddoes" . . .	360
"Colonies, The Middle." J. A. Doyle . . .	184
"Comedies under the House of Hanover, The." J. A. Doyle . . .	184
"Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era." John Fyvie . . .	8
"Cook, Captain James." Arthur Kitson . . .	686
Cook (T. A.) "Eclipse and O'Kelly"	601
Cornford (F. M.) "Thucydides Mythistoricus" . . .	311
"Cornwall, Days in." C. Lewis Hind . . .	480
"Costume, Quats on." G. Woollicroft Rhead . . .	245
"Costume, English." Dion Clayton Calthrop . . .	254
"Costume, Fanciful, Historical and Theatrical." Mrs. Aria . . .	245

REVIEWS—continued		REVIEWS—continued		REVIEWS—continued
	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
"Countess of Pembroke's 'Acedia,' The." Sir Philip Sidney	458	Grey (Sir Edward). "Fly-Fishing"	623	"Malbourne, Lord." H. Dunckley	133
"Crabbe, George, and his Times." Rere	286	Guiney (L. I.). "Thomas Stanley, his Original Lyrics"	209	"Memoirs." Maj.-Gen. Sir Owen Tudor Burne	185
"Cresses and Holy Wells of Lancashire, the Ancient." Henry Taylor	287	Hamilton (Lt.-Gen. Sir Ian). "A Staff Officer's Scrap Book during the Russo-Japanese War"	312	"Mink, The." A. Roman e. M. G. Law's	285
Crutwell (Maud). "Antonio Pallaiuolo"	268	Harris (G. W.). "Herodotus"	359	"Montagu, Mrs., and her Friends." R. Huchon	111
"Cuneiform Inscriptions, the Archaeology of the." A. H. Sayce	265	Hartley (C. G.). "The Prado"	622	Murray (G.). "The Medea of Euripides"	158
"Dampier's Voyages." Ed. by John Macfield	187	Hauvette (H.). "Litterature Itahenne"	313	"Mystical Studies in, and Certain Aspects of the Secret Traditions." A. E. Waite	266
Davenport (David). "The Re-Union of Adam and Eve"	89	"Hearn, Lafcadio, Life and Letters of." Elizabeth Bland	8	"Names and Changes of Name, a Treatise on the Law Concerning." A. C. Fox-Davies and R. W. Callyn Britton	433
Davidson (J.). "The Triumph of Mammon"	468	"Heideberg: its Princes and Palaces." Elizabeth Godfrey	11	"Napoleon's Conquest of Prussia, 1806." F. Loraine Petre	385
Davies (W. H.). "New Poems"	58	"Her Majesty's Rebels." Sidney Royse Lysaght	188	"Napoleon, The Fall of." Oscar Browning	482
"Derby, Lord." George Saintslury	133	"Herodotus." Trans. by G. W. Harris	359	"Nature's Own Gardens." Maud M. Clarke	506
"Desert and the Sown, The." Gertrude Lowthian Bell	210	"Herrick, Poems of." Selected by Rev. Canon Bercham	157	"Netherlands, the Rise and Decline of the." J. Ellis Barker	57
Dickens (F. V.). "Primitive and Medieval Japanese Texts"	54	Hind (C. Lewis). "Days in Cornwall"	480	Nicholson (G. H.). "The Major Dramas of Richard Brinsley Sheridan"	112
Ditchfield (R. H.). "Memorials of Old Kent"	454	"Historia Amoris." Edgar S. Ilus	309	Nichols (W. H.). "Lighthouse Fancies"	89
Ditchfield (P. H.). "The Parish Clerk"	562	"Historical Character Studies." Trans. from the Dutch of Dr. Jousen	577	Nicholson (W.). "The Struggle for a Free Stage in London"	503
Dotell (B.). "The Fictitious Works of William Sirede, 1600-1645"	333	"Historical Study of the Mother Tongue: an Introduction to Philological Method." H. C. World	134	Oman (C.). "The History of England from the Accession of Richard II. to the Death of Richard III., 1377-1485"	247
"Doctrina Romanorum de Invocatione Sancti Spiritus." Rev. H. Stewart	597	Hodgeson (W. E.). "How to Fish"	623	O'Sullivan (V.). "Human Affairs"	434
Doughty (C. M.). "The Dawn in Brittany"	207	Hogg (W.). "Meditata"	89	"Out of the Silence." James R. O'dis	58
Douglas (C. E.). "Puritan Manifestoes"	525	"Homer and his Age." Andrew Lang	624	"Paper Pellets." Jessie Pope	89
Doyle (J. A.). "The Middle Colonies and Colonies under the House of Hanover"	184	"Horker Richard." Vernon St. John	550	"Paripomena Sophoclea." Lewis Campbell	207
"Dress, Historic, 1607-1800." Elizabeth McClellan	245	Horsley (Sir Victor). "Alcibiades and the Human Body"	600	"Parochial Life in Medieval England." Abbot Gasquet	115
Drummond (James). "The Life of Richard John Seddon, Premier of New Zealand"	478	"Houlton Family, The, Its Story and Times." Lady Alice Archer Houlton	504	"Pater, Walter, The Life of." Thomas Wright	263
Duff (E. Gordon). "The Printers, Stationers and Bookbinders of Westminster and London from 1476-1535"	37	Huchon (Rere). "George Crabbe and his Times"	286	"Paul the Mystic." J. M. Campbell	361
Dunckley (H.). "Lord Melbourne"	133	Huchon (Rere). "Mrs. Montagu and Her Friends"	111	"Peckham's Compleat Gentleman." Introduced by G. S. Gordon	290
Edwards (M.). "Stegman's Sculpture of the West"	577	Huchon (Rere). "Un Poète Realiste Anglaise"	286	"Peasantry, the English, and the Enclosure of the Common Fields." Gilbert Slater	407
Edwards, Norton and Seckville, Dramatic Writings of	5	"Human Affairs." Vincent O'Sullivan	434	"Persia, A Literary History of, from Firdawsi to Sadi." E. G. Browne	9
"Egypt, Ancient Records of." Ed. by James Henry Breasted	116	"Isen, Henrik, the Collected Works of." Ed. by William Archer	288	"Personal Opinions Publicly Expressed." Rita. Petre (F. L.)	261
"Egypt, Secret History of the English Occupation of." Wilfrid Scawen Blunt	598	"Isen, the Man, his Art and his Significance." Haldane MacCall	288	"Phrases and Names, their Origins and Meanings." Trench H. Johnson	136
"Egyptian, Heaven and Hell, The." E. A. Wallis Budge	116	"Inteulude of Health and Wealth, The."	553	"Plato, The Republic of." Trans. by A. D. Lindsay	502
"Electrons, or the Nature and Properties of Negative Electricity." Sir Oliver Lodge	597	"Inteulude of John the Evangelist, The."	553	Platt (H. E. P.). "A Last Rumble in the Classics"	30
Ellis (E. J.). "The Real Flake"	232	Jackson (F. H.). "The Shores of the Adriatic"	166	"Plays, Tudor, Recently Recovered Lost." Ed. by John S. Farmer	553
Elton (O.). "Frederick York Powell"	32	Jackson (John). "The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius"	262	"Plutarch, Greek Lives from." Trans. by E. E. Byles	289
Engel (E.). "Geschichte der Deutschen Literatur von den Anfängen bis in die Gegenwart"	160	"Japanese Texts, Primitive and Medieval." Frederick Victor Dickens	54	"Plutarch's Lives." Trans. by W. R. Frazer	333
"England, an Introductory History of, from Henry VII. to the Restoration." C. N. L. Fletcher	575	"Japan, The Future of." W. Petrie Watson	477	"Poems, New." William H. Davies	58
"England, the History of, from the Accession of Richard II. to the death of Richard III., 1377-1485." C. Oman	247	"John Bull's Other Island" and "Major Barbara." George Bernard Shaw	621	"Poets, Realist Angles, Un." R. Huchon	286
"England, the History of, from the Accession of Henry VII. to the death of Henry VIII., 1485-1547." H. A. L. Fisher	159	Johnson (T. H.). "Phrases and Names, their Origins and Meanings"	136	"Police Court, the London, To-day and To-morrow." H. R. P. Gamon	381
"Engravers of England, the Old, in their Relation to Contemporary Life and Art." Malcolm C. Salaman	117	"Ker, Men oricks of Old." Ed. by R. H. Ditchfield and George Church	454	"Pollaiuolo, Antonio." Maud Crutwell	208
"Epigrams, Select, from the Greek Anthology." Ed. by J. W. Mackail	85	"Kingdom of Man, The." E. Ray Lankester	206	Pope (J.). "Paper Pellets." Oliver Elton	89
Escott (T. H. S.). "Society in the Country House"	34	"Kinship Organisations and Group Marriage in Australia." W. W. Thomas	87	"Prado, The." Albert F. Calvert and C. Gasquet	622
Estève (Edmond). "Byron et le Romantisme Français"	552	Kinwemersch (F.). "Supposes and Jocasta." Kitson (A.). "Captain James Cook"	406	"Printers, Stationers and Bookbinders of Westminster and London from 1476-1535." E. Gordon Duff	37
"Faith, the Simple, containing God's Message to Man." Don Glover	454	"Kortabas, Echoes from." Ed. by R. Y. Tyrrell and Sir Edward Sullivan	110	"Prisoners of Hope. An Exposition of Dante's Purgatorio." Rev. John S. Curroll	114
"Falkland, Lucius Cary, Viscount, Life and Times of." J. A. R. Marriott	333	"Lady Beautiful, The." F. E. Walrond	89	"Puritan Manifestoes." W. H. Freere and C. E. Douglas	525
Farmer (J. S.). "Recently Recovered Lost Tudor Plays"	553	Lander (Walter Savage). "Charles James Fox"	573	"Queen of Indiscretions, A." G. P. Clerici	55
Farnell (L. R.). "The Cults of the Greek States"	382	Lang (Andrew). "History of Scotland"	405	Trans. by Frederick Chapman	55
Farrar (J. A.). "Literary Forgeries"	234	Lang (Andrew). "Homer and his Age"	624	Rigg (L. M.). "The Woman Artists of Bologna"	291
Ferrers (G.). "The Greatness and Decline of Rome"	479	Lankester (F. Ray). "The Kingdom of Man"	206	"Recollections and Impressions." E. M. Sellar	357
"Firchlight Fancies." Wallace Bertram Nichols	89	Lawton (Frederick). "The Life and Work of Auguste Rodin"	38	Reinach (S.). "Apollo"	137
Fisher (H. A. L.). "The History of England from Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Henry VIII., 1485-1547"	159	"Leighton, Frederick, The Life, Letters and Work of." Mrs. Russell Barrington	91	"Religion of Co-consciousness, The." F. Reginald Stathan	454
"Fish, How to." W. Earl Hodgson	623	"Lespinasse, Julie de." Marquis de Ségur	295	"Re-Union of Adam and Eve, The." David Davenport	89
Fletcher (C. N. L.). "An Introductory History of England from Henry VII. to the Restoration"	575	Lethaby (W. R.). "Westminster Abbey and the King's Craftsmen"	34	"Revel Office, Notes on the History of Under the Tudors." E. K. Chambers	54
"Fly-Fishing." Sir Edward Grey	623	"Letters from Peking, Indiscreet." Ed. by B. L. Putnam Wale	235	Rhead (G. W.). "Chats on Costume"	245
Fogazzaro (A.). "The Woman of Madombra"	338	Lewis (M. G.). "The Monk." A Romance	285	Rhodes (J.). "Out of the Silence"	58
"Fox, Charles James." Walter Savage Landon	573	Lindsay (A. D.). "The Republic of Plato"	502	Rhodes (J.). "The Æneid of Virgil"	6
Fox-Davies (A. C.). "A Treatise on the Law Concerning Names and Changes of Name"	433	"Literary Forgeries." J. A. Farrar	234	"Richard III., His Life and Character Reviewed in the Light of Recent Research." Sir Clement Markham	10
Frazer (W. R.). "Plutarch's Lives"	335	"Literature, Deutschen, Geschichte der, von den Anfängen bis in die Gegenwart." Edouard Engl	160	Rickards (J. S. C.). "Lyrics of Life and Beauty"	89
Frere (W. H.). "Puritan Manifestoes"	625	"Litterature Itahenne." Henri Hauvette	313	Rita. "Personal Opinion Publicly Expressed"	261
"Furniture, Dutch and Flemish." Esther Singleton	384	Lodge (Sir Oliver). "Electrons or the Nature and Properties of Negative Electricity"	576	Robertson (Col. J. P.). "Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer"	36
Fyvie (J.). "Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era"	8	Lofie (W. J.). "The Colour of London"	501	"Robin, Auguste, The Life and [Work of." Frederick Lawton	38
Galton (A.). "Church and State in France, 1300-1907"	337	Lohe (F.). "Women of the Second Empire"	265	Rogers (B. B.). "Comedies of Aristophanes"	574
Gamon (H. R. P.). "The London Police Court To-day and To-morrow"	381	"London, Medieval, Ecclesiastical." Sir Walter Besant	501	"Romantic Revolt, The." Charles Edwin Vaughan	181
"Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic." Macaulay Trevelyan	455	"London, the Colour of." W. J. Lofie	501	"Rome, the Greatness and Decline of." Guglielmo Ferrero	479
Gascoyne (G.). "Supposes and Jocasta"	406	Lyell (Mrs. H.). "The Life of Sir Charles J. F. Rumbury"	90	Rosebery (Lord). "Lord Randolph Churchill"	133
Gasquet (Abbot). "Parochial Life in Medieval England"	115	"Lyrics of Life and Beauty." Marcus S. C. Rickards	89	Roth (H. L.). "The Yorkshire Colliers and Old and Prehistoric Halifax"	7
Glover (Don). "The Simple Faith containing God's Message to Man"	454	Lysaght (S. R.). "Her Majesty's Rebels"	188	"Russia, A Year in." Maurice Baring	506
Godfrey (E.). "Heidelberg: its Princes and Palaces"	11	MacCall (Haldane). "Isen, the Man, his Art and his Significance"	288	"Russo-Japanese War, A Staff Officer's Scrap Book during the." Lt.-Gen. Sir Ian Hamilton	212
"Greek States, the Cults of the." Lewis Richard Farnell	382	Mackail (J. W.). "Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology"	85	"Saint Catharine of Siena and Her Times." Author of "Mademoiselle Mori"	32
		"Marcus Aurelius The Meditations of." Trans. by John Jackson	262	Saintsbury (George). "Lord Derby"	33
		Markham (Sir Clement). "Richard III., his life and character reviewed in the light of recent research"	10	Salam (M. C.). "The Old Engravers in England in their Relation to Contemporary Life and Art"	117
		Marriott (J. A. R.). "The Life and Times of Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland"	383	Saltus (Edgar). "Historia Amoris"	309
		Massfield (J.). "Dampier's Voyages"	187	Sayce (A. H.). "The Archaeology of the Cuneiform Inscriptions"	265
		"Matthew, The Life of Sir Tobie, Bacon's Alter Ego." Arnold Harris Matthew and Annette Calthrop	456	"Scotland, History of." Andrew Lang	405
		"Medea of Euripides, The." Trans. by Gilbert Murray	158	Scott (T.). "The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift"	527
		"Medieval Peoples from the dawn of the Christian Era to the Fall of Constantinople." Robinson Scutlar	312	"Sculpture of the West." Dr. Hans Stegman	577
		"Meditata." Walter Hogg	89	"Sculpture, Roman." Mrs. Arthur Strong	530

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXII

vii

REVIEWS—continued		REVIEWS—continued		REVIEWS—continued
	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
"Seddon, Richard John, Premier of New Zealand, the Life of." James Drummond . . .	478	Spensley (Mrs. E.) "A Sheaf of Songs" . . .	89	Trevelyan (M.) "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic" . . .	455
Séguir (Marquis de). "Julie de Lespinasse" . . .	265	"Stage in London, The Struggle for a Free." Watson Nicholson . . .	503	"Triumph of Mammon, The." John Davidson . . .	408
Sellar (E. M.) "Recollections and Impressions" . . .	357	"Stanley Thomas: His Original Lyrics." L. I. Guiney . . .	209	"Truce of God, The, and other Poems." William Stevens . . .	89
"Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays." Hon. A. S. G. Canning . . .	86	Stanley (Vernon). "Richard Hooker" . . .	550	Underwood (W.) "A Book of Masks" . . .	89
Shaw (George Bernard). "John Bull's Other Island" and "Major Barbara" . . .	621	Statham (F. R.) "The Religion of Consciousness" . . .	454	Vaughan (C. E.) "The Romantic Revolt" . . .	181
"Sheaf of Songs, A." Mrs. Calvert Spensley . . .	89	Stegman (Hans). "Sculpture of the West" . . .	577	"Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles. The General Historie of." Capt. John Smith . . .	310
Sheridan, Richard Brinsley, the Dramatic Works of . . .	112	Stevens (W.) "The Truce of God and other Poems" . . .	89	"Versailles, The Great Days of." G. F. Bradby . . .	35
"Sheridan, Richard Brinsley, the Major Dramas of." Ed. by G. H. Nettleton . . .	112	Stewart (H. F.) "Doctrina Romanensium de Invocatione Sanctorum" . . .	597	"Voltaire, The Friends of." S. G. Tallentyre . . .	56
"Shirburn Ballads, The" . . .	232	"Strode, William, The Poetical Works of, 1600-1645." Ed. by Bertram Dobell . . .	333	Waite (A. E.) "Studies in Mysticism and Certain Aspects of the Secret Traditions" . . .	266
Sidney (Sir Philip). "The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia" . . .	458	Strong (Mrs. A.) "Roman Sculpture" . . .	530	Wallace (W.) "The Poetical Works of Robert Burns, with Life and Notes" . . .	53
Sigerson (G.) "Bards of the Gael and Gall" . . .	135	Sturge (M. D.) "Alcohol and the Human Body" . . .	600	Walrond (F. E.) "The Lady Beautiful" . . .	89
Simmonds (F.) "Reinach's Apollo" . . .	137	Sullivan (Sir Edward). "Echoes from Kottabos" . . .	110	Watson (W. P.) "The Future of Japan" . . .	477
Simpson (S. G.) "Thomas Edward Brown, the Manx Poet" . . .	109	"Supposes and Jocasta." Trans. by George Gascoyne and F. Kinwelmersch . . .	406	Way (A. S.) "Æschylus in English Verse" . . .	182
Singleton (E.) "Dutch and Flemish Furniture" . . .	384	"Swift, Jonathan, The Prose Works of." Ed. by Temple Scott . . .	527	Weale (B. L. P.) "Indiscreet Letters from Peking" . . .	235
Slater (G.) "The English Peasantry and the Enclosure of the Common Fields" . . .	407	Symonds (A. V.) "Annals of Tacitus" . . .	529	Werner (A.) "The Natives of British Central Africa" . . .	266
Smith (Captain John). "The General Historie of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles" . . .	310	"Tacitus, The Annals of." Trans. by A. V. Symonds . . .	529	"Westminster Abbey and the King's Craftsmen" W. R. Lethaby . . .	34
Smith (V. A.) "Catalogue of Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta" . . .	430	Tallentyre (S. G.) "The Friends of Voltaire" . . .	56	"Woman of Malombra, The." Antonio Fogazzaro . . .	338
"Society in the Country House." T. H. S. Escott . . .	89	Taylor (H.) "The Ancient Crosses and Holy Wells of Lancashire" . . .	287	"Women of the Second Empire." Frederic Loliée . . .	26
"Songs to Desideria, and other Poems." Hon. Stephen Coleridge . . .	89	"Thames, The Historic." Hilaire Belloc . . .	590	Wright (H. N.) "Catalogue of Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta" . . .	549
Souttar (R.) "A Short History of Mediæval Peoples from the Dawn of the Christian Era to the Fall of Constantinople" . . .	312	Thomas (J. M.) "A Free Catholic Church" . . .	289	Wright (T.) "The Life of Walter Pater" . . .	263
		Thomas (N. W.) "Kinship Organisations and Group Marriage in Australia" . . .	87	Wyld (H. C.) "Historical Study of the Mother Tongue; an Introduction to Philological Method" . . .	134
		"Thucydides Mythistoricus." F. M. Cornford . . .	311

SUPPLEMENTS

EDUCATION

(January 19)

	PAGE
Religion and the Teacher in School	61
Middle-class Education	62
The Public Schools from Within	69
School Books: French	64
" Geography	68
" German	64
" Greek	63
" History	65
" Latin	62
" Mathematics	66
" Readers	69

ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT

(February 16)

Fielding, Henry	163
Fielding's Library, Henry	164
Fielding's Bibliography, A	166

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

(March 9)

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1809

JANUARY 5, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

THE Council of the University of Sheffield is about to appoint a Librarian who must have high academic qualifications. Copies of not more than three testimonials, and the names of two referees, must be sent, by January 23, 1907, to the Registrar, from whom full particulars may be obtained.

W. M. GIBBONS,
Registrar.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

EVENING CLASS DEPARTMENT.

COURSES are arranged for the Intermediate and Final Examinations for the B.A. and B.Sc. Degrees of the University of London. Students taking the full course pay composition fees and rank as Internal Students of the University. There are also classes in Architectural and Engineering Subjects.

Evening Classes are also held for Mechanical and Electrical Engineering, Architecture and Building Construction, Drawing, Mathematics, Physics, and all Science Subjects.

For full information and Prospectus apply to the Dean (Mr. R. W. K. EDWARDS), or the Secretary, King's College, Strand, London, W.C.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

THE Course which is intended to meet the requirements of the Teachers' Registration Council is both practical (including properly directed work in a Secondary School) and theoretical (preparing for the London Teachers' Diploma and the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate).

The Course occupies a year, beginning in October or January.

For further particulars apply to the Secretary, King's College, Strand.

Books for Sale.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue.
Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.
REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

THE Best and Largest Stock of Second-hand and New Remainder Books in the world, 25 to 80 per cent. reduction on the published prices. Write for our January Catalogue containing some 7000 titles.—W. H. SMITH & SON, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

Books Wanted

DICKENS (Charles), Great Expectations, first edition, 3 vols. 1861, or either vol.
Uncommercial Traveller, first edition, 1861
Is She His Wife? 1877
Mr. Nightingale's Diary, 1877
The Lamplighter, a Farce, paper covers, 1879
The Plays and Poems of Charles Dickens, 2 vols, 1882
To be Read at Dusk, 1852
Child Pictures from Dickens, 1868
Report of a Dinner given to, 1842
Speech of, 1863
Address delivered at Birmingham, 1869
Any separately printed Speeches
Any Plays, Portraits, &c. relating to him or his Works
Any odd Parts or imperfect Vols of any of his Works before 1865
Sunday under Three Heads, by Timothy Sparks, paper covers, 1836
Memoirs of Joseph Grimaldi, 2 vols, 1838
Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman, illustrated by George Cruikshank, 1839
Sketches of Young Ladies, first edition, cardboard covers, 1837
Picnic Papers, 3 vols, 1841, or vol 1 only
Sibson's Illustrations to Master Humphrey's Clock, 72 plates, complete, or any odd ones
Hands to Master Humphrey's Clock, by Jacob Parallell, 2 parts, or either
Sibson's Racy Expeditions of the Pickwick Club, 1838
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street W.O.

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late
R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.LIT.

Edited by
E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Sale by Auction

C. C. & T. MOORE,
Auctioneers and Surveyors,
Established 1820,
7 Leadenhall Street, E.C.

Re W. S. Page, deceased.

Messrs. C. C. & T. Moore will include in the Sale, at "The Limes," St. John's Road, Putney, S.W., on January 17, at one o'clock, a few choice oil paintings, including "BARLEY FIELD IN BERKSHIRE," by C. J. Lewis, R.I., and "LYNMOUTH," by James Webb; a beautiful English chiming clock, and some pieces of antique furniture.—Auction Offices, 7 Leadenhall Street, E.C.

The Builder.

Architects, Engineers, Surveyors, etc.

NOW READY, post free 44d.

NEW YEAR'S NUMBER, JANUARY 5, 1907.

Contents:

BERLIN ARCHITECTURE, 42 pages (13 in. by 17 in.) of fine views of Berlin Architecture, together with a descriptive article.

"The Stairs of Time," from a drawing by the Editor: also the commencement of a series of articles (Student's Column) on "Electric Lighting and Heating," accompanied by other interesting matter both literary and artistic.

The above, enclosed in an illuminated cover of extra substance, will form a sumptuous New Year's number.

London: The Publisher of "THE BUILDER,"
4 Catherine Street, W.C.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE FAMOUS THIN PAPER CLASSICS are steadily covering the whole available ground of English literature. In spite of the numerous reprints now on the market they maintain their unique character for perfection, for purity of text, soundness and artistic charm of production, and cheapness. Some of these dainty and portable volumes, which cost 3s. 6d. each, bound in leather, contain within a small compass five or six times as much matter as the leather-bound volumes in other series which are sold at 2s. The type is very legible, the paper opaque, the binding durable, and the decorative details exceedingly artistic. The various colours of the bindings serve only to mark the different classes into which the series is divided. All of these works are printed from new type and never from old plates.

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Postage, 3d. extra.

EVELYN'S DIARY.
LAMB'S WORKS.
THE VISION OF DANTE.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
TENNYSON'S POEMS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS' POEMS.
DON QUIXOTE.
BACON'S WORKS.
SHELLEY'S POEMS.
PEPYS' DIARY.
KEATS' POEMS.
POE'S TALES.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.
THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCEY.
BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

FROM ALL BOOKSELLERS OR LIBRARIES OR
 GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C

Punch says:

"Lo, Messrs. Newnes have published at the price
 Of three-and-six apiece these volumes three
 (Their print is pleasant and their binding nice)
 Of BYRON'S varied mass of poetry.
 Thin paper classic are they, but to me
 What most appeals is this:—that they are bound
 In lambskin, like the wolf who fain would be Mistaken for a sheep, and scheming found
 Sheep's clothing best to help him as he prowled around.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

for JANUARY

Commences a New Volume, and contains Contributions by

The Right Hon. Lord STANLEY OF ALDERLEY. The Education Bill of 1906, and the Future of Popular Education.
 ALFRED NAQUET (Ancien Sénateur, Ancien Député). Entente—English or German?
 WILFRID WARD (Editor, Dublin Review). The Pope and France.
 AMEER ALI, C.I.E. (late a Judge of H.M.'s High Court of Judicature in Bengal). Afghanistan and its Ruler.
 H.H. the Raja I. RAJGAN of KAPURTHALA, K.C.S.I. The Education of Indian Princes.
 GEORGE MCRAE, M.P. (Member of the Select Committee). The Evolution of the Income Tax.
 REGINALD NEWTON WEEKES. The Curse of Machinery.
 BASIL DE SELINCOURT. Giotto in Modern Life.
 E. N. BENNETT, M.P. "A Temperance Town."
 G. W. BULMAN, B.Sc. Bees and Blue Flowers.
 JOHN C. MEDD. Agricultural Education in the United Kingdom.
 G. WILLETT VAN NEST. Divorce in the United States.
 C. B. WHEELER. Milton's "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce."
 DOMINICK DALY. "La Jeune Captive."
 Lieut.-Colonel ALSAGER POLLOCK. The Spectator Experimental Company.
 HARTLEY WITHERS. "Window Dressing" in the Money Market.
 HERBERT PAUL, M.P. The Influence of Catullus.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

The SHANACHIE

A New Illustrated Irish Miscellany.

FIRST ANNUAL VOLUME.

LITERARY CONTENTS by GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, W. B. YEATS, Lord DUNSANY, S. O'SULLIVAN, G. BIRMINGHAM, STEPHEN GWYNN, Lady GREGORY, A. E., Miss JANE BARLOW, T. M. SYNGE, OLIVER GAY, Miss ROSAMUND LANGBRIDGE, "TÓRNA," GEORGE ROBERTS, MICHAEL ORKNEY, PAGE DICKINSON, Father O'LEARY, P. COLM, FIONAN MACCARTHY, A. P. GRAVES, GRACE RHYS.

ILLUSTRATIONS by JACK YEATS, R. CAULFIELD ORPEN, HUGH THOMSON, T. B. YEATS, R. H. A., ELINOR MONSEL, SEAGHAN MACCATHMHAOIL, GEORGE MORROW. Cover design by Miss BEATRICE ELVEY.

Single Numbers can still be had, price 1s. net.

CALENDAR OF THE SAINTS,
1907. Patrie.

Illustrations and Letterpress, by SEAGHAN MACCATHMHAOIL.

Printed on plate paper, Letterpress in black and red, in envelope ready for posting, 1s. net.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	3	The Elethian Muse	15
Literature :		A Literary Causerie :
The Early English Drama		The Place of Wit in Poetry .	16
Society Again	5	Drama :
The Aeneid	6	"Antony and Cleopatra" at
Yorkshire Counterfeits	7	His Majesty's Theatre . .	17
Frail Immortals	8	Fine Art :
The Poetry of the Persian Renaissance	9	The Decay of Illustration .	18
Whitewashing Richard	10	Music :
Old Heidelberg	11	Handel's Indebtedness . . .	18
English Classics	12	Forthcoming Books	19
The Library Table	13	Correspondence	20
Logic and Life	15	Books Received	20
		The Bookshelf	21

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

NOTHING more striking is likely to be published about the New Year on which we have just entered than Mr. Thomas Hardy's poem in the Fortnightly. It takes the form of an interview between God and the poet. Seeing that there were ninety and nine reasons against the Supreme calling "From formless void this earth I tread," what hundredth reason, the poet asks, made Him do so? Bitter and hopeless is the reply:

Strange, that ephemeral creatures who
By my own ordering are,
Should see the shortness of my view,
Use ethic tests I never knew
Or made provision for!

And the end of the matter is that:

He sank to raptness as of yore,
And opening New Year's Day
Wove it by rote as theretofore,
And went on working evermore
In His unweaving way.

In theme the poem is similar to Tennyson's "By an Evolutionist," where much the same question is asked:

The Lord let the house of a brute to the soul of a man,
And the man said, "Am I your debtor?"
And the Lord—"Not yet: but make it as clean as you can,
And then I will let you a better."

But how different is the conclusion arrived at by Tennyson's evolutionist:

I have climb'd to the snows of Age, and I gaze at a field in the Past,
Where I sank with the body at times in the sloughs of a low desire,
But I hear no yelp of the beast, and the Man is quiet at last
As he stands on the heights of his life with a glimpse of a height that is higher.

When this passage was written it was accepted by many leading evolutionists of the time as an accurate description of their best beliefs, and it received special interest from its having been written in Tennyson's old age, just as Mr. Hardy's poem reads as though it were his final message. But forty years previously Tennyson had been plunged into the same kind of thought as that expressed by Mr. Hardy, when he wrote the famous canto of "In Memoriam":

"So careful of the type?" but no.
From scarped cliff and quarried stone
She cries, "A thousand types are gone:
I care for nothing, all shall go.

"Thou makest thine appeal to me:
I bring to life, I bring to death:
The spirit does but mean the breath
I know no more." And he, shall he,

Man, her last work, who seem'd so fair,
Such splendid purpose in his eyes,
Who roll'd the psalm to wintry skies,
Who built him fanes of fruitless prayer,

Who trusted God was love indeed
And love Creation's final law—
Tho' Nature, red in tooth and claw
With ravine, shriek'd against his creed—

Who loved, who suffer'd countless ills,
Who battled for the True, the Just,
Be blown about the desert dust,
Or seal'd within the iron hills?

He ends the soliloquy with a cri de cœur as poignant and as bleakly hopeless as the more stolid declaration of the novelist:

No more? A monster then, a dream,
A discord. Dragons of the prime,
That tare each other in their slime,
Were mellow music match'd with him.

O life as futile, then, as frail!
O for thy voice to soothe and bless!
What hope of answer, or redress?
Behind the veil, behind the veil.

Thus it seems that Mr. Hardy has found no answer beyond what was suggested half a century ago by Tennyson. But there is one essential difference between the two. Tennyson had been brought up in the shelter of the vicarage, and traditions and old associations suggested possible ways of exit from his blind alley; Mr. Hardy possesses no similar means of escape. He looks, however, with stubborn courage at facts as he sees them, and even those who do not agree with his opinions are compelled to admire his honesty.

In the Monthly Magazine Mr. Francis Duckworth essays to teach literary critics their business. It appears that he has been making some researches into what he calls "fictional criticism" in daily and weekly periodicals. He describes the typical method of noticing or reviewing in this way. "First the plot is given in outline; secondly, if any definite judgment is given, it is quite brief, and passed so to say, ex cathedra." This complaint has been heard frequently enough, but we do not, for one, moment admit that it contains any element of justice. Those who know how criticism is actually done are more likely to be surprised at the care and labour bestowed upon it than at its flippancy. Many of those brief notices at which Mr. Duckworth sneers are the result of hours of painstaking labour, and in a very great number of cases they represent a matured and impartial judgment. If each writer were to set forth his reasons for arriving at his judgment about every trumpery novel placed in his hands the weekly and daily press would either have to enlarge their columns or dispense with "fictional criticism," to repeat Mr. Duckworth's elegant phrase.

The Monthly Reviewer goes on to give the following sapient advice to journals:

Whereas a paper like the Daily Telegraph will reserve three-quarters of a column for such books as the "Times History of the War in the Far East," and four lines to the "Treasure of Heaven," it should devote a column and a half to the "Treasure of Heaven," and no space at all to the Times History. Then should we see in the Daily Mail vigorous articles disentangling the social creed of Dr. Conan Doyle; the Daily News would open its columns for fictitious correspondents to wrangle over the vividness of Mr. Rider Haggard and the moral code of Mr. William Le Queux's heroes; while the Globe might attempt some explanation of the popularity of Miss Rosa Nouchette Carey.

Is this jest or earnest, a weak gibe or a foolish suggestion?

A house at Vienna inhabited by Beethoven in 1824 has just been pulled down. Beethoven had many lodgings in the course of his long life and many were the reasons on account of which he left them. On one occasion it was because too many people hung about the door in the hope of seeing him; on another because he thought the landlord excessively polite. Perhaps the commonest cause of all was a favourite amusement of his, which consisted in dabbling his hands in water or pouring water over them in such a careless way that some of the liquid found an exit through the ceiling of the room beneath. In another case he was ejected by his landlady. One day he had been playing the piano to an extent that was unusual and the landlady's patience was entirely exhausted. "I can't stand that strumming any more," she said in effect to her daughter, "go and tell him he must go." The house in question was at the corner of the Kaerntnerstrasse and the Johannesgasse and near the theatre where the deaf composer was turned round so that he might see the excitement produced by his Ninth Symphony.

The late Mrs. Josephine Butler—whose death took place on Sunday at Wooler, in Northumberland—wrote several books that had nothing to do with her political and social crusades. Perhaps the most interesting of them was the life of her father, John Grey of Dilston, a remarkable man and a great agriculturist in his day. At the time of her birth he lived at Milfield, a village only a few miles from the place at which she died. She also wrote a Life of Catherine of Siena, "Recollections of George Butler," and the "Lady of Shunem." Nor did her literary activity end with this, as she had been continually employed in matters connected with the propagandum which she began early in life and continued almost to the day of her death.

There are some delightful sayings in the learned article on "Border History versus Border Ballads," contributed by Mr. Andrew Lang to the January number of the Cornhill. Here, for instance, is a type of the writer's humour: "I cannot go with the higher criticism which is ever too fanciful." After observing that ballads are becoming fields for the scientific folk-lorist and the curious historian, Mr. Lang goes on to say, "The man who does not care for 'Kinmont Willie' is the man who sneers at Dumas, who thinks that R. L. Stevenson is overrated, a dealer in perishable goods. If he were honest he would call Homer a tedious barbarian; he cares for nothing that is not 'up to date'; he uses, without shame, such words as 'happenings' and 'artistry,' 'A minstrel's malison is said.'"

Mr. Albert E. Cave, in the January number of the Contemporary Review, raises a vigorous protest against certain proceedings of what he calls the "newest journalism." His main point is that those whom he designates "hooligan journalists" do not play the game legitimately, but seek by questionable methods to raise the circulation of their paper and thereby turn journalism into a gold-mine. It is impossible to deny that there is a very great amount of truth in his contentions, but the most promising feature of the situation is that he and others are raising their voices against the degradation of letters. The only possible cure for such a state of affairs as exists lies in the formation of a strong and healthy public opinion, one that will welcome what is clean, pure and wholesome, and actively combat those who appeal to the gambling and other evil instincts of their readers.

Some interesting particulars are now obtainable about the Tata Institute, which is to find its permanent home in Mysore. Dr. W. Morris Travers, D.Sc., F.R.S., late Professor of Chemistry at University College, Bristol, has arrived in India to take up his post as Principal. A suitable site for the erection of the Institute has been chosen at Bangalore and the building arrangements are now under discussion between the Government of India and the Mysore Durbar, who will share the expense of erecting a suitable edifice. The endowment of the Institute is formed by the magnificent gift of the late Mr. Jamsetjee H. Tata, and since his death other donors have come forward to assist in the realisation of his great project. The Maharajah of Mysore, accompanied by Mr. Madhava Rao, C.I.E., and other members of his Government, is at present staying in Calcutta as the Viceroy's guest, and one of the chief objects of the visit is to arrange the constitution and governing body of the Institute. The latter will consist of representatives nominated by the Government of India, the Government of Mysore, the Tata family and other donors. The question of diplomas, degrees, and a charter will be allowed to stand over.

It is often asserted that poetry does not sell, but this statement is somewhat discounted by the fact that since the publication in the late autumn of the "Poetical Works of Walter C. Smith," close upon one thousand five hundred copies have been sold. It is over forty years since the "Bishop's Walk," Dr. Smith's first volume, was published, and succeeding volumes, "Olrig Grange," "Hilda," "Raban," etc., secured for the writer many admirers. In the last-mentioned book, Dr. Smith, who celebrated the other day the eighty-second anniversary of his birth, pays a fine tribute to an old friend and namesake, a "forgotten teacher of teachers," who pursued a humble calling in Aberdeen, and influenced Emeritus Professor Masson, George Macdonald, and other young men of their time who ultimately attained distinction. "Raban" closes with the following testimony:

Meanwhile he struggled, lonely, poor,
Indebted, slighted, and obscure,
And went through darkness into rest;
But yet, his thought with us abiding,
He lives in us when we are best,
He is but changed and multiplied.

In a contemporary, President Roosevelt has an article on "The Ancient Irish Sagas," illustrated by pictures which, to say the least, are not very Irish. For the most part he is content to give a sort of synopsis of the Sagas themselves, but the point of his contribution appears to lie in the regret he expresses that "America should have done so little, either in the way of original research in connection with the early Celtic literature, or in the way of popularising and familiarising that literature."

"It is much to be desired," he says, "that, wherever possible, chairs of Celtic should be established in our leading Universities." It is to be hoped that President Roosevelt's zeal will not lead to the same claim being put forward in Ireland. Of the Sagas he says:

The heroes are much like those of the early folk of kindred stock everywhere. They are huge, splendid barbarians, sometimes yellow-haired, sometimes black- or brown-haired, and their chief title to glory is found in their feats of bodily prowess. Among the feats often enumerated or referred to are the ability to leap like a salmon, to run like a stag, to hurl great rocks incredible distances, to toss the wheel, and, like the Norse berserkers, when possessed with the fury of battle, to grow demoniac with fearsome rage. This last feat was especially valued, and was recognised as the "heroes' fury."

The point is, as we have insisted before, that there is nothing in the so-called "literature" of Ireland to warrant it being called literature at all.

At the Victoria Hall, Ealing, on Saturday last a very interesting performance of The Importance of Being Ernest was given by an unusually talented Society of Amateurs calling themselves the "Hypocrites"; the proceeds going to The Children's League of Pity. The brilliant little comedy is obviously not very suitable to present to amateur audiences at Ealing; but it would be very difficult to find more clever impersonators for this exquisite Harlequinade outside the ranks of professional actors. The "Miss Prism" of Miss M. D. Smyth was an amazing interpretation which would have done credit to a large London theatre. Until last Saturday, since the immortal creation of the part by Mrs. George Canninge, there has never been seen, in the many revivals of the play, a lady who understood the rôle as the author conceived it. Mr. Gordon Jack as "John Worthing" and Mr. W. H. Martin as "Algernon" preserved the balance between the two heroes with surprising skill. It is fatal to this play if one of the male parts falls short of the other, but in their cases innate talent and earnest training were equally matched, and the greatest credit is due to the Stage Manager and Producer, while a word of special praise must be given to the "Lady Bracknell" of Mrs. Samuel Budd; hers is in some way the hardest part of all.

In spite, however, of these unusual advantages a large and well dressed middle-class audience sat in stony silence throughout the three acts as though it were listening to Hamlet or the Passion play at Oberammergau. Except when John Worthing appears in deep mourning not a laugh was heard in the vast hall, the acoustic properties of which seemed unusually good. As long as the curtain was down the applause was hearty enough though not enthusiastic. That the actors could have preserved their good humour throughout the riotous and delightful nonsense of the last act was not the least meritorious part of their performance. The "Hypocrites" ought to put up Ghosts or some play more in accord with the spirits of their Ealing patrons who seem, to use a phrase of Mr. Anstey's, like "a lot of halfpenny ices."

The report of the Commission on Art Institutions of Dublin has pleased nobody. The Royal Hibernian Academy, in whose interest the Royal Commission was instituted, are indignant because the Commissioners have not recommended that they shall be provided with a fine new house in a fashionable situation. Worse still, the Commission proposes to deprive them of their Life School, in which for several years the proportion of students has been that of sixteen women to one man. The Commission propose that a new Life School, with new Professors, should be established in the Metropolitan School of Art, under the partial control of an outside committee "consisting mainly of members of independent views on art teaching" whose chief duty it shall be to select the teachers in the Life School.

As a counterblast to this document a minority report has been published, signed by Mr. Justice Madden and Mr. Boland, M.P., who recommend that a new Academy building should be provided by the State, in which the Modern Art Gallery collection should be housed. They further recommend the endowment of bursaries or exhibitions for students at the Academy schools, and are of opinion that only in the strengthening of the Royal Hibernian Academy can salvation be found for the student of art in Ireland.

So far, popular opinion is in sympathy with the Academy. But the impartial observer cannot close his eyes to the fact that the teaching given during the past few years in the R.H.A. schools has been wholly unsatisfactory. Whether it would be any better in a school partly managed by a Department which already has too many irons in the fire, and partly by that wonderful committee of "independent views" is open to question. But with the recommendation of a building for the Modern Art Gallery all intelligent people will sympathise. Good modern pictures are a necessity for the Irish art student; and whether the collection be housed in the Academy or in a separate building, housed it should be, and at once.

ERRATA.—Owing to printer's errors "Panegyricus" (p. 648, l. 5) and "Boetus" (p. 648, l. 6) appeared in our last issue as "Panegyrics" and "Bocotes."

LITERATURE

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY AGAIN

The Dramatic Writings of Edwards, Norton, and Sackville. Anonymous Plays, second series. (Privately printed for subscribers by the Early English Drama Society.)

READERS of the ACADEMY may remember that in reviewing the first batch of plays published by the Early English Drama Society we took the opportunity of asking in what respect this "society" was really a society at all. We further pointed out that the text of a play which we took the trouble to collate for ourselves contained a number of gross errors, and that these errors were taken over bodily from the edition of Dodsley's Old Plays, re-edited by Mr. Hazlitt in 1874, though (as we afterwards discovered) most of them went back a century earlier still, to the time of Hawkins's "Origin of the English Drama" (1773). As a consequence of our review Dr. Furnivall and Mr. Henry Bradley, two of six well-known scholars who had allowed their names to be used as honorary vice-presidents of the "society," publicly withdrew from it. The "society," as represented by its editor, Mr. Farmer, and its "secretary," Mr. Gibbings, who carries on his business as a publisher at the same address as the "society" gives on its title-page, announced its intention of going on without the added grace of honorary vice-presidents. It was announced, also, in reply to our inquiries, that the "society" did not intend to publish a balance-sheet (a slight formality with which most societies hitherto have thought well to comply); but an explanation of why the errors in the text printed by Mr. Hazlitt in 1874 were perpetuated in 1906 was unkindly withheld on the humorous ground that our review was anonymous.

The "society" has continued to send us its successive volumes, a sportsmanlike course of action which commands our admiration. We were unable to do much in the way of testing the two volumes which arrived in the summer. Two more have now been sent us, and in order to see to what extent Mr. Farmer has mended his ways we devoted a Saturday afternoon to collating a couple of sheets of one of the plays, Damon and Pithias, with the editions in the British Museum, upon which the text professes to be based.

It may be well to give chapter and verse for this profession. It is printed, according to the curious editorial arrangements of the series, in the "Note-Book and Word-List," on page 161.

Damon and Pithias. The text of this play, which will be found on pp. 1-84, has been taken from the edition of 1571, which, in turn, has been collated with that of 1582.

In the face of this statement, which should certainly imply that the text was taken direct from the source stated, we have some curiosity to know how Mr. Farmer will account for the fact that the following errors in the reproduction of sheets C and D of the 1571 edition, appear once more to be taken over bodily from Mr. Hazlitt's edition of Dodsley's Old Plays published in 1874. Our page references are to the "society's" edition.

Which amity first sprung—without vaunting be it spoken, that is true—
Of likeness of manners, took root by company, and now is conserved by virtue. (P. 18.)

For "likeness" the 1571 edition reads "likelines," that of 1582 "lykelinesse."

Pythagoras said, that this world was like a stage,
Whereon many play their parts: the lookers-on, the sage.
Philosophers are, saith he, whose part is to learn
The manners of all nations, and the good from the bad to discern.
(P. 19.)

The comma after "lookers-on" and the full stop which separates "sage" from "Philosophers" are printed by Mr. Hazlitt, but are not printed in the original editions.

To join the two words into a phrase the second edition even indulges in the luxury of a capital for the adjective :

Let them bark that lust at this kind of gain,
He is a fool that for his profit will not pain. (P. 20.)

The original editions read "will not take payne." Mr. Farmer follows Mr. Hazlitt in omitting "take."

On page 21 we have found nothing worse than the modernisation of "swarveth," where it rhymes with "starveth," into "swerveth." As the editor professes some tenderness for rhyme-endings he might have restored the original spelling, but this may be thought a matter of opinion. In any case this and the four following pages stand to his credit :

Such a one as viewed every weak place in the city,
Survieu'd the haven and each bulwark in talk very witty;
And yet by some words himself he did bewray. (P. 26.)

It is plain that, despite the colon, "in talk very witty" expresses a new idea which is followed up in the next line. The old editions showed this to some extent by placing a comma after "bulwark." Mr. Farmer has followed Mr. Hazlitt in omitting it.

He suddenly fell in dump. (P. 27.)

The first edition reads: "He suddenly fell in a dump." The second edition omits the article, and Mr. Farmer follows Mr. Hazlitt in omitting it also, without noting its occurrence in the earlier text. We have no fault to find with page 28.

But, O music, as in joyful times thy merry notes did borrow,
(P. 29.)

The original editions read (1571) "I did borow," (1582) "I did borrow."

My woe no tongue can tell,
No pen can well descry. (P. 30.)

The original editions read "Ne pen," where "ne" (i.e., "nor") cannot be correctly "modernised" into "no."

Dionysius, of late so pleasant and merry,
Is quite changed now into such melancholy,
That nothing can please him: he walketh up and down
Fretting and chaffing, on every man he doth frown. (P. 32.)

Here the Dodsley editor seems to have worked from the 1582 edition, which in the third line has the obviously wrong reading "walked," tempting an editor to alter it to "walketh." In the 1571 edition the reading is "walkes." So also in the next line the spelling "chaffing," which suggests a more genial attitude towards his court than could have been looked for from Dionysius, is supported by the second edition. The first edition has "chafyng," and if Mr. Farmer had worked on the first edition independently it can hardly be doubted that "chafing" is what he would have printed.

One pathetic instance of the extent to which Mr. Hazlitt's text dominates this edition is found on page 19 and the note to it on page 163. Latin was not a strong point with the printers of the original editions, and they printed a well-known tag in the appalling form: "omnis solum fortis patria." Mr. Hazlitt (or was it his predecessor Mr. Collier?) knew quite well how this ought to be edited, but one of those transpositions of letters which sometimes happen even after the last proof has been passed in absolute accuracy caused the line to appear in his text as: "Omne solum forti patria" [sic]. Mr. Farmer's printer apparently disliked the word "patria," and in his text it appears as "patria." But the last word of the Early English Drama Society was not yet said, for on page 163 there is the delightful and refreshing note:

Omne solum forti patria (19d), read patria.

Of course subscribers to the E.E.D.S. may enjoy this kind of humour, but we cannot help still feeling sore that it should be put on the market as the work of an English "Society." Bad as the work is, it is somewhat better than that in the earlier volume which we tested, and this not entirely because Mr. Hazlitt's text also is better. If the series is continued long enough it is possible that the improvement may become more marked, and if Mr. Farmer were working only in his own name what happens in the intermediate stages would be a matter to be settled between himself and his subscribers. By placing on it what should be considered a hall-mark, to which it does not appear to be entitled, the editor and secretary of the "society" oblige us to repeat our protest.

THE AENEID

The Aeneid of Virgil. Translated into English verse by JAMES RHOADES. New edition. (Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE fact that Mr. Rhoades's blank verse translation of the Aeneid has reached a second edition is a proof of its acceptability. It is literal, unshackled by the fetters of rhyme, and of a fairly elevated style: insurgit aliquando, as Quintilian said of Horace. But it does not aim at line-for-line reproduction, thus escaping the hard condition imposed upon himself by Mr. Billson, whose highly meritorious version we recently reviewed.

To speak generally of Mr. Rhoades's work, we would say that his diction is excellent. He has succeeded wonderfully in combining fidelity to the original with elegance and vigour. He applies, as a critic of his first edition observed, "a very strenuous type of poetic expression to the problem of interpreting Virgil." But he has not mastered the rhythm of blank verse, without which the great lines of Virgil will never find their final rendering. Such a feat could have been performed by the poet of "Tithonus," and might yet be achieved by the author of "Atalanta in Calydon" and of "Erechtheus." In this respect Mr. Rhoades seems to us to fall short of those who have recently essayed his metre—Canon Thornhill and Mr. Billson. Here is a sample from the beginning of the first book:

Here were her arms, her chariot here, that this Should, fate consenting, a world-empire be,
E'en then the goddess aimed with fond desire.
Nathless she had heard that from the blood of Troy,
A race was rearing destined to o'erthrow
Her Tyrian towers; that issuing hence should come
A people of wide empire, lords of war,
To ravage Libya: such the round of fate.

A few lines further on ego quae divom incedo regina loses its queenliness in Juno's mouth when rendered by Mr. Rhoades:

I who walk the queen of heaven;

or by Mr. Billson:

I who walk
The Queen of Gods;

but is as stately as the Latin in Thornhill's version:

While I who queen it through these courts of heaven, which, in addition to its vigour, conveys a charming reminiscence of the "courts of heaven" of a noble passage in Shakespeare.

A piece of fine diction in description of another goddess, i. 402-405, is marred by the close-packing of the second line:

She spake, and turning shone with rosy neck;
Her head's ambrosial locks breathed scent divine;
And, as her robe flowed downward to her feet,
She stepped no doubtful goddess.

Mr. Billson's version runs more smoothly:

She said, and turned; all rosy flashed her neck;
The ambrosial locks a heavenly fragrance breathed,
Her vesture flowed to earth, and by her gait
The goddess stood confest.

In a very celebrated line (i. 461) which almost defies reproduction in another tongue,

Sunt lacrimae rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt,

Mr. Billson, by his very vagueness, is the most effective of the three blank verse translators whom we have been comparing:

Tears fall, and hearts are touched by mortal things.

Mr. Rhoades is more explicit:

And there are tears for what befalls, and hearts
Touched by the chances of mortality.

Thornhill appears to take rerum as meaning "in the world":

Here man with man
Weeps kindly drops, and here poor human hearts
Are touched to sympathy by human ills.

But this is eminently one of those passages which are the despair of translators, because, in the words of Mr. Rhoades's modest and graceful preface:

If it is impossible to reach perfection in the rendering of any poem from one language to another, it is past impossible when the two languages are so remotely akin as Latin and English, and when the style of the author was even in his own tongue unapproachable for subtle delicacy and artistic finish.

We have little space for further comparative extracts, but here is a passage (iv. 165-172) which would triumphantly stand that test. It is the meeting of Aeneas and Dido driven by the storm during the hunt into the same cave, and it is eminently characteristic of him whom Bacon called "The chastest poet and royalest that to the memory of man is known." How differently would Ovid or Lucan have portrayed the incident. We will not even think of Juvenal. The manly chasteness and princely dignity of the Latin is almost achieved in:

The Trojan prince
And Dido to the self-same cavern come.
Earth first and bridal Juno gave the sign;
Flashed at the nuptials fire and conscious air,
And shouted from their topmost peak the nymphs.
First day of death was that, first cause of ill;
Sway'd nor by outward show nor rumour's tongue
Dido of secret passion dreams no more:
Marriage she calls it—name to mask her fall.

The same scene is treated in a very different spirit by a modern rhymester, James Smith, in his "Comic Miscellanies":

Virgil, whose epic song enthral,
(And who in song is greater?),
Throughout, his Trojan hero calls
Now pious and now pater.

But when, the worst intent to brave,
With sentiments that pain us
Queen Dido meets him in the cave,
He dubs him dux Trojanus.

And well he alters there the word:
For in this station, sure,
Pius Aeneas were absurd,
And pater premature.

In the famous imperialistic manifesto of vi. 846-853, that "barbaric yawp," as Walt Whitman would call it, which is too familiar to be quoted, Mr. Rhoades has the glory of not falling into the error of translating by "tell the rising stars" the Latin words surgentia sidera dicent. "Tell" thus used could only mean "count," as in "I may tell all my bones," and dicent could not mean "count." The adjacent Marcellus passage, vi. 878-886, is so fine in the Latin and so well done into English that we cannot forbear from giving it:

Mourn for his goodness, for his old-world faith,
His hand in war unconquer'd! Man to man
None could have grappled him unscathed, on foot
Strode he against the foeman, or with spur
Goaded the red flanks of his foaming steed.
O boy, our sorrow, if any way thou could'st
Burst the harsh bonds that doom thee, thou shalt be Marcellus. Bring me lilies with full hands,
The bright flowers let me strew, these gifts at least
Heap o'er his shade, and the vain tribute pay.

We must give one more comparative extract. Mr. Billson is very successful in this passage:

O for love and faith!
O for the hand invincible in war!
Him none confronting in the shock of arms
Had met unscathed, or if he charged afoot
Or if he spur'd the horse's foaming flanks,
Ah, boy, the pity! Could'st thou sunder fate
Thou wert Marcellus! Give me purple flowers,
Handfuls of lilies: let me strew at least
O'er his dear Shade these unavailing dues.

Father-in-law and son-in-law are, it must be owned, unpoetical expressions, though the Latin poets did not eschew them, while they seem to have avoided avunculus. Catullus refers to generos, and socer and gener are brought together in Aen. vi. 830, 831. Mr. Billson does not abhor "son-in-law," while Mr. Rhoades dexterously shirks the word thus:

From the Alps'
Heap'd barriers and Monoecus' citadel
The sire descending, while his daughter's lord
Confronts him with the armies of the East!

We have not left ourselves space to examine the last six books, but they are not so rich in memorable passages, though Virgil himself thought the last six books the best. The visit to Evander is well rendered, and especially good is Evander's kingly greeting to Aeneas, which Dryden enthusiastically admired (viii. 362 ff.):

Dare to spurn riches, O my guest, and shape
Thyself to worthy godship, and approach
All undisdainful of our humble board.

The beautiful episode of Nisus and Euryalus in the ninth book is worthily treated, and the crescent splendour of the last book is duly depicted.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

YORKSHIRE COUNTERFEITS

The Yorkshire Coiners and Old and Prehistoric Halifax. By H. LING ROTH, Hon. Curator, Bankfield Museum, (Halifax: F. King & Sons, Ltd., 21s. net.)

IN the year 1782, John Cockroft, woollen manufacturer, of Sand Hall, Halifax, was "surprized at Work in his Garrett" by officers acting on a Warrant of Search:

being then edging Counterfeit Shillings by means of his Throw Wheel and a File, which he had not Time to part with. He leap'd down at a Trap Door with the File in his Hand. . . . The following Implements were found in his House and Shop, viz:

One Pair of Steel Rollers with Frames and Winches.
One Machine for cutting Blanks.
One Throw Wheel.
One Smith's Anvil.
Three Pieces of Blue Crucible Pots.
Eleven Files.
A Quantity of Silver Turnings.
Ditto of Salt of Tartar.
Etc. etc.

It was a compromising outfit for a woollen manufacturer, but that is not the reason it is mentioned here. Rather, it is quoted as a comment on Mr. Ling Roth's statement that "there appear to be no proofs for thinking that the merchants and manufacturers carried on this lucrative business with the coiners." And the odd thing is that Mr. Roth himself quotes Cockroft's case.

That, at this time of day, is the whole point—whether the better sort joined in or not. It makes the difference between history and a Newgate chronicle. The business of history is rather with the prevalence of criminal ideas than with isolated crimes, and of crime we may in a sense say, as doctors say of burns, that the danger lies rather in the extent than in the depth. If, as Mr. Roth inclines to think, the better sort held aloof, his record loses much of its significance.

But did they? We hardly think so. Mr. Roth's own book furnishes us with testimony to the contrary. In the first place, we have the remarkably explicit statement of John Waterhouse, that he himself "had actually seen a ledger in which the various transactions had been kept in a regular manner, consisting of consignments of guineas to the coiners and their reimbursements to their depositors." When Leyland asked Waterhouse whether he could not get a sight of this ledger, "he at once told me that I could not, for it would implicate some of the first families in the neighbourhood." It is hardly to be supposed that a Fellow of a Society of Antiquaries would deliberately mislead on a point of antiquarianism, but Mr. Roth merely remarks, "From what I can gather, John Waterhouse had a weakness for claiming universal knowledge . . . and for mystifying people." It is unsatisfactory. Leyland himself evidently credited the statement, and it is to Leyland more than to any one else that Mr. Roth is, after all, indebted. In the meantime the ledger remains undiscovered.

Further, in support of his view that this evil of counterfeiting was confined to illiterate "marksmen," Mr. Roth advances little more than the general meeting of the Justices of the Riding convened by the Marquis of Rockingham. That certainly is not enough. It is significant that even this meeting was not called until after the murder of Supervisor Deighton, when something had to be done. Deighton had failed, apparently, to rouse them to any enthusiasm during his life, but they could not pass over his death. Moreover, until Deighton had come they had done nothing whatever, and it therefore amounts to very little that when they did meet they promptly passed a vote of confidence in themselves, extolling their own conduct as "highly commendable and meritorious." It was the least they could do. Treasury action, too, was taken within a fortnight, and that would be likely to make local magistrates monstrously zealous. And do we not read in the Leeds Mercury, December 19, 1769, an admission of, and excuse for, "the general relaxation of justice, owing to the want of a sufficient number of acting Magistrates"? There is every indication that the evil was widely spread, and that the class was not alone guilty which furnished the men for the gallows at York. Cockroft's case and Waterhouse's statement (to mention but two points) can hardly, we think, be ignored.

But it is better to make acknowledgments to Mr. Roth for much curious and interesting matter now published (as he claims and we believe) for the first time, than to regret the absence of things that probably never will be brought to light. It is not Mr. Roth's diligence that is at fault. No doubt he himself would gladly know more of the notorious King David and his brother, Isaac Hartley. These were the great villains of the piece, and we have little record of them. One was hanged early in the drama, the other died at eighty-six, in agonies and writhings. And we are the more keenly curious about this King David from the glimpses Mr. Roth affords us of such men as Thomas and innkeeper Bates. He was certainly no ordinary man who could maintain an ascendancy over such a man as Thomas, for instance. It was Thomas who loaded the blunderbuss with such care that it "would have gone off if he had spitted on it"; and it was Thomas again who said to his accomplice, "I can tell thee how to get to bed" (where they were supposed to be) "so a Cat cannot hear thee." And such details as those in the evidence of innkeeper Bates (who "could never manage it himself upon any account") are luminous and instinct with character.

Very curious is the way in which formal depositions, obviously spoken in the dialect, were put into as good Law English as was possible in the circumstances. The question "What art thou for?" (on p. 23) can still be heard any night in any inn in any village in Yorkshire; and it was a homely remark of Bates's that Crabtree "might light of Chaps [coiners] in a many places by all reports," but that he himself would never meddle any more with it, "for I would not if I was to want Bread." It is all very human, and Mr. Roth's book is full of such things. But the coming to light of Waterhouse's ledger would add much to the story as it now stands. It is a thousand pities about that ledger.

FRAIL IMMORTALS

Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era. By JOHN FYVIE.
(Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

It is not clear for whom this book is intended. Certainly not for students of the drama, for Mr. Fyvie's references to the theatrical history of his heroines are neither full nor critical. And if for students of scandal, then Mr. Fyvie falls very short, as a purveyor of that delectable substance, of Mr. Noel Williams, whose two volumes on the French actresses are at least diverting. Mr. Fyvie is a little too reticent to be a good scandalmonger, and too little technical to be a good historian of the stage; and his sketches, though written from an independent point of view and clearly the result of much original study of his subjects, offer little that is new on the details of their private lives, and nothing on the subject of their professional careers.

Even so, so great is the charm of these dead beauties, whose laughter still rings down the ages, that we have read the book with interest, grateful for being reminded of Clivy-Pivy, the Jordan, the immortal Peg, the original Polly Peachum, and for finding in a handy form the strange histories of lesser lights, the eccentric Charlotte Charke, Colley Cibber's youngest daughter, who dressed for many years in the clothes of a man, followed the callings of actress, author, hawker, sausage-maker, confectioner, valet to a nobleman, beggar (and perhaps worse), waiter, publican, market-gardener; and the more than eccentric Mary ("Becky") Wells, whose "friend" was Major Topham, the founder of the original World, a paper on which her editorial and managerial labours were of great value; who imagined that George III. was in love with her and chased him day after day in a sailing-boat during his cruise after his recovery from madness; who became a Jewess in order to marry Sumbel, a wealthy Moroccan Jew, and ended up by marrying a waterman of the Thames.

It is good work, too, to remind us that Kitty Clive wrote several not at all unsuccessful plays, and to expose the truth about the Mrs. Steele who played a strange and apparently disgraceful, if somewhat obscure, part in the life of the unhappy Sophia Baddeley. Of the twelve ladies in the volume only one—Elizabeth Farren, afterwards Countess of Derby—can be said with certainty to have lived a "respectable" life. But, without instituting comparisons between the Georgian and the Edwardian stage, we may be permitted to protest against the too common notion that all actresses before our own day were monsters of iniquity. Such a union as that between Mrs. Jordan and the Duke of Clarence was, according to the ideas of the time, quite equal in respectability to a morganatic marriage. She was recognised as the head of the household, and even handed to her seat at the head of the table by the Regent. And even in less reputable cases the state of opinion at the time must be considered. The stage had not yet, for all Garrick's achievement, outlived the old ecclesiastical and social ban, and the position of woman has always been (and possibly may continue to be) that which man makes for her. The position that man made for actresses in the eighteenth century was one that almost prohibited marriage except with a very great or a very small man. With any one between the two, it was considered perfectly natural—and certainly no aggravation of the initial offence of being an actress—that an actress should form an unlicensed connection. She was not a marriageable woman. She hardly aspired to the position. An "establishment," with a view to a settlement on separation, was all that she hoped for, and since the age did not think wrong of it, she cannot be blamed for not thinking wrong of it herself. And, to come to extreme cases—Peg Woffington, for instance—it is well to cast a glance at the surroundings in which they spent their youth.

The author of these Memoirs has seen the part of the Widow Brady (a breeches part) in the farce of The Irish Widow, played in high-heeled shoes, a shift, and a loose greatcoat, the poverty of the wardrobe not affording better accommodation. He remembers also to have seen the part of Captain Plume, in The Recruiting Officer, enacted in a red stuff coat, and a laced waistcoat, and yellow plush breeches, borrowed from the footman of the parish Rector. And being once behind the scenes of a theatre erected in a barn, and observing a gentleman decked in a very gaudy suit, without any stockings, he inquired whether the part he was going to perform required his legs to be naked; and was informed that the gentleman's wife was then on, using the stockings, and that as he did not appear at the same time with her . . . he was waiting till she took them off in order to his putting them on.

Thus Mr. Fyvie quotes from the biographer of Elizabeth Farren, and to such a sketch we need hardly add the Hogarth picture of the strolling actresses dressing in a barn, which is reproduced as the frontispiece of the book, to realise the squalor, and the inevitable accompaniment of squalor—vice—which were the lot of the stroller in those days. There were scoundrels, too, like the Daly of Dublin, who poisoned the early years of Mrs. Jordan, to be reckoned with. And even such downfalls as that of poor George Anne Bellamy, who started with everything in her favour, may be ascribed as much to ill-luck in the choice of a protector as to inherent vice.

We hear complaints to-day of the publicity given in the press to the private lives of actors and actresses. It is nothing to the publicity forced upon them a century ago. To-day competition is so keen that the player who desires to advertise himself must be careful to keep the papers and the photographers informed of such details of his private life as he wishes to see published, while even in clubs and other places where they gossip the rest is only gingerly handled. A hundred years ago details which men scarcely speak of to-day were displayed in all the glory of transparent innuendo, italics, capitals and dashes, in the newspapers. Mr. Fyvie gives a good example of this in the quotations concerning Mrs. Jordan and the Duke of Clarence, and a passage from the Morning Post on Colonel Tarleton and Mary Robinson, which is almost unquotable. Here is another specimen:

Little Pickle's assumed character of the Tar was a prelude only to her future nautical fame; for though pressed into the service, she has consented, we find, to be close moored under the guns of the Royal Commodore.

What would be thought of a paper that published such paragraphs to-day? It might be argued that publicity should have acted as a deterrent from irregular conduct. Experience shows it to be all the other way. Players were not treated with the respect that they have earned in our own time, and without respect there is small chance of respectability.

It is better to turn from the glare of the "private" lives of these admirable but often unhappy women to the contemplation of their histrionic achievements: but the artistic history of the stage, like its scientific history, remains to be written. The world is too easily content to believe that because the material of the actor's art—his limbs, his face and his voice—dies with him, it is impossible to reconstruct his work; and it is content with the dull details of the chroniclers or the gossip of the scandal-mongers. We can never hear Mrs. Jordan laugh, nor Lavinia Fenton sing; but it should not be impossible to reconstruct, from portraits and the testimony of eye-witnesses, something of the artistic methods of public favourites and good actresses like these. The prevalence and period of "tone," the amount of communication and confidence passed directly to the audience, the degree to which the actress was absorbed in her part and the degree to which she remained her individual self on the stage—these are some of the questions to which attention might be directed. Meanwhile, those who wish to make a first acquaintance with a few of the comic actresses of the Georgian era will find Mr. Fyvie a fairly trustworthy guide.

THE POETRY OF THE PERSIAN RENAISSANCE

A Literary History of Persia from Firdawsī to Sa'dī. By EDWARD G. BROWNE. (Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.)

OF all the literatures of the nations of the Orient the literature of Persia is certainly the most agreeable to the English taste. The striking resemblance which obtains between the genius of Shelley, one of the greatest of English lyrical poets, and the genius of Jalálu'ddīn Rūmī, one of the greatest of Persian lyrical poets, is not wholly a matter of chance. The Persian mind occupies in the Eastern world a position similar to that which the English mind occupies in the Western world. It combines in a new form the qualities of two races with different characteristics. It inherited the richness of imagination and depth of thought of the Aryan genius of India, as the English mind inherited the like qualities of the Teutonic spirit: it acquired the practical ability and clearness of vision of the Semitic genius of Arabia, as the English mind acquired the like qualities of the Latin spirit. The effect of the Arab Conquest of Persia in 651 was similar to the effect of the Norman Conquest of England in 1066. For three hundred years and more, the indigenous civilisations of the subjected peoples were submerged by the civilisations introduced by their conquerors: the English were connected with the intellectual life of the northern shores of the Mediterranean; the Persians with that of the southern. In neither case, however, was the spirit of the nation broken, though its language, its frame of mind and its customs were modified. It assimilated and blended with the original elements of its genius everything that was forced upon it, and thereby it became in its turn a conquering race with a rich and potent civilisation of its own. The victories of Sultan Mahmūd of Ghazna were the signal for the renaissance of Persian literature, as the victories of Edward III. were the signal for the renaissance of English literature.

The Persians had already begun in the tenth century to collect and relate in prose the stories of their Zoroastrian kings and legendary heroes when Mahmūd, by his conquest of North-Western India, brought them again into close communion with Indian thought, and enhanced their pride in the ancient glories of their race and in their Indo-European traditions. Mahmūd was remarkable not only for his ability in war, but also for his passion for learning and his talent for poetry. In the verses which he is said to have written shortly before his death he moralises in a manner that reminds an English reader of the work of King Alfred, but the triteness of thought is redeemed by a certain energy of style. This is a difficult thing to translate into another language, and much of it has escaped in our version of the famous palinode of the great conqueror:

As flesh is thrall to spirit, the splendour and wealth of the land
Were thrall to the might of my sword and the strength of my strong right hand.

Now clothed in glory and gladness, I lived in the land of my birth:
Now veiled in terror and darkness, I trampled the kingdoms of earth.
Oh! high and great I appeared when exulting in conquest I came;
But now I know that peasant and prince in their end are the same.
Behold these skulls that moulder to dust in the dust of the grave!
Which is the skull of the king and which is the skull of the slave?

One turn of my hand and the gate of the strongest of strongholds gave way;
One touch to my horse and an army of enemies broke in dismay.
But now Death comes against me what profits the power of my sword?

The Lord alone endures, and dominion belongs to the Lord.

Like many men of action the Sultan was of simple faith and averse from all kinds of heresy; and he was displeased when Firdawsī, the greatest of many poets attached to his Court, composed the epic, "The Book of Kings," which remains the greatest utterance and most powerful instrument of the national spirit of Persia. For in that work the pagan traditions of the people were revived and consolidated. In such tales as that of "Sohrab and Rostum," splendidly paraphrased by Matthew Arnold, Firdawsí lowered, indirectly but effectually, the renown of the heroes of Islam by exalting the fame of the heroes of the infidel faith of his native country. The epic poet prepared the way for the popular religion of dissent that found expression in the miracle plays of Persia, as the lyrical poets prepared the way for the philosophic religion of dissent that found expression in the mystical poetry of Persia. The result was that heterodoxy, in some form or another, became the note of Persian literature. Some writers were sceptics, like Avicenna, the contemporary of Firdawsí and author of the famous epigram:

Up from Earth's Centre through the Seventh Gate
I rose, and on the Throne of Saturn sat,
And many a Knot unravelled by the Road;
But not the Master-Knot of Human Fate—which FitzGerald has included in his version of the quatrains of a now famous Persian man of science of a later age. Most of the poets, however, were inclined to mysticism. Even from the scurrilous works of Sa'dí, as Professor Browne observes, one may cull many passages of a beauty and of a fineness of sentiment worthy of Meister Eckhardt or Thomas à Kempis. In mediæval Persia, as in modern England, the movement of scepticism deepened the religious feeling of the people. It weakened the base of the religion of authority, and strengthened the foundation of the religion of experience. Avicenna and Omar Khayyám were only the forerunners of Attár and Jalálu'ddín Rúmí.

Jalálu'ddín was a contemporary of St. Francis of Assisi. He, too, was a man of great sweetness and holiness of character, and the founder of an order of mendicant monks that is still one of the great spiritual forces of the world. We fancy that St. Francis was known to him by fame, for he said to a disciple who contemned the Christians: "One of the greatest of God's most cherished saints is a man who now lives in poverty in a certain town of Europe." Like most of the eminent Persian mystics, Jalálu'ddín was remarkably free from religious prejudice. "I am neither a Christian," he said, "nor a Muslim"; but he certainly had far more in common even with the orthodox Christian than with the orthodox Muslim, and it is difficult to see in what essential point his creed differed from that of the Neo-Platonic School of Christianity. In the matter of literary genius, as we have remarked, he reminds one of Shelley: in the matter of spiritual genius, however, he resembles more closely Crashaw. It is impossible for any one who has not as supreme a command of the harmonies of the English language as had Milton to translate adequately one of his beautiful lyrical odes. As his editor, Mr. R. A. Nicholson, finely says, a single line is sometimes an orchestra in itself. But in the invocation to Saint Teresa in "The Flaming Heart," Crashaw has caught the very accent and spirit of Jalálu'ddín's poetry, if not all its large music:

O thou undaunted daughter of desires!
By all thy dower of lights and fires;
By all the eagle in thee, all the dove;
By all thy lives and deaths of love;
By thy large draughts of intellectual day,
And by thy thirsts of love more large than they;
By all thy brim-fill'd bowls of fierce desire;
By thy last morning's draught of legend fire;
By the full kingdom of that final kiss
That seized thy parting soul, and seal'd thee His;
By all the Heaven thou hast in Him
(Fair Sister of the Seraphim!)
By all of Him we have in thee;
Leave nothing of myself in me.
Let me so read thy life, that I
Unto all life of mine may die.

So Jalálu'ddín invoked his master Shams-i-Tabriz. "By all of Him we have in thee," that is an admirable expression of the esoteric doctrine of the Persian mystic. In his view, every noble teacher of religion who could quicken in him the life of the spirit was, to some extent, a partaker of the Divine Nature. He believed, in fine, in a natural and continual revelation throughout the ages.

All the mystical poets of Persia sang to this one clear harp in divers tones: Saná'í, Attár, Jalálu'ddín, and Jámí, they were all seers who tried "to justify the ways of God to man"; and their successors are to be found in modern Persia.

In order to show the extraordinary interest of the work under review, we have discussed some of the literature of the period covered by Professor Browne, instead of attempting the impossible task of examining his work in detail. The virtue or the defect of his book is that it is an encyclopædia of the results of first-hand research. It is designed for the benefit of the man of learning rather than for the delectation of the lover of letters. Carlyle would have called it a magnificent piece of navvy work, but it is navvy work of a valuable kind.

WHITEWASHING RICHARD

Richard III.: his life and character reviewed in the light of recent research. By Sir CLEMENTS MARKHAM. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

THERE is nothing more fascinating than the attempt to whitewash an historical scoundrel. To be able to prove that you alone are right and that the verdict of history is wholly wrong is perhaps the highest pleasure an historical writer can obtain, but to do this successfully two things are essential—a power of appreciating evidence and its value, and a habit of original research—in neither of which does Sir Clements Markham excel. He seems to imagine that to repeat a statement over and over again makes it true, and that citations from earlier writers take the place of original documents. We do not suggest that time and labour have not been spent on the book; but we demur to the author's statement that "the present work is about as complete as very frequent revision can make it."

The proposition that the book seeks to prove is that the two sons of Edward IV. did not die in the reign of Richard III. but survived until after the accession of Henry VII. There is a great deal more that is sought to be proved, but this is the central proposition, and if this be established it may be taken that Sir Clements Markham has gone a long way towards proving his case. We have stated his proposition in its crudest form, left out all question of murder, and put it simply as a matter of fact. What was the date at which the princes died? Edward IV. died on April 9, 1483, leaving two sons—Edward V. and Richard Duke of York—and five daughters surviving him. Sir Clements Markham assumes as proved that these children were all illegitimate on the ground that Edward IV. had been contracted to Eleanor Lady Butler before his marriage to Elizabeth Woodville, so that therefore there was no object in his getting rid of the princes. All that can be said is that the evidence is not such as proves anything of the sort. It is not, however, of any great importance in the way we have stated the case. The princes went to the Tower in June 1483; they never came out. This is admitted; the only question is, when did they die. The usually accepted version is that it was in August 1485. Sir Clements Markham says: "there are two pieces of evidence, one of them positive evidence, that they were alive throughout the reign of Richard III." It is unfortunate that these pieces of evidence on which the whole theory turns are not given fully. All that is said is that "in the orders for King Richard's household dated after the death of his own son children are mentioned of such high rank that they were to be served before all other Lords. The only children who could occupy such a position were the sons of Edward IV. and the son of Eleanor." No reference is given to what orders are here mentioned and the exact words of the order relied on are not quoted. It would be unfair to cite any passage from the orders as disproving this assertion, for Sir Clements would reply that it was not the passage that he meant. As the matter now stands the first so-called piece of evidence proves nothing, certainly not the inference sought to be drawn from it that "the conclusion must be that all his [Richard III.'s] nephews were members of his household and that they were only sent to Sheriff Hutton and to the Tower when danger threatened the realm from the invasion of Henry Tudor." This is certainly a very large inference to draw from a very slight premiss.

The next piece of evidence is a warrant of March 9, 1485, given in Rymer, directing Henry Davy to deliver unto the footman for the Lord Bastard certain articles of apparel, and this it is said must be meant for Edward V.; he was a lord and was a bastard and was therefore the Lord Bastard. Lingard has given his view that this order was for Richard III.'s own illegitimate son, John of Gloucester. This Sir Clements will not admit, and says that this person was called the bastard son of the King, not the Lord Bastard. This is a fair point for consideration and he is entitled to rely on it for what it is worth; but he is not entitled to say that from it he has proved "that Edward was alive and well treated in March 1485, four months before the death of Richard III." Even if he had proved this point, he has totally failed to account for the Duke of York and what became of him.

Sir Clements, having assumed that he has proved that the princes survived Richard III., goes on to "prove" that Henry VII. killed them. His method is peculiar. He begins by saying that Henry caused the prisoners taken at Bosworth to be executed; therefore he, having no legal status and being in fact an attainted outlaw, committed a series of murders. And he goes on to say:

What did he do with the surviving members of the royal family of England, legitimate or otherwise? There were Edward and Richard, the illegitimate sons of Edward IV.; there was Edward, the legitimate son of the Duke of Clarence and now the rightful King of England; there was John, the illegitimate son of Richard III. They all fell into his power and he alone became answerable for their lives. There is too much reason to suspect that they all met with foul play at his hands.

This is a fairly confident statement to make, especially on the evidence brought forward. If Henry was so bloodthirsty as is here suggested, why, it may be asked, did he kill the illegitimate children and keep alive the son of Clarence, who was the legitimate Yorkist heir, executing him only after subsequent rebellions. If Sir Clements, before he write history, would give a little attention to law he would find that no one can be convicted of murder until it is proved that the person was murdered. He has first to prove that the princes survived Richard III.—which he has not done—and he has then to prove that they were killed. Of this he has produced not one tittle of evidence, yet he has the boldness to conclude: "The conduct of Henry adds weight to all other evidence; it cannot be reconciled with his innocence, it can only be explained by his guilt."

OLD HEIDELBERG

Heidelberg: its Princes and its Palaces. By ELIZABETH GODFREY. (E. Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE writer of this volume may rest assured of the fulfilment of her hope that those who familiarise themselves with its contents will not echo "the remark uttered by a rather learned man: 'I did not know the Palatinate had a history.'" Such sayings indicate one of the drawbacks which might be set against the inestimable advantages of the Union of Germany. For federation did away with many of the reasons which formerly impelled representatives of other countries to study the history of the individual States of the Fatherland.

But though it is possible for generally well-informed persons to be ignorant of the chronicles of the Palatinate, they usually contrive to acquire some idea of the historical importance of its ancient capital. If they have not visited Heidelberg, they hope to do so. In either case they will find much to interest them in Miss Godfrey's monograph. "Next to the Alhambra of Granada," says Longfellow, "the Castle of Heidelberg is the most magnificent ruin of the Middle Ages." And those who have often lingered within its precincts can recall their longing for something more detailed than a guide-book outline of the life and work of the Palatine princes, something which might enable them to reconstruct the past after the fashion of Friedrich von Matthison in his "Elegie: in der Ruinen eines alten Bergschlosses geschrieben," the Bergschloss in question being Heidelberg Castle. It is this very real need that Miss Godfrey has set herself to supply, and a large measure of success has attended her efforts.

The early chapters of her book deal with the remote beginnings of the history of the Palatinate. At this point a map to illustrate the importance of its position would have been helpful. "Commanding the great waterway of the Rhine, it became a seat of the Roman power." At a later day, when the Romans had been driven out by the Franks, "it was the very kernel of Charlemagne's empire, and from the title of his Court officials, Comes Palatii, the name of its rulers was derived." Ultimately the Holy Roman Empire came to be identified with the elective monarchy of Germany. "German affairs, when the Emperor was beyond the Alps, were administered by the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who was himself eligible for the imperial dignity and several times attained it."

With the accession to power of Conrad von Hohenstaufen, brother of the Emperor Friedrich Barbarossa, the Palatinate becomes a distinct entity, and a force to be reckoned with in German politics. This was in the year 1155. Conrad's chief residence was his castle on the hill which began to be called Heidelberg, or the hill of the bilberries, for in those days, instead of being as now richly wooded, it was a wild heathy waste. Very little is known of this structure, which dominated the whole valley at the height of some 650 feet above the river. It was completely destroyed in successive disasters, and now the modern world has hidden all that remained of it beneath the terraces of a restaurant, known as the Molkenkur.

"The Builders" is the name of that section of her work in which the writer conjures up, one after another, the forms of successive electors, remarkable, many of them, for their personal attractiveness, their success in warfare, and for their love of learning and the arts, especially the art of building. Their names are indissolubly associated with the palaces and towers and fortifications gradually up-reared in the course of six centuries and known collectively as Heidelberg Castle. Here is a portrait of one of the builders, the Elector Friedrich I.:

At the time of his succession (1449) he was four-and-twenty, handsome and tall, chivalrous and of a knightly presence, loving books, yet delighting in active life, a practical soldier, and a capable man of affairs. . . . Besides these advantages, Friedrich possessed one which we are apt to describe as luck, but which rather means the power to seize the flying opportunity, to decide promptly, to will and act without faltering, and to this he owed his cognomen of the Victorious and the singular fact that through all his twelve years' fighting he was never beaten. . . . He added greatly to the fortifications of the Castle. He also built the Apothecary Tower and the mighty one at the north-east corner, which now lies in ruins, and is known as the Cleft Tower (die Gesprengte Thurm).

Another notable builder was Ludwig V. To his reign, which began in 1508, was due the erection of the beautiful Library Tower. The name of his nephew, Otto Heinrich, is perpetuated by the magnificent palace, with its richly decorated façade, on the east side of the courtyard. A series of admirable reproductions of old prints will enable Miss Godfrey's readers to form some conception of the majestic appearance of the Castle in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. These do not, however, make up for the omission to provide a ground plan of the various buildings. For want of this, the stranger to Heidelberg cannot possibly realise their relative positions, or follow with any interest such architectural achievements as are described, e.g., on pp. 123-7.

We cannot but regard it as unfortunate that the author did not uniformly adopt, for the earlier portions of her work, the plan which she has used with conspicuous success in the last two Books: that, namely, of making the history of the times an effective background, against which the chief personages of the story stand out in sharp relief. Compared with Friedrich IV. and Elizabeth Stuart, Karl Ludwig and his daughter Liselotte, the figures of the fifteenth and sixteenth century electors are, as a rule, wanting in precision and lifelikeness. This is largely due to the fact that parts of their story are kept back for insertion in Book III. or Book IV., which deal respectively with the Renaissance and the Reformation. The far-reaching effects of both these movements on the history of the Palatinate call for special emphasis. But supplementary chapters, dealing with the incidents which could not be incorporated into the chronicles of the various reigns would surely have been preferable to the long interruption of the main stream of the narrative. It is also a matter for regret that the chapters on "the Divided Church" were not conceived in a more judicial spirit. In future editions of this non-polemical work, which may number many Germans among its readers, we would suggest the omission of the reference to "Luther's so-called wife" (page 175), and the application of some more fitting adjective than "notorious" to the work of Melancthon (page 184). A slight inaccuracy occurs on page 160, where the writer states that the Courts of the Dukes of Ferrara and Florence were early affected by the humanistic movement. At the dawn of the Renaissance Florence was nominally a republic. The first Duke began his reign in 1530. A printer's error is possibly accountable for the announcement on page 318 that the mother of George I. "missed the succession in her own person by a very few years." The Electress Sophia died on May 28 and Queen Anne on August 1 of the same year—1714.

We have given one reason for selecting for special commendation the closing chapters of this history. The writer's familiarity with the Stuart period likewise counts for much when she tells of the disasters which overtook the "Queen of Hearts" and her descendants. It is strange that the devotion of one Elector to his wife should have brought about the Thirty Years War, while the ambition of a succeeding Elector for his daughter resulted in the Orleans War. When both were over, the glory had departed from the Palatinate. Heidelberg's wondrous castle lay in ruins. "The cunning hand of Art was busy for six centuries in raising and adorning its walls; the mailed hands of Time and War have defaced and overthrown them in less than two." In 1799 the Rhenish Palatinate was merged in the Grand Duchy of Baden. But the first Grand Duke inaugurated a new period of prosperity for Heidelberg by reconstructing the University, originally founded in 1386, and erecting a suitable building for the accommodation of professors and students.

ENGLISH CLASSICS

Newnes' Thin-Paper Classics. (3s. 6d. per volume.)

IN looking over these handsome and well-printed volumes one is tempted into a vein of speculation. Complaints are frequently made that the literary taste of the age is debauched and demoralised, and that only the hysterical and the sensational have a chance of appealing to the public. Yet we understand that the volumes which constitute this series have found an appreciative public. The books chosen are not popular in the ordinary sense of the word. We have to begin with the acknowledged classics of the English tongue, Shakespeare and Milton, Boswell's life of Johnson, Swift and Sterne, Bacon and Goldsmith. No doubt there are omissions. Fielding has certainly as much claim to be considered a classic as any other writer whose book is here reproduced. In his own way his style is inimitable. It has at once sinew and grace, force, lightness and cleverness. There is no other writing quite like it in the English language. The objection which probably has weighed with the Editors of the series is a certain lack of delicacy which is alleged against both Fielding and Smollett, but this ought not to have caused his exclusion. Fielding, as a matter of fact, was one of the most moral of English writers. He was too great a man and too much of a philosopher not to be able to pardon and laugh at sins and peccadilloes, but was not that chiefly because he understood the wider issues? His was the tolerant creed expressed by Burns:

An honest man may like a glass,
An honest man may like a lass,
But mean revenge, an' malice fause
He'll still disdain,
An' then cry zeal for gospel laws,
Like some we ken.

Henry Fielding is unmistakably entitled to be called, in Scott's phrase, the father of the English novel, and a series of classics can scarcely be complete without the inclusion of "Tom Jones," indisputably the best novel in the English language. A place ought to be allowed to Smollett also, and it would be absurd of the publishers to allow feelings of so-called delicacy to stand in the way. We would be the last to recommend the publication of anything that had an immoral tendency, but such a charge cannot be truthfully made in regard to the works we have mentioned. Fielding and Smollett wrote in the language of their age, which did not call a spade an agricultural implement. But they were wholesomeness itself as compared with the suggestiveness of much modern literature. In fact, the only reason for complaint is that they are little read at the present moment. Fielding's style is wasted on a generation which has come to accept the most slipshod writing as cheerfully as though it were the best. Any one who is in doubt of this may be recommended to turn to the pages of the current Contemporary Review, where he will find adduced some extraordinary examples of careless writing that appears to appeal to the multitude to-day. Of course, this neglect of style is merely a temporary aberration on the part of the British public, a result, perhaps, of a vast number of half-educated readers having been brought into existence during the operation of the Education Acts. But those who desire to cultivate a fine taste in literature must give their days and nights to the study of such masterpieces as are reproduced in these thin-paper classics. If they will take a volume, say, of Addison's Essays, and consider the directness, clearness, and lucidity of the style in which it is written, joined, as these qualities are, to a complete absence of anything in the nature of false ornament or affectation, they will very quickly be able to discern the gross faults of that literature which morning and evening is served up by the popular press.

If we desired to make a contrast between language that is full of real energy and the merely forcible style of the ordinary journalist, then it is Swift to whom the student should turn. He is not represented quite so fully in the series as he might be, and we hope that this and other omissions will be rectified in the future; but still there is enough to show the strength of that master-hand. One great advantage of having classics in the shape of these before us is that they can be very comfortably carried in the pocket. We have all read these great authors at least once, but a test of literature is whether it can be taken out and perused again and again. Nearly all of the works issued in this series can be read with advantage at least once in every twelve months. And whoever encourages this kind of reading is deserving of the fullest gratitude. It is the only effective antidote that can be applied to the poisonous stuff that abounds at the present moment. A well-known critic told us only a little while ago that for some time past it has been the custom to place what have hitherto been known as the English classics on the top shelf of the library, where they never are asked for even by the young. If this be so, can it be wondered that the taste for literature should show such signs of degeneracy.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Ruba'iyat of Omar Khayyám. Translated by GEORGE ROE. (Foulis, 7s. 6d. net.)

BETWEEN those English versions of the Ruba'iyat which have departed from the letter of the original in order to conform to the requirements of good verse and those which have sacrificed the spirit of the poem in order to attain literalness there is, as Mr. Roe says, a wide gulf. In his new metrical version, from "various Persian sources," he has tried to steer a middle course. His rendering is literal in that he has not followed former translators in expanding one quatrain into several or compressing several into one; but, on the other hand, while each of his stanzas is representative of an individual ruba'i, he has attempted to weave them into a poem whose form bears no resemblance to the disjointed arrangement of the original manuscript. He has caught the spirit of Omar—though not, we think, so completely as FitzGerald—and his translation, though it is not likely to bring many new worshippers to the shrine of the old tent-maker of Naishapur, should be welcomed by scholars. Much learning and research have gone to its making, and the marginal and other notes are valuable; but, judged as literature, it is—inevitably—vastly inferior to FitzGerald's. And, after all, a great deal of the popularity of the Ruba'iyat is due more to FitzGerald than to Omar himself. The difference between the two renderings may be illustrated by quoting one of FitzGerald's stanzas:

They say the Lion and the Lizard keep
The Courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep;
And Bahrá'm, that great Hunter—the Wild Ass
Stamps o'er his Head, but cannot break his sleep; and giving Mr. Roe's translation:

In yonder mansion of the mighty dead,
Where Bahram feasted, prowling lions tread,
And where his cunning lasso caught the gür,
Behold the gür has closed o'er Bahram's head.

There can be no question as to which is the finer. Mr. Roe explains that gür means either wild ass or the grave, but he gives no note on the "paronomasia—play po' words." Lovers of Omar who know nothing of the liberties FitzGerald took in translating the Ruba'iyat would do well to compare the two versions.

The Making of the Criminal. By CHARLES E. B. RUSSELL and L. M. RIGBY. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.)

ROUGHLY speaking, there are two classes of criminal: the accidental and the habitual—the man who is betrayed into a solitary crime and the man who makes crime a profession and lives by it. It is with the latter class that the authors of this admirable little study deal. They base their book on experience gained among juvenile delinquents in Manchester and—rightly, we think—it is with the criminal in the making that they are chiefly concerned. They have arrived at the conclusion that it is between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one that the habitual criminal is made. We should be inclined to put the period a little earlier—between the ages of fourteen and nineteen—because it is during the year or so of idleness which often follows the termination of school-life that a disinclination to work is engendered, and it is then that the boy is most susceptible of evil influences. The chapters on comparative methods of dealing with the youthful criminal—the first offender—are suggestive and worthy of serious study, and the authors throw much light on the factors of heredity and environment which make a law-abiding life almost an impossibility to many. We could wish that they had seen their way to touch on the most important point of all: the necessity of remedying the root of the evil, and making the demoralising atmosphere in which the young criminal is brought up an impossibility. When our authorities have done that they may reduce the police force.

Porcelain. A Sketch of its Nature, Art, and Manufacture. By WILLIAM BURTON. (Cassell, 7s. 6d. net.)

UNDER this all-embracing title the author of several standard works on English stoneware, earthenware and chinaware displays the once closely guarded secrets of his craft with the clearness and accuracy of the scientist and the æsthetic appreciation of the connoisseur. Such vast sums are now spent and so much time and care bestowed upon the collection of old porcelains that such a book as this, compact of knowledge and taste, is assured a wide welcome. Mr. Burton covers the complete field of ceramics in all countries from the earliest examples of the inspired East to the latest European efforts, such as Mr. Solon's pâte-sur-pâte or the flambé and lustrated porcelains of Mr. Bernard Moore. Thus, the subject has to be compressed, and we find the works of the Oriental potters somewhat slightly treated in comparison with the European manufactures. However, that which the author does give us he gives fully and out of his large experience and pleasing enthusiasm; and all readers will find in his volume much sound information and valuable technical research. The last point of interest to the informed collector of porcelains to-day is the mark. A generation ago, and earlier, nothing else appeared to matter. Nowadays the authority on the subject is most interested in the character of the body and the glaze, the colour and the decoration of the piece under consideration, and it is towards knowledge of this valuable kind that Mr. Burton's "Porcelain" will lead the reader. Marks, as he says, have been greatly over-valued, for the choicest specimens are without them, the marks of one period or one factory have been frequently imitated at other times and places, and the first thing the forger copies is the mark. The large number of well-reproduced full-page photographs of actual pieces from the earliest natural felspathic Blanc de Chine to our own modern commercial phosphatic or bone porcelains, forms a gallery of objects at once informing and beautiful.

Western Tibet and the British Borderland. By CHARLES A. SHERRING. (Arnold, 21s. net.)

Tibet the Mysterious. By Sir THOMAS HOLDICH. (Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. SHERRING'S volume is a poor piece of book-making. To book-making, when it gives the reader who cannot afford expensive works a succinct record of available information at a modest price, we have no objection. The book before us is not one of these summaries, nor can its price be called modest. Its extraordinarily lengthy title-page left us breathless and a little suspicious. We remembered that it was but a short time since the publication of books by Major Ryder and Captain Rawling, the leaders of the expedition to Gar-tok; and we remembered Colonel Waddell. Had the author of the present tome spent years of patient research in daily peril of life and limb, or how would he justify its appearance? We wandered through an unnecessarily long preface, admitting freely that "the public expects nowadays something which is decidedly new and distinctly additional to what has already been so ably put before it by writers in the past," and that "information gathered on the spot does add, however inconsiderable the addition, something to that vastly interesting mass of knowledge which is the delight of those interested in comparative religions, ethnology, and political science," and hoping for a few less adverbs in the chapters to come. Our hope was vain, and superlatives add a further terror to Mr. Sherring's pages. His book is mainly the result of a brief visit to Gar-tok, our new trade-mart in Western Tibet. The greater part of the country covered in the journey has already been described, and for the rest, all that rewards the reader is hastily assimilated information about customs and religions, picked up on the way. In itself it is interesting, but much of it is not new, and the statement on the first page of the volume:

The Assam border is at present of little use to us owing to the wildness of the country and the savage character of the people, whereas Western Tibet, with which British territory comes into actual physical contact, is of enormous importance, while it may be safely said that it is difficult to find in any portion of the earth a more interesting country than Western Tibet and the British Borderland which adjoins it. Geographically, this portion of Tibet is the nearest to Russian territory, and, although separated from Russian Turkestan by chains of the most forbidding mountain ranges, still the fact of its position gives it great importance, is not calculated to inspire trust in our guide in matters where we are unable to check his accuracy. We do not wish to appear ungenerous, and we realise that to the author his work has been a labour of love, an attempt to add something to the sum of our knowledge of Tibet and its races. But it comes too late, and it is far too bulky.

Sir Thomas Holdich's addition to Messrs. Alston Rivers's admirable "Story of Exploration" series is a book of a very different nature from Mr. Sherring's. Like Mr. Sherring's it is a piece of book-making, but unlike his it is a careful compilation, a trustworthy summary at a very moderate price, "intended to illustrate the sequence of exploration in that great wilderness of stormy and inhospitable altitudes with lie far beyond Lhasa"; and to serve incidentally as "a small tribute to many great achievements." The author has gleaned his information from many sources—Russian, American, Italian, Indian, French, Swedish and English—and the book is well illustrated. A good bibliography and a full index add to the value of a volume in every way worthy of the series.

Hokusai. By EDWARD F. STRANGE. (Siegle, 1s. 6d. net.)

ANYTHING about Japanese art written by Mr. E. F. Strange commands respectful attention, for he is one of the few who, having an authoritative knowledge of his subject, has also the gift of presenting that knowledge in an entertaining and stimulating fashion. The essay on Hokusai which he has contributed to the "Langham Series of Art Monographs" is not only a résumé of what is known of the life of this great Japanese artist and a discriminating guide to those qualities which make the greatness of his art; it also tends to give the reader a sounder understanding of what art is than many a volume ten times its size and ten times more pretentious. A suggestive comparison of Hokusai with the great French draughtsman Daumier may be taken as an example of the author's critical insight and lucid style:

Hokusai's exaggeration of the human face and figure is inspired by pure joyousness. It is, quite simply, fun; and has nothing in common with the bitter and biting satire of the French artist. Neither does Hokusai, in spite of the hardship and sorrow of his life, ever depict the seamy or pathetic side of humanity. One of the invariable and most beautiful of his characteristics is an unceasing happiness, a feature not far removed from that which inspired the best period of Greek art. But in method these two otherwise dissimilar geniuses come much more nearly together. Daumier . . . has, like Hokusai, a fine disregard of non-essentials and the keenest eye for those salient points that compel the instant recognition and admiration of the beholder. . . . Both are masters of the art of expressing their minds with a few poignant strokes of brush or pencil. Stripped of the disguise imposed on each by the traditions which dominate him, their work, in its technique altogether, and partly in its application to the scenes and events of daily life, seems to me to rest largely on a common basis.

The coloured frontispiece and other reproductions in black and white of Hokusai's drawings effectively point Mr. Strange's arguments and adorn his delightful little volume.

The Voyage of the "Scotia." By Three of the Staff. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

In 1901, it is hardly necessary to remind our readers, three expeditions were despatched to different parts of the unexplored Antarctic regions by England, Germany, and Sweden. In November 1902 a Scottish exploration party, supported entirely by private munificence, set out from the Clyde, in the Scotia—an old Norwegian whaler which had been rebuilt for the expedition. Mr. W. S. Bruce, the leader, and Captain Robertson, the navigating officer, both took part in the prospecting voyage made by four Dundee whalers in 1892, but the account of the present voyage has been written by three members of the scientific staff—Mr. Rudmose Brown, Mr. Mossman, and Dr. Harvey Pirie—and though there is much interesting information in their pages, particularly in those contributed by Mr. Brown, we think this a mistake. The parts do not "hang together," and too much space is devoted to localities already well known. We think Mr. Brown is incorrect in his description of the frigate-bird (Fregata aquila), which, he says, "hovers high above the water, spying out its prey, and then suddenly, with a splash like a cannon-ball, drops straight down into the sea, to emerge in a few moments with a captured fish"; and there is a curious paragraph on pp. 311, 312 which seems to demand an explanation.

The night closed in wild and thick, and shut out the Lucifer Shoal and Blackwater lightships. The tide ran with a phenomenal speed that upset all the mate's calculations, and, in consequence, at daybreak we were fairly at a loss to know what part of the Irish coast was nearest us, and how far from land we were; and this on the morning of our return. But the South Arklow lightship warned us off in time when we were running straight for the dangerous Arklow bank; and a friendly little schooner, with an unmistakably Irish skipper, whom the Captain hailed, put us right again, and at noon on July 15 the Scotia anchored in Kingstown Harbour.

If this statement be correct, which we doubt, it should in charity have been suppressed. We recognise how much the Scotia owed to the generosity of Messrs. Coates, but surely the first photograph on p. 312 might have been omitted. The illustrations are admirable, and there is plenty of good reading in the book—much that will be new even to those who have studied the records of previous expeditions to the South Pole—but there is also a good deal that might with advantage have been omitted.

Recollections of a Lucknow Veteran, 1845-1876. By Major-General J. RUGGLES. (Longmans, 5s. net.)

MAJOR-GENERAL RUGGLES—the oldest of the twenty-five survivors of that gallant band of fifty officers who used to assemble at the annual Lucknow dinner to toast the memory of their fallen comrades—has written a very entertaining account of his experiences in the Indian Mutiny and elsewhere. He has been content to give us only essentials, and we are never bored by trivial letters and despatches. He admits that he has turned up contemporary memoirs in order to refresh his recollections of several incidents, but his book bears no sign of research and lays no claim to be history. It is fresh and spontaneous, commendably brief and modest, and in many ways a model autobiography. We have only one quarrel with its author. In his account of the relief of Lucknow he says:

By 3 P.M. the redcoats were seen steadily advancing [towards the Mess House] headed by an officer, who entered first, and through our glasses we shortly perceived a man on the roof; this proved to be Captain Wolseley . . . and in a few seconds the British ensign floated aloft over this massive building; and although it was shot away again and again, it finally rested there.

In his "Story of a Soldier's Life" Lord Wolseley disclaims the honour:

Some one in after years (Archibald Forbes?) asserted that I claimed the honour of having hoisted the Union Jack upon the Mess House when we took it. My answer is that it was taken by my company . . . but I did not know who the hero was that hoisted a flag upon it. All I know was that it was not I who had done so, and that no flag was hoisted in the Mess House whilst I was in it, and as to what took place after my company had gone through it to take the Motee Mohul I could say nothing.

The hero was Lord Roberts, who, if we remember rightly, gives an account of the incident in his autobiography. It is characteristic of his dogged determination that although the flagstaff was knocked down no less than three times, on each occasion he returned to his position of peril.

LOGIC AND LIFE

(To P.)

WHAT tho' the thoughts of our reason dissever and drive us asunder ?

Ever the thoughts of our hearts knit us as closely in one !

Clouded our intellects clash in sullen reverberate thunder ;
Clear our intuitive souls bask in the glorious sun.

JOHN B. WAINWRIGHT.

THE ELETHIAN MUSE

To readers of the ACADEMY, some months ago, it was my privilege to introduce the eleventh Muse, a rather Batavian lady who is not to be found in that Greek peerage, Lemprière's Dictionary. An obliging correspondent from Edinburgh (an eminent writer to the Signet in our northern Thebes) in communicating to me a priceless couplet

The mightiest grandest thoughts of greatest men Cannot be put on paper with a pen ;

inquired if there were any more muses who had escaped the students of comparative mythology. It is in response to his letter that I now present, as Mr. Charles Frohman would say, the thirteenth, the Elethian Muse. I hope to prove too, that the mightiest thoughts can, and have been put on paper with a pen.

Yet I can fancy people asking, where is the twelfth, and over what art or science does she preside ? According to Apollodorus (in a recently recovered fragment from Oxyrynchus), Jupiter, suffering from the chronic headaches consequent on his acrimonious conversations with Athena, decided to consult Vulcan, Aesculapius having come to be regarded as a quack. Mulciber (as we must now call him, having used the name Vulcan once), suggested an extraordinary remedy, one of the earliest records of a homœopathic expedient. He prescribed that the King of Gods and Men should keep his ambrosial tongue in the side of his cheek for half an hour three times a day. The operation produced violent retching in the Capitoline stomach. And on the ninth day, from his mouth, quite unarmed, sprang the twelfth muse. The other goddesses were very disgusted ; and even the gods declined to have any communication with the new arrival. Apollo, however, was more tolerant and offered her an asylum on the top shelf of the celestial library. Ever afterwards, Musagetes used to be heard laughing immoderately, even for a librarian to the then House of Lords ; Jupiter, incensed at this irregularity, paid him a surprise visit in order to discover the cause. He stayed however, quite a long time, and the other deities soon contracted the habit of taking their nectar into the library. With the decline of manners, the twelfth muse began to be invited to dessert, after Juno and the more reputable goddesses had retired. To cut a long story short, when Pan died, in the olympian sense, very shortly afterwards, all the gods, as we know, took refuge on earth. Jupiter retired to Iceland, Aphrodite to Germany, Apollo to Picardy, but the twelfth muse wandered all over Europe and found that she was really more appreciated than her sisters. The castle, the abbey, the inn, the lone ale-house on the Berkshire moors, all made her welcome. Finally she settled in Ireland, where, according to a Protestant libel, she took the black veil in a nunnery.

She is older than the chestnuts of Vallombrosa. Perhaps of all the ancient goddesses time has chilled her least.

Her unfathomable smile wears a touch of something sinister in it, but she has a new meaning for every generation. And yet for Ætino there was some further magic of crimson on her lips and cheeks lost for us. She is a solecism for the convalescent, and has given consolation to the brave. She has been a diver in rather deep seas and a climber in somewhat steep places. Her censers are the smoking-rooms of clubs, and her presence lamps are school-boys' lanterns. Though held the friend of liars and brutes, she has lived on the indelicacies of kings, and has made even pontiffs laugh. Her mysteries are told in the night-time, and in low whispers to the garish day. She lingers over the stable-yard (no doubt called mews for that reason). Her costly breviaries, embellished with strange illuminations, are prohibited under Lord Campbell's Act. Stars mark the places where she has been. Sometimes a scholar's fallacy, a sworn foe to Dr. Bowdler, she is Nôtre Dame de Milet, our Lady of Limerick.

But it is of her sister I would speak, the thirteenth sister who was created to keep the eleventh in countenance. She presides over the absurdities of prose. She is responsible for the stylistic flights of Pegasus when, owing to the persuasive eloquence of the Hon. Stephen Coleridge, his bearing-rein has been abolished, and he kicks over the traces.

It was the Elethian Muse who inspired that Oxford undergraduate's peroration to his essay on the Characteristics of St. John's Gospel :

Furthermore we may add that St. John's Gospel is characterised by a tone of fervent piety which is totally wanting in those of the other Evangelists ; and she hovered over the journalist, who, writing for a paper which we need not name, referred to Bacchus as :

that deity whose identity in Greek and Roman mythology is inseparably connected with the over indulgence of intoxicating liquors.

There are prose beauties, Elethian jewels, hidden away even in Baedeker's mines of pregnant information and barren fact. I know it is fashionable to sneer at Baedeker, especially when you are writing little rhapsodies about remoter parts of Italy, where you have found his knowledge indispensable, if exiguous. You must always kick away the ladder when you arrive at literary distinction. I, who am still climbing and still clinging, can afford to be more generous. Let me therefore crown Baedeker with an essayist's parsley, or an academic laurel, ere I too become selfish, forgetful, egoistical and famous. From "Southern France," 1891 edition, p. 137 :

To the Pic de Néré, 3½ hrs. from Luz, there and back 6½ hrs. ; a delightful excursion which can be made on horseback part of the way ; guide 12, Horse 10 fr. ; adders abound.

For synthetic prose you will have to go to Tacitus to find the equal of that passage. No more is heard of the excursion. "We leave Luz by the Barege road," the text goes on to say. Reflections and picturesque word painting are left for Mr. Max Beerbolm, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. Arthur Symons and Murray. In "Southern Italy" Baedeker yields to softer and more Virgilian influences. The purple patches are longer and more frequent. On page 99 we learn not only how to get to Baia, but that Luxury and profligacy, however, soon took up their abode at Baia, and the desolate ruins which now alone encounter the eye, point the usual moral.

And from the preface to the same guide we obtain this remarkable advice :

The traveller should adopt the Neapolitan custom of rejecting fish that are not quite fresh.

But it is certain educational works, popular in my childhood, that have yielded the more exotic Elethian blossoms for my Anthology. There are passages I would not willingly let die. In one of these books general knowledge was imparted after the manner of Mangnall. "What is the world?" "The earth on which we live." "Who was Raphael?" "How is rice made?" After such desultory interrogatives, without any warning, came question 15, "Give the character of Prince Potemki?":

Sordidly mean, ostentatiously prodigal, filthily intemperate and affectingly refined. Disgustingly licentious and extravagantly superstitious, a brute in appetite, vigorous though vacillating in action.

Until I went to the University a great many years afterwards I never learnt who Potemki was. At the age of seven he stood to me for what "Timberio" still is for Capriote children. My teacher obviously did not know. She always evaded my inquiries by saying, "You will know when you are older, darling." Suspecting her ignorance, I became pertinacious; "When I am as old as you?" was my ungallant rejoinder. I had to write the character out a hundred times. Then, one Christmas Day I ventured to ask my father, who said I would find out about him in Gibbon; but I knew he was not speaking the truth, because he laughed in a nervous, peculiar way, and added that as I was so fond of history I must go to Oxford when I was older. I loathed history, and inwardly resolved that Cambridge should be my University. My mother admitted entire ignorance of Potemki's identity, but on my sketching his character (for I was proud of the knowledge), said he was obviously a "horrid" man. His personality shadowed my childhood with a deadly fascination which has not entirely worn away; producing the same sort of effect on me as an imaginary portrait by Pater.

In a semi-geographical work called "Near home, or Europe Described," published by Hatchard's in the fifties (though my friend, Mr. Arthur Humphreys, denies all knowledge of it), I can recall many stereotypes of dialectic cast in a Socratic mould:

Q. What is the religion of the Italians? A. They are Roman Catholics.—Q. What do the Roman Catholics worship? A. Idols and a piece of bread.—Q. Would not God be very angry if he knew the Italians worshipped idols and a piece of bread? A. God is, very angry.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, if still interested in educational phenomena, will not be surprised to learn that when I reached to man's estate I "embraced the errors of Rome," as my historical manual would have phrased it.

I pity the child who did not learn universal history from Collier. How tame are the periods of Lord Acton, the Rev. William Hunt, Froude, Freeman, Oman, Round, even Macaulay and little Arthur, beside the rich Elethian periods of William Francis Collier. Not Berenson, not Byron, not Beerbohm, have given us such a picture of Venice as Collier in describing the Council of Ten:

The Ten were terrible; but still more terrible were the three inquisitors—two black, one red—appointed in 1454. Deep mystery hung over the Three. They were elected by the ten; none else knew their names. Their great work was to kill; and no man—doge, councillor, or inquisitor—was beyond their reach. Secretly they pronounced a doom; and ere long the stiletto or the poison cup had done its work, or the dark waters of the lagoon had closed over a life. The spy was everywhere. No man dared to speak out, for his most intimate companions might be on the watch to betray him. Bronze vases, shaped like a lion's mouth, gaped at the corner of every square to receive the names of suspected persons. Gloom and suspicion haunted gondola and hearth!!

It is owing to Collier that I know at least one fact about the Goths who took Rome, "having reduced the citizens to feed on mice and nettles, A.D. 546," a diet to which many of the hotel proprietors in the Imperial city still treat their clients. But let Bellows Dictionary, a friend and instructor of riper years, close my list of great examples and my theme. The sentiment is apposite to myself, and its only oddity, its Elethian quality if I may say so, is its presence in that marvellous miniature whose ingenious author you would never suspect could have found room for such portentous observations in the small duodecimo to which he confined himself:

Unaffected language is the inseparable accompaniment of natural refinement: but that affectation which would make up for paucity of thought by overstrained expression is a mark of vulgarity from which no accident of social position can redeem those who are guilty of it.

ROBERT ROSS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE PLACE OF WIT IN POETRY

THERE came into our hands a few days ago, from different sources, new editions of Robert Burns and Thomas Hood, whom few would deny to be the wittiest poets in our language. On the whole the Northern bard must be credited with being the wittier of the two, but it is extremely unfortunate that the best of his work should be masked in dialect that must ever become increasingly difficult as education spreads, since the schoolmaster tends to grow more and more ignorant of everything except what he calls pure English. Messrs. W. and R. Chambers, who are responsible for the edition of Burns before us, have tried to get over the difficulty by printing explanations of the more obscure words opposite them, in the way in which we have in our schooldays seen a Latin "crib" done. But this is not a practice to be commended. Those who understand Scotch will be worried by the continuation of the line, while for those who do not there is the difficulty of rendering into idiomatic English the expressions used by Burns. To take a few examples: for "Some black, grousome Carlin," "horrid-looking old woman" is not a happy rendering, and "First on Sawnie gies a ca'" seems to have lost its salt when rendered "calls out the name of Satan." However, it is only fair to say that in other respects the edition is a most admirable one, for the notes have been gathered with both industry and judgment and are really illuminating. The edition of Hood is equally satisfactory, though, of course, it does not require the same apparatus. It is issued by Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford Press, and is in every way an excellent issue of Hood's poems. But we must confess that the considerations suggested by glancing through these books were not altogether of a bibliographical kind. The two poets are akin to one another, and yet offer a most striking contrast. Each is a wit, and each is at the same time a poet, though the author of "Mother of light! how fairly dost thou go Over those hoary crests, divinely led!" was but a younger brother of the Muse in comparison with Burns. Yet there is poetry as well as wit in such well-known word-play as this:

O false and fickle Nelly Gray;
I know why you refuse:—
Though I've no feet—some other man
Is standing in my shoes!

I wish I ne'er had seen your face;
But, now, a long farewell!
For you will be my death;—alas!
You will not be my Nell!

The wit of Burns is partly that of condensed thought. We find in it a quality akin to the almost indescribable touch in Tennyson's "When the dumb Hour clothed in black Brings the Dreams about my bed." In "Holy Willie's Prayer" we get wit, humour, and also dramatic intensity of expression. Few writers except Shakespeare could have placed the character on the boards so completely with so few touches:

O Thou that in the heaven does dwell!
Wha, as it pleases best Thyself,
Sends ane to heaven and ten to h—ll,
A' for Thy glory;
And no for ony guid or ill
They've done before Thee!

It is, of course, the province of wit to bring much into little. Garrulity and feebleness of thought go hand in hand, and when a poet requires several pages or stanzas in which to get into touch with his reader it is evident that he lacks the quality of wit, because no witty man can be prolix. Wit disdains long sentences and detests explanations. It secures its point by a stroke or not at all, and it is exemplified on those occasions referred to by Tennyson: "All the charm of all the Muses often flowering in a lonely word." Wit, however, in its highest sense, is something more than the play of word and phrase and idea which Hood so delightfully accomplished. It is the penetration, the insight, and the force of a mind awake, high-strung and ready to respond to whatever appeal is made to it. In Burns it is the more delightful because of the kindly, charitable thought which often hangs over and colours it, as in the end of his "Address to the Deil."

But fare-you-weel, auld "Nickie-ben" !
O wad ye tak a thought an' men' !
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—
Still hae a stake :
I'm wae to think upo' yon den,
Ev'n for your sake !

The following two stanzas suggest that if the life of Robert Burns had been cast in Fleet Street he would have described Bohemia with a wit, sympathy and cleverness that would have put to shame all other attempts in the same field :

Of a' the thoughtless sons o' man,
Commen' me to the Bardie clan ;
Except it be some idle plan
O' rhyming clink,
The devil-haet, that I sud ban,
They ever think.
Nae thought, nae view, nae scheme o' livin',
Nae cares tae gie us joy or grievin' :
But just the pouchie put the nieve in,
An' while ought's there,
Then, hiltie, skiltie, we gae scrivin',
An' fash nae mair.

These lines are witty, and the wit in them is not that of clever repartee or skilful verbal fence. It is, as it were, more in the mind of the writer than in the actual words he employs. It would be extremely easy to adduce thousands of instances from Burns of wit that was keen as a rapier, but for our present purpose it is much more interesting to rely on the attitude of mind. With Hood the case is quite different. He had a quickness equal to that of Burns, but much more artificial. His puns, in fact, belong more to the region of cleverness but less to that of capacity, using the word in its widest sense. As an example, take "Tim Turpin," of which we quote the last two stanzas :

The great judge took his judgment cap,
And put it on his head,
And sentenc'd Tim by law to hang
'Till he was three times dead.
So he was tried, and he was hung (Fit punishment for such)
On Horsham-drop, and none can say
It was a drop too much.

Here cleverness is abounding, but it has not that background of pathos, or at least of sympathetic understanding, which lies like a halo round the wit of the other greatest writers. One could show what is meant by passages from Molière and Shakespeare. Shakespeare is always poetic, Molière is generally bright and keen, without the atmosphere of poetry behind him.

DRAMA

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA" AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE

MR. JOSEPH HARKER is to be congratulated unreservedly upon the magnificent scenic effects which he has obtained. He has executed the twelve of the thirteen scenes and one tableau into which the play is divided with rare skill and judgment. His scenery was suggestive, as scenery should be, and avoided that fatal realism under the influence of which the proper illusion vanished like a touched bubble. As the curtain rose on his Landing Stage of Cleopatra's Palace the illusion of Eastern splendour, helped by the fragrance of burning incense, was brought home to the audience. Everything was ready for a fine presentation of the play. It stirred the imagination, and prepared the mind for the world tragedy of passion which Shakespeare has created in Antony and Cleopatra. Expectation was roused to its utmost pitch. But nothing came of it. The production as a whole was completely disappointing. It was a spectacle (at times a vulgar spectacle) and nothing more. All the dignity had gone from the play, and its place was taken by pettiness and vulgarity which the pomp and circumstance of the setting served to accentuate almost intolerably. Of course to compress so long a play into the limits of an evening performance is a matter of extreme difficulty. But no attempt was made to represent Shakespeare. Everything was sacrificed to scenic display. Nothing else mattered. Mr. Tree himself felt this so strongly that when lines slipped from his memory, he waved his hand deprecatingly towards his splendid scenery, as though to an alleviation or an excuse. It happened once in the third act at one of the crucial moments of the play; but then the scene which was pointed out was certainly most remarkable. Typical of the production was the importance given to the drunken scene, at the close of the second act, on Pompey's galley. Such an opportunity was not one to be missed. It opened with a dance of girls that would have done credit to a Café Chantant, and ended, after prolonged riot and exaggerated horseplay, with the gradual extinction of the lights on the vessel, and an ominous crash of thunder when the vessel is in darkness and silence. No expense must be spared to educate the people up to Shakespeare! "Pass along the notes of exclamation, devil," as Thoreau would say.

Naturally with such encouragement the part of Cleopatra was not easy to portray. Miss Constance Collier was fighting against tremendous odds; and much credit is due to her for the care and energy which she put into her performance. In the scene in which Cleopatra beats the messenger who has brought her the ill news of Antony's marriage with Octavia she was at her best: her rage was convincing and her speaking of the lines:

These hands do lack nobility, that they strike
A meaner than myself; since I myself
Have given myself the cause was finely effective. She possessed much of the Queen's beauty and power, but in the second part of the scene, where Cleopatra asks the messenger for a description of Octavia's appearance, she lacked the woman's indescribable fascination of voice and gesture which makes that swift change of mood charming.

Mr. Lyn Harding, who played Bolingbroke in Richard II. with marked ability, scored an even greater success as Enobarbus. He rendered the part with care and true feeling: all his points were admirably studied and executed with absolute ease. His performance, in its finish and grip, was one of which any actor might be proud. Mr. Charles Quartermaine brought out the terror of the messenger with great cleverness, and Mr. Hugh Buckler was very good in the small part of Eros. His suicide was an effective piece of work.

As a whole, however, the production was bad. Shakespeare can treat passion and ennoble it by his treatment. But passion is a dangerous subject to handle, and when it is debased the result does not bear thought. And in this production passion has indeed become an ale-house guest.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

THE DECAY OF ILLUSTRATION

WHILE the publication of a third impression of the late Mr. Gleeson White's standard work on "English Illustration: the Sixties" (Constable, 12s. 6d. net) may warrant the inference that an increased interest is being taken in this branch of pictorial art, a comparison of its contents with the pages of any of our present illustrated weekly or monthly periodicals inevitably points to the lowered standard of contemporary illustration. That the illustrations which appear in the pages of our popular magazines and illustrated journals are collectively greatly inferior in artistic interest to the designs published nearly half a century ago in Once a Week, Good Words, and other periodicals of the time, is a fact as indisputable as that there are now living in our midst black-and-white draughtsmen fully as skilled, and fully as artistic, as those who made the sixties a "golden decade of English Illustration." It has to be admitted that nowadays illustrations are not always made by those most qualified to illustrate, that many a good draughtsman has abandoned the creation of noble designs in black and white for the production of mediocre performances in colour. It may not be possible to produce such an array of illustrators as those who figure in Mr. Gleeson White's book—Ford Madox Brown, A. Boyd Houghton, Arthur Hughes, Charles Keene, M. J. Lawless, Leighton, Millais, Du Maurier, J. W. North, Pinwell, Rossetti, W. Small, Sandys, Whistler and Fred Walker—but contemporary illustration could, if it would, make a brave show with the help of Messrs. Abbey, John D. Batten, Annirg Bell, Frank Brangwyn, Walter Crane, Garth Jones, Maurice Greiffenhagen, Laurence Housman, Wm. Nicholson, Pennell, Rackham, Ravenhill, Claude Shepperson, Byam Shaw, Sime, Strang, and E. J. Sullivan, not to mention men who, like Sir Luke Fildes, have abandoned black-and-white work for painting, or like Messrs. Orpen, Rothenstein and Muirhead Bone, who ought to be illustrating and are not. Moreover in this hasty list, compiled haphazard, many woeful omissions will occur to students of contemporary black-and-white work, and the more readily these are perceived the more willingly should it be granted that the inferiority of our present-day magazine illustration is due to a fault in the demand rather than in the supply.

No one acquainted with the admirable etchings and black-and-white drawings occasionally shown at West End exhibitions can fail to realise that our art-editors as a body do not make the best use of the talent at their disposal. To these, however, or to the public for whom they cater, blame is rarely attached, for, arguing on the post hoc ergo propter hoc principle, false prophets have succeeded in establishing the fallacy that the decay of illustration is due to the decay of wood-engraving. That this belief is as erroneous as it is widespread is sufficiently indicated by the following sentences from Mr. Gleeson White's book:

If any one doubts that nearly all the drawings of the sixties lost much, and that many were wholly ruined by the engraver, he has but to compare them with reproductions by modern processes from a few originals that escaped destruction at the time. If this be not a sufficient evidence, the British Museum and South Kensington have many examples in their permanent collections which will quickly convince the most stubborn. If some few engravers managed to impart a certain interest at the expense of the original work, which not merely atones for the loss but supplies in its place an intrinsic work of art, such exceptions in no way affect the argument.

The inferiority is not in the method of reproduction, which has been vastly improved, but in the originals to be reproduced. And the key to this mysterious decadence of illustration while so many excellent illustrators are found in our midst, will be discovered when we compare the illustrations of the sixties with those of the present day; for whereas the former, without exception, are in line, the latter, in the main, are in half-tone. More than to anything else the deterioration of illustration is due to the substitution of that bastard in art, the wash-drawing, for the pure design in line. This preponderance of wash-drawings in the pages of our magazines and illustrated weeklies is the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual degeneration. False ideals are responsible for the change which has resulted in decay. Modern illustrators are apt to aim at truth instead of beauty, forgetting that if truth be the goal of science, beauty is the goal of art, and that if, as Keats has said, beauty and truth are ultimately one, nevertheless artists and scientists travel by different roads to the common end. Moreover the hack-illustrator of to-day seems to adopt the camera as his standard of truth, and to endeavour to obtain with his indian-ink an effect resembling as nearly as possible the reproduction of a photograph. Instead of trying to decorate a page, the hack-illustrator would persuade us that he has "snap-shot" some incident or scene described by his author.

Illustrated journalism has been degraded and deprived of all artistic interest by the wholesale employment of photographs instead of drawings, but the evil influence of the camera has not ended here, since the degeneration is spreading from the journals and their readers to the artists who engage in unwise competition against the photograph. The dull uniformity of our sixpenny illustrated monthlies and weeklies, brought about by their publication of similar and often identical photographs, is now matched by the monotonous impersonality of the wash-drawings by the few illustrators for whom employment is still found. With the exception of Punch—a last stronghold of the line draughtsman against the invading forces of the wash-drawing and half-tone block—it would be difficult to name a single English periodical whose illustrations are an attraction to an educated purchaser. Nowadays the patrons of illustration confine their attention to books, or to American periodicals, in which the standard of illustration is admittedly higher, not because America has better illustrators, but because American editors have better taste and shrewder artistic judgment than our own.

MUSIC

HANDEL'S INDEBTEDNESS

ENTHUSIASTIC lovers of Handel—fortunately they are still many—may be inclined to emulate "the deaf adder that stoppeth her ears" when they first read the title of Mr. Sedley Taylor's book, "The Indebtedness of Handel to Works by other Composers" (Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d. net). They will be wise not to do so, however, for the time for wholesale defence of their hero against these charges has long since gone by, and the facts of Handel's indebtedness—to adopt Mr. Taylor's polite phraseology—have become such common property, and have been so glibly quoted by people who know little of Handel and much less of Stradella, Urlo, and the others, upon whose works Handel drew, that a volume which sums up the matter by printing the parallel passages must certainly do Handel's reputation more good than harm. This is what Mr. Sedley Taylor's book does. It is a compilation of musical extracts from the works of Handel and his sources, printed in a double score, Handel's uppermost, so that direct comparison can be made, and this is rendered still easier by the fact that wherever the keys differ the music of the original is transposed into the key which Handel adopted. The author's notes and comments are always illuminating, and his personal opinion is freely given without being asserted dogmatically.

The work begins—and it is here that the most original contribution to the question is made—by referring to the Handel autographs in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge and quoting a number of fragments contained therein which are quite clearly shown to be copies made from works by Muffat. Since these do not appear in any of Handel's completed compositions their importance lies solely in the fact that they prove him to have been in the habit of noting down passages which for some reason or other attracted his interest. They are not even fully copied; sometimes figures are placed instead of the parts being written out, as if all that he wished to do was to note the chord progressions. In this there is no hint of plagiarism, since in days when published music was scarce this method was the only one by which a composer could gain experience from the work of others. We are next shown the accompanied recitative from the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, beginning: "When Nature underneath a heap of jarring atoms lay," with an adagio from Muffat, from which it appears that Handel chose to adopt the harmonic structure of the latter almost without modification together with a single figure of accompaniment, while he constructed his own voice part with his own fine sense of declamatory effect. The whole is, as every one knows, immensely successful, and probably many an admirer has praised the genius that devised the succession of jarring discords to accompany these words, nor has he done so wrongly, for it is an extraordinary attribute of Handel's genius that he could take such a work as this featureless adagio and see that it could be turned to powerful account as descriptive music. Another case of exactly the same thing occurs in the chorus in Jephtha:

No more to Ammon's God and King
Fierce Molech shall our cymbals ring.

This time the original is a "Kyrie Eleison" from a Mass by Habermann. The key is D but the word "Eleison" is set to a passage of very experimental harmony, a sudden modulation on to a chord of B flat and back again to the dominant by chromatic movement. Although Handel practically adopted the whole short movement it must have been the strong effect of this passage applied to the words "fierce Molech" which attracted him. It is a case where an unlearned hearer would certainly give him complete credit for having invented a passage to suit the words. Of this type of plagiarism, arising from his extraordinary aptitude for seeing where music would be most effective, and placing it accordingly, there are, of course, many well-known instances in Israel in Egypt. To the discussion of this work, Mr. Sedley Taylor naturally devotes a large part of his book, considerably more than half, in fact. It contains examples of every kind of "indebtedness," from that which merely copied out an organ piece by Kerl, distributing its parts among four voices for the chorus "Egypt was glad," to the consummate workmanship which pieced together fragments from the disputed "Magnificat" and the undisputed "Te Deum" by Urio into the famous duet "The Lord is a man of War." Between these two extremes lies the "Hailstone" chorus with Stradella's structure and his own additions of descriptive orchestral colouring and the dramatic choral exclamations of "Fire," and innumerable other cases in which the now well-known sources either decided the whole course of a movement, or merely suggested a melodic outline. Amongst the confusing sources come the short choruses "He rebuked the Red Sea," "And Israel saw that great work," in which his own inventive genius steps in at need, and enables him to write a passage which makes an immediate impression and requires no elaboration to enforce it. Most marvellous of all in the second part come such great choruses as "I will sing unto the Lord" and "The people shall hear," in which there is no evidence to suggest that any part is not Handel's own work, and in which not only is his creative genius completely vindicated, but, unlike the short original choruses of the first part, they are worked out to the fullest dimensions.

Mr. Sedley Taylor concludes with a chapter on the moral aspect of the case, in which he quotes a number of conflicting opinions, including that of the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, and himself sums up against Handel, while acknowledging that he apparently acted with a perfectly clear conscience in adopting these methods of composition. Most people have come to the same conclusion; a more interesting and apparently quite unsolved question is—why did he do so? It is customary to say that he was too hurried to wait for his own ideas to shape themselves and took whatever came to hand. This explanation is quite insufficient; in certain cases, as for instance in the use of Kerl's Canzona, it is undoubtedly the right answer. He was not particularly interested in the words and a piece by another man in which was a sufficiency of fugato would do as well as anything he might write, so he adopted it. But in those instances where passages from different works or different parts of the same work are dovetailed together, where the utmost ingenuity in selection is shown, and the result is a masterpiece and perfectly homogeneous in style, it is impossible to believe that to a man of such extraordinary readiness as Handel the process was really quicker than actual composition. Indeed, in Israel in Egypt we sometimes seem to see him rummaging through his manuscripts to find a suitable passage for the words and at last giving up the laborious process and, in despair, dashing off a masterstroke of originality to fill in the space. Perhaps there was to the end of his life something of the schoolboy in Handel, and he would expend prodigious effort to save himself trouble. Be that as it may, the comparisons of Handel's work with that of his contemporaries, from whom he freely quoted without acknowledgment, must give to those of his advocates who have the courage to undertake it, a fresh view of his many-sided genius; again and again the alteration of a detail gives to the stolen work a point and individuality which it lacked before. If this book forces the last remnant of believers in the verbal inspiration of Handel to resign their faith, it offers them abundant compensation by bringing within the reach of all an opportunity for gaining a true view of the many qualities which played a part in his versatile genius.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a volume of nature studies by the late Mr. C. J. Cornish. It will be entitled "Animal Artisans."

The "Introduction to the New Testament," by the late Dr. Salmon, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, has been a standard work ever since its publication. The author devoted the last years of his life to a kindred work on the Synoptic Gospels. It consists of an independent inquiry into the origin of the Gospels of SS. Matthew, Mark and Luke; how far they are derived from a common original, and how far they are dependent one on another. Certain apparent discrepancies have been one of the chief battlegrounds of the destructive critics, but Dr. Salmon shows by a careful and minute study what is the true explanation of these difficulties. Taking the Greek text as his basis and placing the parallel passages side by side, he deals with each incident separately. In addition to the value of the scholarship of the late Dr. Salmon, the book possesses the personal interest, of such works as Dr. Blunt's "Undersigned Coincidences" and the late Dr. H. Latham's "Pastor Pastorum." It will be published by Mr. Murray early this year.

During the next few months Messrs. Methuen will publish the following six shilling novels: "The Kinsman," by Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick; "Stepping Westward," by M. E. Francis; "The Enchanted Garden," by Mrs. Stepney Rawson; "The Halo," by Baroness von Hutten; "The Memoirs of Ronald Love," by Mary E. Mann; "The Long Road," by John Oxenham; "Behold the Days Come," by Father Adderley; and "A Midsummer Day's Dream," by H. B. Marriott Watson.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have in active preparation a new book by Mr. B. L. Putnam Weale, entitled "The Truce in the East: and the Aftermath," which forms a sequel to "The Reshaping of the Far East," published about a year ago. The main point of the new book, as the title indicates, is to show that the present condition of affairs in Manchuria and Korea offers little prospect of permanent peace. Mr. Weale has travelled through the country since the war, and his new volume will be illustrated from photographs taken during his travels.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will publish in the course of a few days another book by Mr. Putnam Weale, entitled "Indiscreet Letters from Peking," which deals with the siege of the Legations in 1900. These letters form practically a diary of the siege and clearly set forth the imminent peril in which the Legations stood and from which, he says, they escaped only through the cowardice of the Chinese Imperial troops and the Boxers.

Mr. John Long has in the press the following six-shilling novels: "The World and Delia" by Curtis Yorke; "The Dust of Conflict" by Harold Bindloss; "The Luck of the Leura" by Mrs. Campbell Praed; "The Yoke" by Hubert Wales; "Selma" by Lucas Cleeve; "The House in the Crescent" by Adeline Sergeant; "Amazement" by James Blyth; "The Mistress of Aydon" by R. H. Forster; "The Duchess of Pontifex Square" by G. W. Appleton; "The Second Evil" by Sadi Grant; "The Two Forces" by E. Way Elkington; and "Two Women and a Maharajah" by Mrs. C. E. Phillimore.

Mr. Joseph Pennell has been invited by the Director of the Uffizi at Florence to contribute to the Gallery a selection of his drawings made for Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Road in Tuscany" which was recently issued in a cheap edition by Messrs. Macmillan and Co. Mr. Pennell has accepted the invitation and the drawings will at once be placed in the Royal Collection.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland has completed the third volume of his edition of Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," which covers the letters M—P, and it is hoped that the book will be ready in February. Many of the biographical articles have been largely extended; some have been re-written in the light of later researches; and suitable new articles are provided on the more modern musicians. The publishers are Messrs. Macmillan.

Only two volumes by M. Brunetière have appeared in English translations. The first, a selection of his "Essays in French Literature," translated by D. Nichol Smith, appeared in 1898, and contained papers upon, among other subjects, "The Influence of Women in French Literature," "The Philosophy of Molière," "Voltaire and Rousseau," "Classic and Romantic," and "Impressionist Criticism." The second was the "Manual of the History of French Literature," one of M. Brunetière's most important works. The English edition, translated by Mr. Ralph Dorechew, was published in 1898. M. Brunetière, in the special preface which he wrote for English readers, described his work as "an application of the Doctrine of Evolution to the history of a great literature." Apart from the extremely interesting theories which the book develops it is made particularly valuable to the student by its elaborate biographical and critical foot-notes, which present in a terse form outline studies of the chief French writers. Mr. Fisher Unwin was the publisher of both volumes.

One of the most important works of the late Miss Mary Bateson was her volume on "Mediæval England," which was published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin in the "Story of the Nations" series in 1903. The book deals with the social evolution of England from the Norman Conquest to the middle of the fourteenth century, and the author's object was to depict the common life of the people rather than the procession of great events, and to give some of the detail which is apt to be crowded out of political histories.

Messrs. P. S. King will issue shortly a work entitled "The Infant, the Parent, and the State," by Dr. Llewellyn Heath.

The publication of Mind: a Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy has been transferred from Messrs. Williams and Norgate to Messrs. Macmillan and Co., who will publish the January number.—Mr. John Lane has taken over and will publish in future the Independent Review, which Mr. Fisher Unwin has hitherto issued.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie will issue shortly a new novel by Victoria Cross, entitled "Life's Shop Window."

CORRESPONDENCE

NUGÆ SCRIPTORIS

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—I see from the "Nuga" in this week's ACADEMY that the papers written by Spectator ab Extra are to be discontinued for the present.

As a close and interested reader of the whole series I wish to thank him and you for the very great pleasure with which I and many others have perused them.

Such profound thinkers as Spectator ab Extra are few, and it has occurred to several of your readers that his papers should be printed in a small volume, as Mr. Benson's articles "From a College Window" were reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine.
M. F.

January 1.

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It has always been maintained by Sir Henry Irving and others that the writer of the Shakespearean plays, from the knowledge of "stage craft" which they display, must have been an actor. This is what Sir Henry Irving wrote: "Apart from the genius of the poet, you have the irresistible evidence that Shakespeare was a great dramatic constructor, who knew the stage as intimately as a watchmaker knows the mechanism of a watch. . . . Shakespeare acquired it because he was an actor, and the hand of the actor is visible in all his dramatic work."

I notice that Mr. Beerbohm Tree has produced in London a Shakespearean drama, Antony and Cleopatra; but being only a "provincial," I have not seen any description of Mr. Tree's "setting" of the play. As originally produced, its construction was as follows:

First Act, five scenes.

Second Act, seven scenes.

Third Act, thirteen scenes (Scene 8 consists of five lines, and Scene 9 of four lines).

Fourth Act, fifteen scenes (Scene 1 consists of fifteen lines, Scene 10 of nine lines, and Scene 11 of four lines).

Fifth Act, two scenes.

How does Mr. Tree manage to solve the scenic difficulty? Would an actor, or acting manager, of the present day ever place upon the stage a play consisting of forty-two scenes, some of them limited to four or five lines? How would Mr. Archer criticise such a production?

Then if the author of the plays was such a supreme master of "stage craft," how comes it about that the Keans, Phelps, Irving, Benson, Tree, and others know so much more of "stage craft" than the "actor" who wrote them that they have shifted about and curtailed the author's scenes and language in a manner totally unrecognisable by a reader of the "First Folio"?

GEORGE STRONACH.

January 1.

P.S. Of course, I am quite aware of the fact that there was no scenery in Shakespeare's day.

A FOLK-SONG

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—The children's song and dancing game inquired for by Miss Main in the ACADEMY of November 5 is explained by the movements of the children during the dance. One of the Midland variants of the song, with its music, will be found in "Shropshire Folk Lore," Burne and Jackson (Trubner, 1883). Another, also known in the Midlands, is printed, without music, in "Mother Goose," illustrated by Kate Greenaway (Routledge, n.d.). If Miss Main cannot readily consult these books, I will, on receipt of a postcard, gladly send her copies both of the words and music.

EDWIN SMITH.

December 24, 1906.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

English Costume. Painted and described by Dion Clayton Calthrop. Vol. iv.: Georgian. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 99. Pl. xvi. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

[The last volume of Mr. Calthrop's history of English costume: deals with the years 1660 to 1830.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Grant, Mr. Colquhoun. Queen and Cardinal. 9 × 5½. Pp. 268. Murray, 12s. net.

[A memoir of Anne of Austria and of her relations with Cardinal Mazarin. Portraits.]

DRAMA.

Baring, Maurice. Desiderio. 7½ × 5¼. Pp. 128. Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. net.
[A drama in three acts.]

FICTION.

Ingersoll, Ernest. Eight Secrets. Illustrated. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 338. Macmillan, 6s.

Winter, John Strange. The Love of Philip Hampden. 7¼ × 5½. Pp. 302. White, 6s.

In Statu Pupillari. 7½ × 5¼. Pp. 287. Sonnenschein, 6s.

Lynn, Eve. The Joy of Hell. 8 × 5½. Pp. 367. Drane, 6s.

[We quote the opening sentence: "An ominous silence enwrap the mighty vastness and there was a strange misty amethystine phosphorescence clinging amorously to the myriad magnificent mountain peaks."]

Carter, J. E. The Offenders. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 421. Drane, 6s.

Magnay, Sir William. The Duke's Dilemma. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 320. Long, 6s.

Mitford, C. Guise. Izelle of the Dunes. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 355. Long, 6s.

Pemberton, Clive. The Weird o' It. 7½ × 5. Pp. 279. Drane, 3s. 6d.

[Ten short stories.]

Sandford, Gerald. The Gipsies' Queen and A Double Shuffle. 7½ × 5. Pp. 124. Drane, 3s. 6d.

[Two short stories.]

Gould, Nat. A Sporting Squatter. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 286. Long, 2s.

Murray, David Christie. The Penniless Millionaire. 7½ × 5¼. Pp. 340. Long, 6s.

HISTORY.

Barnicott, Roger. Plymouth in History. With many illustrations by W. S. Lear. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 114. The Cornubian Press, 1s. net.

Barker, J. Ellis. The Rise and Fall of the Netherlands. 8½ × 5¾. Pp. 478. Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.

[“A political and economic history and a study in practical statesmanship.”]

LITERATURE.

Letters of Literary Men. Arranged and edited by Frank Arthur Mumby. 2 vols. Vol. i.—Sir Thomas More to Robert Burns. Vol. ii.—The Nineteenth Century. 8 × 5¼. Pp. 374 and 632. Routledge, 2s. 6d. net each.

[In “The London Library.”]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Thomsett, Richard Gillham. Fables and Fancies. Illustrated by K. M. Davidson and A. E. Holloway. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 82. Drane, 3s. 6d.

St. Johnston, Reginald. A History of Dancing. 9¼ × 6. Pp. 197. Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.

The Catholic Directory, Ecclesiastical Register and Almanac for the Year of our Lord 1907. 7¼ × 5. Pp. xxviii, 652. Burns & Oates, 1s. 6d. net.

[Seventieth annual publication.]

The Fingerpost 8½ × 5½. Pp. 246. Issued by the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, 1s. 6d. post free.

[A series of useful articles on existing employments for women, with detailed information as to methods and costs of training.]

Chase, Wilfrid Earl. Jonathan Upglade. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 200. Madison, Wisconsin: Chase, n.p.

[Papers on different subjects. They have apparently been delivered in America in the form of sermons.]

Spencer, Frank. The ABC of Progressive Whist. 5½ × 4¼. Pp. 151. Drane, 1s.

[“Rules, procedure and etiquette, with hints on play and prize-winning.”]

NATURAL HISTORY.

Sinel, J. An Outline of the Natural History of our Shores. Illustrated by 120 photographs from Nature and numerous descriptive diagrams. 8 × 5½. Pp. 344. Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.

[With chapters on collecting and preserving marine specimens, methods of microscopic mounting, etc., and on the marine aquarium. Short list of books useful to the beginner and a very inadequate index.]

POETRY.

Cruttwell, Robert W. First Words of an Idler. 7¼ × 4¾. Pp. 67. Routledge, 1s. 6d.

[Ten of the poems in this volume have appeared in the Isis.]

By Still Waters: Lyrical Poems Old and New. By A. E. 8½ × 6. Pp. 33. Dundrum: The Dun Emer Press, 7s. 6d.

Atkinson, E. J. Rupert. The Shrine of Desire. 8 × 4¾. Pp. 83. Melbourne: Melville & Mullen, n.p.

Clark, Arthur G. Poems. 6 × 4¾. Pp. 95. Drane, 1s.

Another Handful of Leaves. 7 × 4½. Perth: A. Stevenson Nicol, n.p.

Bingham, Clifton. Lyrics without Music. 7½ × 5. Pp. 160. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 2s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Byron's Don Juan. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. 8½ × 5¼. Pp. 612. Murray, 6s.

[A new, revised and enlarged edition, with illustrations.]

Eliot, George. The Mill on the Floss. With photogravure frontispiece by William Hatherell. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 568. Blackwood, 3s. 6d. net.

The Thousand and One Nights: The Arabian Nights' Entertainments. Translated by Edward William Lane. Edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. In four volumes—vols. iii. and iv. 7¼ × 4¾. Pp. 388 and 451. Bell, 3s. 6d. per vol.

Merriman, H. Seton. The Last Hope. 8½ × 6. Pp. 184. Newnes, 6d.

[In Messrs. Newnes's series of Sixpenny Books. Illustrated; paper cover.]

Boothby, Guy. A Bride from the Sea. 8½ × 5¼. Pp. 120. Long, 6d.

[Paper covers.]

THEOLOGY.

Lilley, A. L. Adventus Regni. 7¼ × 5¼. Pp. 146. Griffiths, 3s. net.

[Sermons, chiefly on the Parables of the Kingdom, preached at St. Mary's, Paddington Green.]

Smyth, Wm. Woods. The Bible in the Full Light of Modern Science. 9¼ × 6. Pp. 19. Simpkin, Marshall, n.p.

The Religion of the Spirit. By an Unorthodox Churchman. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 104. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 2s. net.

[“A modern view of Christian doctrine and observance.”]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Philip, Alex. J. Gravesend: the Water-Gate of London. With an introductory chapter by G. M. Arnold. Illustrated by J. A. C. Branfill. 7¼ × 5. Pp. 124. The Homeland Association, 1s. net.

[Bibliography.]

Reynolds-Ball, Eustace. The Tourist's India. With 28 full-page illustrations and new map of “Tourist India.” 8 × 5¼. Pp. 364. Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d.

THE BOOKSHELF

The Elements of Greek Worship. By S. C. Kaines Smith, M.A. (Francis Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net.)—One of the earliest members of the Royal College of Physicians, Dr. Caius, the refounder of Gonville and Caius College, in a burst of loyalty to his University published an elaborate demonstration that Cambridge had been a University town from 394 B.C. Later historians like J. R. Green, who distinguish the history of the English people from that of this island, would hardly, it is to be feared, attribute much importance to Dr. Caius's conclusion, even if they allowed that he had made out his case. A similar distinction occurs to the mind when confronted with many of the current investigations of Greek topics. Valuable as these investigations are, they do not always assist the humanism that is inspired from Hellas. In Mr. Kaines Smith's little work we have such facts of Greek worship as are contained in Greek literature especially and Greek art, analysed in the light of comparative mythology. One set of gods are put aside as aboriginal, another set are labelled as importations. The University Extension student, for whom the volume is intended, may naturally ask which element is Greek, or, if he receive the answer which Mr. Kaines Smith properly enough implies to be correct—that the temperament of classical Greece was composite—he may go on to inquire why he, who needs inoculation with that composite growth, should have fobbed off on him theories of origins. Not otherwise might a Basuto, avid of some infusion with the spirit of English Literature, resent receiving instead lectures on the beliefs of the Goidels or the Neolithic inhabitants of Albion. This criticism, however, concerns rather the Extension student than Mr. Kaines Smith, who, if his subject be granted, writes well enough. He does not indeed speak with the masterfulness of an original worker: but his study of Heracles's life (he styles him the great “Progressive” of his age) is entertaining and abundantly convincing. It is unfortunate that the book has appeared before the writer could make use of Mr. A. Bernard Cook's paper on Zeus and Hera. Mr. Cook, like our author, thinks Zeus and Dione one pair of divinities, where the male is the superior: but he makes Hera and Heracles another, which is dominated by the female. The truth would appear to be that Hera's complement was Poseidon, as we know to have been the case originally at Argos and in Crete. Whether this pair was aboriginal may be questioned: the occurrence of Zeus before the Dorian invasion, and in Attica, makes it conceivable that Zeus and Dione with Athena were earlier, and that Hera and Poseidon were introduced by Pelops. Space precludes more than a passing reference to the interesting chapters, on Were the Greeks Idolaters? (the author says: No), Sacrifice and Prayer, Divination and Oracles, and The Mysteries. Undoubtedly to those who know nothing of the Comparative Study of Religion, this little book (which requires no knowledge of Greek) will open new avenues of thought, though in some directions its learning appears to be a little thin.

The Old Roof-Tree. By Ishbel. (Longmans, 5s. net.)—This book of letters from "Ishbel" (an Australian on a visit to England) to her half-brother Mark, who has not, like herself, been brought up in the Colonies, owes something to "The Road-Mender." From the preface it may be assumed that it is the Colonial freshness of vision which is to be of value in enabling the writer to "touch one, here and there, to more critical examination of the strange chaos of misery that underlies Britain's social system." It is a laudable ambition, and we are disappointed to find that it has not been achieved. Critical examination becomes difficult when a book is written in a style which is frequently confused and incoherent. No sooner is interest in a certain subject awakened, than it is dropped, and references to various shadowy relatives interfere with the train of thought, and endless questions intrude themselves, and, to use the writer's own words, "let you down as if you had missed a step on the stairs." The first three letters are written at Cheyne Walk, where a very lively imagination causes the author to see in an old weather-beaten barge a resemblance to a slaver on the African coast, or a beach-comber in the South Seas. After that come many letters from "Cathedral City," where she is struck—it is not a singular experience—by the narrow-mindedness of certain members of the cathedral circle. There are some true and delicate descriptions of landscape; and in the accounts of visits to the slums of Chelsea, Ham, Stepney and Shoreditch, the author is at her best. She is simpler and more direct in expression as she insists on the "tale of derision," the "parable of shame," and there is power in many of her passages. The last few letters are from Holland, Germany and Venice and the sympathetic account of the birthplace and of the teacher of S. Thomas à Kempis is as interesting as anything in the book. It is from Venice that the dream of the regeneration of England reaches Mark. "There is but one tribunal to which the army of reformers can finally appeal—the nation at large. . . . Ah! what a throb of passionate hope it brings—the thought of a people rising at last in its might, strong to put down fruitless ruin, to preserve life rather than to destroy it, to revive faith in the truth which falseness to all great aims so often clouds—the truth that God is Love."

Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari. Arranged and translated by E. L. Seeley (Chatto and Windus, 7s. 6d. net.)—This new edition of a selection of Vasari's Lives has no particular merit, for in so far as the text varies from the admirable translation of A. B. Hinds it is not an improvement, while an arrangement which omits the lives of Correggio, Massaccio, and Carpaccio, and inserts those of Perino del Vaga, Baccio Bandinelli, and Rustici is sufficiently self-condemnatory. Of the illustrations, which are the chief feature of the edition, those in ordinary half-tone are to be preferred before the more pretentious and more traitorous coloured plates.

European Enamels. By Henry H. Cunynghame. (Methuen, 20s. net.)—Although the title of this work (an addition to the Connoisseur's Library) covers an immense field of labour, the art of enamelling always appears to us essentially oriental in character. Byzantium may have attempted to bring home to Europe the glories of the east, but one has only to set side by side the examples of Persian or Chinese work with that, say, of early Limoges to discover once for all that the art and craft of enamelling gives a vastly richer result under the older civilisations. No one knows this more fully than Mr. Cunynghame, who has absorbed the whole history of his subject and sets it before us in so convenient and graceful a way as to make his volume one of the most charming of an excellent series. From the nature of the materials used in various enamels and the different methods of work in all countries, the author goes on to the productions of early Egypt and Greece, the Gaulish enamelling, the Byzantine work and that of the period of Charlemagne to the decline of the Champlevé. Thereafter he deals with enamelled bas-relief and Benvenuto Cellini; painted work and the decay of mediæval art. From these considerations Mr. Cunynghame takes us to the miniaturists—from Limousin onwards, and thence to snuff-boxes and "fancy ware," "Battersea" and the degradation of the art. Enamelled jewellery, although considered in regard to certain antique forms, is rightly reserved for fuller treatment in another volume. The moderns, both in France and here, are noticed. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Dawson and schools and classes are considered. Thus it will be seen that the whole vast subject comes well within Mr. Cunynghame's work. Some seventy illustrations in colour and black and white will aid and delight the connoisseur, for whom the work is intended, but we hardly think that these reproductions of modern examples of the art will induce him to become anything other than a collector of the antique.

Historia Amoris: A History of Love, Ancient and Modern. By Edgar Saltus. (Sisley's, 5s. net.)—If any one is fitted to write the History of Love it is the author of a delightful little volume of essays entitled "Love and Lore," published some years ago and known only to readers of Mr. Saltus. In this history the author starts with Semiramis and ends with Schopenhauer. Love is a pleasant theme and here it is treated pleasantly, if with a very effective show of erudition. We have such delightful studies as those of Sappho and Aspasia, and of Antony and Cleopatra, which make modern love, in spite of Mr. Meredith, look cold when compared with that of the past. Mr. Saltus wears his learning "lightly like a flower," but though he gives his readers, "the topmost froth of thought," footnotes attest to his having his authorities at his fingers' ends. The book should prove a popular study of a popular subject.

The Theological Encyclopædia. An introduction to the study of theology. By E. O. Davies. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)—This is an invaluable little book for the theological student, containing, as it does, in a small compass, concisely and clearly expressed, an outline of all the departments of theology. But the author's own description of its object will give the best idea of it:

"The purpose of that portion of our subject on which we are now entering is to bring together under a single view the several departments of theological study, so that its extent, together with the grouping, the mutual relations, and the general character of the various branches into which it is divided, may be seen."

This purpose has, on the whole, been well fulfilled. One of the most useful features of the work is the very full bibliography which is appended after each of the divisions, containing long lists of those works, ancient and modern, which deal with that particular portion of the subject. It must be added, however, that in one respect this bibliography is notably deficient, and that is under the important head of "Historical Criticism of the Old and New Testaments."

Mr. Morris Stewart's Crown of Science (Melrose, 3s. 6d.) is of a highly speculative character, which is combined with dogmatic affirmation. The book is well written, but it is difficult to suppose that the writer intended his very problematical description of the future possibilities of the race to be taken literally. As a work of imagination, as the sketch of a system of Christian theosophy, it has much to recommend it. It is not, however, put forward in this way, but as founded on Scripture and scientific facts. The latter are used as a jumping-board for the most surprising leaps into futurity, in the course of which the astonished reader sees the author, as it were, disappear into space, after the manner of the Indian rope-trick, and then, after he had given him up for lost, reappear on solid ground once more. Telepathy, and such like, show latent powers in man which are to have surprising developments in the future. This may be so, but it is difficult to meet the opposite theory that these strange powers, such as second sight, being more highly developed in barbarous nations, are on the decline among civilised. We do not complain of the speculations, which are at least interesting and well worked out, but of the way in which the whole is put forward as a necessary deduction from the teachings of Christianity.

In The Knowledge of God (T. & T. Clark), Dr. Gwatkin uses the antiquated scholastic method in his inquiry whether Revelation is possible; whether there be either lack of power or willingness on God's part to accord one. Such a question depends on the untenable assumption that we know the nature of God well enough to be able to answer it. There is a wide difference between the Agnostic assumption that we can know nothing of the Absolute Being, and the equally gratuitous one that we can know His character and reason upon it with greater a priori certainty than in the case of our human friends. Even if the question be legitimate, some previous definition of "Revelation" becomes necessary. Dr. Gwatkin offers one. According to him: "Any fact which gives knowledge is revelation. Thus: Revelation and the knowledge of God are correlative terms expressing two sides of the same thing." He thus assumes the fact in order to discuss its possibility! Yet he is well aware of the argument for the a posteriori against the a priori method. As he puts it himself: "It may be said that the only legitimate method is to reason back from ascertained facts to find out whether a revelation has been given and, if so, of what sort it was." The only answer he can give to this is the assumption of which we have just pointed out the fallacy: "We are perfectly free to reason . . . from what we know of God to what may be expected from Him." The fact is that revelation is subjective, relative and ethical—either we have the experience of God—either we find Him in nature, in history and in ourselves—or we do not. Therefore the question as to the possibility of revelation is otiose.

Theology and Civilisation, by C. F. Dole (Allenson), deals with the problem of man's relation to the universe from the point of view of the shallow and easy optimism which is so current among a certain class of writers. For him all is plain sailing: there are no "anatomies" or mysteries. The origin and presence of evil in the world are completely and satisfactorily explained by the theory that evil is the necessary foil of good. A great deal of it is after the manner and style of many sermons, and, like these, it is far too wordy. The writer seems to think that argument consists in assertion, strengthened by reiteration in different words through many pages. A book which, like this, attempts a general synthesis, touches, at all points, on deep psychological and philosophical problems which need to be carefully analysed and defined, not assumed as here. The only attempt at definition consists in that of personality, to which he ascribes the quite unusual and arbitrary meaning of goodness and unselfishness. Only one who possesses these qualities is, in his view, properly speaking a possessor of personality. It may be granted, no doubt, that in the development of personality the escape from the autocratic standpoint is a necessary stage, but some of the strongest personalities (in the ordinary sense of the word) in history have been the most self-centred. We are informed that this book is a second edition.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

The best thing you can put into the cup for morning and evening meals. An invaluable liquid food in the form of a delicious beverage.

You can have nothing purer or more reliable than Cadbury's Cocoa. It is made amidst pure surroundings in the Garden Factory of Bournville.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

UNIVERSITY
JAN 22 1907
LIBRARY

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1810

JANUARY 12, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

THE Council of the University of Sheffield is about to appoint a Librarian who must have high academic qualifications. Copies of not more than three testimonials, and the names of two referees, must be sent, by January 23, 1907, to the Registrar, from whom full particulars may be obtained.

W. M. GIBBONS,
Registrar.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN ALBEMARLE ST., PICCADILLY, W.

Tuesday next, January 15, at three o'clock, Professor PERCY GARDNER, Litt.D., F.S.A. First of two Lectures on THE SCULPTURE OF AEGINA IN RELATION TO RECENT DISCOVERY. Half a Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 17, at three o'clock, WILLIAM NAPIER SHAW, Esq., M.A., LL.D., Sc.D., F.R.S. First of Two Lectures on RECENT ADVANCES IN THE EXPLORATION OF THE ATMOSPHERE. Half a Guinea.

Saturday, January 19, at three o'clock, Sir ALEXANDER C. MACKENZIE, Mus.Doc., D.C.L., LL.D. First of Two Lectures on LATEST PHASES OF MUSIC with Musical Illustrations. Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season Two Guineas.

The Friday evening meetings will begin on January 18, at nine o'clock, when Sir ANDREW NOBLE, Bart., K.C.B., D.Sc., F.R.S., will give a Discourse on FIFTY YEARS OF EXPLOSIVES.

Books for Sale.

GROTE'S HISTORY OF GREECE. Portrait, Map and Plans, 10 vols. cr. 8vo, cloth. Published by Murray at 50s., offered for 25s. net, new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS, translated by Van Laun, Memoir, Appendices and Notes. Fine Etchings by Lalauze. 6 vols., 8vo, cloth, 30s. Another without etchings, 20s., published by Paterson in 1875.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MEISSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BELGIUM.—Lady highly recommends Ladies' School where unexpected vacancy occurs. Special fees, 40 guineas yearly. French, German, Piano included.—References in England, Mrs. BAYNES, 28 Heathurst Road, Hampstead, London.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors, MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

AUTHOR (translator of considerable experience) undertakes literary translations from the French, German or Italian.—Address, BETA, 38 Lansdowne Road, South Lambeth.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late
R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by
E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Sale by Auction

Re W. S. Page, Esq., deceased.

Messrs. C. C. & T. Moore will include in the Sale, at "The Limes," St. John's Road, Putney, S.W., on January 17, at one o'clock, a few choice oil paintings, including

"BARLEY FIELD IN BERKSHIRE,"
by C. J. LEWIS, R.I.,

and "LYNMOUTH," by JAMES WEBB; a beautiful English chiming clock, and some pieces of antique furniture.

Auction Offices, 7 Leadenhall Street, E.C.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue.
Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expenses when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Newnes' Art Library

Small crown 4to. Quarter vellum. 3s. 6d. net. Post free, 3s. 9d.

THE object of this series is to illustrate by adequate reproductions the Paintings, Drawings, and Sculpture of the Great Masters. To this end the illustrations are all full-page finely printed upon one side only of the paper. Special care is being taken in every detail of the production that the result may be worthy of its great subject. Each volume contains from 56 to 64 full-page plates. In addition there is a Frontispiece in photogravure or two illustrations in colours. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced.

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDREY.
CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.
VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDREY.
GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.
RAPHAEL. By EDGCUMBE STALEY.
VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.
G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. PANTINI.
TINTORETTO. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.
BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.
PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSÈNE ALEXANDRE.
ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.
FRA ANGELICO. By EDGCUMBE STALEY.
LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILES.
GIOVANNI BELLINI. By EVERARD MEYNELL.
THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.
DE LA CROIX. By HENRI FRANTZ.
INGRES. By OCTAVE UZANNE.
CORREGGIO. By SELWYN BRINTON.

The National Gallery

3s. 6d. net each. Post free, 3s. 9d.

THE scheme of these seven volumes is very similar to that of the popular Art Library, to which they form a companion series. They consist of 49 to 65 fine reproductions of important works, printed on superior plate paper. These are preceded by essays written by eminent authorities on the schools of painting represented. Complete catalogues of the works in the Galleries are included. Each book has a photogravure frontispiece. The bindings, in blue, gold, and warm grey, are uniform and charming.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL. By GUSTAVE GEFFROY.
THE FLEMISH SCHOOL. By FREDERICK WEDMORE.
THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.
THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.

THE NORTH ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE CENTRAL ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE FRENCH, GERMAN, AND SPANISH SCHOOLS. By WALTER BAYES.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE BUILDING AND ADORNMENT OF THE HOUSE IS SURELY THE MOST IMPORTANT ART OF MAN

In this volume Mr. Baillie Scott deals in an able fashion with all the problems involved in house building, furnishing and decoration, the main idea being to show the possibilities of beauty which lie in the mere building of a house

HOUSES AND GARDENS

BY H. M. BAILLIE SCOTT

Art Linen, Medium 4to, 31s. 6d. net. Post free, 32s.

Over 200 Illustrations, 17 of which are in Colours

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	27	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Going up top	40
The Novel of Manners	30	Fiction	41
The Pleasantest Ramble	30	Drama:
Another Terror	32	Two Plays at the Court
Biography for the Million	32	Theatre	42
Society in the Country House	34	Fine Art:
Medieval Builders	34	The International Society	42
Le Roi Soleil	35	Music:
By Land and Sea	36	A Second Performance	43
Early London Printing	37	Forthcoming Books	44
Ill-treated Rodin	38	Correspondence	45
The Library Table	38	Books Received	45
To E. J.	39	The Bookshelf	46

This Number contains the Index to Vol. LXXI.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It is evident that Mr. Alfred Austin must look to his laurels; for the Times has found a formidable competitor in the Archbishop of Armagh, who contributes a poem of more than twenty stanzas in memory of Lady Burdett Coutts. We would like to quote it in its entirety, but one or two stanzas will be sufficient. One is:

Thou, high beyond all reach of the scorers,
Who dwelt not as one of the self-adorners,
But one that is sent to comfort the mourners;

Another is:

Till the carthorse had his Whitsun feast,
And the donkey grew a favoured beast,
And the bird's song saved his life at least;

And the final one reads:

One may tell us what that word can say,
Hid though she be from our sight away,
In the tongue of the angels—Angela!

Evidently the Archbishop of Armagh would be no unworthy successor to the present laureate!

The "Notes by an Examiner" in "Provincial Letters" (Smith, Elder) still yield some amusement in these days of high-class education. The young ladies' schools lag as far behind in humour as ever. The most striking characteristic of Chaucer was "a great brain, specially endowed for the great purpose of settling the English language on a firm basis." The practice of learning lists of books and a few particulars about the authors has some curious results, and the reformers of our educational methods can certainly turn much to ridicule. "'Paradise Lost' is the most famous lyric poem in the English language, and, with Homer's 'Illyad,' holds the chief place among lyric poems ever written." Or take this for an appreciation of the organ voice of England: "Milton's style was sublime and comprehensive, and at the same time soothing."

Was it a juvenile wit who wrote that Wordsworth "took up the position of a retired poet," and that "Wordsworth regarded Nature as a sweetheart"? Has the following to be regarded as a satirical commentary on the feast of soul to be found in our halls of learning; or perhaps a young brother observes from afar the æsthetic movement: "In his youth he received a university education, and that led him to say that the meanest flower gave him thoughts too deep for tears. It seemed as if a blade of grass spoke to him."

The higher education evidently conveys many common facts about the domestic lives of poets, though it leaves the pupil with few ideas about the greatness of their achievements. "Shakespeare married Jane Hathaway," says one. "Byron was the son of a dissolute guardsman and an Aberdeenshire heiress, and he inherited the defects of both parents," says another.

In nearly every case the literary criticism is confined to parrot-like repetitions or confused memories of facts that are to be read in every "literary reader." "Milton wrote in very varying metres, and uses eighty-nine per cent. of Anglo-Saxon verbs." "Tennyson was born in Lincolnshire, and we can trace the influence of the fens and flats in many of his poems." "Byron has not much imagination, but the powers of his intellect are wonderful, and we wonder at his amazing productiveness. 'Cain' is the most thoughtful of his works; others are 'Gulliver's Travels,' 'Don Juan,' and 'Beppo.'"

This is what children spend years of their lives in endeavouring to assimilate. Why should we keep up the farce of such non-intelligent education any longer? If the children read the poems, or parts of them, that is surely sufficient. If they have the intellect to appreciate verse or fine prose, then first steps have been taken and the master's duty is done. Those who are non-comprehending will return to browse on the thistles of juvenile literature provided in such abundance.

Mrs. Earle, in her work "Letters to Young and Old," gives an example of the extraordinary questions put to children of eleven and twelve by the school examiners. The following will surely result later on in sodden brains for these young people. How is it (we may ask our mature readers): (a) That there are so many old cathedral cities in the eastern half of England? (b) That the heaths round London (such as Blackheath) are now so famous for schools, and were once notorious for highwaymen? (c) That the sites of most old Roman camps are now occupied by railway junctions? (d) That so many small articles (such as pins, pens, screws, watch-springs, etc.) are made in the Birmingham district? (e) That the Broads teem with wild fowl?

The young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly!—
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

A correspondent writes: At this moment, when our spelling is—possibly—in the throes of a new birth, and when France devotes an occasional second to following our lead and "cuts down her own vineyards," orthographically, Wilhelm Franz is useful reading. He deals with Shakespearean sixteenth-century spelling. Of course, King Lear is no longer a play, after Tolstoy's sapient critique of that foolish, fond old king. The divine William, also, could not write his own surname twice in the same way. But how did he pronounce words like change, danger, range, orange? Franz tells us—quoting as his proof, occasionally and unfortunately, W. Salesbury. For W. Salesbury was, or may have been, vitiated in his pronunciation by residence in N. Wales, and his "Dictionary in Englyshe and Welshe [is] moche necessary to all suche Welshemen as wil spedly learne the englyshe togne thought unto the Kynges maiestie very mete to be sette forth to the use of his graces subiectes in Wales." It is, however, less necessary as a guide of English (as it was spoken in 1547) to present English-speaking Englishmen.

And, when Franz quotes Salesbury's spelling oreintsys = oranges, one instinctively dreads a solecism, the Denbighshire pronunciation of an imported name for an imported article. Ebenso spricht Jones. Another Welshman? And are we to bow to "the Celtic fringe," whether West-Anglian or other? And shall we acknowledge, with Dublin, that Dublin speaks the best English in the Three Kingdoms? Laugh=laf is "dialektanssprache," we are told; and what of the rhyme "slaughter" and "laughter"? Perhaps they were both guttural. Salesbury writes laughe, lawghe, laughyng with refreshing indifference, unless the noun and verb were pronounced each after its kind: so a noun and adjective, devyll, dyvellysshe.

The examination of Shakespearean puns has not resulted in any real addition to our knowledge, and his rhymes are inadequate to describe sixteenth-century pronunciation. Certainly the hoary mirth of "room in Rome" is no more serviceable than slaughter and laughter, and the abominable (or abhominable) Salesbury gives Rhoma, which takes us further afield. Rhymes are notoriously for the ear or for the eye. Provincialisms are ever with us, and practically defy elimination. Were ancient (old) and ancient (Pistol) pronounced alike, and both or neither as Fluellen utters the latter? But Fluellen—like Salesbury, like Jones—is a Welshman, and what has the Ancient Briton to do in this galley that is none of Cleopatra's? Was it ainsient, ansient, ainsient? The heart sinks and the very spirit flags, and thou wouldst divine of this unity of Shakespearean utterance. In the multitude of counsellors, Sweet and Skeat and Butler and Luick, is "comfort like cold porridge," such as burned the man of the South in the adage.

Our reviewer, in another page, refers to Mr. Escott's story about Douglas Cook: how Mrs. Lynn Linton used to say that he stormed at, swore at and even on one occasion hit her. The description given on page 146 is vivid and interesting:

The editor was John Douglas Cook, a choleric Aberdonian, with a round, red head, a bull neck, a bon-vivant, a man of pleasure, but also a first-rate man of business, with few or no real literary tastes, but with a quick, almost infallible, instinct for the literary article that would take with his public.

But why did Mr. Escott practically repeat this description on page 240. We give the passage:

At the Tresco Abbey dinner-table where we have just met him, Douglas Cook, a choleric Aberdonian with red hair, a bull neck, the gourmet and epicure shown in all the lines about his mouth and double chin, blandly took his friend Kinman's correction, and only so far asserted the prerogative of editorial autocracy as to pooh-pooh a suggestion that Scilly could possibly have anything to do with the sun-god Sulleh.

We assume the explanation to be that the chapters in the book were originally contributed to various magazines and that the author frugally spread out his material as far as it would go. But we confess that we should have liked to have some further personal knowledge of Mr. Douglas Cook, who must have been a remarkable man and was probably the most capable editor that Great Britain has ever produced. We suppose that there are very few who now sit in the chair of authority who would use to a lady contributor such words as flowed from the lips of Douglas Cook on "one of his bad days."

In Italy the State protects national art treasures for the preservation of which we in this country have to rely on private munificence or the National Art Collections Fund. The present working of the law, however, appears to be unsatisfactory, and Signor Rava, the Italian Minister for Public Instruction, is bringing in a Bill under which no article of artistic, historical, or archaeological interest over fifty years old belonging to the State, provinces, towns, villages, or ecclesiastical bodies can be sold. Public and private owners will be compelled to supply Signor Rava and his successors with full particulars of works of art or important buildings in their possession; export will be forbidden; and the State will have the option of purchasing for the nation any such treasures which come into the market. If the Bill is passed—and there seems every prospect that it will be—in a few years at most Italy will be in possession of a catalogue of her literary, architectural and artistic wealth such as no other country can boast.

Few scenes of natural beauty can boast so many memories of the immortal dead as do the glorious pine-forests of Ravenna. Here, as a contemporary recalls, Dante hunted with the Polenta and dreamed his Dream of Heaven and Hell; here Theodoric fought and Byron rode with La Guiccioli; in its solitude Boccaccio found inspiration, and Dryden and many others have sung of it. Some half a century ago it was handed over by the State to the Commune of Ceria, and about two hundred and fifty acres have been cleared in order to raise money. We are glad to learn that the indignant protests which resulted from this act of vandalism have resulted in the Commune undertaking to preserve the remaining area—the Pineta originally extended over nearly two thousand acres—and to replant the devastated ground.

The bi-centenary of the birth of the great Venetian playwright, Carlo Goldoni, which, by a decree of the Town Council of Venice, is to be publicly solemnised, occurs in February, only a few days after another centenary, no less important from an artistic point of view in the annals of the great Republic—the quater-centenary of the death of Gentile Bellini. Gentile Bellini ranks among the great Venetian painters of the Renaissance, while as a pageant-painter he stands almost supreme. His fame excelled that of his father, and he was again excelled by his brother Giovanni, the founder, with him, of the school which bore their name and from which Venetian art drew its highest inspiration and greatness. Marin Sanudo in his "Diaries" states that Gentile Bellini died on February 23, 1507, several years before his brother Giovanni. He was buried in Venice, and the Church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo is said to contain his ashes. No trace, however, exists of his tomb, and though many researches have been made to discover where he lies, all have proved in vain.

Although only a limited number of his works remains, the National Galleries of London, Buda-Pesth, Frankfurt-am-Main, Milan and Venice, possess valuable examples, while in private collections the best known specimens are those in Mr. Ludwig Mond's collection in London, and the late Sir Henry Layard's in Venice. The newly-formed Istituto Veneto d'Arti Grafiche intends to publish, on or about the quater-centenary of Gentile Bellini's death, a volume by Lionello Venturi, entitled "Origini della Pittura Veneziana," which has been awarded a prize (as was Pompeo Molmenti's now famous "Vita Privata dei Veneziani") by the Regio Istituto Veneto di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti. Beginning with the earliest Byzantine masters in 1300 it covers the period up to the masterpieces of Giovanni Bellini in 1500, devoting an almost inordinate space to Gentile and enlarging on his technique and composition, his style and sense of beauty. There will be one hundred and twenty illustrations.

Mr. Roosevelt's essay on the ancient Irish Sagas, to which we referred last week, may perhaps be regarded as a sign that the United States are anxious to take the lead in inquiring into so-called Celtic literature on the Irish side. For several years a scheme has been on foot in America for starting a Library of Irish Literature under the auspices of Mr. Charles Welsh, who was for many years the managing partner in the firm of Messrs. Griffith, Farran and Co. Since he has been in America Mr. Welsh has been actively pursuing his project, and has enlisted the co-operation and support of Lady Gregory, Dr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. Stephen Gwynn, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Prof. F. M. Robinson, of Harvard, and other authorities. He himself first drew up a list of the Irish authors and their works from the seventh to the thirteenth century and sent a copy to scholars who were competent to form an opinion as to its merits. The lists were returned with their amendments and suggestions, and by collating these Mr. Welsh has compiled a final list which should be of considerable interest. His methods are thorough and businesslike, and the Library—which Mr. Bryce after his address in Dublin on Norse and Celtic literature last week ought to encourage—will at least be an interesting one.

The sources of Children's Nursery Rhymes are touched on instructively by Mr. Thurstan C. Peter in "The Old Cornish Drama" (Elliot Stock).

Matthew, Mark, Luke and John,
Guard the bed that I lie on—(Varia lectio: Went to bed with their breeches on)— is a quotation from the Towneley mysteries, or ministeria. Another Nursery-game rhyme:

A. How many miles to Babylon?
B. Three score and ten.
A. Shall I be there by candlelight?
B. Yes, and back again—has an equally pious origin, plays of Chyldremas Day. So has the riddle of our grandfathers concerning the number of wives, etc., possessed by the man who was going to St. Ives. "The accounts of the borough authority of St. Ives record receipts from the interludes," and in 1575, 4d. was the sum "spent upon the carpenter that made heaven." For half that price Fawston "mended the wind," and equally cheap were "two worms of conscience" (ayenbites of inwit? or threads of screws?). Children, we are told, "at times appeared in the costume of Eden."

Here come I, old Father Christmas, Welcome or welcome not, are the opening lines of the play St. George, and protest against the Christmas observance inhibition in 1652. For schoolboy "howlers" commend us to this play! Henry of Monmouth seizes Quebec and the crown of Spain, thanks to Gibbon's pig-merchant, George of Cappadocia. Who would have guessed it of Hal? Among "December liberties," at the Feast of Fools, was the eating of puddings off the altar. As history is a recurring decimal, last month the French soldiers at Sens were celebrating a black mass and visiting the cantine in chasubles. The old "ordinary" had nothing to do with the House of Lords Spiritual, being merely the director of such pieces as the Gwreans an bys (Creation of the World), or Beunans Meriasek (Life of Meriadoc). Meriadoc is quite Celtic, partly Breton and partly Cornish, and at a pinch a sailor, like St. Brendan. One is pleased to find that the infernal chef (or one of his aides), Tulfic, has a treble voice, while Beelzebub and Satan sing bass. Pontius Pilate (his prænomen is apparently still unknown) is dreadfully travestied. His father's capture of Mithridates for Pompey the Great was known to Moses of Khorni, not to the Cornish. The play Pascon agan Arluth (Our Lord's Passion) is less amusing. Here are no pedant talking Latin in his cups, like Chaucer's Somnour, no sermons to man-eating wolves, no guzzling pipers. And now what have we of this Yuletide revel, of the libertas Decembris? "Nothing," answers the Éclair, "but 'Pantagruéliques nopces et festius.'"

A propos of a communication to the Daily Mail of Tuesday last on "Business and Prayers," a correspondent writes: The American people are, with the exception of the English, the most religious nation on earth, and this fact has been recently illustrated by the action of an Episcopalian clergyman who has composed collects for use on special occasions in Wall Street. It is doubtless these forms of prayer to which the Daily Mail refers. They have already met with the approval of Mr. Pierpont Morgan, who in forwarding a copy of them to his friend the Archbishop of Canterbury, asked for his opinion of them as liturgical compositions. It is strange to find that our "beautiful liturgy" is not sufficient for the needs of a new country, but even the Book of Common Prayer must march with the times, and every one will admit that these collects are singularly free from sectarian prejudice and might be used by any denomination other than Roman Catholic, as the following examples show:

For the use of Staff of a Morning or Evening Paper.

O Lord, from whom all good things do come; grant to us Thy independent coadjutors that by our own inspiration we may think of those things that really are good without the intervention or assistance of Laffan and Reuter; through, etc.

At the Formation of a Trust.

O God, the strength of them that belong to any Trust mercifully accept our shares; and if through the weakness of the market we have not got hold of a good thing, grant that with a good grace while keeping both thy commandments and that of the American legislature we may unload at a favourable opportunity; through, etc.

On the Departure of a Daughter for Europe.

O God, in whose sight the almighty dollar is of no less value than the English sovereign; mercifully grant that this our daughter now sailing for Europe in ss. [name of vessel] may effectually meet her peer, who will thus be made partaker of a treasure upon earth, which with his title anticipates and renders superfluous the rewards of paradise.

After a Smash when Directors have been Arrested.

O Lord, we beseech thee to clear us; and grant that we to whom thou hast given a hearty desire to pay may be ably defended and comforted: forgiving us those things whereof our conscience is afraid and granting us the benefit of that doubt which has been the safeguard of our financial existence.

A correspondent has addressed a long letter to us protesting against the trend of an article in last week's issue on The Decay of Illustration. His point is, in the first place, that American periodicals have not a higher standard of illustration than English periodicals, but that on the contrary they have nothing to compare with our best work of this kind. In the second place, although the effects produced by process reproduction are not equal to those of the old woodcut, they have nevertheless improved very greatly during recent years and it is somewhat old-fashioned to talk of photography as being a mere mechanical process. It has been employed during the last few years by artists for the production of art. The assertion that this is not so is merely an echo from a controversy that was rife ten or twelve years ago. There is much to be said for the view of our correspondent.

Prince Francis Liechtenstein has just bought the valuable library and scientific collection of the Russian historian, Professor Bilbasow, and has presented it as a gift, for the purpose of promoting the study of the history and position of Eastern Europe, to the Department of Public Instruction at Vienna. Professor Unterberger, of the Vienna University, has gone to St. Petersburg for the purpose of taking over possession and bringing the collection and library back with him.

The amount Mr. Carnegie has given during the past year for the erection of Libraries is by no means small. Including one sum of £7500 which in the case of Scarborough has not yet been accepted, the amount promised to the different library authorities during 1906 is £121,398. The total may be larger than this, as it is possible some gifts may not have been announced, but if there are any sums of this description they are probably small. An item of £13,000 must be deducted from the total amount, however, as Bath refused both to accept the gift and to adopt the Public Library Acts.

LITERATURE

THE NOVEL OF MANNERS

Honoré de Balzac. By FERDINAND BRUNETIÈRE. French Men of Letters series. (Lippincott, 6s. net.)

IN this volume we have an excellent example of the late M. Brunetière's work, and to read it is to feel an increased regret that the services rendered by the author to literature have had finis written to them by the hand of death. No work exactly similar to this has ever appeared in English. M. Brunetière was as much immersed in the spirit of criticism as was Sainte-Beuve himself. He thought with clearness and precision, his opinions were of a decided character, and they are here expressed with copious energy. The author wastes no time over the trivial or irrelevant. He is passionately interested in Balzac, but beyond Balzac is always the French novel and beyond the French novel life itself. In a spirited preface he tells us that he intends this work to be not a memoir but a study. The reader is expressly warned not to seek here for information about Balzac's origin, "anecdotes of his college days, the tittle-tattle of his love-affairs, and the tedious narrative of his quarrels with newspapers or publishers." Thus the personal element is eliminated. Circumstance :

Machinery just meant
To give thy soul its bent,

if not entirely ignored is at least neglected. M. Brunetière does not start with the childhood of Balzac, but with the childhood of the modern novel. The ancestors he is concerned with are not the forefathers of the "Inspector of Supplies for the First Military Division," but the fathers of the modern French novel, whom he finds in Le Sage and Courtlitz de Sandras who invented Athos, Aramis, and Porthos. No doubt this is meant as a rap on the knuckles to the reputed parent of the immortal trio, for M. Brunetière has little sympathy with the so-called historical novelists. To him the elder Dumas was "nothing but a negro, one who was quite happy to exploit white people, and who laughed immoderately over it." M. Brunetière's great point is that the Novel of Manners, the story of contemporary life, is the real historical novel: it is the evidence of one who has seen with his own eyes and who has lived among the scenes he describes. Your studious bookman with bent head and pale face he will have none of; for of all forms of composition the novel is the one "whose roots should be most deeply implanted in reality." With the conclusions of M. Brunetière we confess ourselves in absolute agreement. The present degradation and low estate of the English novel are due to the success of those who have manufactured cheap art fabrics for the million, cloak and rapier stuff from which even the omnivorous schoolboy turns away. No age recorded in history is so romantic and so magical as that in which we live, but the man who essays to depict it needs more than a deft pen and the attributes of a sedulous ape.

M. Brunetière might have worked out his thesis more convincingly. Are the distinctions he draws vital? In trying to show that the novels of the half-century following "Gil Blas" "assumed almost universally the form of the personal narrative," he mentions "Robinson Crusoe," "Gulliver's Travels," "Manon Lescaut" and "Marianne." He goes on to say that :

the success of the "novel in letters"—after the model of "Clarissa Harlowe" (1748) or "The New Heloise" (1762)—neither interrupted nor checked the vogue of the personal novel; but, on the contrary, it may be said, indeed it must be said, that its success contributed only to encourage that vogue. And, in truth, if "correspondence" is, so to speak, nothing else but a mutual diary, and is therefore also only a form of "confession," or, at all events, of "confidence," it will be seen how the novel in letters continues and extends the form of the personal narrative by broadening and diversifying it. It is herself, and no other, whom Clarissa Harlowe analyses, as Marianne did; and Saint-Preux differs from the Chevalier Des Grieux only in this, that he "anatomises" himself with more complacency.

It is curious that M. Brunetière never alludes to or mentions "Tom Jones," the apotheosis of the Novel of Manners, a work which fulfils all his conditions except that it does not take the form of a personal narrative or of a tale told in letters. Yet it is dominated by a personality who is none the less commanding because he does not mingle in the story or use the first personal pronoun.

Now let us glance at M. Brunetière's examination of the romance. A clue to his thought is to be found in a mot of one of the De Goncourts: "History is a novel which has been; a novel is history which might have been." He says the models and masterpieces of the historical novel are "Ivanhoe," "Quentin Durward," "The Abbot," "The Monastery," "Rob Roy," "I Promessi Sposi," "The Last of the Barons," and "Henry Esmond." But surely this is a "variegated" list. Are both "The Abbot" and "The Monastery"—a failure and a success—to be classed together? Are Scott and Thackeray to be placed on a throne (or bench) on which Manzoni and Bulwer-Lytton have an equal place? Worse still is the comment :

The historical novel having no other legitimate means of its own to attract and hold the reader's interest than its literal imitation of the past, if I may so speak, and a scrupulous exactness which might be compared to that of the painters of the Dutch school, it forced, as it were, by a return shock, this scrupulosity upon the representation of contemporary reality, and made of this literal imitation a sort of law of the form. It revived what formerly was life-like; and what is life-like to-day is therefore what will endure in the future. Such is the lesson to be drawn from the historical novel, and that is why the success of Walter Scott could not last.

This is altogether wrong. Not "literal imitation of the past", not "scrupulous exactness" (whenever was it found in a historical novel?), but adventure is the attraction. Even in historical novels the present has more influence than M. Brunetière admits. Sir Walter Scott, for instance, in Louis XI., Richard Leicester and the rest of his historical characters gives us only so many varieties of his own countrymen dressed in the garments and using the language of a different age and clime. The greatest of all truths is the essential truth to human nature, and when genius gives us this it may choose its own embroidery. Yet, while establishing this point of difference from M. Brunetière, we recognise with gratitude the immense value of his book and with how keen an interest it will be read by all "novel-makers."

He takes a pardonably high view of his subject, although admitting or boasting that whereas style with Flaubert was an end in itself, to Balzac it was only a means to an end. As a philosophy of life he places the novels of Balzac first, with those of George Eliot second, and the ground on which this criticism is based is stated in the following passage :

Balzac devotes himself to the new characters, the singularities "as yet unseen," which his time offers to his observation; and this is precisely what readers brought up on the classics find it extremely hard to forgive him. That which displeases them in his manner of conceiving and representing life is the very thing that shocks them in his style, which they consider, if I may so express it, scandalously "modern."

This is a sample of the acute and sound criticism with which the book abounds.

THE PLEASANTEST RAMBLE

A Last Ramble in the Classics. By HUGH E. P. PLATT. (London: Simpkin, Marshall; Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS charming sequel to the charming "Byways in the Classics" is to be heartily welcomed from every point of view save one; Mr. Platt tells us that this is his last ramble. Homekeeping does not beseem a wit so far from homely; and the fount of so much brilliant comment and sparkling scholarship shows not the least symptom of running dry. Books like this do much to help the continuance and influence of classical reading, now threatened on every side. They deserve the tribute paid to the performing dog of which Codlin in "The Old Curiosity Shop" declared: "that dawg would have made his master's fortun' besides revivin' the drayma."

The Preface (modestly called "Apology") gives an interesting addendum to De Quincey's famous denunciation of that bane of conversation, the professional story-teller. "It is no good your telling us stories," said G. A. Sala to a young man who showed a tendency of that kind; "if it's a proper one we don't want to hear it, and if it's improper we know it."

Many departments of social life are touched with the lightest hand, and many interesting observations thereon both new and true are made or suggested. It was not the wife's mother who was the target of the cheap humourists in ancient Rome. Juvenal (vi. 231) did launch one thunder-word after his manner,

Desperanda tibi salva concordia socru;

but the jealousy that seemed natural to the dramatists was that between the wife and her mother-in-law; Laches in Terence (Hecyra ii. 1, 4) puts it plainly:

Itaque adeo uno animo omnes socrus oderunt, oderunt, nurus.

Mr. Platt on his next appearance (for there will be a second edition of this "Ramble" and, we hope, another to follow) may think it worth while to add to his comments on noverca a reference to Aesch. Prom. 727, where a dangerous coast is described as "the maw of Salmydessus, rude hostess to mariners, stepmother of ships." To some diverting tales about Roman marriage he might add an incident related by Plutarch about the famous Cato of Utica. Cato had married as his second wife Marcia, the daughter of the consular Marcius Philippus. She was still young and beautiful, and had borne to him three children. He was much attached to her, but his bosom friend Hortensius conceived that his own feelings were still more deeply engaged, and requested Cato to be kind enough to divorce her, so that he might make her his wife. It sounds like a Bab Ballad, but Cato consented. "Observing," writes Plutarch, "how much the affections of his friend were engaged, Cato did not think his own feelings should be allowed to stand in the way." As to Marcia, it seems that, like the lady sung by an anonymous poet quoted by Mark Twain:

She loved her husband dearly,
But another man twicest as well.

She was married to Hortensius in the presence of Cato. To crown the absurdity of the situation, when some six years later Marcia became a widow, Cato at once remarried her. The bizarre incidents of the Roman marriage-market were various. Pompey, having divorced his wife for alleged adultery with Caesar, immediately married the daughter of his wife's seducer. Caesar, who repudiated a blameless wife with the words that Caesar's wife must be above suspicion, was called by Curio omnium mulierum vir. Cicero in his sixty-second year, the year before his death, married an heiress in her teens named Publilia, concerning whom he wrote to Atticus: "I never saw an uglier creature"; now Cicero was an exceptionally sober and "rangé" gentleman for his time. On p. 52 Mr. Platt quotes an amusingly pedantic definition of pupae "dolls" by Forcellini, which he compares with Johnson's famous definition of "network" as "anything reticulated or decussated at equal distances, with interstices between the intersections." Beside both may stand Hegel's definition of Notion (Stirling's translation of Schwegler's History of Philosophy, p. 329): "The Notion is the Unity of the Immediacy of Being with the self-diremption of Essence." Archbishop Whately used to ask his clergy the distinction between an Idea and a Notion, and when they had exhausted their metaphysics in attempted solutions, he would thus propound the answer: "An Idea is the object of the mind in thought, an Ocean is a vast expanse of water." Another favourite question of his was: "What is the vocative of cat?" The reply was generally "O cat!" The Archbishop, with the true sense of grammar, said the vocative was "Puss, puss."

The sections on Proverbs and Mottoes are excellent reading. If we began to quote we should never stop. We will give only two timely mottoes:

For a Visit to a Country House

Plures dies [efficiendis] pontibus absumpti.—Tac. Ann. ii. 8.

For an Automobile Club.

Sunt quos curriculo praepepe pulverem
Collegisse juvat.—Hor. Carm. i. 1, 3.

The little essay on melody in poetry is full of interest. We read that Johnson's favourite verse from this point of view was Formosam resonare doces Amaryllida silvas.

The author is himself disposed to crown a lovely line from one of the stanzas to which Gray refused a place in his "Elegy":

And little footsteps lightly print the ground;

or Tennyson's exquisite:

The moan of doves in immemorial elms;

or Keats's magic casements opening on the foam

Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn.

Tennyson reckoned among the most liquid lines in any language:

And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds.

We will not impose on the reader our own choice for melody, but for cacophony we hold that it would be hard to surpass Browning's:

Draughts dregwards loose tongues tied.

On p. 144 Mr. Platt makes a shrewd remark on a device useful in rendering a pregnant phrase, the transposition of the substantive and its epithet. Thus Gibbon translated anilis superstitio "the dotage of superstition." So Calverley in the ode beginning Uxor pauperis Ibyci renders famosisque laboribus by "All thy studious infamies." The author naturally finds a difficulty in the way in which, in foreign words, usage sometimes throws back the accent, as in "senator," sometimes keeps it on the syllable which originally held it, as in "arena." Would it not be a good rule to retain it only when the word has a non-English termination? Thus we say abdomen, vertigo, plethora, but not blasphemy, orator. He very naturally asks why Lewis and Short give platēa. The penult is certainly short in classical Latin. Does the absurd rule of old Alvarez still dwell in their minds as it lives in the memory of the present writer, who once knew Alvarez's Prosody by heart, and still remembers much of it, though he has not seen it for fifty years? The dear old nonsense ("precious" nonsense) runs as follows:

Nomina Graecorum certa sine lege vagantur:
Quaedam etenim longis, see dia, chorea, platea,
Quaedam etiam brevibus, veluti symphonia, gaudent.

Mr. Platt remarks how often in quotation the order is reversed in Hoc opus, hic labor est. Another trap besets this passage. Most men if asked to repeat the passage after facilis descensus Averno will go on with Sed revocare gradum. But between these two comes a fine line, Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis.

Among familiar misquotations he might have counted the very common substitution of "a" for "the" in

He left the name at which the world grew pale
To point a moral or adorn a tale.

We remember reading many years ago in an article on Eton in the Cornhill Magazine by an old Etonian that when the writer of the article was at Eton a boy sent up as a rendering of that couplet;

Linquebat nomen per quod jam palluit orbis
Pungere moralem seu caudam ornare superbam.

This may be "a fond thing vainly invented"; but jam and superbam are very natural.

R. Y. TYRRELL

ANOTHER TERROR

Frederick York Powell. A Life, with a selection from his letters and occasional writings. By OLIVER ELTON. 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 21s. net.)

A PERUSAL of this book recalls very forcibly Lord Lyndhurst's remark when he heard that Lord Campbell had undertaken to write the Lives of the Lord Chancellors: "Another terror is added to death." Nothing would perhaps have displeased York Powell more than the suggestion that all his desultory writings and his private letters—never intended for eyes other than those to whom they were written—should be given to the public. It is a great pity that Mr. Elton was not true to his remark that "No one knows better than a reviewer the objection to reviving work of this kind"; his frankness in dealing with his hero is almost brutal. Since Froude gave us his representation of Carlyle it has hardly been equalled. We should be the last to deny the cleverness and ability of one who was a valued contributor to this journal, but we feel that Mr. Elton has hardly done York Powell justice. We should never have said: "Powell loved heathendom being himself a heathen." We believe that this is giving an entirely wrong idea of his character. He loved not heathendom but the determination and courage of which the heathen world showed many fine examples. That his was Hero-worship more than Heathen-worship, is exemplified in his idea that the proper form of histories intended for schools should be on the lines of Plutarch rather than on those of Eutropius. This may be a wrong view, but it is the view that York Powell, Green and others put forward as the teaching of the Oxford history school as opposed to the more prosaic view of the narrative of events advocated by Lord Acton and the Cambridge historians. It was almost a necessity that York Powell should hold it. His association with Vigfusson and his study of northern literature made it practically a certainty. To quote Mr. Elton: "this association enabled Powell to satisfy the dream that was once cherished in our Universities of sitting in the study of the master of learning, watching his ways, helping to produce his works, and soon becoming his indispensable partner." Vigfusson was the prophet of the Icelandic saga, and Powell, as his disciple, became a worshipper of the prophet's idols, the heroes of the sagas.

We agree with Mr. Elton that it is a pity that the English Universities contain no place for men like Powell, who should be able to concentrate themselves on some one great task and make it the work of their lifetime; and that unless a man is content "to spend himself on college tuition or sterilise himself for the good, real or seeming, of his pupils," Oxford has no place for him. As he says, Powell's strength did not lie in that direction; he would hardly have respected himself if it had. Although it is true that Powell had possibly a wider miscellaneous learning than any other resident Oxford graduate of his time, it was not the learning that Oxford wanted taught to undergraduates. It could utilise him only in teaching something it wanted, and he was set to teach the rudiments of law. It was unfortunate, but in order to live York Powell had to work. This gave him a living, but it injured his scholarship: had he been able to concentrate his power he would have left an enduring monument; as it was his talents were wasted. As his biographer tells us:

With all his gifts and historical erudition he left no large example behind him of the methods that he urged. He did not produce much historical writing of a continuous kind; he said clearly and sharply and repeatedly what he thought of the relation of written history to ethics on the one side and literature on the other.

This, however, is hardly what is expected from the Regius Professor of History at Oxford. We admit the great, the exceptional, difficulties of the task that awaited any one who undertook the duties of the post at the time when York Powell was appointed. Oxford had become accustomed to the carefully prepared, picturesque essays in which Froude detailed, in his splendid prose, some incident of the Reformation history. If Froude's accuracy was doubtful his language was perfect. A greater contrast than there was between York Powell and Froude it would be difficult to imagine. Most of us have read some of Froude's lectures; here is Mr. Elton's account of York Powell's inaugural lecture:

Powell misreckoned his time, was troubled with notes, and stopped abruptly after half an hour. When he had jerked out his earnest advice that they should look to calendaring state papers and the exploration of local archives and closed with the names of three reclusive scholars whose names they dimly knew, they could hardly believe that it was all over. There is no sign that Powell thought he had missed fire unless it be that he did not print the lecture in the customary way.

The opening was inauspicious, and York Powell never regained the opportunity he lost. He held the chair for nine years, till his death, and it will be best to give Mr. Elton's account of his work:

Powell's successor, Mr. Frith, had to open his own career with a grave public protest against the methods of Historical teaching in the University. Powell was not and did not become a popular and frequented lecturer; it was often said he could not lecture at all. He did not gather round him a serried numerous band of young investigators. He did not become a captain of organised research like Mommsen. He did not publish any historical work of larger compass than a short article or address. He had as a professor few visible annals.

We have quoted this because we prefer to give the considered judgment of the biographer rather than our own. It is a sterner one than we should have passed on York Powell but it is not wholly untrue. He ought never to have been made Regius Professor of History. He was unfit for the post, not from lack of learning, for probably no more widely learned man was then at Oxford, but for the reason Mr. Elton gives, that he underestimated the lecture as a means of letting light and air into half-awakened or stagnant spirits.

We recognise the difficulty of Mr. Elton's task in compiling the biography of his friend, and we feel that he has performed the task conscientiously; but in closing the book we cannot help wishing that it had not been undertaken. York Powell was one of those men to whom no biography can do justice. There is nothing to write about; and to be obliged continually to refer to great learning and no tangible results is a thankless task, especially if four hundred and fifty pages have to be made of it. Mr. Elton has failed partly because failure was inevitable, partly because of a certain lack of sympathy with his subject; but he has one quality which is also his main defect—a fine impartiality.

BIOGRAPHY FOR THE MILLION

St. Catherine of Siena and Her Times. By the Author of "Mademoiselle Mori." (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a remarkable book. It seems to sum up in itself a whole method peculiar to latter-day England and to America, a method of bookmaking in which any real knowledge of the subject upon which one writes is apparently the last thing necessary. A fluent style, not too grammatical; a gift for taking one's facts where one finds them and spoiling them in the taking; and an extraordinary carelessness in dealing with, and ignorance of the language of, the country or person of whom one writes, are the only equipment needed. It has become necessary to speak out, and since Italy has particularly suffered from such writers it is well that it should be a book on a great Italian that gives us an opportunity to deal with these things.

The first thing that strikes us on opening this book on St. Catherine is the curiously small number of authorities cited. There is no bibliography such as a scholar includes in his work, thus acknowledging his debts as an honourable man should, and giving his reader some guarantee of the seriousness of his work. Our author, who prefers to remain anonymous, gives in all perhaps ten names of writers at the bottom of the pages without for the most part naming any of their books, or editions. Generally she merely writes a name—"Gigli" for instance—at the foot of the page. Now Gigli is responsible for at least three books: but we have no means of knowing which she refers to, or to what page or volume. This, however, is a specimen of her work when she is more or less careful; five times out of ten she will write her authorities' names wrong. Thus, on page 3 she writes "Zeekaner"—meaning, we may suppose, that great Tuscan scholar, Zdekauer. We begin to wonder whether she has ever really seen the work in question. Our wonder increases as we proceed. On page 11 she cites "Bentivoglianti" as an authority, writing it as though she had information from him visa voce. Who is Bentivoglianti, we ask ourselves? We never heard of him. It is only after a long time that we conclude that she must mean Benvoglianti, who wrote the Preface to the Cronache Sanesi in Muratori (Rer. Ital. Scrip. xv.). On page 58 she quotes "Neri di Donati," meaning Neri di Donato, while on page 107 she refers us to "Tennyson's Memoirs." We should like to see these. Again on page 185 she quotes "Capocelatro," meaning Capecelatro.

So much for the authorities our author does quote. Let us pass to those she does not. One might almost say that the whole of that part of the work dealing with the times of St. Catherine has been based on, and sometimes whole passages taken verbatim from, the various works of Mr. William Heywood, a very fine scholar some of whose works have not been published in England; and from Mr. Langton Douglas's "History of Siena." Yet from cover to cover the names of these writers are never once mentioned! In Mr. Heywood's case, the morality of this free use of his work is open to question. In England his "Ensamples of Fra Filippo: a study of mediæval Siena" (Siena, Torrini 1901) is not well known. It is certainly the finest study of a mediæval Italian city in the language. Our author has used it without scruple or acknowledgment—a most discourteous act, especially as the book was not published in this country. This in itself would be curious, but it becomes more extraordinary since she has here and there changed words of Mr. Heywood's to other words of her own, as though to free herself from obligation. Debts cannot be so paid. As this is a matter which concerns every writer and scholar, we will be particular in our choice of examples. Had our author acknowledged the debt, though there might have been nothing to say, we should have thought her large use of another writer's work almost indefensible. Scholars like Mr. Heywood may seem to our writer mere dry-as-dust researchers, whose work should be "brightened up" and used to adorn a pleasing tale, the very heart of which she has dragged from their less popular works. Apparently the writer of "St. Catherine and Her Times" does not know the "Assempri" of Fra Filippo apart from Mr. Heywood's book. If she does, this is a strange coincidence.

St. Catherine . . . and Her Times, p. 34.

How is it that thou considerest not thy duty? he demands. See'st thou not the pig which always squeals and always clamours and always befouls thine houses, yet thou sufferest him till the time cometh when he is fit to kill. This forbearance thou showest only that thou mayest have his flesh to eat. Consider thou pitiful rascal, consider the noble profit of the woman and have patience. Not for every trifle should'st thou beat her.

Ensamples of Fra Filippo. Heywood, p. 40.

How is it [he says] that thou considerest not thy duty? See'st thou not also the pig which always squeals and always clamours, and always befouls thy house and yet thou sufferest him until the time cometh when he is fit to kill. This forbearance thou shewest only that thou mayest have the profit of his flesh to eat the same. Consider thou pitiful rascal, consider the noble profit of the woman, and have patience. Not for every trifle should'st thou beat her.

"Consider thou pitiful rascal"—"Considera gattivello" it is in the original. Could it have occurred to two people independently to translate "gattivello" "pitiful rascal" . . . and the rest?

Again:

St. Catherine, p. 9.

another who after a life which was a long hymn of love and goodness feeling death approach thankfully knelt down laying his tired head on the Gospels and so passed away.

Ensamples, p. 223.

other pious anchorite whose life had been one long hymn of love and kindness and who feeling the hour of his death approaching kneeled down and laid his weary head upon the Missal which he had opened at the words, "In manus tuas Domine," etc.

The original is: "e poi si pose ni ginocchioni e co' le braccia si riposava su'n un gofano et aveva el Missale aperto inanzi in quella parte del passio di S. Luca evangelista che dice In manus tuas Domine," etc.

There is nothing here about laying "his weary head"; that is Mr. Heywood, and we may suppose the "Gospels" substituted for "Missale" for reasons we need not explain. There are many other passages of a like character; but space and the will to quote them alike are lacking. By this it must be obvious to all that our author has used Mr. Heywood mercilessly without even a "Thank you." Let us turn to another sort of failing.

On page 6 (cf. Ensamples, p. 118, notes 5 and 6) the saying of Paolo di Ser Pace da Certaldo is attributed to Fra Filippo Aguzzari (sic). So that our author spells even the name of the author of "Gli Assempri" wrong, for it should be Agazzari. This mistake occurs everywhere. On page 8 Fra Niccolo Tino should be Fra Niccolò Tini. On page 11 (cf. Ensamples, p. 269) our author speaks of the "dark arches of Fontebranda in whose waters the were-wolves . . . bathed to recover human shape." It is a misreading of Ensamples, p. 269. The superstition as to the were-wolves is quite modern. On page 13 (cf. Ensamples, 99 et seq.) our author refers to a receipt for dyeing the hair. This receipt is mentioned by Mr. Heywood; but our author says it was this receipt which Catherine's mother urged her to use. What is her authority? It is manifest nonsense. On pages 21-22 (cf. Ensamples, pp. 75 et seq.) our author states that there was an affresco of our Lord at Vignona (sic). There is not. The fresco is at Macereto. Vignone is to-day almost as it was in St. Catherine's time. The hot-water spout where she half boiled herself may still be seen.

On page 25 our author writes: "a man most evil traitorous, perfidious, merciless, and cruel beyond all diabolical imagination who took more delight in slaying than did many wild beasts. The Italian is "Che più si deletteva di uccidere gli uomini che molti le fieri salvatiche": which means, of course: "he took more delight in slaying men, than many take in hunting wild beasts." (cf. Ensamples p. 205.) Here, too, our author speaks of the "sermons" of Fra Filippo. The "Assempri" were not sermons. On page 31 our author says that the Palio was run on foot in St. Catherine's days. She gives no authority for this statement. There is a statute of 1262 (quoted by Mr. Heywood, "Palio and Ponte," p. 63) qui current eques etc. This is a good instance of the enormous inaccuracy of statement in this book.

On page 35 (cf. Ensamples 164) our author writes Piazza Prusierla. There is no such place in Siena. It should be, we suppose, Piazza di Postierla. On the same page she says that "Baths were unknown" in the Siena of St. Catherine. This is absolutely false, as we shall see if we compare Ensamples p. 42, and G. Giacosa La vita privata ne' castelli in "La vita italiana nel Rinascimento" 1899, p. 40, quoted by Mr. Heywood. On page 39, Campidoglio is written for Campiglia. On page 49 our author speaks of Via Infangato. There is no Via Infangato in Siena, and if there were it would not mean "Muddy Street," it would mean a street bespattered with mud by some extraneous force. The true name is Via Malfango. The person who traversed Via Malfango might be Infangato. On page 37 she writes "Sovrana" for Sovana. As we learn from L. Bianchi's note to the "Prediche Volgari" of St. Bernardino (vol. i. p. 100): "Sovana è il nome che ha la maggior campana del Duomo di Siena . . . ed è così chiamato perchè i Senesi la tolsero al campanile del bellissimo Duomo della diserta Sovana"; see also the Cronaca of Bindino da Travale p. 152. On page 40 she writes "Salimbena" and elsewhere "Salimbene" for Salimbeni.

Such are the first fifty pages of "St. Catherine of Siena and Her Times," by the author of "Mademoiselle Mori." It is useless to pursue the matter, and indeed we have already devoted a considerable amount of space to this inaccurate book only because it is about the worst specimen of its class which we have seen.

SOCIETY IN THE COUNTRY HOUSE

Society in the Country House. By T. H. S. ESCOTT. (Unwin, 16s.)

MR. ESCOTT belongs to that genial and companionable class of writers whose reminiscences form an indispensable commentary upon and amplification of the solid matter of history and biography: a class which, since Pepys and Evelyn, has furnished through its Creeveys and Grevilles the living hues with which a future generation may clothe the dry bones of the past. It is the chronicler of what may seem at the time small beer, with his retentive memory, his sense of humour, his almost invariable tendency to prolixity, who supplies the little intimate touches without which no portrait of a man or his times is complete.

The large volume before us possesses both the merits and the failings of its type. In his opening and concluding pages, Mr. Escott certainly endeavours to indicate a definite plan on which the book is worked out; but it is needless to trouble about the train of thought, which disappears after the introductory chapter, and makes a dutiful reappearance only on the last page. We prefer to take the book as a cheerful jumble of interesting sidelights on people and events, the value of which consists in its mirroring the passing phases of thought in the fashion and speech of the time. It is left to the reader to supply his own perspective, and to select the grain from the inevitable chaff of anecdote and genealogy. Mr. Escott wisely devotes his chief attention to matters within his personal knowledge, either at first-hand or from direct information—houses which he has himself visited, and notabilities with whom, or with whose contemporaries, he has come into contact. His acquaintance with the last survivors of the Regency, bucks like Captain Gronow and Mr. Alfred Montgomery, carries his store of anecdote back to the beginning of the nineteenth century, and gives additional interest to his chapter upon early days at Brighton.

This tour round some of the notable country houses of England includes many whose notability is derived from other reasons than those of wealth or architectural splendour. Such are Alfoxden, which Wordsworth and Coleridge rented with its deer-park for £40 a year: Sarsden Rectory, with its memories of "Soapy Sam": and Morwenstow Vicarage in R. S. Hawker's day. Such a progress, including West Dean and Waddesdon, Arundel and Petworth, is likely to leave one's head in a whirl if made at a high speed, and, like most diarists and writers of reminiscence, Mr. Escott is most enjoyable as an occasional companion. The glimpses which he gives us into the less-known sides of the lives of public men are varied and sometimes pathetic, as when we see Lord Palmerston in 1865:

Coming out of the house bareheaded, walking straight up to some high railings opposite the front door. Then looking round to see that no spectator was near, the old man climbed over the top rail on to the ground on the other side; next, turning round, he climbed back once more. It was his way of testing his strength, and discovering whether ground had been lost or gained.

For the most part, however, the anecdotes—which are the best things in the book—are such as this of Lord Lytton and his young Australian visitor:

Looking at some China ornaments especially prized by their owner, the young man nervously let one slip through his fingers—not, however, to the ground, for Lord Lytton, at once putting out his hand, arrested the fall of the ornament with the words, "Fielded, by Jove! and saved my crockery."

Among the literary stories is one of Douglas Cook, of the Saturday, and his contributor, Mrs. Lynn Linton. "Has he not," she would say, "stormed at me, cursed me, on one occasion actually hit me, on one of his bad days?"

There are a few good new things among the Oxford pages, together with much that one has heard before; and, although Mr. Escott has not lighted upon any fresh Jowett story, Liddon's mot at Jowett's table is a hard one to beat:

Talbot (head of Keble), a good scholar but a bad whip, had upset into a ditch the then Khedive's son, Prince Hassan. Proposing to drive Liddon home, he received the reply, "What, intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian yesterday?"

Among the gifted ladies whom Mr. Escott has met was Mrs. Grote, the historian's wife, of whom Sydney Smith once observed: "Grote, hence the word grotesque." He gives us a good description of this lady, who affected a masculine manner and to some extent a masculine dress, and who, sitting with one leg crossed over the other and both legs as high up as possible, would lecture Dean Stanley on ecclesiastical history, Max Müller on Sanscrit epics, Count Saffi on Italian literature, and any local expert in agriculture on the growing of turnips or the breeding of Southdowns.

We must bring our quotations to a close with the delightful American lady of the Via Babuino, who invited Lord Malmesbury to a reception "in Baboon Street, near the Pope propagating houses."

MEDIAEVAL BUILDERS

Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen. By W. R. LETHABY. (Duckworth, 12s. 6d. net.)

As a statesman and warrior Henry III. was deficient; but as a patron of art he stands first among our kings, for he not merely ordered and collected, he initiated and controlled the execution of works of surpassing beauty at the finest moment of the Gothic age. The history of his greatest achievement, and of the craftsmen of genius who nobly carried out the task he had set them, is now given to us, after years of painstaking study of written record and surviving structure, by Professor Lethaby. He seeks to rebuild in our imaginations this "supreme work of art" in all its perfection of form, its beauty of adornment, its suavity of environment, its church and chapter-house, its monastery and mill, its garden and farm, seated by the side of the king's palace on the bank of the clear-running Thames.

Our Angevin kings were French by race and training and English only by residence and position. They were surrounded by a Court of foreign-speaking laymen, and their ecclesiastics were members of a cosmopolitan church. There was, therefore, nothing narrow or insular in Henry's outlook on the art of his age, or in the personnel which he gathered round him to execute his schemes. By a minute comparison of Henry's work at Westminster with contemporary French examples, Professor Lethaby clearly establishes that the English coronation church resulted from a full knowledge and observation of the French one, and the dates support this. "When Westminster was begun, the choir of Rheims had been consecrated four years." But, also, the English designers had likewise mastered the details of St. Louis's "incomparable" chapel—which he was just completing in Paris for the reception of the Crown of Thorns—and of the great church at Amiens, begun some years before Westminster and completed in the same year, which was sufficiently advanced for consecration. And yet our Abbey is English and not French. "It is a remarkable thing, indeed, that this church, which was so influenced by French facts, should, in spirit, be one of the most English of English buildings." This is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that it was native in design and execution. None of the leading craftsmen of its structure appear to have been foreigners. John of St. Omer, Peter de Hispania, William of Florence may have painted there; but so also did William of Westminster, "the king's beloved painter," and Walter of Durham, the probable artist of the surviving altar retable, "the most beautiful thirteenth-century painting in England." And London, Gloucester and Beverley supplied the designers and artificers in chief.

It was in 1245 that the King ordered the pulling down of Edward the Confessor's church, which had been consecrated in 1065—a few weeks only before its founder's death—but had been altered and continued all through the twelfth century. The Lady Chapel, which had only recently been completed, was left, but the Norman choir and transepts were gradually removed. Meanwhile stone and other material for the new work were being collected, and in the following year Master Henry the mason was authorised to receive them as master of the works at Westminster, and himself acquired two messuages close by, where he took up his abode and remained as the chief architect and overseer till 1253, when the absence of all further mention of him in the accounts seems to indicate his death. "By this time the work was so far advanced that Master Henry must be considered as the architect of the building in all its parts." He was succeeded by John of Gloucester, who had charge of other royal works as well, for next year he was promised ten "librates" of land for his services to the King at Gloucester, Woodstock, Westminster and elsewhere. With him, as keeper of the works, was associated Alexander the carpenter, who had from the beginning been head of the timber work at the Abbey, and whose rôle, now that the stalls and other fittings were in progress, was increasing in importance. Both these men had, twice a year, furred robes of office supplied to them. After 1260 we hear no more of them, and Robert of Beverley is in charge and continues to conduct various royal works into the reign of Edward I. By 1269 he brought forward the building then in progress—the choir, transepts and four bays of the nave—to a usable, though unfinished condition, and:

On Oct. 13, the anniversary of his first translation, the Confessor was enshrined in the marvellous, but still incomplete feretory of gold, silver, and precious stones, beneath the new structure which the king, at his own cost, had built from the foundation, and in the presence of a great concourse of prelates, barons and commoners. On this day the monks first celebrated the mysteries within the new building. (p. 169.)

The interior ever surprises me by its loveliness. The grace of the parts and their ordered disposition, the slender springing forms and the gaiety of the style, the fine materials and the romantic early monuments, are arresting beauties of a matchless whole. (p. 3.)

With historic precision, Professor Lethaby continues his account of the progress of the work and the lives of the workers throughout the Plantagenet reigns. The noble series of royal tombs he not only dates and describes; he assigns them to their particular creators. The whole succession of master masons and their individual imprint on the Abbey, whose monastic buildings, cloisters, nave and west end were gradually rebuilt during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, are duly catalogued to the time when Henry VII. determined to remove the early Lady Chapel and erect a new royal mausoleum in its place. "Built wholly in the sixteenth century, and yet without any taint of the Renaissance," his chapel completes the Gothic cycle of which the Abbey is so full a presentment. Just as Henry II. shows it in the fresh vigour and simple elegance of its first full development, so does Henry VII. give us a choice example of it in the tricky cleverness and gorgeous elaboration of its decadence: "As an exercise in architectural composition of intentionally romantic cast, self-conscious, elaborate and artificial, it is a work of extraordinary merit." Of all this what have we preserved? Of the inside, much; of the outside nothing—not even a meritorious copy. We have the havoc of the modern Gothic architect who feels he knows better than did Master Henry of London or Master John of Gloucester what "early English" work was like.

Until our own, every age has had its style; it has been proud of it; it has believed in its superiority to that which preceded it and which it has therefore not hesitated to replace. We have none of this; we are conscious copyists; we set out to build not in our own, but in the Gothic, or Renaissance or Georgian style. And yet we subject old examples of such work to deeper destruction than did those who professedly despised them. Fully clad in the mantle of Palladio and Bramante, it was intellectually impossible for Wren to impregnate himself with the mediæval spirit. Yet he respected the past more than did Pearson, who claimed to be a devoted follower of the Early English masters. Wren sought to do the necessary repairs "without modern mixtures to show my own inventions." What "inventions" the later restorer of the north transept has indulged in is fully and conclusively set out in Professor Lethaby's third chapter. We have only space for one example.

Henry III. did his work at the very moment when the French school was seeking to expand the window space to its uttermost and had just invented the plan of isolating the wall ribs of the vault from the wall itself, thus allowing the great rose windows of their gable ends to be set in a square whose spandrels were pierced and glazed. This new fashion was seized upon by Master Henry the mason, and both his transepts had roses of this character. The south rose, though altered in the fifteenth century and renewed about 1670, has always retained its pierced spandrels. The north rose remained untouched till, in Wren's time, it called for renewal. Wren had a careful drawing made of the original, and that drawing survives. He then renewed the window. His tracery—it was there until a few years back—was totally lacking in mediæval verve and spirit—inevitably so; but he had enough respect for the past to retain the old plan. His spandrels were pierced. Now—for what reason we do not know—Wren's work has been torn away and in its place we find a rose window with solid spandrels, a nice window, perhaps, but not Master Henry's window, not the window of such surpassing interest as showing us that Henry III.'s architect, far from being insular, was so informed and cosmopolitan that he introduced a development which Rheims, his model, had not reached, and which, though it had been adopted in one or two lesser churches, was only used at Rouen twenty years later.

How different it would have been with the Abbey church if, instead of all the learned and ignorant experiments to which it has been subjected, this ever fresh energy in pulling down and setting up, there had been steadily carried on during the last century a system of careful patching, staying and repair. (p. 91.)

For genuine love of the past; for unwearied study of its records and minute observation of its examples; for accurate marshalling of facts and for incontrovertible conclusions in support of admirable principles, Professor Lethaby's book deserves high commendation.

We have not yet, however, reached his devotion to whitewash.

LE ROI SOLEIL

The Great Days of Versailles. By G. F. BRADBY. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. BRADBY presents a sombre picture of this distinguished formal period, without any brilliance but with too much care to be at all disappointing, though at times we wish for the lightness and gaiety of style which were the feature of his charming story "Dick" and his flippant farce "The Marquis's Eye." Here he wears his robes of office: and though cap and gown become him as they become few, somehow his pen moves without its customary ease and grace: his hand is a little encumbered. Not that he is pedantic—the writer of "Dick" would have a long road to travel before he reached pedantry—but he has taken a few steps in that direction and his sentences show signs of heaviness. We cannot help wishing that he had written this book, too, in his Norfolk jacket.

Versailles and its great originator, Louis XIV., suggest the last word of courtly grandeur and polished grace: of the days which produced Molière, and when, to use an adroit phrase, "vice lost half its evil by losing all its grossness." It speaks in the picture of an artist, Rigaud perhaps, in which Louis, le Roi Soleil, is handing a lady, Le Vallière or de Montespan or another, into a royal coach. On one side stands a long row of magnificently dressed ladies of the court, curtsying with formal precision, on the other side stand the court gentlemen bowing with equal uniformity, as the King's mistress puts her foot on the step: and in the background the sun is setting in red splendour behind the stately formal palace of Versailles. Mr. Bradby's picture is sombre because invariably he goes a little below that polished surface; he protracts the ceremony a little unkindly beyond the great moment of its consummation, and sees the court ladies home to their wretched apartments packed away in unhealthy corners, which have been grudgingly spared from the spacious rooms of state. He listens to their disputes and squabbles; he even escorts the grand monarch to his private room, and amidst the odd medley of his children shows the monumental dullness to cope with which Madame de Maintenon needed all her prodigious strength. He does not dwell on the gorgeous youth of Louis, but on his sad distinguished old age, when more and more pomp became necessary to him to thwart the dreary slowness of Time's gradual advance. Magnificence should serve as the setting of ardour, not as the cloak under which to hide senility. What was the expression of a king's greatness became the exponent of a man's weakness:

The best thing in the book is Mr. Bradby's treatment of Madame de Maintenon; but some of the tremendous contrast of her influence in that court is lost because the full colour of the King's youth is not given. In treating his early days Mr. Bradby is too inclined to award praise and blame: and they are dangerous commodities when handled by a writer whose purpose is to summon the past to life. Much is lost and little is gained by judging one age by the moral standard of another. Nothing may be more commendable than morality, but morality contains no elixir: its touch is cold and deadening. So the drama of Madame de Maintenon's rise to almost supreme power stands by itself: and for that reason its poignancy is diminished. You see the stern patroness of dévots, with her passion for educating and her genius for moulding others by her will and patience to the pattern which she desired them to take. You see her coming slowly upon Louis, like a punishment almost, or like the embodiment of his own advancing years, bringing with her unexampled common sense and chill austerity. The governance of the children of the King's most brilliant mistress, de Montespan, became the terrible comfort of his old age and his wife. "Mad world, my masters." But the isolated portrait of this remarkable woman is depicted with deep understanding, though the greatness of the woman who practised economy at the most extravagant of courts, who was content with a competence when brilliant fortunes were given with a jest, and who loved power for its own impersonal sake, is not fully realised, because the magnificence and splendour in the midst of which she moved, and to which she was superior, are not realised at their true significance.

BY LAND AND SEA

Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer. By Colonel JAMES P. ROBERTSON. (Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a good tale of adventure, told in a cheery, breezy, way which says as much for the light heart of its author as his own statement that at the age of eighty-four he can take a twenty-mile run or more on his bicycle, and feel blither for it. The volume is full of good stories, telling anecdotes, gallant exploits and hair-breadth adventures, related in a manner which at once fascinates and compels admiration for the old officer and his comrades. Like Sir Evelyn Wood, Sir John French, and Sir Henry Hildyard, Colonel Robertson was a middy before he took to soldiering, and a love for the sea and life afloat bore fruit in many stirring episodes in his subsequent career, while to the credit of the seaman's instinct thus early imparted may be placed that readiness of resource so frequently exhibited during the vicissitudes of his military life.

Joining an East Indiaman, on a voyage to Calcutta, he was one day ordered to go with a quarter-master, who had something to do in the magazine, a strong iron room down in the after-hold. His orders were to sit at the scuttle, and hold a lantern so that the quarter-master could see:

Presently I heard the iron door open, and I got a peremptory order to come down with the lantern, as he rather noisily informed me—with a good deal of strong language—that he could not see what he was doing. I accordingly went and held the lantern up outside the open door. After fumbling about for some time, he ordered me to come inside, lantern and all. In I went, and sat down on a bag of gunpowder. Presently, after some more fumbling, I got the order, "Take the candle out of the lamp and hold it in your hand." "Oh, dear!" I said, "what would the Captain say if he knew this?" to which the Quartermaster replied, with a fresh edition of strong language intermixed: "I know just as well as the Captain that, if you drop that candle, we'll all be in hell-fire in less than five minutes."

We decline to believe that Colonel Robertson said "Oh, dear."

His next trip was to the West Indies, where he was considerably surprised to find that the emancipated slaves had been most comfortably provided for by their late owners. Escaping an attempt at murder by a negro who stole into his bedroom in the dead of night, and also the attack of a wild boar, which passed a tusk through his left leg, he almost fell a victim to yellow fever on the return voyage. On his arrival home, he was sent to the Edinburgh Military Academy, and then joined the 31st Regiment, taking passage with a draft of recruits to Calcutta for the purpose. Before, however, he reached Umballa, where the regiment was stationed, he had more than one strange experience, in which an alligator, a cobra that got into bed with him, and a tiger took part. The 31st was a famous regiment, but scarcely up to the standard of the present day in some respects. The colonel was an old Peninsular officer, one of the majors was accustomed to mount his horse from a chair, a captain had fought at Waterloo, and as to the rank and file, many of them had grey hair and had both sons and grandsons serving in the ranks, and many of the married women had been born in the regiment. For all this, it was a grand old corps, made up of tough fighting men, who gave a hearty welcome to the new subaltern. We learn how he escaped from an elephant which knocked over his tent, and how his duties were varied by shooting expeditions and theatricals, about which he relates this anecdote:

In one play I came on as a young lady leading a pet dog by a scarlet ribbon. Lieutenant Bray was my lover. He walked gracefully forward, exclaiming "Dearest Susan," and threw himself into an attitude of devotion, when my pet dog pinned him by the calf of the leg, and his speech ended in a yell of pain, to the huge delight of the audience, who roared till their tears ran down. Shortly afterwards Lieutenant Dash had to be discovered (as the curtain went up) in the centre of the stage, dressed as a lady and about to sing. The curtain had to be rolled up from the bottom by two men, at the side (out of sight, of course). The bell rang, and up went the curtain, catching the lady's (?) dress. She seized the curtain, and struggled to force it down. Another tug from the men—quite unaware why the curtain would not go up—when up went the poor lady, hanging on and kicking frantically. What all the audience saw was a pair of legs, kicking wildly up and down two or three times, till the curtain finally went down with a bang and the petticoats were released. Of course, these little incidents were quite as much amusement to the audience as the play, knowing as they did who the actors were.

Shortly afterwards the news came that India was invaded, and, with his regiment, our hero went through the sanguinary battles of the first Sikh War. At the Battle of Moodkee, 1845, he mentions seeing Captain Napier, afterwards Lord Napier of Magdala, riding all alone, dressed in plain clothes, having nothing but a walking-stick in his hand, and, although in the midst of the fighting, escaping unhurt. He himself had a narrow escape, for, as he passed a tree, a Sikh officer made a fair cut to take off his head. Lieutenant Pollard, who was immediately behind him, put his sword over his head and caught the blow, and at that moment a Grenadier drove his bayonet into the Sikh and drew his trigger.

After the campaign, Colonel Robertson was sent home with a large party of wounded men, and was complimented by the Duke of Wellington, then Commander-in-Chief, upon his conduct of the affair. Presently we find him in Ireland, where, among other amusing incidents of sport and service, he relates how, during the elections in 1852, he was quartered at Ennis:

One afternoon a riot was anticipated, and I received a message from Mr. Franks, the magistrate, who was a brother of Colonel Franks, of the 10th Regiment, telling me that we were to remain under arms all night as a big row was expected. It was a very still, hot summer evening, and Lieutenant Prevost was amusing himself with his harmonium, and as he had a good voice, was singing. Just as he finished one of his songs, by this time well into the night, a thundering knock came on the outer gates. The sentry shouted out at the top of his voice, "Who comes there?" and every man in the barracks jumped up and seized his arms. In a moment there was a dead silence, the men eagerly listening to know what was up. "Who comes there?" shouted the sentry a second time. And a very small voice outside the gate replied, "If you please, Mr. Sintry, will you ask the gentleman to sing that over again?" and the sentry's indignant reply was drowned in the shouts of merriment from the men.

The regiment was ordered to the Ionian Islands, where our author kept a yacht, and with his adventures in the Mediterranean and shooting parties in Greece we have another series of amusing and dramatic incidents. Then came the war with Russia, and we find him in the trenches before Sevastopol, commenting on the disgraceful state of the transport, undertaking the water-supply himself, and eventually being placed in charge of the transport of the second division of the Army, which he speedily brought into a better state.

The chapters devoted to the Crimea, where his battalion remained until nearly the last, are full of graphic scenes and stirring incidents of military life, in which the names of many distinguished men occur. It was decided after the war to establish a military train, on similar lines to that of the French, and the old land transport having been disbanded, Colonel Robertson was selected to assist in the formation of the new unit. He was allowed to choose his men from the cavalry, and, as he says himself, no finer body was ever collected together in one regiment, many of the non-commissioned officers being from the Life Guards, the Scots Greys, and the Royal Horse Artillery. When war broke out with China in 1856, his battalion was picked for foreign service, but during the voyage it was diverted to India, in consequence of the Mutiny. He describes his arrival at Calcutta, where he reported himself to Sir Colin Campbell:

His first question was, "What are you, and what can you do?" I replied, "We can do anything." "Anything?" he cried, in violent excitement, "What do you mean?" "Sir," I answered, "we can act as infantry or cavalry, or drive artillery guns; but we are not gunners, though my men can all ride and drive a pair." "What do you mean," he said, "by saying you can do cavalry?" "Why," I replied, "we are nearly all trained cavalry men, and we can act as such." "Take care what you say, young man; remember, if I make you cavalry and you fail, the responsibility will fall on me, not you." And then in a very sharp voice he asked, "Are you prepared to take that responsibility?" I said, "I am, sir."

And after an interview with Lord Canning, cavalry the battalion came. The chapters which describe the performances of the military train cavalry in India are as fascinating as any in the volume, and through marvellous exploits and narrow escapes our hero had a charmed life, until, after the capture of Lucknow, he was struck down by the heat of the sun and was obliged to be invalided home. It is possible that among the avalanche of gift books at this season, Colonel Robertson's Reminiscences may escape the attention it deserves; but our readers will find it as exciting as any adventure story, and described with a naturalness and simplicity as delightful as they are unusual.

EARLY LONDON PRINTING

The Printers, Stationers and Bookbinders of Westminster and London from 1476 to 1535. By E. GORDON DUFF. (Cambridge University Press, 5s. net.)

THE publication in this volume of Mr. Duff's two courses of lectures as the Sanders Reader in Bibliography at the University of Cambridge is the best justification which Mr. Sanders's bequest has yet received. As far as we know, only one previous lecturer has put his lectures into print, and that in an edition intended merely for private circulation. The rest have been content to adopt the alternative, sanctioned by the terms of the foundation, of depositing a copy in the Department of Manuscripts at the British Museum. Mr. Duff has done better than this, and there are touches of dry humour in his narrative which suggest that he can have had no difficulty in keeping his audience awake. As nearly every one interested in bibliography in this country is probably aware, the history of English printing and bookbinding in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries has been his life-work since the days when he was an undergraduate at Oxford. He has studied the early English books in almost every library in England, great and small, and unearthed so many books and fragments printed by Pynson and Wynkyn de Worde that he has trebled the number of editions which Dibdin was able to assign to them. Thus, while the outlines of the story which he here tells had already been fairly accurately sketched, largely by Herbert, Dibdin's worthier predecessor, Mr. Duff has been able to fill in these outlines with numerous new details, not only as regards printing, but as to bookbinding and the book-trade generally. The new matter and the old are welded together in a well-proportioned narrative, and the result is as good a short history of the period as can be desired. Mr. Duff's zeal as a free-trader, however, has led him into one statement which seems to us little short of extraordinary. One of the statutes of Richard III.'s reign permitted the free importation of books from abroad. At the end of 1534 this was withdrawn. Mr. Duff comments, in his final paragraph, as follows:

The fifty years of freedom from 1484 to 1534 not only brought us the finest specimens of printing we possess, but compelled the native workman, in self-protection, to learn, and when competition was done away with his ambition rapidly died also. Once our English printing was protected, it sank to a level of badness which has lasted, with the exception of a few brilliant experiments, almost down to our own day.

It needs a rash reviewer to quarrel with Mr. Duff on his own subject, but we seem to remember that the presses at Oxford and St. Albans were closed within three years of the Act of 1483, that while it lasted neither Oxford (where a second attempt was made) nor Cambridge, nor any other provincial town could afford support to a printer for much more than a year, and that in London itself after the death of Caxton in 1491 there was an interval of nearly a quarter of a century during which no native Englishman had the courage to start as a master-printer. Thus, during nearly half Mr. Duff's "fifty years of freedom" the native workman existed only as an apprentice or journeyman, and the work he did when he began printing for himself—if we may take Copland and Skot, two of the earliest starters, as fair examples, was far from impressive. After 1534, on the other hand, excellent work was done by Berthelet and Grafton, and above all by John Day, the one English printer, after Caxton, who received reasonable encouragement to do good work, and who certainly did it. The Act of 1483 may have helped the cause of education and scholarship in England. The Act of 1534 was passed, we may imagine, not (as was professed) for the protection of printing, but in the interest of the royal censorship of the press. The one may be defended and the other condemned with excellent reason, but to defend and condemn them on the grounds put forward by Mr. Duff seems to us a curious aberration in an otherwise very sane and scholarly book.

ILL-TREATED RODIN

The Life and Work of Auguste Rodin. By FREDERICK LAWTON. (Unwin, 15s. net.)

THE bulky volume which Mr. Lawton has contributed to the already considerable literature about the greatest sculptor of our days is remarkable neither as biography nor as criticism. Viewed in the most favourable light it is a useful compilation and gathering together of scattered fragments of criticism and biography emanating from more competent pens. It has, consequently, some value as a work of reference, more especially to the student who is conversant with Mr. Lawton's sources of information. A more favourable opinion of the author would have been created were these sources more clearly acknowledged. Mr. Lawton is too fond of opening a sentence with an evasive phrase like: "As Monsieur Mauclair remarks," and then, forgetting to put in the quotation marks, leaving most of his readers in ignorance where the distinguished French critic's remarks end and his own begin. It would have been better to have left no such uncertainties and to have stated in a foot-note the number of the Revue Bleu from which the passage has been translated.

But Mr. Lawton has another use for footnotes. He has an irritating and stupid habit of insisting on his reader's total ignorance of the French language, and deems it necessary, for example, to give the footnote, "National Society of Fine Arts," whenever the Société Nationale des Beaux Arts is mentioned in the text. Elsewhere (pp. 164-6) he devotes three pages to a long-winded explanation that the French word plan is used by Rodin (as by all other French artists of our acquaintance) as the equivalent of the English "plane." But his crowning ineptitude consists in giving in a footnote (p. 175) an English translation of the hackneyed tag about the mountains and the mouse, and torturing the Latin in the text into the extraordinary form: Parturiuntur [sic] montes, educitur [sic] ridiculus mus.

In the reported conversation of Rodin, Mr. Lawton owes much to Mlle. Judith Cladel's "Auguste Rodin pris sur la Vie," and this debt he acknowledges; but in the chapters which tell of Rodin's early life—the most interesting section of the book—he does not state to what extent he is indebted to Mr. W. H. Bartlett's articles in the American Architect for 1889. The existence of these admirable and informative articles is barely chronicled in another part of the book dealing with Rodin's relations with America, but no hint is given of their content or their value.

A life of Rodin, however poorly written, cannot be altogether dull, for the sculptor's personality is a remarkable one and his career has been full of incident. And since these incidents are, for the most part, correctly stated, Mr. Lawton's compilation has a certain value for those who find it impossible or inconvenient to consult the earlier published sources of information. But as criticism his book cannot have, even for the general reader, more than a slight, and generally borrowed, value. Two sculptural principles, rediscovered by M. Rodin, and essentially characteristic of his art, are stated with moderate clearness:

The first was that the spontaneous attitudes of the living model were the only ones that should be represented in statuary, and that any attempt to dictate gesture or posture must inevitably destroy the harmonious relations existing between the various parts of the body. . . . The second was that, as under the suggestion of successive impulses the outlines of the body are continually changing, muscles swelling or relaxing, with a sort of rhythmic flow and ripple round them, the sculptor had large liberty allowed him to choose in his modelling the reliefs and curves that most faithfully and most effectively interpret the pose they accompany.

The reader will readily perceive that a pose observed in life is more natural than one arranged in the studio; but Mr. Lawton is insufficiently lucid in his endeavour to explain that Rodin's second principle was to interpret, or give an impression of, form as it is revealed to us by light and shade, rather than to reconstruct form as it automatically exists. It is in this perception of the distinction between what appears to be and what is, and of the importance in sculpture of chiaroscuro, that Rodin stands out from the majority of his contemporaries and predecessors.

More satisfying than any criticisms for which Mr. Lawton is responsible, and more helpful to a right appreciation of the artist, are the reproductions of M. Rodin's works which illustrate these pages. The series is comprehensive and representative, including reproductions of drawings and etchings as well as sculpture, and though some of the photographs are not so clear as could be desired, the blame in these cases must be attached to the printer rather than to the author. Unfortunately for Mr. Lawton, however, no such scapegoat can be found for the stupidities in the text.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Catalogue of Books printed for Private Circulation. Collected by BERTRAM DOBELL, and now described and annotated by him. (Published by the author, 77 Charing Cross Road.)

THOUGH now for the first time brought together in a volume, Mr. Dobell's lists of privately printed books have been issued at intervals during the last fifteen years, which accounts for one note describing the Catalogue of the Printed Books at the British Museum as still slowly progressing, and another attributing to Mr. A. H. Bullen a design of writing a history of the Chiswick Press, unhappily long since abandoned. Mr. Dobell gives no statistics as to the number of books he has described, but they must amount to between two and three thousand, and are certainly a very notable collection for one bookseller to have brought together. They are here catalogued not merely with all necessary bibliographical information, but with literary notes, which show that Mr. Dobell must often have spent more time over a volume than could be adequately remunerated by the very modest price asked for it, even if the book had originally come to him for nothing. It need hardly be said that books "privately printed," or "printed for private circulation" (two terms which have unfortunately come to be regarded as synonymous) are very miscellaneous in their character. There are the true privately printed books, such as those printed by Horace Walpole, at Strawberry Hill, or by Sir Thomas Phillips, or again (these being much more liberally here represented) at the "Rochester Press" worked by Edwin Roffe. Then there are countless antiquarian reprints of which wealthy book-lovers have caused a few copies to be struck off to give to friends, less wealthy book-lovers occasionally adopting a similar plan in the expectation of being able to sell more copies in this way than on the open market. Lastly there are the books genuinely intended for private circulation, original works which their authors have not cared to subject to the ordeal of criticism: poems, memoirs of relatives, autobiographies, descriptions of travels—not a very exhilarating class of book, but capable when examined by a judicious and sympathetic prospector, such as Mr. Dobell, of yielding pretty little nuggets both in verse and prose.

Letters to Young and Old. By Mrs. C. W. EARLE. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

It would be very pleasant to get one of Mrs. Earle's letters by post: to come down to breakfast and find several sheets of description, philosophy, gardening, diet, and hygiene, all pot-pourried together, and all amiable and soothing. Every now and then a phrase might startle you, partly because the writer seems unconscious that she is saying anything with which any one could disagree. Switzerland is inartistic, she writes, "hopelessly inartistic and unpaintable." We can believe that the high Alps are unpaintable, but to call them "inartistic" is rather like being disappointed with the Atlantic—a paradox for Kensington and Chelsea, but not for the world at large.

In the course of three hundred and sixty-nine closely packed pages Mrs. Earle gives her friends large quantities of excellent advice on a variety of subjects, and one of her subjects is the critic's vocation. She quotes what she calls a unique description of what a critic ought to do, from a poet who says that what is best he firmly lights upon, as birds on sprays. We tried to do it, and we lighted first on some of the charming poems by other people spatchcocked between the letters—"Dreams to Sell," by Beddoes, for instance, and two verses from Shelley's Invocation. Then there are many persuasive pages about the injurious effects of meat and alcohol, and some tempting recipes for vegetarian dishes. There is not enough about gardens in these letters, for when Mrs. Earle writes about gardens she always commands interest and respect. Her successes and her failures are both described with modesty and knowledge. She is not modest about diet because she is an enthusiast, certain that she is right and the unconverted wrong. Her faith is so strong that it infects the sceptic with a mild desire to become a vegetarian himself; but he is checked by his conviction that the vegetarian cuisine, when properly carried out, is elaborate, costly, and quite beyond the resources of the British plain-cook.

The Romance of an Eastern Capital. By F. B. BRADLEY-BIRT. (Smith, Elder, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE interest excited in the recent partition of Bengal has led Mr. Bradley-Birt to hope that the time has come when Eastern Bengal and its capital, the ancient City of Dacca, may win some share of public attention. That Dacca has not been ignored by the historian is proved by the existence of such books as Sir Charles D'Oyley's "Ruins of Dacca," Taylor's "Topography of Dacca," Sayid Aluad Hasan's "Antiquities of Dacca," and the pages devoted to it in Sir William Hunter's "History of British India," and Stewart's "History of Bengal"; but, notwithstanding this array of books on the subject, the city has been fated to an obscurity from which even the Indian Mutiny failed to rescue it; and by readers in Great Britain it is remembered only, if remembered at all, as the temporary home of William Makepeace Thackeray, the grandfather of the novelist. The story of Dacca is the story of many English settlements. Prior to the arrival of Portuguese, English and French traders, the history of the old city is largely a mixture of a few facts with much fiction; and admirably as the author has handled his materials, the lack of dates and the absence of other links in the story are sadly felt by the reader. But Mr. Bradley-Birt makes up for the paucity of his materials for a foundation by raising a superstructure of much beauty in his graphic accounts of the lives and methods of such men as Shaista Khan, Viceroy of Bengal, and the Emperor Farrukh Siyar. For an account of the rule of Aurungzebe there is plenty of material and of this the author makes good use.

Dacca to-day has been restored to the position of capital of the new province of Eastern Bengal and Assam, a position which it lost in 1702 after having held it for nearly a hundred years; and it is pleasant to learn that under present conditions:

Dacca, so long folded in the fatal sleep that falls upon all Eastern cities once their greatness has departed, has at length awakened, and standing at the parting of the ways, midway between the memories of her past and the possibilities of the future, looks hopefully along the vista of the coming years, and awaits with confidence the fulfilment of their promise.

Though there is in the present volume much of the charm which marked "The Story of an Indian Upland," Mr. Bradley-Birt's style suffers sometimes from redundancy of expression, as, for instance, by the introduction of the word "fatal" in the sentence just quoted. If the sleep were "fatal" Dacca could never have awakened. The illustrations, which are chiefly reproductions of photographs, are excellent.

TO E. J.

I THINK I'll not forget them, when Ireland's far away,
The songs you gathered in the glens, the songs you sang to-day;

And maybe you'll remember, as I remember well,
The grey land, the grey sky, and the grey sea swell.

Beneath us was the castle that crumbles on Kenban
And the foam fringes rippling up, that turned and broke and ran,

And straight in front lay Rathlin and farther yet
Cantire

And all away behind us the land of your desire.

The songs that you were singing were simple as the soil
And glad with Ireland's gladness and sad with Ireland's toil,

A dirge for some old chieftain the snake of poison slew
Or maybe "Cuttin' Rushes" or "Bonny lads are few."

And now the words went weeping and now the words were gay

And love and death and laughter were in your voice today,

And still the wind sang with you, and still the sea bore part,

And many joys and sorrows were mingling in your heart.

So in the darkened city and far across the sea
The songs you gathered in the glens will sing themselves to me;

And maybe you'll remember, as I remember well,
The grey land, the grey sky, and the grey sea swell.

ROBIN FLOWER.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

GOING UP TOP

DURING the closing years of the last century certain critics contracted a rather depressing habit of numbering men of letters, especially poets, as though they were overcoats in a cloak room, or boys competing in an examination set by themselves. "It requires very little discernment," wrote Mr. Churton Collins, A.D. 1891, "to foresee that among the English poets of the present century the first place will ultimately be assigned to Wordsworth, the second to Byron and the third to Shelley." Matthew Arnold, I fear, was the first to make these unsafe zadkielian prognostications. He, if I remember correctly, gave Byron the first place and Wordsworth the second; but Mr. Swinburne, with no little discernment, observed that English taste in that eventuality would be in the same state as it was at the end of the seventeenth century, which firmly believed that Fletcher and Jonson were the best of its poets.

But when is Ultimately? Obviously not the present moment, because with all the advantages of Mr. Churton Collins being happily still alive, Byron does not hold the rank awarded him by the distinguished critic in 1891. The cruel test of the auctioneer's hammer has recently shown that Keats and Shelley are regarded as far more important by those very discerning people, the book-dealers. Wordsworth, of course, is still one of the poets' poets and the Spectator, that Mrs. Micawber of literature, will, of course, never desert him; but I doubt very much whether he has yet reached the harbour of Ultimately. His repellent personality has blinded a good many of us to his exquisite qualities; on the Greek Kalends of criticism, however, may I be there to see: I shall certainly vote for him if I am one of the examiners—or one of the cloak-room attendants.

It was against that kind of criticism that Whistler hurled his impatient epigram about pigeonholes; and if it is absurd in regard to painting how much more absurd is it in regard to the more various and less friable substances of literature. By the old ten o'clock rule (I do not refer to Whistler's lecture), once observed in board schools, no scripture could be taught after that hour. Once a teacher asked his class who was the wisest man. "Solomon," said a little boy. "Right, go up top," said the teacher. But there was a small pedant who, while never paying much attention to the lessons and being usually at the bottom of the form in consequence, knew the regulations by heart. He interrupted with a shrill voice (for the clock had passed the hour): "No, sir, please, sir, past ten o'clock, sir . . . Solon." Thus it is I fear with critics of every generation, though they try very hard to make the time pass as slowly as possible.

But if invidious distinctions between great men are inexact and tiresome, I opine that it is ungenerous and ignoble to declare when a great man has just died that we really cannot judge of him or his work, because we have been his contemporaries. The caution of obituary notices seems to me cowardly and the reviews of books are cowardly too. We have become Laodiceans; we are fearful of exposing imposture in current literature lest we get into hot water with a publisher, and a lukewarm, over-weening modesty in us precludes the idea that we are fortunate enough, sometimes, to know personally a great painter, a great poet, a great novelist, or to be nodded to by one occasionally. With all the deliberation of a police-court magistrate we sentence him without the option of a fine and we will never commit him even to the assizes of immortality; so we whimper decadence, decadence; and to corroborate our suspicions we applaud the dramas of Mr. Hall Caine; we cry "stinking fish" and cackle at Mr. Frank Richardson in the weekly press.

During the New Year week I was invited by Lord and Lady Lyonesse to a very diverting house-party. This peer, it will be remembered, is the well-known radical philanthropist who obtained his title owing to his interest in the submerged tenth. Their house—"Ivanhoe"—is an exquisite Gothic structure which is regarded as the masterpiece of the late Sir Gilbert Scott; it overlooks the Ouse. Including our hosts we numbered forty persons, and by an odd coincidence the personnel, including valets, chauffeurs and ladies'-maids brought by the guests, numbered sixty. In all we were a hundred souls, assuming immortality for the chauffeurs and the five Scotch gardeners. On January 2 somebody produced after dinner a copy of the Petit Parisien relating to the plebiscite for the greatest Frenchman of the nineteenth century: another guest capped him with the Evening News list; and the famous Pall Mall Gazette Academy of forty was recalled with indifferent accuracy. Conversation was flagging; our hostess looked relieved; very soon we were all playing a variation of that most charming game suck-pencil. At first we decided to ignore the nineteenth century. The ten greatest Living Englishmen were to be named by our votes. Bridge and billiard-players were dragged to the polling station in the green drawing-room. Lord Lyonesse and myself were the tellers. I shivered with excitement. One of the Ultimaties of Mr. Churton Collins seemed to have arrived; it was Götterdämmerung—the Twilight of the Idols. And here is the result of the ballot, which I think every one will admit possesses extraordinary interest:

Hall Caine,	Sir Thomas Lipton,	Barrie,
Marie Corelli,	Hichens,	George Alexander,
Rudyard Kipling,	Chamberlain,	Beerbohm Tree.
Lord Northcliffe,

I ought to add, of course, that the guests were unusually intellectual. There were our host and hostess: their three sons—one is a scholar of King's College, Cambridge, another is at Balliol, and a third is a stockbroker—there were five M.P.s with their wives (two Liberal Imperialists, two Liberal Unionists and one real Radical); a Scotch peer with his wife and an Irish peer without one; a publisher and his wife; three Academicians, four journalists, an Irish poet; a horse-dealer; a picture-dealer; another stockbroker; an artist; two lady novelists; a baronet and his wife; three musicians; and Myself. I think the only point on which the sincerity of the voting might be doubted, is the ominous absence of any soldier's name on the list. Lord Lyonesse, however, is a firm upholder of the Hague Conference. Like myself, he is a pro-boer, but he will not allow any reference to military affairs and I suspect that it was out of deference to his wishes that the guests all abstained from writing down some names of our gallant generals. Lord Kitchener, however, obtained nine votes and I myself included Christian De Wet; but on discovery of documents, he was ruled out, in spite of my pleading for him on imperialistic grounds. I thought it rather insular too, I must confess, that Henry James and Sargent were denied to me because they are American subjects. My own final list as pasted in the Album at "Ivanhoe," along with the others, was as follows:

Swinburne,	Lord Northcliffe,	Andrew Lang,
C. H. Shannon,	Edmund Gosse,	Oliver Lodge,
Bernard Shaw,	H. G. Wells,	Dom Gasquet.
Thomas Hardy,

Mine, of course, is the choice of a recluse: a scholar without scholarship, one who lives remote from politics, newspapers, society and the merry-go-round of modern life. Its two chief interests lie in showing, first how far off I was from getting the prize (a vellum copy of poems by our hostess) and secondly that one name only, that of Lord Northcliffe, should have touched both the popular and private imagination! I regret to say that none of the guests knew the names of Dom Gasquet or Sir Oliver Lodge. Every one, except the artist, thought C. H. Shannon was J. J. Shannon, and some of the voters were hardly convinced that Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Lang are still ornaments to contemporary literature. The prize was awarded to a lady whose list most nearly corresponded to the result of the general plebiscite. I need not say she was the wife of the publisher. After some suitable expressions from Lord Lyonesse it was suggested that we should poll the servants' hall: pencils and papers were provided and the butler was sent for. An hour was given for the election: and at half-past eleven the ballot papers were brought in on a massive silver tray, discreetly covered with a red silk pocket handkerchief. And here is the result:

Frank Richardson,	Eustace Miles,	Dr. Williams (Pink
Marie Corelli,	Robert Hichens,	Pills for Pale People),
John Roberts,	T. P. O'Connor,	Hall Caine,
C. B. Fry,	Lord Lyonesse

The prize, and this is another odd coincidence, was won by the butler himself, to whom very generously the publisher's wife resigned the vellum copy of our hostess's poems. From a literary point of view, it is interesting to note that Mr. Frank Richardson is the only master of belles lettres who is appreciated in the servants' hall! The other names we associate, rightly or wrongly, with something other than literature.

The following evening I suggested choosing the greatest English names in the nineteenth century (twentieth-century life being strictly excluded). Every one by this time had caught suck-pencil fever. By general consent the suffrage was extended to the domestics; the electorate being thus one hundred. And what, you will ask, came of it all? I suggest that readers of the ACADEMY should guess. Any one interested should fill up this coupon and send it to R. R. puzzle editor, ACADEMY Office, 20 Tavistock Street, on April 1.

I think the Ten Greatest Englishmen of the Nineteenth Century were:

- 1.....
- 2.....
- 3.....
- 4.....
- 5.....
- 6.....
- 7.....
- 8.....
- 9.....
- 10.....

A prize consisting of one year's subscription to the Times Book Club will be awarded for the best shot.

ROBERT ROSS.

FICTION

The Salving of a Derelict. By MAURICE DRAKE. (Laurie, 6s.)

THIS novel was selected by a halfpenny newspaper from over six hundred manuscripts to receive a prize of £100, and it is interesting to note what qualities a widely popular daily paper considers attractive and desirable in fiction. They are not altogether what we expected. We thought that a newspaper serial took its stand, with no regard for politics, on murder, millinery and dukes. There is novelty in a dashing story of the sea, and a hero who, even on the last page, is not heir to a peerage. Nevertheless the great heart of the public gets some of the thrills it demands. The hero "was as near physically perfect as a man of twenty-four should be," and he was a well-bred gentleman; then, suddenly thrust into the rough life on a fishing trawler, he becomes "a sombre devil unchained," a Byronic sea dog feared by all men, adored by a few, loved of women. When the bully of the trawler tries his tricks on him, our gentleman orders every one on deck, including the skipper, and shoots off the bully's thumb. We admire a hero like that in these days of trembling faithfulness to life. There is no non-sensical psychology about him. One day he is a man of culture and breeding, and the next he is a foul-mouthed pirate, and the day after that the girl in a brown dress turns him into a dove. But the march of the story is stirring and vivid, carrying you bravely to the finish. You lay the book down, and from afar off comes the sound of wedding bells.'

My Neighbours. By E. G. STEVENSON. (Elliot Stock, 6s.)

A SIMPLE little story overflowing with kindly feeling and anxiety to advocate the claims of "my neighbour," on the presumption that the neighbour, when of equal social standing, is not stiffnecked and unwilling to accept favours. But the finest taste and tact go to the making of the perfect giver, and we confess that we sometimes trembled for the pride of the recipients of Dr. Bruce's lavish bounty. However, our fears were groundless, all goes well, half a dozen people are rendered happy, and the generous doctor secures the wife he desires. Although the author's style is crude, and the pages liberally sprinkled with platitudes emphasised by italics, Mrs. Erle's and Effie's brave struggles against adversity are described with the eloquence of sympathy and understanding, and we are sufficiently interested in all that affects them to feel a gentle glow of pleasure at their good fortune.

Marguerite's Wonderful Year. By MABEL BARNES-GRUNDY. (Arrowsmith, 6s.)

THE joyous opening of "Marguerite's Wonderful Year," with its radiant happiness, its brilliant promise, its underlying sense of gratitude, secures the reader's deep interest at once, and holds it to the end of the pretty, touching tale. There is a particularly charming chapter in which Marguerite draws a picture of what might have happened in her first year of enchantment with "Dimbie," before they should become an old married couple "used to the wonderfulness of being always together, alone": but the glorious morning of Marguerite's wedded life is suddenly darkened by a great calamity, and nothing is ever the same again. Despair there is, and suffering, but love, courage and humour prove that all is not lost. Marguerite finds her compensations, and gives us many amusing pages about the ways of her household, and the romances of her friends. More fully she discourses of Amelia, the faithful, tyrannical maid-of-all-work, and one of the best-drawn characters in the book. With much that is fine and delicate in sentiment and treatment in this story, there is yet a note that jars, not once, but always when Peter, Marguerite's father, is present or under discussion. There is not even the doubtful excuse that Peter's peculiarities are amusing. Marguerite's attitude of mind towards him, and Amelia's extravagant hostility, detract from the enjoyment of an uncommon and delightful book.

Bazin's Gold. By ERNEST CORNISH. (Greening, 3s. 6d.)

THIS book is quite outside criticism. The only thing that the reviewer can find to say in its favour is that the type is large and the advertisements at the end a material part of its bulk. Its demerits are those that demand silence.

The Offenders. By J. E. CARTER. (Drane, 6s.)

"THE OFFENDERS" opens with prophecies of ill-luck to all concerned in the destruction of the rookery at Stanborough Manor; prophecies that are amply fulfilled. When the vicar's daughter marries an elderly baronet from motives of gratitude while her love is given to his nephew and heir, it needs no clamour of rooks to warn us that mischief is brewing. The young people are passionately in love, and—to put it mildly—their conduct is far from being discreet: and the indiscretion is of the blazing sort, startlingly out of keeping with the drab conventionality, the general dowdiness, that pervades the book. All that can be said in favour of the story is that such incidents might happen, and that the author describes them with the proper amount of disapprobation tempered by charity towards the offenders, who get off much more lightly than they deserve. We do not know why such books are written.

DRAMA

TWO PLAYS AT THE COURT THEATRE

THE Court Theatre has gained a name for producing plays of a certain order; plays which are backed by an idea and contain thought—or, as for instance, in the plays of Mr. Shaw—something to tickle the intellect. So a pleasant atmosphere of brains has been created. And as this is not an atmosphere which is common to all the theatres of London the Court has attracted a special audience. Each one trims up the intellect he possesses to be on the level of the performance; he lunches lightly beforehand, with a stimulating friend if possible; he is anxious indeed to be in proper fettle not to miss that agreeable thing—a new idea. The contrary is generally the case with other theatres. The wise man does his utmost to deaden any perception he may have: he leaves proper time for his dinner (that at any rate shall not disappoint him), and he determines resolutely to obtain his money's worth of amusement. If the wine is good and his will is strong he sometimes succeeds. The management at the Court have heard of this state of affairs and apparently have disliked it. Perhaps they fear that their sphere of influence may become limited to the cold region of mere intellect; perhaps the little restaurant in the precincts has become unpleasantly crowded; perhaps they wish to poke fun at their worthy patrons; or perhaps some still more esoteric and excellent reason exists for their latest move. For on Tuesday afternoon they produced The Reformer by Mr. Cyril Harcourt, and a strange trespass was thereby committed upon the preserves of other managers. The play is a simple conventional story without any horrid admixture of truth, and no point which it might be irritating to feel one had missed: Just "a simple tale, dear brother Jim," as the poet says; and nothing more. It is full of stock jokes and stock characters and ambles along with some gaiety (Mr. Harcourt has the knack of fluent dialogue) to a stock ending. There is Sybil Carew, the sweet artless girl who is won as the curtain rises by an irreproachable young man and writes the coy admission of her maiden's feelings on a photograph—while Mrs. Grundy beams approval (Oh Mr. Granville Barker!)—and who hears a hint concerning the younger man's past and instantly throws him over for ever. There is the irascible old general with indigestion—a very aristocratic old general (his name is Carew) who abuses his man-servant before visitors. There is Sir Rupert Yeld, the noble friend of woman, in whom the sweet girl instantaneously confides and who has ideals woven round Mrs. Rockingham, the mildly scheming adventuress. He knows woman: he knows woman, as he would know his own hat, by a kind of happy instinct, and who is Mrs. Rockingham to withstand the noble persistence of such a man? He shows her her own mind even as he shows the maiden her mind (or heart, which is it? or is it neither?) and the lovers are united. There is a palm tree in the conservatory, as Sir Rupert says: he knows that too. The jokes were refreshing in their old-fashioned simplicity—jokes on onions, and evil smells; jokes on heart-aches and lobsters and stomach-aches. Zest moreover was lent to them by the incongruity of hearing them made on the Court Stage.

The actors entered into the spirit of the thing like boys on a special holiday. Mr. Sydney Brough was perfect as the "lardy-da" young Earl of Crowboro' who cannot face the responsibility of marriage after reading through "What a Young Mother should know" or some such capital text-book of horrors. His exit to freedom and big-game shooting in Bengal, singing "Won't you come home Bill Bailey" brought down the house. Mr. O. B. Clarence was as good as he always is, in the part of a touchy old man. Miss Eva Moore was exactly what Mrs. Rockingham should be, and Miss June Van Buskirk was sweet and girlish in just the way that Sybil Carew is girlish and sweet.

The second item was a play in three scenes called The Campden Wonder, written by Mr. John Masefield. It is founded on fact—a dreadful fact—that happened in the village of Campden some two hundred and fifty years ago. The story is one of mad brutish hatred, and tells how John Perry, to spite his younger brother Richard, swore that he and Richard and his old mother had murdered their master, William Harrison, for his money, and how they are all hanged before Mistress Harrison, who has never believed John's oath, comes to the prison and tells the parson, who returns from the gallows, that her husband is safe and well at home. The play is clever and interesting; but it is ineffective. And it is ineffective because it is technically wrong. The chief mistake is that the audience is not made to realise the insuperable difficulties at that time of conveying news of any kind, so that it seems incredible that a man should disappear as completely as Harrison disappeared and with so little reason. The plea of making John reveal his scheme of vengeance in a soliloquy is weak in the extreme; and the final thrill of horror in the last scene loses poignancy by unnecessary protraction. After the terrible leading away of the three prisoners to death, the revelation of their innocence should come with a snap and not be spun out, as it is spun out by the garrulous old wife. So the play missed fire; though it gave to Mr. Norman McKinnel a fine opportunity, of which he availed himself to the full. He showed with admirable competence the malignant stupidity which under the influence of hatred becomes madness. The other parts were well played, Miss Carlotta Addison being particularly successful as Mrs. Perry.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY

IN abandoning the policy of the "open door" and confining its seventh exhibition, opened at the New Gallery this week, to the work of members only, the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers was actuated, it is understood, by a desire to convince the sceptical of the strength of a society unsupported by outside assistance. That strength would be more obvious if many distinguished members were not this year conspicuous only by their absence. Among the honorary members notable absentees are Sir James Guthrie, Messieurs Carolus-Duran, W. M. Chase, L. Dill, Howard Pyle, Saint Gaudens and Anders Zorn; among the associates Messieurs Paul Bartlett, Anning Bell, Hornel, W. Y. Macgregor, Alexander Roche, W. W. Russell, and Havard Thomas; and the non-representation of these and other familiar exhibitors is not adequately counterbalanced by the new recruits.

While some members, and these by no means the least gifted, show nothing at all, others are permitted an excessive number of exhibits. The freshly seen and daintily handled little water-colours of Brighton and the South Coast by Mr. H. Mann Livens are pleasant enough in their modest way, but they are hardly of sufficient importance to warrant the inclusion of nineteen. A similar number of pastels and etchings by Louis Legrand may have a little more variety, but the attractiveness of the exhibition would not be decreased by a diminution in the number of his clever renderings of unpleasant incidents in Parisian life. Herr Max Klinger, again, has his admirers, but thirteen of his morbid fantasies in etching will seem an unlucky number to very many visitors. Mr. Strang's paintings, drawings and etchings are among the best things in the exhibition, but there are too many. Another improvement might be effected if works by the same artists were kept together and not dispersed. M. Simon Bussy's poetically seen and sweetly-coloured pastels of fir-clad hills and dales, for example, would be more arresting if they were not scattered over the South Room and Balcony. Mr. Joseph Crawhall's masterly water-colour The White Drake (306), again, should not have been banished to the Balcony, but hung with his two other beautiful bird drawings in the South Room.

If less good than it might be, both in its contents and arrangement, the exhibition is by no means lacking in interest. The sculpture section—to which the society rightly attaches great importance—has for its chief feature a representative group of works by Prince Paul Troubetzkoy, whose statuette portraits of "Rodin" (242), "M. Dayot" (244), and "Tolstoy à Cheval" (246) are very successful. The President is not at his best in his unsatisfying bronze bust of Mr. Bernard Shaw (280), or even in the sensitively chiselled marble bust of "Lord H. de W." (279); but the little bronze group "Frère et Sœur" (94), in the South Room, is one of M. Rodin's most tenderly conceived and modelled minor pieces. Mr. Bertram Mac-kennal's colossal bust of "War" (265) is too reminiscent of the President's "Bellona" to be altogether satisfying, while Herr Lucien Schnegg's "Petite Fille à huit Mois" (230) and "L'Hiver" (233), despite their charm, are obvious imitations of Signor Rosso's more famous marble impressions of babies. M. Jef. Lambeaux's full-length portrait of himself (274) is not without distinction, but his colossal group "Murder" (281) is commonplace in conception and is unsatisfactory in line viewed from any other position than in front. Of the remaining sculpture, Mr. Tweed's plaster bust of "Lt.-Col. Hutchinson Poe" (226), Mr. R. F. Wells's bronzes, and Mr. Ricketts's more restrained statuette groups are most worthy of attention.

In the West Room the places of honour are given to Mr. C. H. Shannon's large Giorgionesque idyll, The Golden Age (109), M. A. Besnard's Portrait of Mme. Jourdain (130), and Mr. Wm. Nicholson's Miss Alexander (123), which, but for certain irritating eccentricities, might be pronounced his masterpiece. The arrangement of the last is undoubtedly novel and effective; but although reason tells us that the lady, in a riding-habit, is seated on a table, at first sight she appears to be seated on the floor, through which the lower portion of her figure has disappeared. Again, the background, a huge equestrian portrait, seems almost to touch her cheek, and this want of atmosphere mars an otherwise finely-painted and distinguished composition. Mr. Shannon's idyll and his fine Portrait of Mrs. Stephen (150) may be left for later discussion in conjunction with the fifteen oil paintings he is now showing at the Leicester Galleries. A similar reservation may be made in the case of M. Le Sidaner, who has again been to Venice, and whose beautiful pictures here are but a foretaste of his forthcoming second exhibition of Venetian pictures at the Goupil Gallery. Mr. J. W. Morrice's Venice (125) is not one of the most successful of his pictures, but it proves his ability to take a fresh point of view of a subject that has become almost hackneyed.

Mr. Lavery is not so well represented here as he was at the Autumn Salon in Paris, and the modesty which restrained him from showing in London his self-portrait painted for the Uffizi is to be regretted. His large painting, The Hammock (129), is disappointing, and his only other contribution, an oval portrait of Miss Mary Morgan (173), though full of grace and charm, does not represent the vice-president of the society with sufficient importance. Mr. A. Jamieson's Velasquian portrait of The Dwarf (105); Professor Sauter's Under the Doorway (120), distinguished for its dazzling light effect and lovely colour; M. Cottet's sombre and impressive seascape, Cote Sauvage, Bretagne (132), and his quaintly primitive but dignified and solidly painted Vue d'Avila, Espagne (154); Franz von Stuck's incisive Portrait of the Artist (159); Mr. Sidney Lee's mean street viewed at The Close of Day (147), dignified by scholarly composition and rich creamy paint; and Mr. A. E. John's La Petite Bohémienne (149) are also among the more noteworthy paintings in the West Room.

A novelty to stay-at-home critics will be the two paintings in the North Room by Senor Anglada-Camarasa, who here shows for the first time in London. This brilliant colourist, whose works have created some excitement in Paris, is not quite at his best in either The Spanish Dancer or Pomegranates (208), though the second does give a hint of his quality and of the haunting strangeness which characterises his finer works. In colour, however, it is not so enchanting as his Opales or The White Horse which were shown this year in Paris. Two magnificently modelled charcoal drawings of backs by the same artist, prove his sense of form to be not inferior to his gift for colour. Anglada's compatriot, Ignacio Zuloaga, is a familiar exhibitor at the International, and his chief exhibit, Le Vieux Marcheur (190), has all the virile force we have learnt to expect from his brush; but it is a pity that this gifted artist should wilfully choose such unpleasant themes for the exercise of his talents. No doubt we shall be told that Zuloaga is a satirist, but paint is a clumsy vehicle for satire and often leaves the spectator in doubt whether the artist loathes or delights in the scenes he depicts. M. J. E. Blanche's fondness for effects of shimmering light on white satin skirts is pleasantly as well as skilfully displayed in the fancy portrait Venetian Glass (183) which takes its title from the still-life which meets with no less dexterous treatment, while the same painter's Portrait of M. Claude Achille Debussy (207) has a restraint and dignity which might with advantage be more often present in his work. Both in his etchings and his paintings M. A. J. Bauer makes a strong appeal to those who value original gifts. The merits of his conventionally coloured paintings Oedipus (170) and Benares at the Holy Ganges (197) may not be obvious, but they are the more impressive the more they are studied, and have a rare personal distinction and charm. Mr. James Pryde, who like his Beggarstaff brother Mr. Nicholson, has abandoned poster-designing for painting, shows two arresting compositions, View through a Barn (171) and The Pillar (209). If the rumour that the second of these has been rejected by the authorities of the Tate Gallery be correct, the nation has lost a precious example of masterly design and rich restrained colour by a sincere artist of undoubted originality and genius.

Though its borrowed works were invariably of great interest, the Society is to be congratulated on the moderation shown this year in the exhibition of works by deceased artists. The group of paintings by the late Fritz Thaulow is very properly included and might have been more extensive, while there is every justification for the exhibition of Whistler's charcoal study (61) for the Old Battersea Bridge in the Tate Gallery. The small painting of The Toilet (156) and the sanguine study by Puvis de Chavannes are welcome if less justifiable exhibits, but the society will do well to rely more on the productions of its living than on the reputation of its deceased members for the maintenance of its prestige. Next year we hope there will be fewer absentees of note, and a limit to the number of contributions from individual members.

MUSIC

A SECOND PERFORMANCE

THE preliminary arrangements for the Gloucester festival of this year, which have lately been published, by including Sir Hubert Parry's work, The Love that casteth out Fear, exemplify a principle which might well be acted upon more frequently. It was produced at the last Gloucester festival, that of 1904, and like many fine works by its composer was admired and laid aside; if it has received any complete performances since, they have certainly been few, and it has not, except in fragments, been heard in London. Festival choruses, with the best of intentions and the most painstaking effort, are rarely able to make a first performance satisfactory. A new work engages perhaps one-tenth of the total time for rehearsal, and a correct note performance with a few broad effects of light and shade is all that can be hoped for. The same may be said of festival audiences. They begin by wearying their ears with Elijah or The Dream of Gerontius, a Beethoven symphony and one or two other things, and come with blunted susceptibilities to listen to a new work. It is all they can do to catch its main outlines; they realise enough to know that it seems less attractive than what they were listening to before, which they knew well. Even the critics of the daily papers are sufficiently human to feel their powers of discrimination somewhat impaired by the heat and hurry of a festival, and would often willingly reserve their irreversible judgment could they know that a second hearing was certain. There are, in short, no works good enough to be performed once which are too bad to be heard twice. In taking up again for their next festival the work which they produced at their last, the authorities of the Gloucester Festival do very wisely. A second performance at some other festival would be attended, as far as the chorus is concerned and to some extent for the audience, by some of the evils of the first, but at Gloucester practically every one will have a previous experience to build upon. It would be a great good if this principle could to some extent be adopted by the festivals of the Three Choirs, that an important work which is passed over elsewhere, should on the next occasion when the festival is held in the same town be repeated. Three years would give a sufficient interval in order to see whether the work were likely to be taken up generally, and the second performance, by offering it a much better chance of being understood, might start it on its career. It is possible to think of several compositions produced in the last few years which only need to become known to take their place in the repertoire of large choral societies as current work. In the case of works by Sir Hubert Parry the second performance is very much needed. He has written so much on similar lines, that at first hearing we are too ready to imagine that he repeats himself. Three of his latest works, Voces Clamantium, The Love that casteth out Fear, and The Soul's Ransom are Modern Church Cantatas, a form of his own devising, though it owes much both to Bach and to the older form of Oratorio. This common basis, with Parry's peculiar idiom of musical speech, give them more than ever the appearance of repetition. They require frequent hearing to prove their individuality. The first received an excellent second performance at Leeds in 1904, while The Love that casteth out Fear is now to get its proper hearing. It is more than possible, however, that we may hear it in London before the autumn, when the Gloucester festival takes place, and such an event might be even more conducive to its general acceptance, since it would then be given without the distractions of festival trappings. These works, and perhaps this one most of the three, are music which specially need leisurely listening and quiet thought in order to grasp their intention. Parry does not, like Elgar, take Bible history and describe it vividly; whatever there is of description is rather cold, and his desire to keep to general terms, to avoid what is dogmatic and merely of the Church, often detracts from the surface interest, and at first leaves a vague impression. They are not, therefore, probably they never can be, popular compositions, for neither has the music itself that obvious beauty which will sometimes supply to outside listeners an interest which the subject lacks, nor are the subjects simple enough to make a direct and universal appeal. They require some sympathetic thought on the part of the listener. For those, however, who are able to give that, there is very quickly a reward. The first page for the semi-chorus in The Love that casteth out Fear, to the words:

O my people, what have I done to thee?
Wherein have I wearied thee? Testify against Me—is among the most beautiful pieces of choral sound which any recent work has contained, and its beauty is emphasised by its reappearance before the finale to the first part: Wherever the semi-chorus is used it is with the same distinction, which becomes most clear in the dialogue held with the full chorus, beginning, "What is love? The one thing that availeth," as well as in the last few pages of the cantata in which the semi-chorus, to a phrase which recalls the beginning, ponders upon the words, "Who is wise understandeth these things." If these are the most conspicuous places of beauty, and there are many pages between them, especially those occupied by declamatory solos, in which the musical expression is less perfect, they are yet enough to assure the careful listener that it is worth searching deeper, that beneath some obscurity, due to the haste for composing for an occasion, there is hid treasure. The experience of those who heard Voces Clamantium was generally that it cleared wonderfully with each hearing. The Love that casteth out Fear is much more involved in purpose, and built on a more extended scheme; it may take longer to know than its predecessor, but former experience and some study of the score suggest that the effort it causes will be worth while. I need make no apology for calling special attention to this work before it reappears, for to do so afterwards, as is the usual practice, would be too late to arouse the interest of the apathetic. Such works need ideal performances and ideal listeners, and it is due to the fact that both, but especially the latter, are rarely attainable, that Sir Hubert Parry's works are passed by with such scant appreciation. It is not by any means for his works alone, however, that the vigorous appreciation of the principle of second performance is desirable. Every year several large choral works are produced, but outside those by Sir E. Elgar, who has now a special privilege to be performed everywhere, but few are heard again. There are some which are decisively condemned by a second performance, and this very decision is worth having and cannot be given safely at a first hearing. There are certainly some which might live and have a permanent place amongst performed music. For these we should be so much the richer that the application of the test, even should a majority of the works so tried be condemned, would more than repay the effort.

H C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

FROM the day when, a youth of sixteen, he was given ten shillings by his guardians and bidden to go where he would, until his final return to London as Admiral of New England in 1615, Captain John Smith had as adventurous a life as the most daring spirits of the time could desire. "The Generall Historie of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles, with the Proceedings of those Severall Colonies and the Accidents that befell them in all their Journyes and Discoveries, by Captaine John Smith, Sometymes Governour in those Countreys and Admirall of New England," gives an account of his great work of founding the colony of Virginia and protecting it against the savage tribes who again and again endeavoured to destroy it; in his "True Travels, Adventures, and Observations," published in 1630, he writes the story of his early adventures against Turks and pirates, and in his "Sea Grammar," published in 1627, he gives a very valuable treatise on the ship of his time and the manner of sailing and fighting her. These works—all of which are practically unobtainable—are to be reprinted together by Messrs. MacLehose in a convenient form for the first time since their original publication. The edition now announced will be an accurate, complete, and beautifully printed text from the original editions, and will contain facsimile reproductions of all the rare maps and illustrations in the originals, including the portraits of the Duchess of Richmond and Pocahontas. It will consist of two volumes, printed on antique paper, and will be similar to Messrs. MacLehose's edition of Hakluyt's Voyages and Coryat's Crudities. The edition for sale in this country will be strictly limited to one thousand copies, of which one hundred copies, numbered and signed, will be printed throughout on the finest hand-made paper with proofs of the engravings. The price to subscribers to the ordinary edition will be 25s. net, and to the edition on hand-made paper with proofs, 50s. net.

Messrs. Jack announce a cheap edition of "The Centenary Burns" containing, in addition to Mr. Henley's famous essay on Burns, all the text, notes, glossaries, etc., exactly as in the original edition.

Messrs. Bell announce an abridgment of Webster's "International Dictionary," to be issued under the title of Webster's "Collegiate Dictionary." This book is the largest and latest abridgment of the "International," and contains, in addition to a very full vocabulary, valuable literary appendices, including a Glossary of Scottish Words and Phrases; a Dictionary of Classical Mythology; Vocabularies of Rhymes, Proper Names, etc.; Quotations from Foreign Languages, and Tables of Abbreviations and Arbitrary Signs used in Writing and Printing. There are also articles on Pronunciation and Orthography, a List of Prefixes and Suffixes, and other features of interest. The aim of the editors has been to retain so much of the scholarship of the "International" as to meet the ordinary wants of advanced students in schools and colleges, and to offer to the general reader a compact and convenient Dictionary, thoroughly trustworthy and full enough to serve for most of the every-day purposes for which a Dictionary is consulted. In addition to the ordinary edition on thick paper, an édition de luxe is also issued, printed on Bible Paper, this being the first time such paper has been used in a book of reference. The edition, though containing one thousand, one hundred and sixteen pages with one thousand four hundred illustrations, measures only $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2} \times 1\frac{1}{2}$ inches.

Dr. George Sigerson has just completed the revision of the second edition of his "Bards of the Gael and Gull: Examples of the Poetic Literature of Erin, done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael." Mr. Unwin will publish the edition, which contains much fresh matter (including a new preface), on January 14.

Another book promised by Mr. Unwin on the same date is Sir Spencer Walpole's volume of "Studies in Biography." The subjects are: Sir Robert Peel, Gibbon, Richard Cobden, Prince Bismarck, Benjamin Disraeli, Napoleon III., Lord Dufferin, and the seventh Lord Shaftesbury.

Mr. Unwin will publish on January 14 a new novel by Mr. Alphonse Courlander, whose stories, "The Taskmaster" and "Seth of the Cross," attracted much attention. The title is "The Sacrifice" and the book is, the publisher informs us, a realistic picture of life in a Wiltshire village. Its heroine, Mora, is a peasant girl who is too weak to fight against circumstances and her own nature.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein will publish this month a book on "Saint George: Champion of Christendom and Patron Saint of England," by E. O. Gordon, which deals with the Life and Martyrdom of St. George; the Commemoration of St. George in Church Liturgies and National Institutions; Celebrated Knights of St. George from the Sixteenth to the Twentieth Century; and St. George in Art, Hostels, Customs and Traditions. Another volume promised by the same publishers is "The Principles of Architectural Design (Exterior and Interior)" by Percy L. Marks.

"Charles Edward" is the title of a new novel by Mr. Harrison Rhodes which Messrs. Ward Lock have in the press.

"Phrases and Names: their Origins and Meanings" is the title of a new book by Mr. Trench H. Johnson, which Mr. Werner Laurie will publish shortly.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE SECRET OF THE TOTEM"

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—I regret the necessity for renewing this correspondence. Mr. Lang, in his letter, which appeared in the ACADEMY of October 13, has gone off on a small issue of a misplaced comma, altogether disregarding the more serious one raised by my question as to the four parts of my summary, which he rearranged and termed "a passage from Mr. Howitt" ("Secret of the Totem," p. 197).

It seems to me that it would be well, for Mr. Lang's credit, if he replied to my question, because that so-called "passage," on the face of it, carries an unpleasant suggestion of manipulation, for it was used as the ground for a charge against me of overlooking my own facts ("Secret of the Totem," p. 199).

A. W. HOWITT,

Metung, Victoria,
November 28, 1906.

"PARONOMASIA—PLAY 'PO' WORDS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I should like to know who your correspondent supposes he is quoting from when he places the words "paronomasia—play po' words" between inverted commas in his notice of Mr. Roe's translation of "The Ruba'iyat of Omar Khayyâm" in your current issue?

E. G. EDWARDS.

[There is no question of supposition. We refer our correspondent to "The Cock and the Bull":

"You see this pebble-stone? It's a thing I bought
Of a bit of a chit of a boy i' the mid o' the day—
I like to dock the smaller parts-o'-speech,
As we curtail the already cur-tail'd cur
(You catch the paronomasia—play 'po' words?)
Did, rather, i' the pre-Landseerian days.
Well to my muttons."

He will find it in C.S.C.'s "Fly Leaves."—ED.]

A FIRST EXPERIENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—"Expectation was roused to its utmost pitch. But nothing came of it." Your critic has been writing my experience, for I went to the theatre for the first time in my life exactly a month ago expecting to see Shakespeare's King Richard II., and Lord! what did I not get instead!

From a child I had known Act 1, scene i., "London. A Room in the Palace," and when Act 1, scene i. showed me a river and a garden, with a dumb show in the shape of a game of bowls, I honestly thought I had made a mistake and come to the wrong theatre. My bewilderment was not wholly dispelled when the fidgety King casually went on to say (this time aloud), "Old John of Gaunt time-honoured Lancaster." The scene began with bowls and ended with bowls and much girlish giggling, while Shakespeare was truly "up a tree."

H. de S. says Mr. Lyn Harding played Bolingbroke with marked ability. I can hardly think he and I saw Bolingbroke on the same day, for to my understanding Mr. Lyn Harding's Bolingbroke was a boorish bully, very far removed from Shakespeare's strong man. Charity itself could not have seen anything natural in his attitude when King Richard pronounced the sentence of banishment upon him.

I plead ignorance, but I should like to ask, by the way, whether there is any authority for such vowel shortening as "Then, dear mi' liege, mi'or' 'onour let mi' try." The effect at least was hardly melodious.

The Queen, too. Where was her dignity? Weep Shakespeare's Queen undoubtedly does, but not in that modern uncontrollable fashion, half drowning her words in sobs.

I have not seen the new Antony and Cleopatra, nor do I intend—thanks to experience and your critic. But I should like to know whether this is the only kind of Shakespeare dished up in London nowadays. If so, I stay at home—until I hear again Mr. Gordon Craig's trumpets shaking the walls of Jericho.

M. P.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

Sayce, Rev. A. H. The Archaeology of Cuneiform Inscriptions. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. 220 S.P.C.K., 5s.
[Embodies the Rhind Lectures in Archaeology delivered by Professor Sayce at Edinburgh in October 1906.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Robertson, Col. James P. Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer. With portraits. $9\frac{1}{4} \times 5\frac{1}{4}$. Pp. 284. Arnold, 12s. 6d. net. (See p. 36.)
Lord, John. Cleopatra. $7 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 69. A. L. Humphreys, 2s. net.
[In the "Little Lives of the Great" series.]

Bisland, Elizabeth. The Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn. With illustrations. 2 vols. $9 \times 6\frac{1}{4}$. Pp. viii, 475 and 554. Constable, 24s. net.

DRAMA.

Housman, Laurence; and Barker, H. Granville. Prunella; or, Love in a Dutch Garden. $8 \times 6\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 89. Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.

[Produced at the Royal Court Theatre on December 23, 1904, and revived on April 24, 1906.]

- Harris, E. G. St. Agnes, and other Dramas. 7½×4½. Pp. 179. Dent, 2s. net.
 Besier, Rudolf. The Virgin Goddess. A tragedy. 6½×5½. Pp. 82. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
 [The Virgin Goddess was produced by Mr. Otho Stuart at the Adelphi Theatre on October 23, 1906.]

FICTION.

- Appleton, G. W. The Duchess of Pontifex Square. 7½×5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
 Sergeant, Adeline. The House in the Crescent. 7½×5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
 Forster, R. H. The Mistress of Aydon. Illustrated. 7½×5½. Pp. 314. Long, 6s.
 Montgomerie, F. W. Paying the Price. 7½×5. Pp. 178. Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.

HISTORY.

- Besant, Sir Walter. Medieval London. Vol. ii. : Ecclesiastical. 11½×9½. Pp. 436. Black, 30s. net.
 Chambers, E. K. Notes on the History of the Revels Office Under the Tudors. 9×5½. Pp. 80. A. H. Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.

LITERATURE.

- Brunetière, Ferdinand. Honoré de Balzac. 7½×5½. Pp. 316. Lippincott, 6s. net.
 [In the "French Men of Letters" series. See p. 30.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Escott, T. H. S. Society in the Country House. 9×6. Pp. 512. Unwin, 16s. (See p. 34.)
 Booth, Charles. Old Age Pensions and the Aged Poor. A proposal. 8½×5½. Pp. 84. Macmillan, 2s. net.
 Jones, Emily. The Englishwoman's Year Book and Dictionary, 1907-8. 7½×5. Pp. 405. Black, 2s. 6d. net.
 [Twenty-seventh year of issue.]
Penrose's Pictorial Annual. The Process Year-Book. Vol. xii. Edited by William Gamble. 10×7½. Pp. 160. Penrose, n.p.

POETRY.

- Sparrow, Arthur Goldsmith. The New Crusade. 7½×5. Pp. 136. Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. net.
 Malone, Walter. Songs of East and West. 7½×5½. Pp. 58. Louisville : Morton, n.p.
 Leonard, William Ellery. Sonnets and Poems. 7½×5½. Pp. 67. Boston, Mass. : Published by the Author, $1.00.
 Ledoux, Louis V. The Soul's Progress, and other poems. Pp. 94. New York : John Lane Company, $1.25.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- The East and West Indian Mirror*, being an account of Joris van Speilbergen's Voyage round the World (1614-1617), and the Australian Navigations of Jacob le Maire. Translated, with notes and an introduction, by J. A. J. de Villiers. 9×6. Pp. 272. Printed for the Hakluyt Society, n.p.
The Dramatic Works of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. With an introduction by Joseph Knight and 15 illustrations. 7½×8½. Pp. 490. Frowde, n.p.
 ["The Oxford Edition."] Wilson, Rathmell. Hinemoa and Tutaneikai. 7×4½. Pp. 112. Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.
 [A Maori legend, with other stories and some verses. Paper covers.]

THEOLOGY.

- Knight, the Rev. H. Theodore. Criticism and the Old Testament. A Popular Introduction. 7½×5½. Pp. 170. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d. net.
 [Appendices : (1) Chronological Tables ; (2) Bibliography.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Bayley, Stanhope. The Sacred Grove, and other impressions of Italy. 7×4½. Pp. 132. Elkin Mathews, 4s. 6d. net.
 [Of the eighteen "impressions" in this book, ten have previously appeared in the Times of India.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Du Positivisme au Mysticisme, étude sur l'inquiétude religieuse contemporaine. Paris, Bloud. [Being the continuation of the same author's Introduction (Paris : Oudin, 1901) to Psychology and Mysticism.] By Jules Pachet, S. J.—"Palpitating actuality" is the Gallicism applicable to this work of a Jesuit, French indeed, but steeped in English and American philosophy, and long a resident in Great Britain. Published this year, these études comprise Comte, H. Spencer, Guilan, Schopenhauer, Renan, Barrès, Nietzsche, Tolstoi and the occultists. The Abbé Pachet gave his conférences at the Paris Institut Catholique on "the Internal Life," from 1891-3, or a year over the period devoted to W. James's Gifford Lectures at Edinburgh. The Harvard Professor and the Jesuit thus cover the same ground in point of time and of philosophy. His course at Paris necessitated the delivery by the Abbé of conférences on "mystic," as word and as thing, and that for Catholics and Non-Catholics alike, for the linguist and for "the general,"—the thing-in-itself, Mysticism, being treated physiologically, psychologically, scientifically and artistically. Then comes, in his filiation, the present work on Positivism and Mysticism. "Spiritual life as a poem" follows: "Alighieri and Loyola." The Inferno is now the sinful soul; the Purgatorio, virtue in the acquisition; the Paradiso, Unity in Love. Of these, the Inferno is profusely illustrated, e.g., with the "remorse" of Macbeth; the "confusion" of Lucretian thought, veiled in verse crystal-clear; the "fear" of a St. Thérèse; the all-embracing "Vanity"; variously expressed, of a Villon, a Paschal, a Bossuet. That vale of misery, Purgatory, men use for a well, and the pools are filled with water. Paradise unites Love in one synthesis, and the End crowns the Work. The leit-motif is Dante; the three works of the Florentine make: "une sorte de triptyque, une trilogie, où nous aurions à ramener un choix exquis de peintures d'âme. Ici la poésie des larmes, et les élégies de la conversion; plus loin l'aube de lumière qui croît, le soleil de l'amour qui monte et revêt l'âme de vertus; la poésie de la douleur et du sacrifice, enfin l'idéal paradisiaque de lumière, d'amour et de paix" (p. 96). The Abbé's "Dante and Verlaine" is the introduction to the above works and lectures. Here are marshalled Edm. Spenser, Bunyan, Shelley, Verlaine, Huysmans, Fra Luis de Leon, Giacomone da Todi (il Vecchio di Todi), Silesius, the German mystic poet. The whole series is remarkable for lightness of touch and depth of thought, for allusiveness of style and attraction of subject.

Book-Prices Current, vol. 20 (Elliot Stock, £1 7s. 6d.).—This record of the prices at which books have been sold at auction from October 1905 to July 1906, being the season, 1905-6, has nearly come of age in point of years but long ago reached maturity in point of excellence. It is simply indispensable alike to the bookbuyer and to the bookseller. Forty-eight sales are reported on comprising 37,414 lots, realising £95,829 1s., or an average per lot of £2 11s. 3d. All the sales were in London, and book-selling by auction of important books is practically confined to the Metropolis and indeed to the auction-rooms of four firms. The most important sale of the year was that of the books of Edwin Truman. The sale was divided into two portions, one dealing mainly with Cruikshank, and altogether brought £876. Far the highest price realised for one book was for the 1600 edition of Much Ado About Nothing, £1570; next comes A Midsummer Night's Dream, 1600, £480; The Merchant of Venice, 1600, £460; King Lear, 1608, £395; Othello, 1655 (Sir Henry Irving), £200. One copy of the First Folio Shakespeare appeared during the season and realised £245. Four copies of the Second Folio appeared, one of the Third and seven of the Fourth Folio, as well as two copies of the Poems of 1640. Shelley's "Queen Mab," original boards, brought £168, his "Proposal for Putting Reform to the Vote," £132; Forster's "Life of Dickens," extra-illustrated, £380; "Biblia Sacra," Ben Jonson's copy, £320; Common Prayer Book formerly belonging to Charles I., £285; "Bulletins de la Convention Nationale," complete set, £190; John Still's Gammer's Gurton's Needle, A Play, £180; "The Sporting," 1792-1870, £170; Gould's "Birds of Australia," 10 vols. 1848, £141; Dallaway and Cartwright's History of Sussex, extra illustrated, £131 and a "Memorial" of Edmund Kean, 5 vols. folio, £130. The book is admirably arranged, each sale being catalogued separately and the whole indexed exhaustively. The index runs to nearly 100 pages and is very well done. The compiler of Book-Prices Current is Mr. J. H. Slater.

Messrs. Blackwood issue a handsome, illustrated volume which will make an admirable present for girls who are growing into womanhood—and for those who have passed the border. Maids of Honour, by A. J. Green-Armytage (10s. 6d. net), consists of twelve descriptive sketches of single women who have distinguished themselves in science, poetry, prose, travel, philanthropy, and nursing: Hannah More, Mary Carpenter, Caroline Lucretia Herschel, Sister Dora (Dorothy Wyndlow Pattison), Mary Kingsley, Adelaide Anne Procter, Marianne North, Jean Ingelow, Louisa Alcott, Christina Rossetti, and Mary Lamb. The author treats her subjects sympathetically, and her work is careful and accurate.

Text-Book on Fungi, including Morphology, Physiology, Pathology, Classification, etc. By George Massee. (Duckworth, 6s. net.).—Mr. Massee is a recognised authority on Mycology and in this volume proves clearly how greatly our knowledge of Fungi has increased of late years. The subject is a deeply interesting one, as it throws much light on the all-important point of plasmogony and even suggests that of autogeny. The book is profusely illustrated with very clear drawings, and Mr. Massee, beside giving much valuable information himself, informs his readers where more is to be found. Taken in conjunction with such books as those by Dr. M. C. Cooke, this should prove an invaluable guide to the student.

The Way of the Buddha. By Herbert Baynes (Murray, 2s. net.).—This is the latest addition to "The Wisdom of the East" series, in which are given sketches of the great teachers of Oriental wisdom. The Buddha is by far the most imposing of these figures, and those who desire to learn in plain prose much of what Sir Edwin Arnold expressed in charming verse, cannot do better than consult this attractive little volume.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

The SHANACHIE

A New Illustrated Irish Miscellany.

FIRST ANNUAL VOLUME.

LITERARY CONTENTS by GEORGE BERNARD
SHAW, W. B. YEATS, Lord DUNSANY, S. O'SULLIVAN, G. BIRMINGHAM, STEPHEN GWYNN, Lady GREGORY,
A. E., Miss JANE BARLOW, T. M. SYNGE, OLIVER
GAY, Miss ROSAMUND LANGBRIDGE, "TÓRNA," GEORGE ROBERTS, MICHAEL ORKNEY, PAGE DICKIN-
SON, Father O'LEARY, P. COLM, FIONAN MACCARTHY, A. P. GRAVES, GRACE RHYS.

ILLUSTRATIONS by JACK YEATS, R. CAUL-
FIELD ORPEN, HUGH THOMSON, T. B. YEATS, R.H.A., ELINOR MONSEL, SEAGHAN MACCATHMHAOIL,
GEORGE MORROW. Cover design by Miss BEATRICE ELVEY.

Single Numbers can still be had, price 1s. net.

CALENDAR OF THE SAINTS, 1907. Patrie.

Illustrations and Letterpress, by SEAGHAN MACCATHMHAOIL.

Printed on plate paper, Letterpress in black and red, in envelope ready for posting, 1s. net.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

*It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Full and Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1811

JANUARY 19, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

THE Council of the University of Sheffield is about to appoint a Librarian who must have high academic qualifications. Copies of not more than three testimonials, and the names of two referees, must be sent, by January 23, 1907, to the Registrar, from whom full particulars may be obtained.

W. M. GIBBONS,
Registrar.

Books for Sale.

GROTE'S HISTORY OF GREECE.
Portrait, Map and Plans, 10 vols. cr. 8vo, cloth. Published by Murray at 50s., offered for 25s. net, new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BERTRAM DOBEL L
SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,
77 CHANCING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

CATALOGUES free on application.

No. 147, just issued, contains books recently purchased from the Libraries of the late Dr. Garnett, J. L. Toole, Clement Scott, and other well-known Collections.

MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS, translated by Van Laun, Memoir, Appendices and Notes. Fine Etchings by Lalauze. 6 vols., 8vo, cloth, 30s. Another without etchings, 20s., published by Paterson in 1875.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

WANTED by W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury: "Willis's Canterbury Cathedral"; "Kentish Garland, vol. 2; Kentish Newspapers before 1768.

DICKENS (Charles), Extra Illustrations to the Pickwick Club, by Samuel Weller, 1837-8, or odd
Peter Paillette's Extra Illustrations to Nicholas Nickleby, 1838-9, or odd Pictures Picked from the Pickwick Papers, by Alfred Crowquill, Ackermann, n.d.
Pickwickian Illustrations, designed by W. Heath (20 plates), 1837
Plates to illustrate the cheap edition of Charles Dickens' Works, published by Appleyard or Strange, or odd
Pickwick Papers, first cheap edition, post 8vo, 1847, only a copy containing full page woodcut illustrations
Nicholas Nickleby, first cheap edition, post 8vo, 1847, only a copy containing full page woodcut illustrations
The Extra Christmas Numbers of Household Words for 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1854, uncut
Household Words, part 9, 1858
Mr. Nightingale's Diary, a Farce in one Act, 1851
Library of Fiction, 2 vols., 1836-7, or any odd parts
The Battle of London Life, by Morna, 1849
A Curious Dance round a Curious Tree, a pamphlet, n.d.
Heads to Nicholas Nickleby, by Miss La Creevy, 6 parts, or any
Mr. Thackeray, Mr. Yates and the Garrick Club, a pamphlet, 1859
Account of the Origin of the Pickwick Papers, by Mrs. Seymour, n.d.
Town Talk, No. 6, June 1858
Sketch Book by Bos. Lloyd, n.d.

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street W.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss Foor, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

With this number of the Academy is published an Education Supplement containing authoritative articles on the Education
Problems of the Hour, by Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. J. H.
Yoxall, M.P., Mr. Paul
Kieffer (a Rhodes scholar), and others, together with reviews of all recent school books.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue.
Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

Appointment Vacant

WANTED a HEADMASTER for the Boys' department of the Jews' Free School, salary commencing at £500 per annum, and rising by annual increments of £20 to £700 per annum.

Applicants must be of the Jewish persuasion and have a University degree. Highest educational qualifications and teaching experience in elementary or secondary schools essential. The school accommodation is 2200, and it is proposed by the London County Council to reorganise it shortly so as to consist of a higher elementary and three lower sections, each under a vice-master. The successful candidate must commence his duties after the Easter holidays.

Applications must be addressed to Mr. H. MARKS, Secretary of the Jews' Free School, Bell Lane, London, E., by January 31, 1907, from whom further particulars can be obtained.

The application must be made on form 40 to be obtained from the Education Offices, L.C.C., Victoria Embankment, W.C., or from the present Headmaster at the School.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row E.C.

The Library of Useful Stories

A SERIES OF POPULAR ILLUSTRATED
MANUALS ON SCIENTIFIC SUBJECTS,
WRITTEN BY SPECIALISTS. POTT 8vo,
CLOTH, 1s. EACH ; POST FREE, 1s. 2d. EACH.

The Story of

- A Grain of Wheat. By William C. Edgar.
Alchemy : or, The Beginnings of Chemistry. By M. M. Pattison Muir.
Alpine Climbing. By Francis Gribble.
Animal Life. By B. Lindsay.
A Piece of Coal. By A. E. Martin.
Architecture. By P. L. Waterhouse.
Art in the British Isles. By J. E. Phythian.
Bird Life. By W. P. Pyecraft.
Books. By G. B. Rawlings.
British Coinage. By G. B. Rawlings.
British Trade and Industry. By James Burnley.
Eclipses. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
Lost England. By Beckles Willson.
Music. By F. J. Crowest.
Photography. By A. T. Story.
Primitive Man. By Edward Clodd.
Rapid Transit. By Beckles Willson.
Religions. By E. D. Price, F.G.S.
Reptile Life. By W. P. Pyecraft.
The Alphabet. By Edward Clodd.
The Army. By Captain Owen Wheeler.
The Atlantic Cable. By Charles Bright, F.R.S.E.
The Atmosphere. By Douglas Archibald, M.A.
The British Race. By J. Munro.
The Cotton Plant. By F. Wilkinson, F.G.S.
Electricity. By J. Munro.
Euclid. By W. B. Frankland.
Extinct Civilisations of the East. By R. E. Anderson, M.A.
Extinct Civilisations of the West. By R. E. Anderson, M.A.
Fish Life. By W. P. Pyecraft.
Forest and Stream. By James Rodway, F.L.S.
Geographical Discovery. By Joseph Jacobs.
Germ Life : Bacteria. By H. W. Conn.
Ice, in the Present and Past. By W. A. Brend, B.A.
King Alfred. By Sir Walter Besant.
Life in the Seas. By Sydney J. Hickson, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Life's Mechanism. By W. H. Conn.
The Chemical Elements. By M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A.
The Earth in Past Ages. By H. G. Seeley, F.R.S.
The Empire. By Edward Salmon.
The Mind. By Professor J. M. Baldwin.
The Plants. By Grant Allen.
The Potter. By C. F. Binns.
The Solar System. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
The Stars. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
The Wanderings of Atoms. By M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A.
The Weather. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
Thought and Feeling. By F. Ryland, M.A.
Wild Flowers. By the Rev. Professor Henslow.
Wireless Telegraphy. By A. T. Story.

50 Volumes. 10,480 Pages.
1720 Illustrations.

Of all Booksellers, or from

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE BEST ATLASES

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CITI-

ZEN'S ATLAS. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. 156 Maps. Introductory Text, Statistical Tables, Descriptive Gazetteer, and General Index. Extra crown folio, art canvas, 21s. net; half morocco, 25s. net. Postage, 10d. extra.

"A splendid atlas. The very best atlas which can be purchased at the price." Daily Express.

THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENT'S

ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. A Series of 105 Physical, Political, and Statistical Maps, compiled from British and Foreign Surveys, and the latest results of International Research. Under the direction of J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E., F.R.G.S., etc. Royal 4to, cloth, 6s. net. Post free, 6s. 6d.

"A boon to all students of the world's contemporary history."—Daily Telegraph.

THE HANDY SHILLING ATLAS OF

THE WORLD. Containing 120 pages of Fully Coloured Maps, by J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, and a Gazetteer with 10,000 entries. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net. Post free, 1s. 2d.

THE HANDY TOURING ATLAS OF

THE BRITISH ISLES. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. Being the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Ireland in miniature, contained in 120 Coloured Maps. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE HANDY ATLAS of the BRITISH

EMPIRE. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E. A Series of 120 Maps and Plans, illustrating the Geography of the Colonies, with Statistical Notes and Tables. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED,

3 TO 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THEY MEET ALL NEEDS

AND SUIT ALL POCKETS

THE ACADEMY.

Price 3d. Weekly.

Contents for January 12, 1907.

THE LITERARY WEEK.

NOTES ON CURRENT LITERARY TOPICS.

LITERATURE.

- THE NOVEL OF MANNERS ("Honoré de Balzac," by Ferdinand Brunetière).
THE PLEASANTEST RAMBLE ("A Last Ramble in the Classics," by Hugh E. P. Platt). By Professor Tyrrell.
ANOTHER TERROR ("Frederick York Powell," by Oliver Elton).
BIOGRAPHY FOR THE MILLION (St. Catherine of Siena and her Times," by the Author of "Mademoiselle Mori").
SOCIETY IN THE COUNTRY HOUSE (Mr. Escott's new book).
MEDIEVAL BUILDERS ("Westminster and the King's Craftsmen," by W. R. Lethaby).
LE ROI SOLEIL ("The Great Days of Versailles," by G. F. Bradby).
BY LAND AND SEA ("Personal Adventures and Anecdotes of an Old Officer," by Colonel J. P. Robertson).
EARLY LONDON PRINTING ("The Printers, Stationers and Bookbinders of Westminster and London," by E. Gordon Duff).
ILL-TREATED RODIN ("The Life and Work of Auguste Rodin," by Frederick Lawton).

THE LIBRARY TABLE.

SHORTER NOTICES OF RECENT BOOKS.

POEM.

"To E. J." By Robin Flower.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE.

"Going up Top." By Robert Ross.

FICTION.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

DRAMA.

TWO PLAYS AT THE COURT THEATRE.

FINE ART.

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY.

MUSIC.

A SECOND PERFORMANCE.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BOOKS RECEIVED.
A FULLY ANNOTATED LIST.
THE BOOKSHELF.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	51	The English Association	71
Literature :		Impressions of a Rhodes Scholar	72
Robbie	53	A Literary Causerie :
Tudor Revels	54	Literary Made-Dishes	73
The Poetry of the Far East	54	Fine Art :
A Queen of Indiscretions	55	The Old Masters	74
The Salon of Madame Geoffrin	56	Correspondence	75
A History with a Purpose	57	Books Received	78
Verse and Poetry	58	The Bookshelf	78

An Education Supplement is issued with this Number

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts unless they are accompanied by a stamped envelope

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 19s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THERE are few English scholars whose knowledge of French literature is so extensive as that of Professor Saintsbury, and this accomplishment is seen to full advantage in his article on Brunetière and Balzac in the new number of the Quarterly Review. It forms a delightful piece of reading, and yet the criticism in it leaves us dissatisfied. Professor Saintsbury assumes that M. Brunetière writes with certain judgments that have been formed beforehand, and that one must tolerate and overlook. He calls Dumas a negro, and he is opposed to the historical school of novelists and is in favour of the novel of manners. Professor Saintsbury's own opinions are equally fixed. He was one of that band of Saturday reviewers who brought Dumas into popularity in England, and belief in Dumas is part of his intellectual being.

Professor Saintsbury is altogether wrong when he assumes that those in whose opinion the historical novel has become a mere nuisance have not enjoyed their Dumas. But they are looking at the effects produced, and they see that one result of the Dumas cult has been a degradation of English imaginative literature. One has but to look over the essay on the historical novel contributed to the same Review by Mr. Prothero to see that the time has come when such opinions as have been held by Professor Saintsbury ought to be thrown into the melting-pot. In sum and substance that was M. Brunetière's message. He told the novelist to cease fumbling among the archives of the past and to go forth into the highways and byways of the life of his time and translate the results of his observations into that living mirror of life which the best novel will always be.

Of late years the literary critic or critics of the Edinburgh Review have cultivated a special vocabulary, of which a paper in the current number on "Insular Fiction" supplies an example. It seems to us that the writer might just as well talk of insular rainwater or insular soap. His complaint is that the writing of novels in Great Britain is governed by a convention. This is true of the majority of novels of all nations. If he had discovered a writer who had struck out lines of his own, or in other words originated a convention, he would have been able to tell us that there is a great and original novelist in England at the moment. It was the merit of George Eliot, for instance, that she made a convention. So did Dickens, so did Thackeray; and we call those their imitators who follow that convention. The reviewer mourns because Stevenson and Pater are gone, Mr. Meredith has ceased to write, Mr. Kipling is preoccupied with children, work comes from Mr. Henry James at increasing intervals, and Mr. Thomas Hardy has turned from romance to transcendental drama. We would like to know in what sense these writers are unconventional.

The novels chosen for reprimand are headed by "The Guarded Flame," by Mr. Maxwell. Its author is told that he missed a rare chance in not analysing and throwing into opposition the fresh, generous, unsuspecting love of the philosopher's niece and the jealous, eager, despairing passion of his wife; but that is just what the conventional author would have done. The study of the scholar was a new departure, and nowhere did Mr. Maxwell show more promise than in resting his interest on this foundation. Mr. Hichens receives a still more stinging rebuke, though the writer modestly asks whether he is not wrong "in attributing to the influence of the convention what may be a mere personal insufficiency." "The Call of the Blood" was certainly a failure, but for reasons that the reviewer does not seem to penetrate. His glorification of Mr. Galsworthy is in itself a striking commentary on his style of argument.

In this tercentenary year of the founding of Jamestown, the real beginning of English colonisation in America, the little known writings of Captain John Smith, who accompanied the expedition are, as we announced last week, to be reprinted. Smith was in his way a less picturesque Raleigh, a leader of men, an earnest advocate of over-sea colonisation, an adventurer and a very capable penman. He wrote some thirteen or fourteen books, all worthy of the study of the student of seventeenth-century travel and efforts to establish British settlements on the other side of the Atlantic. His experiences in Virginia—experiences which few men would have survived—are told in the "True Relation," which appeared in 1608. When, some twenty years later, he had settled down in England, he wrote "Advertisements for the Inexperienced, or the Pathway to erect a Plantation." His "Young Seamen's Grammar" is a curiosity. Whilst Jamestown is celebrating its three hundredth birthday, these works of Captain John Smith will naturally be in some demand.

A correspondent writes: The Revue Germanique has an article on "G. B. S." His star waxed as Ibsen's declined (it appears), till that of the dramaturge britannique became of the largest dimensions. The mantle of the Norwegian is on the shoulders of the Fabian. This last-named disciple of Ibsen, and second Byron (for British public opinion), is anything but a Cunctator. Like the Irish pig, he cannot be counted, so brusque and active and fugitive is his genius. Agitator and propagandist—things unmusical enough—he is a critic of Terpsichore from A to G; preaches transition in all the chords. In his Perfect Wagnerite his study of the tetralogy is itself a teratology, marvellously smacking of the Anarch old, Miltonian or other. Before, his Quintessence smelled of Nietzsche's lamp as much as of Aladdin's, carefully omitting as he did there Stirner (whose philosophy is so greatly his own) in the weird, formidable array of word-painters, whom he confesses to affect, from Bunyan to Wagner, from Blake to Tolstoy.

The critics, who with their stilus slew Ibsen between the wall and the altar, spare no bit of "G. B. S.," whose crusade is against our being tied and bound by our ideals of virtue. Marriage idealists, to take but these, were hard on Ibsen, and called Ibsen's successor sacrilegious and cynical. As a conscious nihilist, Shaw has outstripped Nietzsche. That philosopher found that all our principles—scientific, artistic, moral—are illusions. But are illusions bad? On the contrary, they are vital. A philosopher is nothing if not consistent, and conscious inconsistency is the best. But Stirner was already at this stage before Nietzsche, and Shaw is there after both.

Says the last-named: "Activity is the only road to Knowledge," and the present writer found him in bed between 9 and 10 A.M., in his Superman days! One is not Irish for nothing! Not for nothing does one call oneself "a natural born mountebank," in a waggon in Hyde Park, 'midst clashing cymbals and acclaiming mobs. There is nothing like this for a dramatic writer: "Noise and fury; club, finance, theatre, cockneys and clergymen," all giving voice at once. This gives tone, it seems. Hypocritical Albion is prejudiced, blind as a new-born puppy, an ostrich that hides her head in the sand. And this of gaiety of heart, wittingly. But Shaw has torn aside the veil. "Il est retourné ainsi à l'état d'innocence." He is naked, and makes naked, and is not ashamed.

From such innocence and from such nakedness rise works of art. And as tragedy is impossible nowadays, Shaw is Hebbel's ideal "comic poet." Of course our "mob orator" scandalised society with his "Widowers' Houses." It reeks of "the Man with the muck-rake" of Bunyan. Indeed, Shaw refers us continually to Bunyan, for explanations of himself, of his evolution, as a dramatist. And his view of women? Shakespearean, he says; and cites Troilus and Cressida, with its scorn of womankind, or Strindberg, with that Shakespearean's "hate and disgust," modo non genus omne perosus fæmineum.—Woman, however, in the Irishman's view (different from Ibsen's), is excellent in prose and truth; cures men of idealism, as Lady Cicely cured Captain Brassbound, for all his Byronianism. The Irishman's man is not Byronian and not Shakespearean. This new man affects Mr. Cunninghame Graham's intransigence (without the Spanish songs of the Lobby at Westminster): he loves every woman (à l'Espagnole) and never retires, verbally or otherwise, before any man.

"Sir, I never withdraw!"—the Trafalgar Square Red Sunday mot—plants itself promiscuously about the Balkans in Arms and the Man. When the hero falls, as in the song, he falls on exactly two thousand four hundred eiderdown quilts, supplied by Brunschli. Shaw's Cæsar is a very duodecimo hero; bald; part brute, part woman, part god; dividing his time between Cleopatra and (Mr. Hichens's) Sphinx. In the rôle of J. Tanner, Shaw limps somewhat between Revelation and Revolution. Aristotle's critique of the Platonic Man in himself applies to his borrowed Superman (why not a Super Horse or a Super Apple?), crushed out now by Property and Marriage (why is "G.B.S." married?). A synthesis of Nietzsche and Socialism, it seems, is only apparently "forcée, instable, et paradoxale." Shaw is disintegrating and synthetic—without being flippant. And on this note I stay my review of the review.

Novels at half a crown! This is the legend which the happy Editor of the Times was able to inscribe on his pages the other day. At least two firms of publishers have announced their intention of abandoning the custom of publishing at six shillings, and they promise that for half a crown they will give the same quality of ink and paper. It will be interesting to see whether this blow will be as fatal to the six-shilling novel as the six-shilling novel was to the old three-volume.

Unfortunately it is to be feared that the change will work badly for the young and unknown author. Probably novelists with a reputation will gain rather than suffer, because when they have adopted the principle of small profits and quick returns the publishers will take care that the number of copies of a book sold will recompense them for the diminution of profit on the individual copy. But it will become even more difficult than formerly for the young and budding author to find a market. At the most, his first book (unless, indeed, he be exceptionally lucky) would sell to the extent of from five hundred to one thousand, and these at half a crown would admit of very little plunder coming his way. In fact, the publishers would be almost obliged to concentrate their efforts on pushing the important man at the expense of those whose spurs are still unwon.

A contributor to the Times gifted with more ardour than wisdom, has taken it upon himself to explain the attitude of the press to the Book War with which the leading journal has been boring its readers for a long time past. He writes on a subject he understands very little about. The best journalists have always been proud of the Times. They regard it as the leading newspaper not only of Great Britain but of Europe—and one might also say of the world—because it has no rival. Admiration is generous and unstinted; but the journalists are by no means proud of the Times as a retail book-seller, and they are not proud of it for having got up a squabble about the terms on which it is to obtain books for the purpose of selling again. Most people, when they have anything to dispose of, claim to make their own conditions and the bidder or would-be purchaser has only to say Yes or No to them. If the Times were to abolish that page of dull and unintelligent correspondence which has confronted the eye of the reader for months, and return to the legitimate newspaper enterprise in which it has excelled in the past and may excel once more, its readers and admirers would be extremely comforted.

At a meeting of the London Esperanto Club, the other evening, a number of kantoj and deklamoj—in other words songs and recitations—were given, and among the latter was "Konsilo de Hamleto." Our readers may be interested to see the effect of Hamlet's advice to the players:

O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings, who, for the most part, are capable of nothing but inexplicable dumb-shows and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant; it out-herods Herod: pray you, avoid it.

translated into Esperanto:

Mi farigas furioza en la omimo, kiam ia sanego denshara bubo dissiras la pasion en pecajn en verajn afonojn, kaj tondras en la orelojn de la popolamesa publiko, kiu ordinare komprenas tuksi mu sensacajn pantomimojn kaj bruon. Mi sentas tiam fortan disiron bone traboston tiam bubon pro lia bruado: li volas nepre esti pli tirano ol la tirano mem. Mi petas vin, evitu tion ci!

A letter of great historical interest will be offered for sale shortly by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson. It is the Order for the Massacre of Glencoe. The Scottish chiefs, it will be remembered, were commanded by a Proclamation issued in August 1691, to take the oath of allegiance to the king and queen by January 1, 1692, and many of them did so. Amongst those who were late (waiting for the consent of James II., who only sent it from St. Germain in December) were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, and the submission of the aged chief was not given, owing to stress of weather—and, it is alleged, difficulties placed in his way by those in authority—until January 6. Orders had been issued to give no quarter to the recalcitrants and the Macdonalds of Glencoe were to be extirpated. The commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland transmitted the order to the Governor of Fort William, who had it conveyed to Major Robert Duncanson of the Argyll Regiment. He sent the letter in question to Captain Campbell of Glenlyon, also of the Argyll Regiment, which was to do the bloody work.

The letter reads as follows: "You are hereby ordered to fall upon the rebels, the Macdonalds of Glenco, and to putt all to the sword under seventy. You are to have a special care that the old fox and his sons do not escape your hands. You are to secure all the avenues, that no man escape. This you are to putt in execution at fyve of the clock precisely; and that time, or very shortly after it, I will strive to be at you with a stronger party. If I do not come to you at fyve, you are not to tarry for me, butt to fall on. This is by the King's speciall commands, for the good and safety of the countrey, that these miscreants be cutt off root and branch. See that this be put in excution without fear or favour, or you may expect to be dealt with as one not true to King nor countrey, nor a man fitt to carry commission in the King's service. Expecting ye will not faill in the fullfilling herof, as you love yourselfe, I subscryve this with my hand at Ballacholis, 12th Feb., 1692.—R. DUNCANSON."

A number of autographs and historical documents will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge on the first and second days of next week. The letters include twenty-five by Dr. Johnson, chiefly addressed to Mrs. Piozzi and printed in her "Letters to and from the late Samuel Johnson"; a series of letters written by Lord Beaconsfield, and epistles penned by such a variety of persons as John Wesley and Mrs. Siddons, Edmund Kean and Joseph Hume, James Boswell and Mary Robinson ("Perdita"). The signed documents bear the signatures of, amongst others, Napoleon, Louis XVI., Marlborough, and Voltaire.

On the 23rd inst. Messrs. Sotheby will sell the library of the late Mr. Samuel Eyres Wilson, of Bedford Square. Mr. Wilson had a great many sporting books and works illustrated by Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Leech, and other satirical artists. He also collected first editions of Dickens, Fielding, Smollett, Defoe, Sterne, Tom D'Urfey, and other early authors. Amongst the books illustrated by Cruikshank are The English Spy, by Blackmantle, Carey's Life in Paris, and Egan's Life in London (1821), and of those with plates by Rowlandson we have first editions of the Tours of Doctor Syntax in Search of the Picturesque, in Search of Consolation, and in Search of a Wife. Dickens is represented by first editions of nearly all his works and D'Urfey by, of course, his Pills to Purge Melancholy. First editions of Tom Jones, Joseph Andrews and other of Fielding's works will be sold, and also first editions of all of Smollett's works:

"How the branch associations can help the Library Associations" was the title of a paper read at the last meeting of the Library Association. The subject of the paper, however, was, How the Association can help the branches. It was preceded by one suggesting alterations in the "Library Association Record" (Mr. Shaw, Liverpool). The devolution of the control of the Association is necessary for its well-being. London must be equalised with the branch associations, and a central executive appointed. At present it is impossible for the majority of provincial members some distance from London to attend council meetings (Mr. Savage, Wallasey; and Mr. McKnight, Chorley).

It is impracticable to give any authoritative opinion in "the Record" on matters of current interest, as the council of the Association is composed of members with a multiplicity of opinions (Mr. Wyndham-Hulme, Patent Office Library). And an individual editor would create an individual opinion, which could not possibly be the opinion of the council as a whole. The broadcast circulation of the minutes would be an impolitic movement. The extension of the teaching facilities enjoyed by London assistants to the provinces is under discussion, and no doubt will be effected shortly (Mr. Jast, Croydon). The official publication is a record of the transactions of the Association, and if it were desirable it is financially impossible to make it into a smart journal (Mr. Hopwood, Patent Office Library). A resolution (Mr. Kettle, Guildhall) was carried to the effect that the council should consider the suggestions contained in the papers and report at the annual conference.

LITERATURE

ROBBIE

The Poetical Works of Robert Burns. With Life and Notes by WILLIAM WALLACE. (Chambers, 3s. 6d.)

IN some respects this is an excellent popular edition of Burns, in others a very indifferent one. The book would have given less offence to the fastidious taste if the illustrations had been omitted. They are extremely sentimental and they lack character. Apparently the artists have accepted it as a duty to be literal. The passage

Yestreen when to the trembling string
The dance gaed thro' the lighted ha' has an exceptionally fine pictorial quality, which is only mocked by a picture of fiddlers, dancers and an ill-conditioned shepherd "grouching" in a corner with a dog at his feet. The Auld Mare and The Twa Dogs are terrible examples of what illustrations should not be. An absurd literalness characterises the picture to the lines:

We twa hae paid'l in the burn
Frea mornin' sun till dine?

The same remark applies to "Blythe Bessie in the milking shiel."

O my luv's like a red, red rose is illustrated by a rustic damsel leaning over a hedge to pin a buttonhole to her lover's coat. The silliest picture in the book is that which has for legend the opening line of a spirited lyric:

Last May a braw wooer cam' doon the lang glen,
And sair wi' his love he did deave me.

Such pictures give force to the frequently made criticism that the popularity of Burns is in great measure due to an interpretation lacking completely the esprit, humour, wit, point, and energy that were his best characteristics. And glancing over the explanations of words and phrases that are deemed to be necessary we cannot but realise that Scotland has changed utterly since the poet's day and generation. Then the Scotch were a poor and frugal agricultural people. Industry and economy were necessities of existence to them. But now Glasgow is London hopelessly vulgarised; Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Perth, and other large towns approximate closely in character to the great provincial towns of England; clerks and factory hands have supplanted the agricultural classes; and how are the town and country young ladies who, from head to foot, wear scarcely any article that is not cheap and machine-made, to understand that when Burns wrote, clothes were nearly all hand-made? Board schools, too, have taught the poorest to speak a bastard English that must make the poet incomprehensible. In the days of Burns the following was a realistic picture of the cottage life:

There sat a bottle in a bole
Ayont the ingle low,
And ay she took the tither souk
To drouk the stourie tow.

The verses are full of a spinning and weaving that have either passed away or changed completely in character:

My mither sent me to the loom,
To warp a plaiden wab
But the weary, weary warping o't
Has gart me sigh and sab.

In the "Cotter's Saturday Night" the good wife dates her cheese for the time "sin lint was i' the bell." A song is addressed to "the lassie wi' the lint-white locks." Questions might be indefinitely multiplied, but where are the fields of flax that would render such references intelligible to the young people of to-day? Again, when Burns wrote it was the most usual thing in the world for both youths and maidens "to take the shearing" in harvest, but the successors of those whom he addressed are clerks and shopmen if men, milliners and dressmakers if girls. The "auld clay biggin'" has been pulled down and a small villa built in its place. And in the genteeler Scotland that has arisen in place of the old, people neither eat nor drink as they did in the poet's time. "Halesome parritch" is a food suffering an undeserved decline in popularity, yielding place, it is believed, to cheap tinned meats and white bread. If the "chieftain of the puddin' race" is eaten it is only out of sentiment. And where are the drinks over which Burns waxed enthusiastic? If Willie brewed a peck o' maut to-day he would be had up for keeping a shebeen! The "reaming swats" and the "Tippeny" have yielded place to ale from Alloa and Burton and Tam o' Shanter's "usquebagh" certainly differed from all and every kind of "Scotch" now on the market. Yet these external changes only symbolise one that is deeper. The aggregated population of towns have imitated the greater freedom of English manners. He would be vowed a Rip Van Winkle who now insisted upon the sanctity of the Sabbath or expressed a prejudice against "hunkering," objected to "human hymns" or refused to be accompanied in his singing by a kistfu' o' whistles. If Burns could be the one traveller to return he would not know his own country. He would find even his beautiful and poetic streams defaced and polluted, and the holiday-maker in possession of the glen and the heather. In face of these changes the popularity of Burns affords a high testimony to his adherence to those truths that depend on no change of manner. We can say as much after making a most liberal discount for the bleat and sentimentalism which compose so large a part of this popularity. There is no discrimination in the worship of a Burns club; indeed we are afraid it is often directed to those aspects of his poetry that are of least value in the eyes of the true admirer.

TUDOR REVELS

Notes on the History of the Revels Office under the Tudors. By E. K. CHAMBERS. (Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.)

ATTENTION has lately been called to the Office of the Revels in the time of Queen Elizabeth owing to the unfortunate theory put forward in the Clarendon Press edition of the works of Lyly that that impecunious dramatist not only expected the Mastership, but was actually, from 1585 onwards, the Clerk Comptroller. This hypothesis, which, as Mr. Chambers remarks, "runs through the whole of Mr. Bond's elaborate biography of Lyly," and forms the basis of many of its conclusions, can be shown to be wrong, "since it so happens that the tenure, not only of the Clerk Comptrollership, but of every post on the Revels establishment is clearly traceable to the end of Elizabeth's reign, and that there is no room for Lyly." To have put this point beyond doubt was worth a thin book such as Mr. Chambers has here written, but his narrative, though perhaps rather needlessly detailed and minute, possesses considerable interest in its own right. From the reign of Henry VII. onwards notices of Court revels are frequent, and Mr. Chambers enables us to follow the fortunes of the successive masters, sergeants, yeomen, and clerk comptrollers, and to form an estimate of their incomes and even, in some cases, of their characters. Among the Burghley papers are several reports drawn up with a view to a re-organisation of the Revels Office, which like many Utopias make it possible to guess pretty closely what were the actual customs from which the would-be reformers took their start. One of the worst of these customs was that of keeping the creditors of the Office waiting for years for their money, a bad system for which they must presumably have recouped themselves by charging the highest possible prices. Among the recurring difficulties of the Office was that of preventing the fashionable participants in any revels at Court from retaining the costumes supplied to them as their own perquisites, while the spectators seem to have expected to be allowed to scramble for anything that could be carried off, presumably as mementoes. Notwithstanding these depredations the properties belonging to the Office were considerable, and the annual "airing" given to them seems to have been a great affair. During the greater part of the period with which Mr. Chambers deals the office of Master was not very highly paid; but latterly the official salary was so largely increased by the payments made by the players that the special allowance of one hundred pounds a year made to Tilney "for a better recompense" was not continued to his successor. Unfortunately this takes us beyond Mr. Chambers's period, but a full investigation of these payments may be looked for in the second volume of Mr. Greg's edition of Henslowe's Diary, and Mr. Chambers has done his share of the work with admirable completeness.

THE POETRY OF THE FAR EAST

Primitive and Medieval Japanese Texts. Translated into English, with Introductions, Notes and Glossaries. By FREDERICK VICTOR DICKINS. 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE fundamental documents of Japanese history and literature form a trilogy, which is now for the first time presented in completeness. The Kojiki or Ancient Annals, translated by Professor Chamberlain, the Nihongi or Chronicles of Japan by Dr. Aston, and the Manyōshū or Anthology of Poetry, never published before in English or any western tongue, are all the work of the first sixty years of the eighth century of the Christian era. With them Japanese literature begins; and, so far as we can see, with them it ends. Mr. Dickins, in a very interesting Introduction, writes:

In modern Japanese the characters (ideographs) representing the Japono-Chinese words, forming now two-thirds and ever forming more of the vocabulary, must be seen to be understood; the sound alone does not give the sense. Thus the development of the language in the direction of imagery or rhetorical expression was almost destroyed. One can neither be witty nor pathetic in the current language of educated Japan. . . . The modern literature of Japan, as such, is nearly worthless. . . . The modern language of Japan becomes more and more incapable of rendering, so as to be fully understood by a Japanese not already acquainted with some western language, a single sentence, not simply descriptive or narrative, of the literature properly so called of the Occident.

Mr. Dickins's brilliant attainments as a Japanese scholar are well known and have long been recognised. None less would have availed to accomplish, as he has done with splendid success, the task which he has set himself. The two hundred and sixty-four lays of which the Anthology consists are formidably difficult of interpretation. The text is very imperfect and calls for constant conjectural emendation of the compound Chinese script. Moreover, it was the strange habit of these old poets of the Far East to express as little as they could of what they had in their minds, apparently regarding suggestion as the true function of a poet. Now suggestion was probably vocal enough to their contemporaries, but must often fail to carry its message to a translator coming one thousand two hundred years after with a mind necessarily full of western associations. It is only necessary to read Sections XII. and XIII. of the Introduction, dealing with the "decoration" of Japanese verse—which finally destroyed what it was meant to adorn—to appreciate the almost insuperable difficulties arising from the "Pillow-words." Without going into the origin of this curious designation—in itself obscure—we may give Mr. Dickins's explanation or description of the terms so-called, and supplement it by subjoining a few typical instances:

Pillow-words may be described as fixed epithets belonging mainly to the word following them as a verbal decoration, but sometimes more or less necessary to the poem as well. Not unfrequently they are comparable with the Homeric epithet, but they lack all personification, and of the wealth of imagery characteristic of classical poetry the humbler verse of Japan cannot boast.

Some of these are conventional adjectives, like κελαυεφής ισόθεος, some are highly poetical, like "winter-prisoned" as an epithet of spring, but some have a significance wholly unique and confined to the poetry of the far East; for instance, a word meaning "wave-ride-seaweed" by a double quibble involves the meaning of "do not tell (my name)."

When they involve a word-play, or apply to part of a place-name or word, with perhaps a word-play thrown in, they cannot strictly be rendered at all; all that can be done is so to turn the Western version as to give the reader more or less the impression the original may have made on the Japanese hearer of the eighth century.

The pillow-word is often something like the title of the poem, and two alternative versions of its meaning have often hardly an idea in common. Of one passage Mr. Dickens writes (p. 202):

It may mean, "this is what the swift messenger of the skies, swift as a flying stone, hath told me"; or, "like a messenger, swift as a stone flying through the air, would I tell my thoughts"; or, better still, "this is what I say, climbing the rocky hills and swiftly mounting them to reach my love."

Nearly all the lays consist of lines of five syllables and of seven syllables alternately, with two hepta-syllabic lines at the end. It would be quite impossible to convey, except by copious extracts, any idea of the general character of the lays; but they have a character of their own, giving the impression of lovely and delicate workmanship, if one who is wholly unacquainted with Eastern literature may venture to express an opinion. One feels in them all an intense artistic sensibility which cannot fail to suggest the Greek Anthology, especially in the hands of the earlier anthologists. The later Byzantine poets aim at a richness of ornamentation which carries them farther and farther away from the poetry of the Far East. The Japanese dwell on external aspects of Nature with an ecstasy which is sometimes more impressive and intense than that of the Greek, by reason of that reticence and allusiveness to which we have referred as increasing the difficulties which the translator has to meet. But nothing can disguise the love of flowers, of life in the open air, the romantic spirit which came into Greek poetry with the Anthology, and which was by it handed on to the literature of Rome. We see by this collection that Japanese poetry, like that of the Greeks, went hand in hand with art. There are choral odes in the Greek dramatists which are uttered frescoes and bas-reliefs; there are many poems in Mr. Dickens's collection which can only be likened to engraved gems. One may indicate a few of the Lays as a good introduction to the rest: 2, 6, 22, 24, 27, 37, 53, 62, 64, 67, 92, 102, 105-III, 125, 127, 178, 183, 203, 204, 210, 211, 217, 224, 226, 227, 231, 240, 259, 263, and the three lays on p. 304, of which we give the last:

In Yashima
No wife to love I found me,
In Kasuga
Of blossoming spring-time minding
I heard there dwelt
A maiden passing fair,
Whose door I opened
That fair maid's door I opened,
And there I entered,
And foot to foot

And head to head embraced her
My arms embracing
Her, her arms embracing
Me, we lay there,
And so we slumbered sweetly,
Till that the cock crew,
And from the moorland border
The pheasant screamed,
And dawn of day announced,
sweet,
Ere half my tale,
My tale of love was told thee.

Mr. Dickens compares:

O Cressida! but that the busy day,
Waked by the lark, hath roused the ribald crows,
And dreaming night will hide our joys no longer,
I would not from thee.

We may offer one more extract:

Book II. Part ii.

During the residence at the Palace of Ohotsu in Afumi.
18.

By one of the Ladies of the Court on the ascent to heaven of the Sovran.

Earthly and mortal
My Lord I may not follow
On high ascended,
And, far from him divided,
Each morn my tears
Each even flow my tears,
From him wide sunder'd—

Were I a jewel worn,
Or any vestment,
I should be still unparted
From whom I love
My Lord whom in a vision
But yesternight I saw.

These extracts will show how pure and vigorous is the diction of Mr. Dickens. Such is it through his whole work; there is no affectation of archaism or Wardour Street English, hardly a word not to be found in modern poetry. It is this candour and sincerity, as of one who loves and respects his subject, that enables us to read without any sense of weariness a considerable body of poetry which, though it never can rise very high by reason of the absence of personification which characterises Turanian speech, yet never fails to please, partly by its peculiar quality, but partly also by its interesting position in time and place. None can approach without a feeling of deep interest and eager curiosity a body of literature which arose twelve centuries ago in the Far East between the Caspian Sea and the Northern shores of the Eastern Pacific at a period of the world as near to Callimachus and Theocritus as to Tennyson and Browning, a good deal nearer to the "Garden" of Meleager than to the "Golden Treasury" of Palgrave.

Now and then we catch an echo, of course quite fortuitous, of an ancient or modern song. With the above, for instance, Mr. Dickens aptly compares Anacreon's ἐγὼ χιτῶν γενόμεν

ὅπως αἶε φέρησιν με;

and somewhat similar, but warmer in the one and somewhat gross in the other, is the sentiment in Tennyson's "Miller's Daughter" and Ovid's Amores, ii. 15. Again, by lay 94 we are reminded of the nightingale in the celebrated Ode in the Oed. Col. of Sophocles, and lay 180 has the very counterpart of "Shule Agra":

I sold my rock, I sold my reel,
To buy my love a sword of steel.

Mr. Dickens has also translated in vol. i. some short mediæval lays; the Preface to "The Garner of Japanese Verse Old and New"; the Mime of Takasago; and "The Story of the old Bamboo Wicker-worker," the earliest work of fiction in Japanese or any Ural-Altaic tongue.

Volume ii. is not for the general reader but for students of the Japanese language, containing the text of the Lays romanised, and a short grammar, with glossary and index.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

A QUEEN OF INDISCRETIONS

A Queen of Indiscretions. By G. P. CLERKE. Translated, with an Introduction, by FREDERICK CHAPMAN. (Lane, 21s. net.)

THIS book could not have been more aptly named, for Caroline of Brunswick, who was married to George IV., was much more truly a queen of indiscretions than ever she was Queen of England. And she possessed such genius for indiscretion that in the face of a complete system of espionage over her life she managed to preserve something of what is known as a good name and much sympathy. Sympathy, indeed, and pity are easily wasted upon her; and in his introduction, though it is an able piece of work, Mr. Chapman laments a little profusely her ill-usage by the Prince Regent, and treats her escapades with excuse and solemnity which would have fitted the case of a martyr or graced the elegy on a saint. Caroline of Brunswick was far from being either, though she knew the value of a pose which can play upon the sentimentality of a soft-hearted public—the pose of a woman whose woman's feelings have been outraged by a monarch, of a mother whose mother's heart has been broken by a council's edict of separation from her daughter. Mr. Chapman treats her, too, from the moral standpoint, and then hands must be lifted and shoulders shrugged in shocked amazement; for it may be said of her, as it was said of the renowned rabbit, that:

Although he has a pleasant face
His private life's a sad disgrace.

Such treatment is decorous for an injured Queen of England, but it clouds the vision of the merry queen of indiscretions with a kind of noble mist which her rogue's presence would have scattered with a smile.

For Caroline of Brunswick was essentially what Lady Fanshawe, that charming diarist, would have called a "hoiting girl"; that is to say, she was a girl of immense vitality, a pretty wit and no refinement. After certain escapades at the Court of Brunswick—the fun of which probably compensated in a measure for the loss of reputation which they entailed—when she was beginning to weary of the poverty of her home and the wrangles between her father's wife and her father's mistress, both of whom lived in the palace, the English Ambassador came forward with the proposal that she should become the wife of the future King of England, a man who in extravagance and feature was the preux-chevalier of Europe. True, in character and attainments he showed unmistakable signs of being the son of a man who became an idiot; but he made her Queen of England, and only afflicted her with his presence for a very brief space of time, after which she rioted on the Continent, fêted as a queen, with the £30,000 a year which the nation allowed her.

It is principally of the years which she spent in Italy that Professor Clerici treats; the years during which she did as she liked, and during which evidence was being slowly gathered with official solemnity and precision for her ultimate divorce. Rabelais would have done justice to the situation: the staid ambassador, James Harris, Earl of Malmesbury, acting as mentor to the hoyden of the little German court in such matters as the more frequent change of lingerie, and trying to create in her some shadow of the stately queen which he wanted her to become; the journey to England and her royal lover, and the mischief of the girl who must needs walk about with a handsome officer on deck during the whole night; and that marriage and her swift freedom. What could be madder than her behaviour on her wild progresses with Bartolomeo Pergami, while the careful Baron Ompteda kept her under his austere surveyance, and noted down minutely the reports of her mischief and her fancy for lightness of apparel; or more theatrical than her return to England and her attempt to enter the Abbey at the coronation of her sometime husband? And then at length her trial took place before the sober law-lords and peers of the realm while in her hand she held some tremendous secret which could be known only to the king and to herself, which was never revealed, and which kept the king in perpetual uneasiness until death called her from him.

Caroline's life was an astounding romance, and though it is a little clouded in the sumptuous volume before us by sentiment and pathos which are not needed, the account is ably given. Mr. Chapman especially lends colour to her adventures in his clever introduction by the way in which he shows how, for all her genius for mischief and for all her tricks and wantonness, Caroline never lost a curious charm which made her buoyancy and reckless spirit lovable to the last. The numerous illustrations, which are admirably reproduced from contemporary portraits and prints, would alone make the book of interest and value.

THE SALON OF MADAME GEOFFRIN

The Friends of Voltaire. By S. G. TALLENTYRE. (Smith, Elder, 9s. net.)

IN the seventeenth century the French woman of high rank was the patron of polite learning and the companion of the king. In the eighteenth century, the more energetic and ambitious French woman of the upper middle classes ruled in the salon and in the palace. When she appeared the French mind had already lost its poetic qualities, its imaginativeness, its passionateness and its sense of the infinite, and these she replaced by the secondary qualities of radiant common sense, breadth and versatility of interests, and universal sympathy. In politics she was a force that made for disorder, and as the distinction of noble birth was the only distinction to which she could not pretend, she was, in this respect, an envious egalitarian. In literature, science and philosophy she was an urbane and wholesome influence. She had that kind of taste which Edward Fitzgerald defined as the feminine of genius. Her peculiar power of attraction resided in the intellectual quality of the charm which she exercised. She dressed her mind as exquisitely as she arrayed her body. Nothing that interested men was indifferent to her, and she accompanied her lover in the pursuit of knowledge as ardently as she accompanied him in the pursuit of entertainment. In the art of conversation, especially, she was the most brilliant of women. Originating nothing, she collaborated in everything. Ideas presented to her in a clear and agreeable form, she re-expressed with a grace and vivacity of manner that made them the current coin of thought of the civilised world. The Café Procope and the Café Gradot ceased to play in French literature the part that Wills's and Button's played in English literature. The French bourgeoisie, more affable, sympathetic and generous than the great lady of the period, detached the men of letters of the middle of the eighteenth century from the coffee houses, and converted her drawing-room into the centre of the intellectual life of Europe. There, in the absence of any difference of rank between the hostess and her guests, the new spirit of equality was fostered and exercised, until it passed, almost insensibly, from the field of conversation into the field of literature.

Mme. de Tencin had already gathered about her, for political purposes, some of the leading men of the age—Fontenelle, Montesquieu and Bolingbroke, Marivaux, Helvetius and Marmontel—when Mme. Geoffrin entered her salon. "Do you know what Geoffrin has come here to do?" said the Cardinal's sister to a friend. "To take an inventory of my effects." So, in fact, she had. Rich, witty, bountiful and good-tempered, with a genius for managing men, Mme. Geoffrin became in a very few years a great power in the world of French literature, and as soon as she arrived at this position a change took place in the thought of the age. She took over the effects of Mme. de Tencin's salon, but she arranged them in a way that would have displeased that hard, brilliant lady of the old school. Her predecessor was a stateswoman, she was a revolutionary. "You know," she said to Fontenelle, "there is reason in what I say." "Yes," said the nephew and pupil of Corneille, taking out his watch and looking at it; "but your reason is, like my watch, in advance of the right time."

That, however, was just the sort of reason that was then beginning to obtain in France. Scattered groups of men of the younger generation were trying to think in advance of orthodox opinion, and were casting about for a common meeting-place and a means of common action. Mme. Geoffrin placed her house and a great part of her wealth—a hundred thousand crowns—at their service, and Diderot and D'Alembert, the son of Mme. de Tencin, then formally instituted in the "Encyclopædia" that movement of enlightenment in which the moderate forces of progress were massed and directed. A little about everything and nothing about one thing only, so the Encyclopædists talked and so they wrote. There was no more system in the work that Diderot edited than in the conversation that Mme. Geoffrin guided. The men of the new school conspired with the Government against the power of the Pope, and advocated in an indefinite way certain measures of social reform, but they had not, like Rousseau, a clear and radical political philosophy to establish which the whole order of society had to be destroyed. D'Alembert, an eminent geometrician, harsh and overbearing in argument but sprightly and amiable in ordinary talk, was inspired by a belief in science as the main instrument of progress. Diderot, an extraordinarily versatile man of letters and an inexhaustible fountain of ideas, was too much of a sophist to be a thinker. Helvetius and D'Holbach, the extreme writers of the school in matters of metaphysics, reduced the materialism of Hobbes to a desperate and melancholy view of the world upon which no gospel of regeneration could be based. Turgot, the most masculine genius and noblest character of all, disliked every democratic form of government, while other frequenters of Mme. Geoffrin's salon were, like Buffon, the great naturalist, and Grimm, the German critic, but little interested in the machinery of the State.

One trait, however, the Encyclopædists had in common with Rousseau, which none of Mme. Geoffrin's foreign visitors—Gibbon, Hume, Horace Walpole, Galiani and others—possessed. This was enthusiasm. "Posterity is merely a possibility and we are realities," said Galiani, a brilliant Italian abbé who combined Machiavellianism in politics with epicureanism of the lower sort in life. "Why should realities put themselves out for possibilities?" Few of his audience agreed with him. The French writers were then animated by that breath of generous aspiration in regard to the future of the human race which inspired Condorcet, just before he mounted the guillotine in the days of the Terror, to compose his work on "The Progress of the Human Mind." The French intellect in the later part of the eighteenth century had not the cold intellectual quality of the English intellect of the same period. It was suffused with feeling. The Encyclopædists were more deeply moved by a regard for humanity than many of the clergy of their age were by a regard for God. Their humanitarianism amounted to a religion, though sometimes, it must be admitted, it affected them in strange ways. Touched by the new enthusiasm, Helvetius, for instance, a professed atheist, who had enriched himself by farming the taxes and grinding the poor, reformed his manner of life, married, and retired to the country and there tried to make all men happy by writing a book to prove that they were actuated entirely by the most selfish motives. Diderot, too, the founder of the movement, was the author of one of the most licentious novels in French literature, and a man so wanting in feeling in regard to his wife and child that even Mme. Geoffrin grew angry with him, and, as he said, "treated him like a beast."

But, after all, it is in the bright side of the French movement of enlightenment that the genuine character of the men who promoted it, is displayed. The generosity of soul that inspired it, the force of mind and strength of will that sustained it and brought it to a triumphant conclusion, these are the memorable things. The dark side of the movement was only a reflection of the darkness of the age against which the light-bearers struggled. In her studies of the writers of the Encyclopædic school Miss Tallentyre rightly keeps to the bright side. Her book is an agreeable contexture of anecdotes, epigrams and light biographical sketches. The works of the Encyclopædists are not discussed at any length or with any critical power. Few of them, it is true, now merit much attention. The voluminous "Encyclopædia" itself has become one of the most unreadable of books. That is the worst of movements of enlightenment: in them good literature gets mingled with perishable science, and the dead science drags the literature down into dust and oblivion.

A HISTORY WITH A PURPOSE

The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands. By J. ELLIS BARKER. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. ELLIS BARKER, taking the view of Dionysius of Halicarnassus that "History is Philosophy teaching by example," has apparently been looking round for an awful warning which may induce the British people to see the error of their ways. He finds that the story of the rise and decline of the Netherlands has been largely neglected by English writers, though the material is ample and requires only a knowledge of Dutch to make it easily available. Motley did not carry his account of the Dutch Republic and the United Netherlands beyond 1619, and Motley apart, the only histories accessible to the average English reader are Grattan's published in 1830, Davies's published in 1841-4, and Thorold Rogers's published in 1888. In Dutch there are what Mr. Barker calls "the monumental and indispensable works of Bor, Aitzema, Wagenaar," and in addition to reading them he has consulted some two thousand volumes and pamphlets in Dutch, German, French, English, Italian, and Spanish. No praise can therefore be too high for the thoroughness with which he has discharged the task he set himself. From the point of view of many of his readers, however, it will be felt that in this very capable book he has been concerned not mainly to tell the story and point the moral, but has deliberately searched for evidence in favour of a political and economic theory. Indeed he confesses as much when he says that he has deserted the broad path trodden by modern historians and elected not to crowd his canvas with elaborate details which obscure causes and consequences—a criticism on the methods of others which it is necessary for Mr. Barker to make in order to justify the writing of "a history with a purpose." "It is meant," says Mr. Barker, "to be a history of cause and effect, not a lengthy and wearisome account of battles, sieges and negotiations; for I believe with Polybius that 'the most useful part of history is the knowledge of what passed before and after every great event, and especially the causes that produced it.'" If we cannot all share Mr. Barker's view as to the superiority of his methods over those of Motley and Gibbon and Macaulay and Froude and Green, we can at least commend the honesty of his explanation and the quality of the work he has given us.

And what is it Mr. Barker seeks to prove? That the Netherlands grew rich by thrift, by industry, by education; that they were the pioneers in material and scientific progress and of liberty, and that their shipping and their colonisation made them in the seventeenth century to the world in general what Great Britain is in the twentieth. He certainly draws a parallel, which, as his business is that of advocate rather than judge, must be regarded as striking.

Dutch wealth and pretension naturally created enemies for the Netherlands. Louis XIV., with some justification, no doubt, resented their attitude towards France, and sought a pretext for attack. To conquer the country meant his own aggrandisement, and when he had induced Charles II. of England to accept his gold and become his creature, the way seemed clear. The Netherlands, in their self-satisfied belief that wealth was power, had failed to give heed to their defences. Self-government had been carried to an extreme which meant that every province was a law unto itself. Party spirit ran high, and when the hour of trouble came democracy proved itself helpless in the teeth of French organisation and leadership. The army and the navy had been reduced to a point which almost invited attack, and free trade, it is contended, left the various industries equally defenceless against the invasion of foreign rivals. England and France had both set themselves, by tariffs and navigation acts, to break up Dutch supremacy in trade. Whilst the enemies of the Netherlands were active the States were torn by political dissension. Mr Barker is as strong in his denunciation of party government as in his plea for unity of aim and loyalty to the whole rather than to the part. He finds that popular government is a delusion and a snare. "It has never existed during historical times, it exists nowhere at present and it never can and never will exist." Popular government, he says, means party government; and party government means government by a few interested and irresponsible wirepullers and agitators. His account of the effect of the party régime on the fortunes of the Netherlands is a scathing condemnation of the sectional and individual interests which sacrificed the States to their own selfish profit. They rendered union between the States for common purposes impossible, and the Netherlands were saved from annihilation only by the strong hand and wise head of one man, William III. of Orange. The people rose against the politicians, insisted on William being made Stadtholder, were saved from the worst consequences of the folly of their political leaders, and when William's influence was removed by his transference to England, sank back into the rut of materialism from which he rescued them.

The upshot of it all is, of course, from Mr Barker's point of view, that Great Britain will go the way of the Netherlands unless she applies the lessons they provide. She must give up free trade, strengthen her army and navy, federate the Empire and send the party politician about his business:

Unless Great Britain and the British Colonies be soon organised and united in accordance with modern requirements, the history of the Netherlands may repeat itself, and Great Britain may lose her power, her colonies, her industries, her trade, her shipping, and her wealth to other nations.

The trouble is that Mr Barker's book will itself divide men into parties: tariff reformers will applaud its conclusions, whilst free traders will say that the colours are laid on thickly for the very party purpose which Mr Barker denounces. The story of the Netherlands which Motley began is a profoundly interesting one and we wish Mr Barker had seen his way to continue it down to the eighteenth century without making it the vehicle of political propaganda.

VERSE AND POETRY

Out of the Silence. By JAMES RHOADES. (Lane, 1s. net.)

New Poems. By WILLIAM H. DAVIES. (Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.)

It would be difficult to find any serious fault with "Out of the Silence." It is true that occasionally the author becomes ungrammatical, as in the phrase "no toy Like as men fashion for an infant's joy." Occasionally, too, he seems not to understand the meaning of the words he uses, as, for instance, "Say who . . . Enableth foot and finger, ear and eye?" At times he is pleonastic and puerile, as when he writes "Viewless, inaudible, to eye and ear." But we cannot feel too sore against him for this last line: a rhyme had to be found for the words "clear" and "dear," and what could be more appropriate and correct than "ear"? The captious reader might also discover lines in which Mr. Rhoades, without making a downright linguistic mistake, uses phrases which are not quite idiomatic at the present day, such as "What erst was hurtful . . . Will . . . Turn to innocuous or beneficent." Still, as we have said, little censure of a positive kind can be passed on the poem. But where is its merit? "Out of the Silence," the author tells us in the preface, "while structurally conforming to the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, is directly opposite in its teaching." He is a poor poet who has not his own ideas of form, and a poor controversialist who has to borrow the method of his opponent. Omar, as we know him in English, is by no means always blasphemous or rebellious, but he is always familiar. He is ready, as has been said, to curse God with one drink and love Him with the next. Then why use the metre of FitzGerald as the vehicle for a somewhat lengthy utterance on the part of the Deity and put into His mouth things which, by the force of association, have become unreadable in FitzGerald's stanza? If the author had any rhythmical originality, he might manage to produce the impression that he was writing from his heart and had a sense of the appropriateness of form and theme. But originality is precisely what he lacks. His verse is either characterless or else it is an echo of FitzGerald's music.

Mr. William H. Davies, on the other hand, is a poet whose work ought to have attracted much more attention than it has yet received. "The Soul's Destroyer," which was published last year, had not a fair chance of becoming known and appreciated, owing to two causes. In the first place, it was not issued by a publisher, but offered for sale by the author at an address in the Borough. Secondly, a large proportion of the reviewers who noticed the book, excited by Mr. Davies's fearless portrayal of life in London lodging-houses and public bars, treated him as a poet of the slums or a follower of James Thomson. Because he is sufficiently frank to write of intemperance and squalor, they overlooked the fact that he is poet enough to sing of love and beauty. In reality his spirit is much more Wordsworthian than Villonesque. Sincerity and confidence are the keynote and dominant of all his poetry. It is not possible to imagine him writing anything in a posing or histrionic vein, or, as they say, for the sake of writing. How many of our younger makers of verse would have had the sincerity to include the following lines in a passage describing the delight of returning to the country after years of exile in a dismal neighbourhood of London:

Let others praise thy parts, sweet Nature; I,
Who cannot know the barley from the oats,
Nor call the bird by note, nor name a star,
Claim thy heart's fulness through the face of things?

So he wrote in "The Soul's Destroyer," and in this new volume we have evidence of the sincere delight which he has taken in the observation of birds and flowers and changing aspects of the woods and meadows. These subjects may receive fuller treatment in future and come to be an important element in his work. But at present we still prefer him when he writes of men and women, or when he takes a fancy suggested to him by nature to typify a human emotion:

As butterflies are but winged flowers,
Half sorry for their change, who fain,
So still and long they dwell on leaves,
Would be thought flowers again—

E'en so my thoughts, that should expand
To grow to higher themes above,
Return like butterflies to lie
On the old things I love.

He is eminently a poet of humanity. In "New Poems" there is the same healthy strain of humour which appeared in his first book, the same occasional grimness—seldom however amounting to bitterness—the same sudden and unusual pathos, as when, in a passage proclaiming the universality of beauty, he mentions the ocean:

cruel though it be,
That will not leave the poor drowned boy unmoved,
But cuts with rocks that face his mother loved.

While this volume shows a considerable advance on the first in the matter of technique, there are still a few roughnesses and obscure passages which might be altered in the next edition.

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY 19, 1907

EDUCATION SUPPLEMENT

BLACKIES' LIST.

A FIRST GREEK COURSE

By H. W. D. ROUSE, Litt.D., Head Master of Perse Grammar-school, Cambridge. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d. net. [Just ready.]
Compiled as part of a Reformed School Curriculum.

EXCERPTA BREVIA

By W. H. S. JONES and R. PARKER SMITH. Crown 8vo., cloth, 1s. 6d. [Just ready.]
Part I consists of short passages suitable for learners on their first introduction to a Latin text after a year's course. Part II. contains passages which throw light upon Roman history, arranged in chronological order.

THE LATIN HEXAMETER

Hints for Sixth Forms. Interleaved for Student's Own Notes. By S. E. WINBOLT, M.A. 2s.
This book is in class use at Eton and Christ's Hospital.

FRENCH READINGS IN SCIENCE

Selections from Scientific and Technical Writers. Arranged and Edited for the use of Students by De V. PAYEN-PAYNE. 3s. 6d.

LA FRANCE MONARCHIQUE.

By G. H. POWELL, B.A., and O. B. POWELL, B.A. 6s.
This handsome Volume aims at presenting a continuous picture of French life and thought from the C. sides to the Revolution in a series of representative selections from forty of the most important memoirists in French literature of the period.

A FIRST YEAR'S FRENCH BOOK ON THE ORAL METHOD

An Illustrated French Course on the New Method. By A. H. SMITH, M.A. Crown 8vo., cloth, 1s. 6d.

FIRST STEPS IN COLLOQUIAL FRENCH

By ALBERT THOUAILLE, M.A. A Conversational French Course on the New Method. With Brief Systematic Grammar and Phonetic Vocabulary. Cr. 8vo., cloth. Illustrated. 2s.

UN PETIT VOYAGE A PARIS

By MARGUERITE NINET. With Twelve Full-page Illustrations and Vocabulary. 1s. 6d.
A brightly written account of a first visit of the two children to Paris, by the Author of "The French Picture Primers."

FRENCH CLASSICS.

Cloth, 4d. each.
Examples of the best Prose and Verse from the "Chanson de Geste" to DAUDET and PAUL BOURGET

GERMAN CLASSICS.

Cloth, 6d. each.
Selections from the principal German Authors in both Poetry and Prose.

ENGLISH POETRY. FOR THE YOUNG

Cloth, 1s.
Selected by S. E. WINBOLT, M.A. of Christ's Hospital.
Containing a chronological arrangement of English Verse, sufficient for a four-years' course.
In use at Eton College, Repton, Manchester Grammar-school, Rugby, etc. etc.

LATIN TEXTS.

Cloth, 6d. net or 8d. net.
Edited by W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D., Prof. POSTGATE, Prof. REID, etc. etc.
The only Series that fulfils the conditions suggested by the Classical Association as to the improved teaching of Latin, and containing no Notes

BLACKIES' ENGLISH TEXTS.

8vo., cloth, 6d. each.
Including all leading Prose Authors from Sir THOMAS MORE to CHARLES DICKENS.

SMALLER ENGLISH CLASSICS.

Paper, 2d.; cloth, 3d.
The favourite English Poets from CHAUCER to TENNYSON and BROWNING.

SYSTEMATIC INORGANIC CHEMISTRY FROM THE STAND-POINT OF THE PERIODIC LAW

A Text-book for Advanced Students. By R. M. CRAVEN, D.Sc., and G. D. LANDER, D.Sc. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s. net.

A TEXT-BOOK OF ORGANIC CHEMISTRY

English Translation from the German of A. BERNTHSEN, Ph.D. Edited by J. J. SUDBOROUGH, Ph.D., D.Sc., F.I.C. New Edition. Revised to date. 674 pp., crown 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

A FIRST COURSE IN PRACTICAL BOTANY

By G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT, M.A., B.Sc., F.L.S., F.R.G.S. With over 150 Illustrations. 3s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS

By A. LEIGHTON. Containing Algebra up to Quadratics, and the substance of Euclid I. and III., with Similar Figures and Mensuration. Crown 8vo., cloth. 2s.

A NEW SHAKESPEARE FOR SCHOOLS.

THE PLAIN TEXT SHAKESPEARE

THE GREATER PLAYS. TEXT ONLY. NO NOTES.

Price 4d. each.

Messrs. BLACKIES' & SON, Ltd., have the pleasure to announce the publication under the above title of a New Edition of Shakespeare—Text only—at a moderate price.

The Text follows the well-known JUNIOR SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE, omitting everything undesirable in class-reading.

Please write for information regarding latest Educational Publications to BLACKIE AND SON, LIMITED, 50, OLD BAILEY, E.C.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s Publications.

THE NEW PHYSICS AND CHEMISTRY:

A Series of Popular Essays on Physical and Chemical Subjects. By W. A. SHENSTONE, F.R.S., Senior Science Master in Clifton College.

Large post 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

SCHOOLMASTER.—"In every way suitable for those whose knowledge of science is not very deep, but who are able to follow with intelligence a reasonably clever exposition. To such we cordially recommend the book."

NEW VOLUME OF THE "HISTORICAL SERIES FOR BIBLE STUDENTS."

OUTLINES OF BIBLICAL HISTORY AND LITERATURE.

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO 200 A.D.

By FRANK KNIGHT SANDERS, Ph.D., D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s,

"* These outlines enable the student to get at the Bible itself in a most helpful way, to realise vividly the story which it relates, supplements or develops, and to appreciate the various stages in the gradual development of the Israel which became the world's religious teacher." [Immediately.]

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF MARTIN'S "THE STONES OF PARIS."

In 1 vol. With many Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE STONES OF PARIS IN HISTORY AND LETTERS.

By BENJAMIN ELLIS MARTIN, and CHARLOTTE M. MARTIN.

[Immediately.]

"* A few copies of the two-volume edition are still to be had. Price 18s."

THE GREAT DAYS OF VERSAILLES. STUDIES FROM COURT LIFE IN THE LATER YEARS OF LOUIS XIV.

By G. F. BRADBY. With Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

STANDARD.—"Written with scholarly care and with a fine sense of historical perspective. . . . There is much in the picture which is of dramatic and abiding interest."

RICHARD III: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER REVIEWED IN THE LIGHT OF RECENT RESEARCH.

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S.

With a Portrait and Map. 10s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Our author is very careful to base all his facts on distinct authorities, and, so far as it is possible, on contemporary evidence; he writes so persuasively and so ingeniously that we are tempted to accept his version to the full."

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE NETHERLANDS. By J. ELLIS BARKER.

Author of "Modern Germany," etc. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. J. L. GARVIN, in the FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW, says: "There is nothing in any language like it, and when all is said, it remains one of the most striking additions recently made to the political library."

THE LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

New and Cheaper Edition. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Educational & Scientific Books

NEW AND SECOND-HAND

The Largest Stock in London of

SECOND-HAND SCHOOL, CLASSICAL, ELEMENTARY & ADVANCED SCIENTIFIC BOOKS

Mathematical, Theological, and Foreign Books

BOOKS FOR ALL EXAMINATIONS

ALL ENQUIRIES AS TO PRICES OF BOOKS ANSWERED

Keys and Translations. Books Bought

J. POOLE & CO.,

(Established 1854)

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

SPECIAL BARGAINS.

The following books in new condition can be sent carriage paid upon receipt of remittance for amounts named:

E. BOUTMY.—THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. A Study of their Political Psychology. (Published 16s.). 3s. 6d.

GOETHE'S LIFE, 1749-1832. By H. Dunster. With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols. in 1. (Published 21s.). 4s.

GUIZOT.—LIFE OF OLIVER CROMWELL. (Published 3s. 6d.) 2s. 6d.

KLUGE'S ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY OF THE GERMAN LANGUAGE. (Published 7s. 6d.) 3s. 6d.

STANFORD'S OCTAVO ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. 38 double-paged Coloured Maps. Half morocco, gilt edges. (Published 21s.). 9s.

STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY. 48 full-page Coloured Maps. Fifth Edition. 4to, half morocco, gilt edges. (Published 30s.). 10s.

LIFE OF EDWARD FITZGERALD. By T. Wright. 56 Illustrations. 2 vols. Art linen, gilt top. (Published 24s. net.) 10s. 6d.

LIFE OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. From His Boyhood to his Death in Samoa. By J. A. Hammerton. (Published 12s. 6d. net.) 7s. 6d.

CHARLES CANNON

NEW AND SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER,
36 St. Martin's Court,
Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

Books Bought. Best Prices Given.

EDUCATION SUPPLEMENT

JANUARY 19, 1907

RELIGION AND THE TEACHER IN SCHOOL

By J. H. YOXALL, M.P.

ONE cannot argue with a sentiment or disprove a prejudice; above all one cannot usefully controvert the sentiments and prejudices of conscientious worshippers in the Cowper temple, the Brompton Oratory, or the Halifax church. It would be Pharisaic to boast one's exemption, but, after all, there are grâces de l'état, which make for sweet reasonableness and enable one to comprehend and therefore pardon. Because I have been a teacher in Voluntary and Board Schools, and know the inwardness of the matter, I have been able to listen with patience and tolerance to both sides of a loud outcry during eleven long Parliamentary years. The outcry about teaching Religion in elementary schools, I mean; it is accepted that there is no "religious difficulty" for teachers in any other than elementary schools. But when I have said, as with brief default of patience I have said sometimes, that there is no real religious teaching difficulty in elementary schools either, it has been said to ears of unbelief or disappointment. "There is!" has been the response from one side. "Then there ought to be!" has been the cry from the other. It does not appear to suit anybody's book that there should be no "religious difficulty" in the teaching of elementary schools.

Of course to schemes of government and systems of faith the forms, degrees, and conditions of religious teaching maintained at public cost are an important matter; people and Peoples always have quarrelled over that, and perhaps in honesty and vitality people and Peoples always ought to quarrel over it; as a politician I could quarrel over it myself. In writing this I need tax nobody with insincerity nor call anybody hypocrite; though it is human to be inconsistent and self-deceptive, there are very few conscious hypocrites in the world. Neither the right nor the wrong in the present matter lies with Dr. Clifford or with Lord Halifax, it seems to me, though each in honesty battles for what seems to him the right, against what seems to him the wrong. Yet, as one who knows by practice and experience the true inwardness of the matter, regarded practically and not polemically, I declare that at the bottom of the huge, hollow sounding shell of uproar lies only the minutest kernel of solid fact.

"Rights of the parent!" "No tests for teachers!"—those are the war-cries. The floor of the parish church used to be the battlefield of the creeds; the battlefield is now the floor of the public elementary school. "If you will kindly keep out and leave it to us, all will be peace," says the teacher to the wranglers. But the wranglers cannot do that; at any rate, they will not. Yet what the teacher says is true—there is no practical difficulty about the religious teaching in elementary schools. I think it was Disraeli who said, in 1870, that the Cowper-Temple Clause would call into existence a new sacerdotal class—the Board School teachers to wit. With skill, and forbearance, and professional tact, with the approval of many parents and the explicit disapproval of next to none—above all, without any sacerdotal assumption—the Board and Council school teachers have made that latter-day prophecy come true; they have been priests and elders in religion to half the children of the land. With just as much skill, forbearance, and tact, amidst just as much approval and indifference, the teachers in Denominational schools have done their work. In the one case offence and occasions of offence to parents who are Churchmen, or Wesleyans, or Baptists, or what not, have been avoided, in the other case offence or occasions of offence to Nonconformists as a whole.

I have smiled—though tolerantly, I hope—when I have heard in the House of Commons and the House of Lords, a thousand times these last eleven years, the claim that parents must have the right to obtain for their children elementary-school teaching in the creeds the parents profess. I know that parents seldom or never have made that claim for themselves, do not now make the claim, and do not feel that they need make it. I know that Churchmen and Roman Catholics whose children attended Board and Council schools have been satisfied, have not been offended, and not once in a myriad cases have claimed the protection of the Conscience clause. I know that Nonconformists whose sons and daughters attended Church schools have hardly ever grumbled, have hardly ever withdrawn their children, and have often said of the teaching in the Creed, the Catechism, and the Duties there that "It won't do them any harm." And, further, I know that parents who attend neither Church nor Chapel, the Agnostic, Rationalistic, or Materialistic parents, have shown themselves Indifferentists in this matter, allowing their children to "learn religion" all the same. With proof and actuality, therefore, the teacher may say, "If you will only be quiet—if you will only leave it to me!"

"Admirable! Plain evidence of the common sense of the people when not stirred up by fanatics!" thinks the philosopher. "Horrible! Plain proof of the decay of religion in the land!" cry those sincere persons to whom he refers. "I wish you would all keep quiet," says the teacher, "and let me go on quietly with what I know is doing the children good. Come into my school and see for yourselves. It does not matter whether my school be provided or non-provided in this respect. Listen to the sweet and reverent singing of the morning hymn, note the hushed awe of the united prayer, hear the moral teaching conveyed in the lessons from the Bible or the Canons, enjoy the thanks of the Nunc Dimittis, the doxology at the close of the day. Matthew Arnold defined religion as 'morality touched with emotion'; don't drive us into secularism, don't wrest away the Book. Let me keep on impressing on the children, directly or indirectly, that Christianity is all one essentially, and real and abiding; no matter how churches and chapels may be ranked against each other outside. Let us go on touching morality with the religious emotions that English folk have felt for ages—leave us still free to hallow with supernal sanctions the plain and noble ethics we teach. Let me still, without cassock or white tie to mark me off from lay humanity, be a priest and a pastor to these little souls. Don't ask me to form them into Cadet Corps of Episcopalians or Wesleyans—don't think I am doing it now; I have never done it, it is done in no Protestant school, whether Voluntary or Council. This school is a nursery for Christians, not Sectarians; from whatever houses and with whatever creeds the children come to us, here they join in common Christianity and family prayer." Then, like the father in the "Cotter's Saturday Night,"

He wales a portion with judicious care;
And "Let us worship God!" he says with solemn air.

Now that is the attitude of the typical teacher towards this vexed question in elementary schools; the teachers who during the late discussions claimed liberty to "volunteer" to give denominational teaching did not claim liberty to proselytise. And it is an attitude which, in practice, one cannot better. For myself, I cannot see that it needs bettering, and I am sure that legislative and administrative attempts to better it will worsen it instead. "Right of entry" will worsen it, tests for teachers in Council schools will worsen it, ultra-ecclesiastical emphasis on what has been will worsen it, and so will any insistence on formal tests. In practice the use of formal preliminary tests is decaying; the recent dearth of teachers brought that about. A good deal is said, in political debates on this question, as to the necessity of tests in order to ensure sincerity and efficiency in religious teaching; but sincerity and efficiency cannot be proved in that way. In point of fact, teachers who do not wish to give, or are unable to give, instruction according to the views of a religious denomination do not apply for service in schools associated with that denomination; Protestant teachers do not seek to enter Roman Catholic schools, Nonconformist teachers do not apply for appointment to Church schools. Whether or no it is fair and wise that employment and promotion for the teachers as a body should be limited in that way is not the question I am discussing now; I am dealing with the positive value of tests. Over and above this act of selection or renunciation by a teacher, the managers of a Church school can exercise the following preliminary tests: they can inquire of a candidate if he was trained in a Church Training College, if he possesses the Archbishop's certificate in Divinity, if he is a Communicant, and if he is High Church or Low. Now a teacher may answer all those questions satisfactorily, and yet be, au fond, irreligious; formal preliminary tests are worse than useless, they are futile against deceit, and they positively invite deceit. Yet it was to conserve to managers of denominational schools the power to put these preliminary formal tests that the Act of 1902 prescribed four denominational managers to two representative managers on the committee of each denominational school. That provision lies like a worm of ruin at the root of that Act. If all the managers were appointed by the local authority and formal preliminary tests were not applied, there would still be the chief and only valid preliminary test remaining, that of the teacher's willingness to undertake the work. After all, the real test of a teacher's religious efficiency is his teaching, and the true guarantee of his sincerity is his life. To get a truly religious man or woman into the school is the desideratum. The best religious teaching is that which emanates like an aura from personality, from character and example as well as from precept, from zeal in the actual work joined to a sober, righteous and godly life.

The applicant for service in a Council school answers one preliminary test indirectly—he is willing to give the religious lessons which are customary in the school. But to him the real and subsequent tests, of efficient teaching joined to character and behaviour, apply as much as they do to teachers in denominational schools. All teachers in public elementary schools live and work under a fierce light of publicity; they are known and marked in the neighbourhood, the eyes of the children, the parents, the managers, the inspectors, and the neighbouring population are on them constantly, and there cannot be a better guarantee of sincerity of life and purpose than that. But formal preliminary tests, to maintain which the friends of Voluntary schools are risking the very existence of those schools, do not detect unfitness of life, inconsistency of character, or insincerity of purpose at all.

To me the conclusion seems to be that out of great zeal and little actual knowledge a monstrous pothole has arisen, over what in practice is a matter quite simple and small. The discussions during 1906 seem to show that the public as a whole would agree to the continuance of existing denominational schools as well. These denominational schools might be wholly managed by representatives of the public, and yet their denominational teaching be continued; because in the first place, the public managers would, almost without exception, "play fair," and, in the second place, only teachers prepared to give the denominational teaching would apply to work in these schools. Preliminary tests being useless, as I have shown, and not being applied; the management of the schools and appointment of teachers resting wholly in public hands; and the two principles of "public management of public money" and no "denominational tests in public schools" being thus satisfied; then the nation as a whole would be content that denominational teaching as at present should go on. A conscience clause for teachers could be enacted, and by administration over large areas due employment and promotion could be found for teachers unable to enter denominational schools.

MIDDLE-CLASS EDUCATION

NOTHING was more surprising last summer than the enormous output of letters provoked by the articles of Mr G. R. Sims in the Tribune on the Bitter Cry of the Middle Classes. They conclusively proved that the middle classes are a kind of Issachar between two burdens, and the hardest hit section of the community. The country practitioner or his equally ill-paid brother in the poorer suburbs, the small lawyer, the poor parson or minister, the struggling tradesman, all find it harder than ever to make both ends meet and to do their duty by their children—if they consider that they can afford the luxury of children.

It is therefore encouraging to see that at least as to their children's education legislation has done and is continually doing something to lighten their burden. During the past seventeen years a complete change has come over the educational horizon in this respect. Less than twenty years ago there was hardly anything, in many districts, between the public school with its high fees, or the expensive and often poorly equipped private school, and the free or nearly free board or voluntary school, with the result that the intelligent foreigner wondered how the man with a family and five hundred pounds a year educated his children at all. On the other hand, the tax-burdened middle-class parent of to-day often neglects to avail himself of the educational advantages now at his disposal; and this for two reasons: the first (and pardonable one), ignorance of the benefits open to him; the second (and unpardonable), a snobbish and belated notion that by sending his children to the county or municipal school he robs them of social prestige.

It is very true that the things we pay for most dearly we value most. If the fees of these Local Authority schools were those of Eton, the schools would be appreciated. Yet while in curriculum, tone, and status of teachers, some of the best of such schools more and more approximate to the type of the public school, the overweighted middle-class taxpayer neglects to make use of this valuable education for his sons and daughters, for which he is helping to pay. He stands aside, and bemoans his lot, and gives his children a shoddy education at home or in private schools, or wears out his life in the Herculean effort to send his boy to the old school which for generations has been the playground of his family—too often giving his poor daughter only the genteel bringing up which makes her totally unfit to enter the army of wage-earners, and create for herself an independent career. But other times, other manners.

It is extraordinary from what small beginnings this present movement for middle-class education started, and how recent a departure it is. At the end of the Parliamentary Session of 1899 the Bill then before the House to improve Secondary Education was already reckoned among the "Slaughtered Innocents"; but by the skill and energy of Sir William Mather (then Mr. Mather, M.P.), Sir William Hart Dyke, and the late Mr. W. H. Smith, standing orders were suspended, the Bill was considered and passed in a single night by the Commons, carried the next afternoon to the Lords where it passed through all its stages in one sitting, and became law just before the two Houses rose.

To quote Sir William Mather's picturesque description in his Presidential address to the National Association for the Promotion of Secondary and Technical Education, in that year:

At two o'clock in the morning we seemed far from the goal and the debate was stormy; . . . but a few of us stuck to our guns . . . and we managed by four o'clock on Thursday morning, as the light of early dawn flooded the chamber, to get through Committee . . . and on Friday, when Parliament rose, it was law! . . . This story illustrates the somewhat bungling fashion in which we English people deal with some of our most serious legislation.

It is important to note that had the Bill not been passed, the so-called Whisky Money which became available next year could not have been applied to secondary education, and at any rate the outlook to-day would have certainly been more gloomy.

The County Councils at first paid most attention to technical education, but they speedily found that the great majority of those attending their technical institutes and classes were quite unfitted to profit by the various courses, owing to the defects in their general education. They were therefore compelled to concentrate their attention more and more on the secondary problem. At first they confined their attention to the building up of a scholarship system and to giving aid to existing secondary schools. The majority of these scholarships were intended to benefit the cleverer children of the working classes, and to form ultimately a ladder, as it was said, from the gutter to the university. Such scholarships were confined to the children of parents with less than one hundred and sixty pounds a year, but there were others which are still available to-day for the sons and daughters of parents with incomes under three hundred pounds and even under four hundred pounds a year.

Some idea of the magnitude of these scholarship schemes may be gathered from the fact that in London alone the Technical Education Board spent over a quarter of a million in eleven years; and its successor, the London County Council, has since inaugurated a still more complete system of scholarships, which educates free gratis and for nothing in our secondary schools thousands of children, many of whose parents belong to the middle and lower middle classes.

It is interesting to note the extreme lowness of the fees in some of these "aided" schools in London alone. Doubtless this is due not only to the Council's "grants in aid," but also, in some cases, still more to the substantial endowments possessed by the schools.

To show how well equipped these schools are we quote from the latest handbook of the London County Council. Thus School A (for boys), with a fee of £2 8s. per annum, provides good chemical and physical laboratories and workshops. Offers sixty scholarships giving admission to the school and also leaving exhibitions.

School B (for girls), at £2 8s. per annum, is a secondary school. Offers scholarships and exhibitions similar to those at the above boys' school.

School C (for girls), at £4 10s. per annum, is provided with laboratory and lecture theatre for science teaching, and with facilities for the practical teaching of domestic economy.

School D (for boys and girls), £4 10s. per annum, has polytechnic laboratories and equipment available for the pupils of the day school. The school is a mixed one for boys and girls. Pupils from the school can pass to the day college for men and women at this institution.

When we think of the £25 and even £30 charged by some schools for tuition alone the contrast is remarkable, and should appeal to the classes chiefly interested.

A second development of County and Borough Council activity in Education was the erection or taking over of secondary schools, in which a first-class education is often given by well-equipped staffs at a comparatively low fee. We are informed by Mr. Oldman, the courteous secretary of the Technical and Secondary Education Association, to whom we are indebted for many facts in this article, that in 1903—the last year for which complete statistics for England are available—there were no less than one hundred and three towns and country districts in which such schools had either been planned, built, or transferred, and the movement since this has been so much accelerated that it is impossible for statisticians to keep pace with events. In London alone there are now thirteen such schools, the majority of which, however, are only a year or two old. The fees in these particular London schools vary from £1 10s. per annum at Shoreditch Technical Institute Day School (boys) to £10 10s. at Manor Mount Secondary School (girls).

As an instance of what has been done in the country we cannot do better than give a short account of the Cambridge County School for boys. No less than £12,000 was spent on the building and £3400 on the site, and the school receives from the local authority a grant of £500 a year. A thoroughly good general secondary education is given and the fees amount to only £1 10s. per term, and this includes the free use of class-books, stationery, etc. Boys from beyond the Cambridge County area are charged a higher fee. The school was founded over six years ago, steadily increasing in numbers from the first until there were over three hundred pupils when the permanent buildings were opened in 1903 and boys had to be turned away for lack of room. There is a junior and senior course. Only in the latter does differentiation begin. In the Senior Course there are three sections—Agricultural, Building and Engineering, and Commercial. The prospectus lays down that whilst no actual trade or calling is taught, no effort is spared to give the instruction a most suitable, useful, and practical character preparatory for the leading occupations in the neighbourhood.

The Cambridge County Council has a school for girls, carried out on the same practical lines.

SCHOOL BOOKS

GREEK AND LATIN

FROM Mr. Murray we have received Thucydides VI. 30–53 and 60–105 (2s. 6d.), being the story of the first part of the Sicilian Expedition, edited by Mr. Percy Ure. This is an edition for beginners, difficulties of text or subject-matter being deliberately ignored. There is an Historical Introduction upon the condition of Greek political life and of the leading Greek States at the period. The text is followed by explanatory notes, an Appendix upon the speeches of Thucydides, with an abstract of those included in this selection from his writings, and a full vocabulary. Two maps are given, one of Sicily and Magna Graecia, and another of Syracuse, by the help of which Jones minor can follow with ease the course of the siege operations.

Mr. J. A. Shawyer has edited the Menexenus of Plato (2s.) for the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, Oxford. The text and apparatus criticus are those of the Oxford Classical Texts Series. The Introduction examines critically the meaning and intention of the Dialogue; discusses historical misstatements or doubtful statements; and gives a sketch of Greek literary criticism of the Orators. The commentary following the text is brief but deals adequately with all important points of history, grammar and style. From the same Press comes Selections from Plutarch's Life of Caesar (2s.), edited by Mr. R. L. A. Du Pontet, who hopes that the book "may be found a suitable way of introducing middle forms to one of the masterpieces of ancient literature," and makes the happy suggestion that the book be read in conjunction with Shakespeare's Julius Caesar. The notes are brief but to the point, and a useful table of dates is appended. The Greek type of the text is a delight to the eye. Tales of the Civil War (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1s. 6d.) is a selection made by Mr. W. D. Lowe from the third book of Caesar's Civil War. The book being intended for beginners, the chapters are broken up into short paragraphs; the notes are full and explanatory, but rather in construction than in translation, and are followed by a Latin-English Vocabulary, one of proper names, and English exercises with English-Latin Vocabulary. Three maps illustrate the theatre of war.

Mr. E. C. Marchant, in Latin Unseens Selected and Arranged (Bell, 1s.), has cast his net far and wide, and has not feared to draw upon the Vulgate and Prudentius. The collection is intended for beginners, and serves as an introduction to the same editor's Passages for Unseen Translation.

In his First Latin Book (Macmillan, 1s. 6d.) Mr. W. H. S. Jones gives a first year's course intended chiefly for beginners of about twelve years of age, the only grammatical knowledge assumed being simple analysis and the parts of speech. The oral method of teaching is followed throughout. The book includes Professor Sonnenschein's version of the National Anthem, with the musical setting by Professor Villiers Stanford, and a selection of facsimiles from Mr. Jones's Latin Picture Stories.

To Blackie's Latin Texts have been added Books X., XI., and XII. (each 6d. net) of Virgil's Aeneid, completing Mr. S. E. Winbolt's edition of the great Roman epic. No notes are given except a few selected critical ones at the foot of the text, recording noteworthy variae lectiones. Each volume forms a slim octavo of some thirty pages and is prefaced by a short Introduction mentioning the most important manuscripts of the poet's works, the leading dates in his life, and the chief characteristics of his style, with lists of the voces Vergilianae. In the same series is included Cicero's De Senectute (6d. net), edited on similar lines by Dr. J. S. Reid. The text is preceded by an introduction giving the leading dates in Cicero's career, a list of his extant writings, and short excursus on the principles of criticism, Cicero's Latin style, and the dialogue which forms the text.

Latin Unseens in Prose and Verse, Elementary Section (Blackie, 3d.), is a booklet of thirty-two pages, advancing from simple and compound sentences, illustrating some particular grammatical rule, to extracts of about a dozen to twenty lines each.

From Messrs. Blackie and Son we have received A First Greek Course (2s. 6d.), by Dr. W. H. D. Rouse. The author intends the book for fourth-form boys, between fourteen and fifteen, who are already well trained in French and Latin. With this end in view Dr. Rouse has introduced several novelties in arrangement. The grammar is accompanied throughout by reading lessons and conversation. The latter half of the book is occupied by a Compendium of Grammar with the usual paradigms, a summary of syntax rules, and Greek and English Vocabularies. For the convenience of teachers a Companion Reader has been compiled. The fact that Damon: a Manual of Greek Iambic Composition (Blackie, 2s. 6d. net) has reached its third edition is evidence sufficient that it has achieved the end its authors, Mr. J. H. Williams and Dr. W. H. D. Rouse, had in view—a graduated and systematic guide to the art of writing Greek Iambics.

The next two books on our list lie quite out of the beaten track, and would charm even the dullest child to learn Latin before he was aware of the fact. The Story of Robinson Crusoe in Latin (Longmans, 2s.), it is true, is only an old friend revived, having been edited, amended, and rearranged by Mr. P. Barnett from Goffeaux's version. It is a sound piece of work, but we prefer the arrangement by which, in our own copy, dated 1820, the notes are given at the foot of the page, and the wearisome turning backwards and forwards between text and notes is avoided. The book is dedicated to Mr. Rudyard Kipling! The second work is Colloquia Latina (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d.), adapted from Erasmus by Mr. G. M. Edwards. The very headlines—in English—ought to make a boy eager to read the Latin page beneath. The Introduction gives a most interesting sketch of the great Humanist's career, and Holbein's portrait of him forms the frontispiece.

FRENCH AND GERMAN

WE have before us four new volumes in the Oxford Higher French Series (Clarendon Press) under the general editorship of Mr. Leon Delbos: Pierrette by Honoré de Balzac (2s. 6d. net) edited by Miss de Sélincourt; Choix de Lettres Parisiennes de Madame de Girardin (2s. 6d. net), edited by F. de Baudiss; Victor Hugo's Hernani (2s. net), edited by C. Kemshead; and Poésies Choisies de Alfred de Musset (2s. net), edited by C. Edmund Delbos. These titles are indicative of the courage shown by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press in deciding to venture outside the narrow range of reading in French literature to which schools have hitherto been confined. Each of the above volumes contains a contemporary portrait of the author and a bibliography, the introductions are models of what introductions should be, and the notes are bright and interesting.

Two other Clarendon Press publications are also before us: the first, Feuilletons Choisies (2s.), edited by Clouesley Brereton, forms one of the Oxford Modern French Series, and includes half a dozen specimens of that characteristic feature of French journalism which, as Mr. Brereton points out, "had practically to go round the world before obtaining admission to the English Press." There are a few pages of explanatory notes. The second, an illustrated edition of Premières Notions de Vocabulaire et de Lecture par J. E. Pichon (1s. 6d.), is based on the principle of the direct method of teaching, there being not a single word of English in the book. A pleasing feature of both these books is the clear and legible type used in their production.

The name of Mr. H. W. Eve on a title-page is a guarantee of sound and scholarly work. The text of his edition of Corneille's Le Cid (Cambridge University Press, 2s.) is preceded by a short life and appreciation of Corneille, a résumé of the history and legends of the Cid, an analysis of the plot, and notes upon the unities, and the characters of the drama; explanatory notes, indexed, conclude the volume.

Messrs. Macmillan have published Part II. of their New French Course for Schools (3s. 6d.) by C. C. Perry and Dr. Albrecht Reum, "based on the principle of the direct method, combining the practical use of the living language with a systematic study of grammar." The volume is intended more especially for pupils of about twelve to fifteen years of age. Every lesson is accompanied by a dictée, a questionnaire, and a devoir. A series of Petites Lectures in poetry and prose is given, followed by a selection of Chansons avec la mélodie. Grammatical Exercises and a full vocabulary are included.

The same publishers have added to Siepmann's Primary French Series Le Petit Ravageot (1s.), by Jean Macé, extracted from his "Contes du Petit Château." The volume, which has been adapted and edited by Dr. F. W. Wilson, follows the plan of this well-known series; text, notes, and vocabulary being succeeded by Appendices which include a questionnaire, words and phrases for viva voce drill, exercises on syntax and idioms, passages for translation into French, based on the text, and lastly, a key to words and phrases.

To their series of Classiques Français Messrs. Dent have added Lettres Choisies de Madame de Sévigné (1s. 6d. net). These immortal letters—readable in any edition—acquire a new charm when they are issued in the delightful format Messrs. Dent have taught us to look for in their publications. A photogravure portrait of "Marie de Rabutin Chantal, marquise de Sévigné parfois, bourgeoise de Paris bien souvent, si délicieusement femme toujours" is prefixed.

From the same publishers comes Contes Choisies (4d. net), consisting of extracts from Diderot's "Rêve de Mangoult," and Voltaire's "Zadig" and "Montesquieu et Chesterfield," edited by H. Cammartin and W. Osborne Brigstocke.

Three new volumes in Messrs. Blackie's Modern Language Series lie before us: Xavier de Maistre's Voyage autour de ma Chambre (1s. 6d.), edited by Dr. J. E. Michell. The text of this classic is preceded by a short Introduction giving all the necessary information about De Maistre, and is followed by notes literary rather than grammatical, in which the editor draws upon his wide range of reading to illustrate the numerous allusions of his author. Exercises and vocabulary complete the most stimulating edition of the Voyage that we have come across. In the same series we have La Jeunesse de Pierrot, by Alexandre Dumas (1s. 6d.), edited by Louis A. Barbé, with Notes and Vocabulary, and Octave Feuillet's Vie de Polichinelle (1s.)—illustrated—followed by questionnaire and vocabulary, but without notes of any kind. In the Little French Classics of the same house are now included Eugène Labiche's Le Baron de Fourchevif (8d.), without notes, but containing questionnaire and vocabulary; De Laboulaye's Le Château de la Vie (6d.), edited by E. B. Le François, with notes and vocabulary; the Shorter Fables of La Fontaine (6d.), to which Mr. Arthur H. Wall has furnished notes and vocabulary; and La Bruyère's Caractères (4d.), selected and edited, with notes, by M. J. Laffitte. In the Petits Contes pour les Enfants of this firm, La Petite Charité—text, questionnaire and vocabulary, with illustrations, at the moderate price of fourpence—is now issued; for the same sum one can get Cendrillon: Fée en un Acte, edited by E. Magee, with st ge directions in English and hints on the costumes; Froschkönig and Das Märchen vom Dornröschen, both by Henny Koch; or Grossväterchen und Grossmütterchen: Kinderlustspiel in einem Aufzug, von Käte Weber. To Blackie's Little German Classics has been added Bechstein's Märchen (6d.), selected and edited by Frieda Weekley. Mr. H. G. Atkins's Skeleton German Grammar (2s.), now in its third edition, in typography and arrangement is a model of what a schoolbook should be. O si sic omnes!

The Grammaire Française Pratique, basée sur la méthode inductive (3s. 6d.), of W. G. Hartog, now in its second edition, has been sent us by Messrs. Rivingtons. This grammar is written entirely in French. Part i. (which may be had separately) is meant for pupils in their second, third, and fourth years of instruction; Part ii. carries the learner slightly beyond the standard required for the London Intermediate B.A.; exercises are given throughout both parts. Mr. C. V. Calvert's First Book of French Oral Teaching (Rivingtons, 2s.), with numerous illustrations, has reached its third edition. The book is, in the author's words, "written in a spirit of compromise and in the endeavour to devise a scheme combining the best features of both systems" of language-teaching, the old and the new. The First Sixty Lessons of the above work, phonetically transcribed by D. L. Savory (1s.), have been issued separately. Mr. W. G. Hartog, the general editor of Rivingtons' Direct Method French Series, in his First Book of Oral French Prose Composition (1s.) has taken English versions of eight of Grimm's Tales as materials for rendering into French Prose by young pupils, adding a few simple notes of a suggestive kind on difficulties arising in the text. In Pages Choisies des Grands Ecrivains Modernes (1s. 6d.) the same editor has collected sixteen extracts from standard French authors as a reading book for upper forms, explaining historical and other allusions in notes written in simple French, and adding oral and written exercises at the end.

From the same publishing house, and the same editor, Mr. W. G. Hartog, we have received nine uniform volumes, all illustrated, and the price of each is one shilling. The three new volumes in Rivingtons' Illustrated French Comedies comprise Madame de Girardin's La Joie fait peur, Labiche and Jolly's Le Baron de Fourchevif, and Labiche and Martin's Le Voyage de Monsieur Perrichon. The trio of additions to Rivingtons' New Intermediate French Texts are A. de Musset's Croisilles, Prosper Mérimée's Le Coup de Pistolet and Tamango, and Edmond About's Les Jumeaux de l'Hôtel Corneille. In these six volumes the text is followed by notes, oral exercises, and questionnaire, entirely in French. The three additions to Rivingtons' New Junior French Texts are Antoine Galland's Histoire d'Ali Baba, Madame de Ségur's Histoire de la Princesse Rosette, and Prosper Mérimée's Mateo Falcone and L'Enlèvement de la Redoute; in each, in addition to the notes, oral exercises and questionnaire, all in French, a vocabulary has been included.

Recent additions to Messrs. Methuen's Simplified French Texts are L'Histoire d'une Tulipe (1s.), founded on La Tulipe Noire of Alexandre Dumas, adapted by Mr. T. R. N. Crofts; and Abdallah, ou Le Trèfle à Quatre Feuilles (1s.), by Edouard Laboulaye, adapted for school reading by J. A. Wilson. In each case a short Introduction and a vocabulary form the only additions to the text.

From Mr. Edward Arnold we have received the first two volumes of his Lectures Françaises (Book i., 1s. 3d.; Book ii., 1s. 6d.), in prose and poetry, arranged and in part written by Jetta S. Wolff, with questionnaire and vocabulary. Illustrated with reproductions of works by Lancret, Millet, Puvion de Chavannes, Marie Bashkirtseff, etc. Each book contains a vocabulary. From the same publisher comes Vier Kleine Lustspiele für die Jugend (1s. 6d.), by Käthe Weber, four original little plays in easy German, suitable alike for reading in class and for being acted by the pupils.

A Practical German Grammar, Reader and Writer. Part ii. By Louis Lubovius. (Blackwood, 3s.) Until quite recently the most general method of teaching modern languages in English schools was to set the student to learn by heart a number of rules with (especially in the case of German) still more numerous exceptions. By this means a certain familiarity with the grammar of the language was acquired, but the student had no proper insight into the general structure, and was frequently unable to make a practical application of the principles he had learned. The newer, easier and more thorough method has been adopted in the book before us. The grammar is learnt from the language and not the language from the grammar, the starting-point being the translation of simple connected sentences. Thus the grammar is taught gradually, and in connection with the language as a whole. In the case of pupils of average intelligence the advantages of this system cannot be too highly estimated.

Lateinisches Elementarbuch für Reformschulen. Von Dr. Wilhelm Kersten. (Leipzig: Freytag, 3m.) Griechische Schulgrammatik. Revised by Dr. Florian Weigel. (Vienna: Tempsky, 3k., 10h.) In the teaching of classics to young students the labour involved is considerably lessened by the use of a good text-book. Both of the books before us have been compiled with the object of making the lessons as interesting as possible, thus lightening the task of both teacher and pupil. Dr. Kersten's Elementary Latin Book contains a number of graduated exercises, each one illustrating certain rules which are set forth later on in the book. There is a separate vocabulary to each exercise, and a general one including practically all the words used. Dr. Weigel's Greek Grammar is less of a translation book but more of a grammar, and German students could scarcely find a better text-book to assist them in learning the language. The rules, which are given with the utmost clearness, are fully explained, and illustrated by means of numerous examples.

HISTORY

SEVERAL of the histories sent us are little more than readers, but two of greater importance are issued by Messrs. Constable: A History of the Ancient World, by George Stephen Goodspeed (7s. 6d. net), and A Short History of Italy, by Henry Dwight Sedgwick (8s. 6d. net). In Mr. Goodspeed's volume, of course, a severe compression has been necessary, but the author has succeeded in clothing the dry bones of history with a garment of interesting fact; and the need to make a readable book has not led him into accepting as true amusing anecdotes about great men and women which contain no element of truth. They are the bane of modern history books intended for "mere students." His work, so far as we have tested it, is accurate, and it is well and vividly written. It is divided into three sections—(1) The Eastern Empires; (2) The Greek Empires; and (3) The Empire of Rome—each of which is preceded by a "Preliminary Survey": a valuable summary of the salient points in the chapters which follow, and a useful bibliography. A review of each chapter is given at the end, and a general review follows each section. There are maps, plans, charts, and other illustrations; an excellent bibliography for teachers and advanced students; a series of notes on the illustrations is given in appendices; and the index, beside being full, is rendered valuable by the system of marking pronunciation employed. It is a pity that the idea was not extended to the text: we trust that it will be in future editions.

Mr. Sedgwick's Short History of Italy deals with the years from 400 A.D. to 1900 in less than five hundred pages, and is of necessity, as the author says, a mere sketch in outline. At the outset Mr. Sedgwick disarms criticism. "It makes no pretence to original investigation, or even to extended examination of the voluminous literature which deals with every part of its subject. . . . So brief a narrative is mainly a work of selection; and perhaps no two persons would agree upon what to put in and what to leave out." We could have wished for compression in one or two instances and for extension in others, but for the most part Mr. Sedgwick's sense of proportion is excellent, and the book gives an accurate impression of Italian history as a whole. Within its limits it may be cordially recommended as a careful piece of work.

From the same publishers—Messrs. Constable—comes a book which teachers and students alike will find very valuable for purposes of reference, if not for continuous study: the Time Table of Modern History A.D. 400—1870, compiled and arranged by M. Morison (12s. 6d. net). Parallel tables show at a glance the important events taking place in different countries at the same period, and the genealogical charts and maps are useful. The book is a monument of industry and care.

From Messrs. Longmans comes by far the best of their Historical Series for Schools: Book iii—An Advanced History of Great Britain from the Earliest Times to the Death of Queen Victoria, by T. F. Tout (5s.). Professor Tout is a historian of considerable ability and—generally—undoubted impartiality. He weighs and sifts his evidence with the aim of writing history, not a pleasant mixture of facts and fancies; and he never lets his enthusiasm get the better of his judgment. For the series of which this forms the third volume we have nothing but praise. They follow the only possible plan of teaching history effectively: by inculcating a love of the subject for its own sake, with no relation to school tasks. The first volume was designed to meet the needs of junior forms, the second of middle forms, and the third of higher forms; and in each the detail becomes a little fuller, the analysis a little more acute. As a history for students who are within a year or so of leaving school we do not hesitate to say that Professor Tout's is the best obtainable at the present day. There are excellent bibliographies (a valuable feature), maps and plans, genealogical tables, a table of kings and queens, and a list of the chief ministries since 1689. The index is full; a model which index-makers would do well to study.

Though not a new book, A Short History of Ancient Egypt, by Percy E. Newberry and John Garstang (Constable, 3s. 6d. net), which takes the reader from the founding of the monarchy to the disintegration of the empire three thousand years afterwards, is too little known. Opinions may differ as to some of the author's conclusions, but they give in a concise form material which is practically unobtainable elsewhere in so small a compass, and the book will be found useful. A defect which might be remedied in future editions is the absence of a bibliography.

War and Reform, 1789-1837, by Arthur Hassall (Rivington's, 3s.), is an addition to a series of text-books of English history designed for the use of middle and upper classes in which special subjects are taught. Recent contributions by Dr. Holland Rose, M. Coquelle, Professor Oman, Captain Mahan and others have added considerably to our knowledge of the history of the period under review, and the results of their investigations have been incorporated by the author. The "Sketch of the History of Literature during the Period" is extremely superficial, but on the whole the book is well done. As an instance of the author's literary "history" we may take his treatment of Wordsworth:

"During the remainder of his life [after 1816] he busied himself with political and social problems. He sympathised with the Carbonari; he wrote on Education and the Poor Law; he published "Peter Bell", "Sonnets on the River Duddon," and the "Ecclesiastical Sonnets." He died in 1850."

"I should like my epitaph to be: 'He wrote true history,'" said Bishop Creighton in effect. Pressure of ecclesiastical duties prevented his accomplishing half the work he mapped out for himself, but what he did will remain when other historians are forgotten, and he being dead yet speaketh in a little book, very small and very valuable, which Messrs. Longmans send us; for Mrs. Creighton's Heroes of European History (1s. 6d.) shows just those qualities—justice, accuracy, grace, and vividness—which marked his work.

From Messrs. Blackie comes a book by Mr. A. R. Hope Moncrieff bearing the same title as Mrs. Creighton's—Heroes of European History (1s. 6d.), which we understand is to be changed to Heroes of the European Nations. It is rather more "popular," and its object is to give, in simple reading lessons, an outline of the history of Europe "from the early conflicts of Greece with Asia to the great war of the French Revolution." The plan pursued has been to give biographical sketches of the men whose lives have had most influence in each particular epoch, and the selection is good and the idea well carried out. The book will be found useful for lower forms.

A Young Folks' History of England, sent us by Messrs. Relfe, is hardly up to the high standard maintained by these publishers. The language is not simple enough for the students for whom it is apparently intended, and it reads too much like a compilation. There is nothing to hold the attention—an important point in histories for the young—and we regard the absence of notes as a great defect. How are the "young folks" to understand what the Law of Entail was when this is their only clue: "Henry VII.'s reign was chiefly remarkable for the rebellions against the throne, and few good laws, such as the Law of Entail," etc. etc. This is not the way to teach history.

A Primary History of England, by Mrs. Cyril Ransome (Rivingtons, 1s.), is a little book of substantially accurate facts, in which a whole period is summed up in a few words.

For the same class of students an unpretentious little book by Mr. H. R. Hall—Days before History (Harrap, 1s.)—will be found of great value. It presents the history of the Stone Age in a story that will engross the attention of boy or girl, and the facts are accurate so far as we have tested them.

It would be difficult to praise too highly Messrs. Blackie's Readings in English History from Original Sources (2s.). The volume before us forms Book I. of a series and takes the reader from B.C. 54 to 1154 A.D. by means of extracts from historians. Thus the early chapters consist of carefully selected quotations from Caesar, Pliny, Tacitus, and so on, and the child catches something of the atmosphere of the period he is studying. The illustrations are helpful, and we hope the book will find its way into many schools which teach only dates and names at present. Messrs. Morgan and Bailey's method is one that future school-historians would do well to imitate.

To their series of Raleigh History Readers Messrs. Blackie have added a new volume: The Growth of Greater Britain, a sketch of the history of the British Colonies and Dependencies, by F. B. Kirkman. The book is what it pretends to be and no more; but the lack of connection between the episodes seems to us a serious blemish.

A more useful book is the same publishers' The British Empire in the Nineteenth Century, which gives in as vivid and interesting a way as the limits of a history-reader permit, "a clear general account of the building up of the British Empire" in the period under discussion. It is sound and written in simple language.

MATHEMATICS

MR. BORCHARDT'S Arithmetical Types and Examples (Rivingtons, 3s. 6d.) has already reached a third edition, and it is unnecessary to deal with it at length here. Five new sets of Examples of an easy problem type in the first four rules, compound rules, vulgar fractions, the metric system and percentages have been added and a few slight corrections and alterations made. The book may be obtained with or without answers; and the Examples are issued separately.

Junior Arithmetic, by the same author (Rivingtons, 2s.), is based on Mr. Borchardt's excellent "Arithmetical Types and Examples," but contains new matter. Greater space is devoted to the more elementary parts of the subject, and the difficult sections have been omitted. It appears to have been designed for—and should meet the needs of—pupils studying for Oxford and Cambridge Locals and similar examinations.

Messrs. Macmillan issue the first part of a Modern Commercial Arithmetic, by Geo. H. Douglas (1s. 6d.) which should prove useful to teachers of commercial arithmetic in technical schools and to teachers of the commercial side of elementary schools. It contains the notes of lectures given by the author in connection with training courses for teachers of the subject engaged in schools in Yorkshire. A preparatory course in the "fundamental operations" of arithmetic is assumed, and the first part, as the author claims, gives practically all that is required for the elementary stage of commercial arithmetic. We have tested it at several points and found it accurate.

Messrs. Black send us an excellent little book of Arithmetical Exercises for Junior Forms, by R. B. Morgan (1s.) of which two other parts are to follow. Wherever possible oral exercises precede written exercises of a mechanical nature, which are succeeded by problems; and each new difficulty is prefaced by a note explaining the method and giving worked examples. This is a valuable plan which we should like to see more widely adopted.

Two admirable books by Mr. Webster Wells, Professor of Mathematics in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, reach us from Messrs. D. C. Heath: Algebra for Secondary Schools (5s.) and Text-Book in Algebra (5s.). The first is intended for fairly advanced students and is in many respects similar to the author's "Essentials of Algebra" which is too little known in this country. Many additional topics have been introduced, and the book is carefully compiled. The Text-Book in Algebra is an amplification of the "Algebra for Secondary Schools." The first four hundred and fifty-eight pages are identical, but to meet the entrance requirements of more advanced colleges and of scientific schools chapters on compound interest and annuities, continued fractions, summation of series, determinants, theory of equations and solution of higher equations have been added.

Elementary Algebra for the use of Higher Grade and Secondary Schools. By Peter Ross. Part I. (Longmans, 3s.; without answers, 2s. 6d.). The tendency of the modern text-book, as Mr. Ross observes in his introduction, is "to consist of a collection of examples strung together by a few worked out cases, the theory and great underlying principles being almost entirely neglected." Mr. Ross's aim has been to produce a text-book from which the student of any intelligence can gather the principles of Algebra for himself if necessary, without recourse to the teacher. His book supplies a very real want and has been carefully prepared and clearly written.

Mr. A. Leighton's Elementary Mathematics: Algebra and Geometry (Blackie, 2s.) has been prepared for the use of pupils beginning the study of mathematics. It covers "algebra as far as quadratic equations; the subject-matter of Euclid's 'Elements'—Books I. and II. (to illustrate certain algebraic identities), and Book III. the mensuration of plane figures and of the simpler solids; and similar figures." Within its limits the book is a useful one, but we think the introduction of a little more explanation would have added considerably to its value.

"It has long been felt," says Mr. E. J. Edwardes, the author of The Elements of Plane Geometry (Arnold, 3s. 6d.), "that some substitute for Euclid is required; my aim in this work has been to unfold the Elements of Plane Geometry in the simplest and easiest manner possible." The book is intended for use in schools and colleges, but, so successful has Mr. Edwardes's attempt been, it may be used by an intelligent student without the assistance of the teacher. It is, throughout, admirably clear and lucid.

Gradually the old unintelligent methods of teaching are being superseded, and the way of the student of mathematics

MACMILLAN'S EDUCATIONAL LIST.

FIRST LATIN BOOK. By W. H. S. JONES, M.A., Perse School, Cambridge. Globe 8vo, 1s. 6d.

* * A First Year's Course on the Reform method, with numerous Exercises, Grammatical Drill Tables, Latin Songs with Music, Summaries for Revision, Picture Composition Lessons, Vocabulary, etc. etc.

LIFE IN ANCIENT ATHENS: The Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day. By Professor T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. (Camb.) Illustrated, extra crown 8vo, 5s.

TRIGONOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS. By Rev. J. B. LOCK, M.A., and J. M. CHILD, B.A. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.

SCHOOLMASTER.—“We have nothing but praise for this book, for it demonstrates quite clearly that trigonometry is eminently a practical subject, and therefore can be made interesting. . . . The book should have a great sale.”

A PUBLIC SCHOOL FRENCH PRIMER. Comprising Reader, Grammar, and Exercises, with a Chapter on French Sounds and Lists of Words for Practice in Pronunciation and Spelling. By OTTO SIEPMANN and EUGÈNE PELLISSIER. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

TEACHER.—“This volume will add to the laurels which the authors have already won in the field of modern languages; we have the highest opinion of the book, and are sure that it will prove a most effective class-book.”

NEW FRENCH COURSE FOR SCHOOLS. Based on the Principle of the Direct Method, combining the Practical Use of the Living Language with a Systematic Study of Grammar. By CHARLES COPLAND PERRY, New College, Oxford-Dr. Phil. Marburg, Prussia, and Dr. ALBRECHT REUM, Oberlehrer am Vitzhumschen Gymnasium, Dresden. Crown 8vo. Part I., with an Introductory Chapter on French Pronunciation, 1s. 6d.; Part II., 3s. 6d.

A HEALTH READER. By C. E. SHELLY, M.A., M.D., and E. STENHOUSE, B.Sc. Illustrated. In Three Books. Globe 8vo. Book I. (for children 9 to 10 years of age), 1s.

Cambridge Local Examinations, 1907.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.		s. d.
The Gospel according to St. Matthew. The Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. SLOMAN, M.A. (Preliminary, Junior and Senior).	2	6
The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. (Junior and Senior).	2	6
The Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. (Junior and Senior).	3	6
The Epistle to the Galatians. An Essay. By E. H. ASKWITH, D.D. (Senior) net	3	6
ENGLISH.		s. d.
De Foe's Robinson Crusoe. (Preliminary).	2	6
Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome. W. T. WEBB. (This volume contains "Horatius," "Lake Regillus," and "The Armada.") (Preliminary)	1	9
Shakespeare's As You Like It. K. DEIGHTON. (Junior and Senior)	1	9
King Lear. By K. DEIGHTON. (Senior)	1	9
Ransome's Short Studies of Shakespeare's Plays. King Lear. (Senior.) Sewed	0	9
Scott's Telford. With Introduction and Notes. (Junior and Senior)	2	6
Goldsmith's Traveller and The Deserted Village. A. BARRETT (Junior)	1	9
Southey's Life of Nelson. M. MACMILLAN. (Junior)	3	0
Milton's Paradise Lost. Books I. and II. M. MACMILLAN. (Senior)	1	9
Gray's Poems. J. BRADSHAW. (Senior)	1	9
Nesfield's Outline of English Grammar. (Adapted to the Preliminary and Junior Local Examinations)	1	6
KEY, for Teachers only, 2s. 6d. net.
Junior Course of English Composition. (Adapted to the Junior Course)	1	6
Senior Course of English Composition. (Adapted to the Senior Course)	3	6
KEY, for Teachers only, 1s. net.
Manual of English Grammar and Composition. (Adapted to the Senior Course).	2	6
KEY, for Teachers only, 2s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH—continued.		s. d.
Nesfield's English Grammar, Past and Present : : : : 4	6
KEY, for Teachers only, 2s. 6d. net.
Errors in English Composition	1	3
3	6
LATIN.		s. d.
Caesar's De Bello Gallico. Book VII. With Notes and Vocabulary by J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE. (Junior)	1	6
De Bello Civili. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary by H. MONTGOMERY. (Senior)	1	6
Virgil's Aeneid. Book IX. With Notes and Vocabulary by H. M. STEPHENSON. (Junior and Senior)	1	6
Cicero's De Senectute. With Notes and Vocabulary by E. S. SHUCKBURGH. (Senior)	1	6
Horace's Epistles. A. S. WILKINS. (Senior)	1	5
5	0
GREEK.		s. d.
Xenophon's Anabasis. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary by G. H. NALL. (Junior)	1	6
Euripides's Iphigenia at Aulis. E. B. ENGLAND. (Junior and Senior) net	6	0
Demothenes's First Philippic. T. GWATKIN. (Senior)	2	6
Philippic I., etc. J. F. SANDYS. (Senior)	1	5
Second Philippic, etc. J. E. SANDYS. (Senior)	1	5
Homer's Iliad. Books I., IX., XI., XVI., to XXIV. J. H. PRATT and W. LEAF. (Senior)	1	5
5	0
FRENCH.		s. d.
Cornell's Le Cid. G. E. FASNAUGHT. (Senior)	1	1
1	0
GERMAN.		s. d.
Schiller's Wilhelm Tell. G. E. FASNAUGHT. (Senior)	1	2
1	6
Wilhelm Tell. W. H. CARRUTH. (Senior)	1	3
1	6

College of Proctors Examinations, 1907.

LATIN AND GREEK.		s. d.
Welch and Duffield's Exercises in Unseen Translation in Latin	1	6
Alford's Latin Passages for Translation	1	3
Caesar's Gallic War. J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE. (First, Second and Third Class)	4	6
Gallic War. Book IV. C. BRYANS. (First Class)	1	6
Gallic War. Book V. C. COLBECK. (First and Second Class)	1	6
Gallic War. Book VII. J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE. (First, Second and Third Class)	1	6
Virgil's Aeneid. Book IX. H. M. STEPHENSON. (First and Second Class)	1	6
Horace's Odes. Book IV. T. E. PAGE. 1s. 6d. (First Class.) Edited by the same	2	0
Cicero's De Senectute. E. S. SHUCKBURGH. (First Class)	1	6
Xenophon's Anabasis. Book VI. G. H. NALL. (First and Second Class)	1	6
Euripides's Medea. M. A. BAYFIELD. (First Class)	1	6
Medea. A. W. VERRALL. (First Class)	1	6
Iphigenia at Aulis. E. B. ENGLAND. (First Class)	1	6
Eutropius. Book I. and II. W. WELCH and C. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1	6
Peacock and Bell's Passages for Greek Translation	1	6

ENGLISH.		s. d.
Shakespeare's As You Like It. K. DEIGHTON. (First and Second Class)	1	9
Coriolanus. K. DEIGHTON. (First and Second Class)	2	6
Tennyson's Poetical Works. Globe Edition. (This volume contains "The Lady of Shalott" and other Poems, and "English Idylls" and other Poems.) (First Class)	3	6
School Edition of Tennyson's Works. Part I. (This volume contains "The Lady of Shalott" and other Poems, and "English Idylls" and other Poems.) (First Class)	2	6
Scott's Marmion. M. MACMILLAN. 3s. (Second and Third Class.) Sewed	1	0
Macaulay's Horatius. W. T. WEBB. (Third Class)	1	6
Lays of Ancient Rome (containing "Horatius" and "The Armada"). W. T. WEBB. (Third Class)	1	9
Saintsbury's Short History of English Literature.	1	8
8	6
SCRIPTURE HISTORY.		s. d.
The Gospel according to St. Matthew. The Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. SLOMAN	2	6
Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE	2	6
The Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE	3	6

MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd, St. Martin's St., London, W.C.

is becoming less a bed of thorns. Messrs. H. C. Payne and R. C. Fawdry deserve the thanks alike of teachers and pupils for a book the value of which it would be difficult to over-estimate: Practical Trigonometry (Arnold, 2s. 6d.). It is intended to give the reader a thorough working knowledge of elementary trigonometry without making the subject repulsive by mechanical repetition of examples. Enough varied examples are given to keep the pupil constantly in touch with what he has already learnt, but the unintelligent masses one is accustomed to find are absent. We trust they will not reappear in the next trigonometry book that comes into our hands.

GEOGRAPHY

THE Oxford Geographies, vol. i. The Preliminary Geography. By A. J. Herbertson. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. 6d.).—The second volume of this valuable series has already appeared and has earned the wide appreciation it merited. The third has yet to appear, but each may be used independently of the other two. Dr. Herbertson's work is invariably sound and scholarly, and the book before us is proof of the value of the methods of teaching geography at Oxford to-day. There is more in it to stimulate the mind of the pupil than in all the geography books of our childhood put together.

The British Empire. Selected and edited by Mrs. F. D. Herbertson. (Black, 2s. 6d.).—This well illustrated little book is apparently the first of a new series of Descriptive Geographies from Original Sources which, if succeeding volumes are of equal merit should prove even more attractive than Messrs. Black's Descriptive Geographies of the World, in which the plan of teaching geography by means of quotations from original authorities was adopted in preference to the customary digest, "touched up" by the "historian." The book before us consists for the most part of extracts from the earlier series, some of which have been slightly simplified; and a commentary which links the extracts together replaces the indices, which were considered too difficult for junior pupils. The bibliography has been omitted; and in a work of this class it is no great loss.

A Scientific Geography. Book III.: Europe. By Ellis W. Heaton. (Ralph Holland, 1s. 6d. net).—This is the third of a projected series of six books. The author takes it for granted that the student has mastered the leading facts of the subject, and his aim is "to associate those facts in a way that not only makes them interesting, but affords at least some explanation of them—to be suggestive rather than exhaustive." He holds that it is best to associate historic places with historical incidents in their proper place, and that side of the subject is treated only incidentally. There are useful maps and diagrams, and a short glossary of geological terms used in the text. The author's English is not above reproach.

A Survey of the British Empire: Historical, Geographical, and Commercial (Blackie), gives, in broad outline, in the earlier chapters, an account of the British Empire as it is to-day, and of the process of empire-building. The second part is devoted to the commercial aspect. A brief explanation of the nature and importance of international trade is followed by a survey of the trades of each part of the Empire, and the principal commodities are dealt with singly in systematic order. A tabular view of the Empire, a chronological summary, a short list of Empire-builders, and a geographical summary add considerably to the value of a book we can heartily commend.

The New Century Geography Readers. Book VI.: Geography of Greater Britain. (Blackie, 1s. 6d.).—The last volume of Messrs. Blackie's series of Geography Readers is in every way a worthy successor to its predecessors. It is well-illustrated and gives an entertaining and substantially accurate account of the different countries under the British flag, and the author (or authors, for the title-page names no name) show an excellent sense of proportion. The synopses are good and the maps clear.

Messrs. W. and A. K. Johnston send us a new and revised edition of their indispensable Multum in Parvo Atlas of the World, with descriptive text. The index is a Gazetteer in itself, and it is hardly necessary at this date to say that the maps are well-defined. It is a book which no school should be without.

A Geography of Europe and the British Isles. By Lilius Milroy. (Blackie, 2s.). "This text-book for junior [and middle, cf. title-page] forms endeavours to avoid the dangers consequent on presenting mere tabular lists of facts to be learnt by the pupil as home-work," says the author. It is not very successful in avoiding those dangers, and it is badly written.

Messrs. Philip send us a Progressive Atlas of Comparative Geography, edited by P. H. L'Estrange (3s. 6d. net), with one hundred and seventy-two maps and diagrams on seventy-two plates. It consists of the maps which were included in Mr. L'Estrange's larger "Progressive Course of Comparative Geography," which is too well-known to call for comment here, and there is a good index.

Messrs. W. and A. K. Johnston make a special feature of maps, and we have received two excellent specimens—the Bathy-Orographical and Rainfall maps of the British Isles. They are well mounted on canvas, with rollers at 4s. each, and may be obtained in sheet at 3s. each. They should be on the walls of every school in whose course scientific Geography finds a place.

READERS

MESSRS. BLACKIE issue the first seven volumes of a new series: The Plain-Text Shakespeare. Those before us are The Tempest, King Richard II., King Richard III., The Merchant of Venice, Coriolanus, As You Like It and King Henry V. As the title of the series implies, there are no notes, and the text follows the Junior School Shakespeare in omitting everything which is considered by the editor to be undesirable for class reading. They are well worth the modest price (4d. each) asked for them.

To the excellent series of Epochs of English Literature, which we noticed in a former Supplement, Mr. Arnold has added two new volumes: The Shakespeare Epoch and The Milton Epoch, by J. C. Stobert (1s. 6d. each). The selections have been carefully made, the introductions are scholarly and not too long, and there are good notes and glossarial indices.

Messrs. Ralph, Holland send us a new volume of their Shakespeare—The Tempest (2s.)—with introduction, full text, notes, glossary, examination questions, and an index to the notes. Mr. C. W. Crook is responsible for the series, and we referred to his methods in terms of high praise when noticing earlier volumes. "The Tempest" is in every way worthy of its predecessors. The preliminary matter gives the student everything he will need to learn during his schooldays.

Another excellent reader is Mr. W. Murison's edition of The Traveller and The Deserted Village in the Pitt Press series (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d.). The introduction is brief but adequate, and the notes full.

Selections from Tennyson: Tiresias and other Poems, with an introduction and notes by F. J. Rowe and W. T. Webb, reaches us from Messrs. Macmillan (2s. 6d.). We do not know what considerations influenced the choice of a title, but Tiresias comes last in the volume. The other poems given are "A Dream of Fair Women," the "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington," "Maud," "The Coming of Arthur," and "The Passing of Arthur." There is a good general introduction, and the notes are full—a little too full we are inclined to think.

A very welcome reader has been added to Messrs. Bell's English Texts for Secondary Schools: Charles Lamb: Essays and Letters, selected and edited by A. Guthkelch (1s. 4d.). This little volume contains ten of Lamb's essays (including the "Dissertation on Roast Pig"), sixteen of his letters, and one or two minor pieces, arranged, with short introductions with a view to giving "a more or less connected account of his life." There are good notes, references to quotations, and a short bibliographical note, and the book is in every way calculated to induce a love of Gentle Elia that age will not diminish.

A Tale of Two Cities, arranged and edited by J. Connolly, and Ivanhoe, arranged and edited by the Rev. C. F. A. Wimberley (1s. 6d. each) are new additions to Mr. Edward Arnold's English Literature Series. Both are intended for small children, for use, as the publisher puts it, "as a reading-book in school and at home," and they have been, of course, considerably cut down; but the work has been carefully carried out, and the books will serve the purpose for which they are intended.

From Messrs. Oliver and Boyd we have received two readers of an even more elementary type: The Excelsior Readers, Books I. and II. (9d. and 10d.). They are well illustrated and the pieces included in them should make reading a pleasure to very small children to whom it would otherwise be a pain.

English Lessons. No. 1. By Alsonia. (Murby, 2s.).—This book, which is designed especially for teaching English to foreigners of practically any nationality, is of a kind seldom seen in this country. It is the first of a series of five and is evidently intended for young students, as the lessons are given in a very elementary fashion and are accompanied by curious and childish illustrations. At the end of the book there is an alphabetical list of the words used in it with their pronunciation, a very necessary addition, as the seeming inconsistencies of English pronunciation must offer great difficulties to foreigners. If placed in the hands of a capable teacher, this book might be of some assistance to a foreigner wishing to learn English, but it would be of little use otherwise.

Messrs. Charles and Dibble send us two books for small children: "Observation Lessons in Plant Life," by F. H. Shoosmith, in which the subjects are arranged seasonably for a full year's work, beginning with seeds in January and ending with holly and mistletoe in December, and "Nature Walks and Talks," by Florence B. Tindall. Both volumes are well-illustrated.

THE BOY'S DIGESTION

The Public Schools from Within. Essays by Schoolmasters. (Sampson Low.)

THE opinions of specialists command scant attention in these days when the layman, inspired by his particular brand of halipenny paper, claims to be in a position to lay down the law on war, diplomacy, medicine, and any other subject to which he has not devoted a lifetime of work and thought. Still we would commend this volume to the earnest and, if possible, respectful attention of the parent.

In it he will find eight chapters devoted to Class-room studies, six to Auxiliary studies, and many others glancing at nearly every facet of the many-sided boy-life of our Public Schools, and nearly all written by men who are actually engaged in teaching. "The most obvious weakness of the schools" (it is pointed out in the Introduction) "appears to lie not in conservatism or supineness, but in a state of uncertainty and confusion which is caused mainly by the profusion of advice shouted from all sides." Exactly; the very number of chapters in this book bear out this suggestion.

"A boy's brain" to quote from Mr. Page's chapter on Classics "is not, any more than his stomach, capable of all things. His mental like his physical digestion does best on simple diet. About two solid courses supplemented by some trifles that suit his taste would promote his health and vigour." Now in choosing these two solid courses it cannot be too much emphasised that they must be such as will enable the progress of the boy to be noted and measured week by week, and this requirement classics and mathematics amply fulfil. Latin composition in lower forms is an infallible test showing up clearly the efforts made to correct yesterday's faults, and the increased power of using each new rule taught. Doubtless science, when its teaching methods are systematised in the same way, will prove of equal value, but it must be remembered that it is handicapped by the subjects mentioned above having gained a start of many centuries: How best to teach a subject is not discovered in a decade or two.

In writing his chapter on Science Mr. Eggar takes as his text Professor Armstrong's dictum that school science is not worth having. Now that gentleman is the great exponent of what is called the "heuristic" method of teaching, which undoubtedly is of great value when gradually and carefully introduced on the top of a solid foundation of facts thoroughly learnt from books or from the master. But work—honest, uninteresting, hard grind—is as necessary and inevitable now in all subjects as ever it was in the days of our predecessors and the foundation laid by it is the only thing that makes safe the further advance to original observation and research; wherefore the practical master will make use of the heuristic method (he will not call it by that name) or of any other only as far as he finds he can safely weld it into his own system.

Mr. Arthur Hassall in his essay on History makes a somewhat unexpected protest against the neglect of classical history in the supposed interest of mediæval and modern history, but his contentions seem to us undeniably sound, and, to quote the introductory chapter again, are "independent corroboration from an unexpected quarter of Mr. Page's warning against the danger of letting classical studies drop out."

"Teaching to think" is the title of a chapter by Mr. R. Somervell, the author, if we mistake not, of one of the most valuable little books ever written on the analysis of the English Sentence, and he goes to the root of the matter in saying that no rules can be laid down as to when and how the highest ends of teaching can be pursued. The seizing the right moment is an inspiration. That is as much as it is safe for one man to tell another; each must learn it for himself.

According to Mr. P. W. Headley: "It is most desirable" in the study of Natural History "that boys should keep note-books or pocket-books in which to record what they observe," but that is not the kind of boy we ourselves should like to take out for a walk, and his statement that "in many preparatory schools the tendency is to coop boys up more and more" is on all fours with Professor Armstrong's opinion quoted previously. Frankly, the public school master knows nothing about boys from nine to twelve years of age any more than a University Lecturer does of boys under sixteen. Let each "stick to his last."

Messrs. Constable's List

A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

Selected and arranged by KATE M. WARREN
Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Westfield College (University of London), and Deputy Assistant Lecturer in the same at Bedford College for Women (University of London), with an introduction by

STOPFORD A. BROOKE, M.A.

Demy 8vo. Over 1000 pages. Price, 7s. 6d. net.

The Athenæum says:

Sound literary judgment, scholastic experience, and a knowledge of the best English writers of all ages are employed with happy results in the making of Miss Kate Warren's "Treasury of English Literature."

The London Quarterly Review says:

A treasury which every lover of English literature will find a source of constant pleasure.

The Daily Graphic says:

A companion to Mr. Stopford Brooke's invaluable little Primer of English Literature, illustrating by prose and verse selections in its literary history and criticism.

The Catholic Times says:

The introduction by Mr. Stopford Brooke is a charming and informing essay on English literature by a writer whose knowledge of the subject is scarcely equalled.

The School Guardian says:

A well-proportioned, representative selection of passages from English writers extending over a period of something like eleven hundred years, beginning with those of the seventh century and coming down to Robert Burns.

The Guardian says:

Must beyond doubt be accorded a high place in ranks of such literature. Admirably chosen and arranged.

The School Government Chronicle says:

This "Treasury of English Literature" appears at a juncture of real need, but also of great promise for its immediate and progressive acceptance as a standard work for teachers and students of every degree, and as the life-long companion and friend of the intelligent general reader.

The Daily Chronicle says:

A selection from English verse and prose . . . beginning with the seventh century and ending with Burns, is designed especially to accompany and illustrate Mr. Stopford Brooke's famous "Primer."

AN ENGLISH GARNER.

Ingatherings from Our History and Literature, arranged in periods, each volume edited and with an introduction by an authority. Now complete in twelve uniform vols. of about 400 8vo pages each. Price 4s. net per vol.

ENGLISH REPRINTS.

A Collection of 30 volumes, sold separately, comprising Prof. ARBER'S selections from the classics of English Literature. With Memoirs, Introductions, Bibliographies, Reproductions of the Original Title-pages, etc. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt. List and prices on application.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE.

Edited by KATE M. WARREN. In 6 vols., fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net per vol. Presentation edition, with Photogravure Fronts, cloth gilt, 15s. net the set.

THE POETRY OF CHAUCER.

By ROBERT K. ROOT, of the English Department, Princetown University. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

TACITUS, AND OTHER ROMAN STUDIES.

By Professor BASTON BOISSIER. Translated by W. G. HUTCHISON. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

THE AGAMEMNON OF ÆSCHYLUS.

Translated into English Verse. By Rev. EDWARD THRING, late Headmaster of Uppington. Crown 8vo, Cheap edition, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

SEXTI PROPERTI OPERA OMNIA.

With a Commentary by HAROLD E. BUTLER, Fellow, Tutor, and Librarian, New College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

LONDON: ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co., LTD.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESSSTUDIES IN EDUCATION DURING THE AGE OF THE RENAISSANCE, 1400-1600

By W. H. WOODWARD, Professor of Education in the University of Liverpool. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The subject of the present volume appeals to all those who are concerned in classical education and desire to make acquaintance with the achievements of the great scholars and teachers who laid the foundation of higher education for the modern world. The theme of the book, viewed as a whole, will be seen to be the origin and development of the idea of a liberal education—embracing character, manners, and instruction—during the two important formative centuries of modern Europe.

COLLOQUIA LATINA

Adapted from Erasmus. With Notes and Vocabulary by G. M. EDWARDS, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. 1s. 6d.

The original text of Erasmus has been freely dealt with in order to secure greater simplicity of vocabulary and syntax, and some of the dialogues have been considerably shortened. It is hoped that a selection of "dramatic idylls," thus adapted, will prove a useful and entertaining reading-book for young students.

THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK AND LATIN

With Tables and Practical Illustrations. By E. V. ARNOLD, Litt.D., and R. S. CONWAY, Litt.D. Third and Revised Edition (embodying the scheme approved for Latin by the Classical Association). Demy 8vo, paper covers, 1s.

THE TEACHING OF MODERN FOREIGN LANGUAGES AND THE TRAINING OF TEACHERS

By KARL BREUL, Litt.D., Ph.D., Cambridge University Reader in Germanic. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

A NEW METHOD OF TEACHING CHEMISTRY IN SCHOOLS

By A. M. HUGHES, B.Sc. Lond., Science Mistress of the L.C.C. Secondary School, Eltham; and R. STERN, B.Sc. Lond., Science Mistress of the North London Collegiate School. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.—"In this little book we have endeavoured to work out a new method of teaching elementary Chemistry in schools—a method based entirely upon the principle of working from the known to the unknown. . . . The children build up step by step their knowledge of many chemical substances which they have themselves prepared and of which they have found the properties. In this way the children are taught to realise that the science is intimately connected with their everyday life."

London: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE
FETTER LANE—C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESSA School Course of Mathematics.

By DAVID MAIR. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

BRITAIN AND THE BRITISH SEAS. Second Edition. By H. J. MACKINDER. Large 8vo, with Maps and Diagrams. 7s. 6d. net. [Regions of the World Series.]

SOPHOCLES' ANTIGONE. Translated by R. WHITELAW. With Introduction and Notes by J. CHURTON COLLINS. Fcap 8vo. 1s. net.

SENTENCE ANALYSIS. By one of the Editors of "The King's English." Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

Oxford Higher French Series.

Edited by LEON DELBOS, M.A.

Crown 8vo.

LETTRES PARISIENNES. By MADAME DE GIRARDIN. Edited by F. DE BAUDISS. 2s. 6d. net.

HERNANI. By VICTOR HUGO. Edited by C. KEMSHEAD. 2s. net.

PIERRETTE. By HONORÉ DE BALZAC. Edited by THÉODORA DE SÉLINCOURT. 2s. 6d. net.

RACINE ET SHAKESPEARE. By STENDHAL (HENRI BEYLE). Edited by LEON DELBOS. 3s. net.

DE CASTELLANE'S VIE MILITAIRE. Edited by W. G. HARTOG. Crown 8vo, 2s. [Oxford Modern French Series.]

SELECT EPIGRAMS OF MARTIAL. Books VII.-XII. Edited from the Text of Professor LINDSAY, by R. T. BRIDGE, M.A., and G. D. C. LAKE, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE MENEXENUS OF PLATO. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. A. SHAWYER, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s.

EDUCATIONAL CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

From THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST.

A Notable Discovery by Mr. Robert Mond.

ARAMAIC PAPYRI: DISCOVERED AT ASSUAN

Edited by Prof. A. H. SAYCE, with the assistance of A. E. COWLEY; and with Appendices by W. SPIEGELBERG and SEYMOUR DE RICCI. Double crown folio, in portfolio, 1 Guinea net.

Contents—General and Grammatical Introductions. Appendix I.—Explanation of Egyptian Names. Appendix II.—Bibliography—Translation of the Text, with Commentary—Index of Proper Names—Glossary Texts—Facsimiles.

BURMA: a Handbook of Practical, Commercial and Political Information.

By SIR GEORGE SCOTT, K.C.I.E., Author of "The Burman: his Life and Notions." Special Cover Design, with many Illustrations and Map, Appendices on the Shan States, and other subjects. Crown 8vo, cloth 10s. 6d. net.

HYPNOTISM: Its History, Practice, and Theory.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s. net. The chief aim of this monograph is to draw the attention of medical men to the therapeutic value of hypnotism. The author has devoted the last twelve years to hypnotic practice and research, and his personal observation of the practical work done in France, Germany, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, and Belgium should also make the volume a valuable addition to the science of a subject which is exciting much interest at the present time.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE & INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE STUDY OF PLANT LIFE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc. London. Designed Cover. Illustrated with Plates and numerous Diagrams. Royal 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD., 32 George Street, Hanover Square, London. W.

SOME PAGES OF LEVANTINE HISTORY

By the Rev. H. T. FORBES DUCKWORTH, Professor of Theology at Trinity University, Toronto; and formerly British Chaplain at Nicosia, Cyprus. With illustrations and map. Crown 8vo, cloth.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS

By Professor H. G. FIELDER, Professor of German at the University of Birmingham, and F. E. SANDBACH, Lecturer in German at the University of Birmingham. With Diagrams. Square 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the leading examples will be found of great assistance, and the diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments help to fix the names in the memory.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

Readings from Recent German Scientific Publications, Selected, Arranged, and Annotated by H. G. FIELDER and F. E. SANDBACH. Square 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"BUCK" WHALEY'S MEMOIRS

Written by himself. Edited, with Notes, Introductions, and 10 Illustrations in Photogravure. By Sir EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. Now published for the first time from the original manuscript of 1797. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME

As Illustrated by Monumental Brasses. By HERBERT DRUITT. Indispensable Handbook for all interested in Brasses, Costume and Mediaeval Archaeology. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

THE ENGLISH ASSOCIATION

I READILY accept the Editor's courteous invitation to declare here my firm belief that the English Association, which was formally inaugurated on Saturday last at University College, Gower Street, is designed to render an urgently needed public service. The main object of the society is to enforce the truth, which though apparently a truism, has never been fully apprehended in this country, that the accurate and pliant writing of English, the correct speaking of English and the just appreciation of English literature are not less important but more important acquirements than any other that can come of educational training. No sensible person would wish to exclude from their due place in the modern educational system the classics or modern languages or mathematics or the sciences or technical subjects. The English teachers and the advocates of English teaching who have called the English Association into being, preach, as I understand their aim, no more revolutionary doctrine than that whatever else is well taught in English schools and colleges, English should be well taught there too. It is for the English Association, in my view, to impress beyond all risk of misunderstanding this saving creed on the mind of the nation, and especially on those who are responsible for the instruction of secondary schools and universities.

Collateral purposes of the association are to afford opportunities of intercourse and co-operation among all who are interested in English language and literature; to discuss methods of teaching English and the co-relation of school and university work; and to encourage and facilitate advanced study in English language and literature. Every means that is calculated to maintain correct usage in spoken and written English lies within the Association's scheme of work. But it seems clear that its vital objects can only be fully realised if the educational authorities, through all the ranks of the hierarchy, put their shoulders vigorously to the wheel.

In spite of sporadic improvements in the position of affairs during the past quarter of a century, it is still possible for young Englishmen to pass quite creditably through public schools and the older universities without acquiring any sound knowledge of the range and fascination of English literature or, what is more important, the power of expressing themselves clearly and effectively in their own tongue. There may be differences of opinion as to how far literary taste or feeling may be communicable by teacher to pupil, although an efficient teacher can do much in this direction, if literary instruction begin early in the pupil's career, and continue late. But no doubt at all can exist of the possibility of instructing youth in the art of clear and effective expression. It is only by constant practice in composition that a perspicuous and supple style of writing is attainable. Any educational course which fails to provide for such uninterrupted training of the pen is worthy of summary condemnation. On that theme the greatest English writer on education long since pronounced the last word. "Whatever foreign languages a young man meddles with (and the more he knows the better)," wrote Locke two hundred and fourteen years ago, "that which he should critically study and labour to get a facility, clearness and elegance to express himself in, should be his own, and to this purpose he should be daily exercised in it."

The present system of higher education in England commonly treats both English literature and English composition as only fit, even in the pupil's early career, for spasmodic and somewhat scornful notice. In the later stages of his training both subjects are often withdrawn from his attention altogether.

The competitive examinations for public offices seriously influence educational standards and methods through the country. Happily these essay-writing always finds a place. But the study of English language and literature, on which English composition must always chiefly depend for its real virtue, is treated, as a rule, with scant courtesy. Even English composition carries, in the Civil Service Examinations, marks which do inadequate justice to the supreme importance and utility of the subject. In the highest examination for first-class posts at home, in India and the Colonies, it is placed on a level in mark-value with Greek history and with Roman history and with Roman Law. It ranks twenty per cent. below Sanskrit, Arabic, any one modern European language or any one natural science; nearly eighty per cent. below either Latin or Greek, and fully one hundred and thirty per cent. below either "Mathematics" or "Advanced Mathematics." The purely optional papers on English Language and Literature are meanwhile allotted in the same examination a gross maximum of six hundred marks, while Latin and Greek are reckoned at nine hundred marks each, and the two divisions of mathematics at twelve hundred marks each. In no rationally conceived scheme of English education or of public examination should English composition or English literature suffer such humiliating treatment. At any rate, essay-writing should hold a place apart from and above every other topic. No surer test could be devised of the general capacity, knowledge and judgment of the candidate than the English essay, were English composition recognised in English schools and universities to be the essential complement and inseparable companion of all other studies from end to end of the curriculum.

In France, Germany, and America the teaching of the vernacular literature, and of composition in the vernacular language, is treated not only as the basis but as the coping-stone of all intellectual development. Again Locke points the moral which few Englishmen heed: "We see," he writes, "the policy of some of our neighbours has not thought it beneath the public care to promote and reward the improvement of their own language. Polishing and enriching their tongue is no small business amongst them; it hath colleges and stipends appointed it, and there is raised among them a great ambition and emulation of writing correctly." Another result of the zeal outside England for education in the vernacular languages and literatures is that living foreign languages are far more easily acquired by the youth of France, Germany, and America than by the youth of this country. In France and Germany advanced students of English language and literature show an aptitude and an interest in the pursuit of those branches of knowledge which, paradoxical as it seems, excels the aptitude and interest of the home-born.

In all directions tragical results of the long neglect of serious English study are visible. The worst English is practised and appreciated, outside a very small circle of English society. The municipal libraries, which minister to the literary needs of the multitude, overflow with literary vacuity and vapidty. The standard of average taste in literature steadily declines. To bring home to the British public dismal facts like these and to suggest means of cure is, I take it, the mission of the English Association.

While I highly appreciate the compliment paid me by the organisers of the movement in inviting me to preside at the first meeting last Saturday, I ought to add that I am in no sense entitled to the credit of founding or of organising the Association. In a humble way I desire to forward its interests, but in speaking or writing of its objects or prospects, I have no mandate for expressing any other views than my own. The actual founders of the Association are two masters of secondary schools, Mr. Valentine, of Dundee Grammar School and Mr. Coxhead, headmaster of Hinckley Grammar School. That the society should spring from the ranks of secondary schoolmasters is a circumstance of happy omen. The headquarters of the Association are in London, but there is in course of formation throughout England and Scotland a network of branches, which will enjoy, according to the constitution, as much local independence as is practicable. A Scottish branch and a Liverpool branch are already at work. There is thus every likelihood that the movement will assume a national character. A strong central executive has been formed under the chairmanship of Dr. Gregory Foster, provost of University College, London, with Professor F. S. Boas (Cranford, Bickley, Kent) as chief secretary, and Miss Laidler (Goldsmith's College, New Cross, London) as assistant secretary. Mr. G. E. S. Coxhead (the Grammar School, Hinckley) is secretary for business connected with the provinces; Mr. J. I. Low (64 Murray Place, Stirling) is secretary for Scotland, and Mr. E. S. Valentine (the Grammar School, Dundee) is the treasurer. The annual subscription has been fixed at five shillings, and a composition fee for life-membership at three guineas.

SIDNEY LEE.

IMPRESSIONS OF A RHODES SCHOLAR

AN American periodical recently published a professedly humorous article about Harvard University in which that institution was called "The Gentleman Trust." It was not quite clear whether the writer meant to imply that Harvard manufactured gentlemen or that only gentlemen entered the University. If the latter was the meaning, the appellation suggests one of the first impressions of Oxford. To an American, unaccustomed to any necessary connection between one's antecedents and membership in a university, the notion that membership in such an institution should be confined practically to one class in the community, is at first glance altogether undemocratic and wicked, and he is apt to reprobate such a state of affairs in set terms. But it is one of the many advantages which Oxford has in two years conferred on the Rhodes scholars that in many cases they are not now so cock-sure about things upon which they once held unalterable convictions; and while in this particular instance the Americans are still sure that the conditions that prevail in America are best for America, they are by no means sure that the conditions at the English Universities are not best in England. Certainly the class in question has justified its monopoly of the Universities in respect of social service alone.

In America not only do students at the Universities come often from the humblest homes, but also during their university courses they support themselves by means of such lowly services as waiting on the table in dining-hall, etc. The result is, often, particularly in some of the large universities in the East, that there are social differences within the university greater than any that we find at Oxford. Professor Münsterberg says that Americans boast that they have only one class on their railways, but he notices that nearly every one who can afford to do so avoids riding in that class by taking a Pullman. In something of the same way the American undergraduate often escapes from the one class in the university by living at his club. But, of course, the large Eastern universities form by no means all or even the larger part of university life in America. Still, at Oxford one finds something altogether different. There is a homogeneity in the student body, a democracy in the higher levels which makes for social intercourse to a degree unknown in America. A student may go to Harvard and become lost, making few friends; at Oxford the student is looked up and given every opportunity of entering into the college life. I cannot here enter into a eulogium of the social life at Oxford, except to say that a Rhodes Scholar is always glad of an opportunity to express his appreciation of the extraordinary hospitality which was accorded him on his arrival at Oxford.

This homogeneity of the membership of the student body unites with another feature of Oxford life to make real the Oxford atmosphere about which so much nonsense is talked. I mean the continuity of the life. One feels the close connection with the past. As to the dons, one feels that they are not a teaching force superimposed from without, but members of the same college body with the undergraduate, only further advanced in the degrees of learning. One still hears, as facts of present interest, that the head of this college took a double first, or that the dean of that college was a Rugger blue. It was Old Gorgon Graham, I think, who could not grasp "the atmosphere proposition"; men of his kind rarely can. It is said that a Western millionaire, intending to found a university, came to Harvard to "look it over." After doing so, "Well, Maria," he said to his wife, "I think about ten millions would do it, don't you?" What he could not see at Harvard, and what his ten millions could not furnish, is exactly what makes residence at Oxford so important, apart from the reading which one does there, and proves the wisdom of the framers of the statutes in requiring a certain amount of residence for a degree, even though a student may have to reside after his work is finished.

An English undergraduate once said to me: "We regard a man's education as absolutely finished when he takes his B.A." I do not know whether the university is prepared to endorse this, though there are critics who say that the fact that the M.A. may be had by merely paying dues implies it. But the statement suggests that the Oxford idea of a B.A. degree is different from that prevailing in America. At Oxford a man specialises in reading for the degree. He can take his degree in history, or law, or the classics. In America we associate the idea of specialisation of this kind with the M.A. degree or the Ph.D. In fact the Oxford degree is more nearly akin to these degrees than to an American B.A. So it is true, in a sense, that with the B.A. degree a student's education is finished as far as the university is concerned. The consequence is, that Oxford takes apparently little interest in a student who is doing work apart from preparation for the B.A. Her heart is in the final honour schools; she holds other examinations and grants other degrees, but they do not arouse much interest. Now, for a foreigner these facts are difficult if not impossible to obtain. When the Rhodes scholars came to Oxford, most of them with B.A. degrees from American universities, they naturally turned in the direction of other degrees. But they soon found that they had placed themselves outside of the main channels of Oxford life. Those who went in for these degrees—e.g., B.Litt. or B.C.L.—found difficulty in getting started. They found few who knew the statutes on the subject, and when they did finally get registered for the degrees, they found that little of the University teaching was directed to their work. For the greater part they have been left to shift for themselves. This is perhaps unavoidable in the circumstances, and in the future Rhodes scholars will be well advised at least to consider the expediency of putting themselves in a position where they will come in more direct contact with university teaching.

With respect to undergraduate life there is one aspect that strongly impresses an American. The undergraduate has a great deal done for him. The don takes a paternal attitude toward him and manages his affairs. You pay your college club subscription to a don and you are handed a report made up by him without, apparently, any undergraduate aid. In one college, I am told, college meetings are conducted as follows. A don presides and when any business is to be done, he says: "Will some one please move so and so?" Then when the motion is obediently made, the chairman says: "If there is no objection that motion will be carried." The undergraduates apparently take no part in their own meeting, I am told that the paternal attitude of the don is on the increase in recent years, and it may be the better way; but to a foreigner it seems that the undergraduate is often deprived of opportunities of acquiring self-reliance and the power of initiative which he might otherwise have.

One is struck by the levity of the debating. In America debating is taken very seriously. When I tell an English reader that there a debating contest is followed often with the same keenness as a football match, that a college debater is sometimes given the equivalent of a "blue," and that at least at some of the larger universities, briefs, bibliographies, etc. of a debate are published in book-form, he will get some idea of the seriousness with which debating is followed. An American sometimes finds it difficult to put himself in the frame of mind for an Oxford college debate, where an epigram is more highly prized than argument and where sophistry is often purposely made to displace logic. It must be admitted that the English debate is more entertaining, just as debates in the House of Commons are much more interesting than Congressional debates at Washington. People out in the Western states subscribe to London papers and read the reports of the Parliamentary debates regularly, whereas no one reads the Congressional Record except to look up some dreary question of steel rails or railroad rebates. But at Oxford one sometimes feels that opportunities are sacrificed of learning effective expression of sound arguments. I notice that the Scotch undergraduate is different; he is argumentative.

Much is said of the expense of a course at Oxford. Admitting that the total cost is not out of proportion to the value of an Oxford education, one would like to see some re-arrangement of the items of expenditure. If possible, something should surely be done to reduce the extraordinary inflation of values, by which one often pays two or three times the real value of an article. Perhaps something could be done by discouraging the giving of unlimited credit. "I like to hear you Americans talk," said a clerk in an Oxford shop. "There is Mr. B. He never asks the price of anything; he always asks how much it's worth." Certainly that Americanism is out of place in that shop! A knowledge of the value of money is surely a useful thing even to an Oxford undergraduate, and by providing for increased payments direct to the college, the colleges could reap the benefit of a reform.

It is needless to say that within the limits of an article one cannot attempt to sum up all the impressions of seven terms at Oxford. One would like to speak of many things: of the healthy system of athletics, by which some form of exercise is provided for every student, and where the aim is not, as is too often the case in America, to produce a single team of stars; of one's belief in the vitality of classical education as exemplified at Oxford; of one's growing admiration for the type of mind which the best of the Oxford schools produce. Perhaps I have not expressed, as I wish to do, the deep sense of privilege which an American at Oxford feels. Rare opportunities are opened up by a three-years' residence there, and certainly not the least of these is the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the institutions and customs, and, above all, of knowing the men of the country which, to America, in spite of the influx there of other races and all nationalities, has been, and, we hope, will long continue to be, the Mother Country.

PAUL KIEFFER.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

LITERARY MADE-DISHES

SOME few weeks ago, when I ventured to make some observations on Literary Feeding-Bottles, or the reduction of the finest old literature to pap-meat for babes, I brought on my devoted head an avalanche of blame from the irate authoress of a book of stories from the ballads, and other equally righteous people. None of them questioned the principle that I tried to lay down—which was that it is much better to give children original literature than to simplify it into the language of babes and sucklings. What they did protest was that the various ballads relating to the Battle of Otterburn were so separate and distinct that they could not be combined into one story. The argument was certainly feeble. There are people yet living whose nurses crooned to them the old ballads, and who can yet remember the words as they fell from the lips of some aged servant. If the children of the new generation cannot enjoy this privilege and require that their food should be pulped, one sees no reason why, at all events, the stories should not be as good as they can be made, and a writer who was single-hearted in the desire to obtain a fine story would not at all mind how many versions were blended in order to secure that end. But my reason for referring to this matter is not to fan the flames of controversy, but because in the versions alluded to there is an example suitable to my present theme. It has occurred to me only at this moment that my theme has not yet been disclosed. "Made-dishes" then, is suggestive of French kickshaws, of spices and condiments and of elaborate cookery. At them I by no means desire to sneer, but would rather leave them to the gourmet. "Plain roast and boiled for me," cried the hungry curate in a well-known tale of parish life, and the present deponent would cry "Amen." He likes variety, but he can find abundance for his tastes in the sundry and widely-different products of Nature. What he means is that he prefers the potato in its native jacket to the potato tortured into strings. I confess that cold meat eaten cold is more to my taste than when it is hashed, or minced, spiced, tortured and served up as though it were a new dish. The most flagrant of all examples is supplied by the vegetarian. Mr. Eustace Miles, for instance, will make at his restaurant a chop or a sweetbread that has never been any part of a living animal. When the thing comes to your table you find that it is a curious concoction of vegetables so mixed as to bear some distant resemblance in everything except taste to what it is called. I hope that no one thinks I am in this arguing against the cult called vegetarianism. All that is meant is that the writer prefers vegetables as vegetables, and meat as meat, and does not care for one "got up" so as to resemble the other.

Now to transfer our thought from the material to the spiritual, it is the same taste for a simple life that one would like to see prevailing in letters. In the old ballad we have, so to speak, the potato exactly as it comes from its native earth; but no sooner is it visible, than officious cooks begin to manipulate it, sometimes with skill and sometimes with stupidity. Take the death of Douglas as it was told in the "Hunting of the Cheviot":

Thorowe lyvar and longes bathe
the sharpe arrowe ys gane,
That never after in all his lyffe-days
he spayke mo wordes but ane:
That was, "Fyghte ye, my myrry men,
whyllys ye may,
for my lyff-days ben gan."

The dying speech of Douglas is here as straight and simple as it possibly could be. In one version of "The Battle of Otterburn" he makes no dying speech at all:

The Perssy was a man of strength,
I tell yow, in thys stounde;
He smote the Dowglas at the swordes length
That he fell to the growynde.

But if we turn to the version of "The Battle of Otterburn" which Mr. George Eyre-Todd has selected for his Abbotsford Series of the Scottish Poets we find any amount of embroidery. After Percy wounds Douglas the latter makes a long speech:

Then he called on his little foot-page,
And said, "Run speedily,
And fetch my ain dear sister's son,
Sir Hugh Montgomery."

"My nephew good," the Douglas said,
 "What recks the death of ane!
 Last night I dreamed a dreary dream,
 And I ken the day's thy ain."

"My wound is deep; I fain would sleep;
 Take thou the vanguard of the three,
 And hide me by the braken bush,
 That grows on yonder lily lea."

"O bury me by the braken bush,
 Beneath the blooming brier,
 Let never living mortal ken
 That a kindly Scot lies here."

The embroidery, no doubt, is very excellent embroidery but we much prefer:

Thorowe lyvar and longēs bathe
 the sharpe arrowe ys gane,
 That never after in all his lyffe-days
 he spayke mo wordēs but ane:
 That was, "Fyghte ye, my myrry men, whylls ye may,
 for my lyffe-days ben gan."

And it is not only the individual case that we are considering, but the principle of the thing. The professional literary man of to-day is a most learned chef. He sits in his intellectual kitchen and devises and devises, piling ingenuity upon ingenuity until the simple plain material is distorted beyond recognition; for there are poets and novelists, too, who seem to forget the elementary truth that whatever their material it must be contained within the limits of human nature. As the greatest of our novelists has told us in a famous passage, human nature is the only book that is to be unfolded. But the very earnest, and still more the very yearnest, are for ever straining beyond this point. I was the other day reading the poems of W. B. Yeats and this, in truth, gave rise to the present meditation. "Veiled" is, I believe, the correct descriptive word to apply to them. I am very far indeed from denying the magical quality of romance that hangs so beautifully over the shadowy waters, any more indeed than I would deny the poetry of the elaborate French dinner prepared by a chef who happened to be an artist. Once and again, indeed, such a meal is to be enjoyed, but it consists almost exclusively of made-dishes, and a made-dish indeed is the poetry of Mr. W. B. Yeats. A made-dish, indeed, appears to be the literature of the whole Celtic movement, and beautiful though much of it may be, it would be a more wholesome and satisfying affair if the essence of it had been presented as simple roast or boiled. But from Ossian downwards these bards have invited us to feasts where the intellectual chef had laboured his brains to produce the fare. For the present I refrain from making a wider application of the principle, yet it was through not understanding it that Rossetti and his school all came to failure. The discovery is none of mine. It has been that of a hundred others. Mr. Kipling felt it when he swung back the pendulum from the refinement of Tennyson to his music-hall numbers. The popular journalist heard its call when he abandoned the stately Macaulayese and the mid-Victorian period and plunged into the directness, slang and vulgarity of the present moment.

A.

FINE ART

THE OLD MASTERS

THIRTEEN portraits by Reynolds and the same number by Gainsborough are probably enough to lure as many people from Bond Street to Burlington House this month as all the rest of the exhibits put together. Certainly they are a wonderfully attractive assemblage, and so sure are they to be talked about that there is no necessity for saying anything about them on this occasion.

One of the least obtrusive portraits (156), which is hung at the very end of the last gallery, is alone worth going so far to see. Portraits by Alfred Stevens are not so plentiful as to pall, the only one known to the public being that of Mrs. Collman at the Tate Gallery. It seems hardly credible that this one of Mr. Spence should have been refused by the authorities at Millbank when recently offered at a nominal figure, and Mr. Alfred de Pass is to be congratulated on having secured this example of a master whom we do not even yet seem to appreciate at anything like his proper value.

Another picture which really might have been specially painted for the Tate Gallery and certainly ought to be placed there, is Wilkie's Chelsea Pensioners (131). That it should belong to the Duke of Wellington is, we admit, perfectly right and proper; but that it should be conspicuously hung in the British Gallery is so desirable, that it is well worth pausing to ask whether some arrangement could not be made for a permanent loan of it.

On the same wall is another English piece (135) of which Mr. Alfred de Pass is the fortunate possessor, namely Hogarth's Happy Marriage. Hogarth's reputation has suffered, like Rowlandson's, from the British enjoyment of caricature, and the real genius of both is but little known. This picture, though carried somewhat further than the "Epsom Wells" at Peckham, is evidently unfinished but its shadowy effect has an indescribable charm that is altogether absent from such elaborate accomplishments as the Election series at the Soane Museum.

On the opposite wall of the same room is another little English picture (146) that is a joy to gaze upon, the only example here of Richard Wilson. The catalogue coldly describes it as Scene in Italy: Effect of Twilight, but it might without affectation be called, "In the Key of Blue: effect of Richard Wilson," for blue is not a colour usually associated with Wilson and for this reason alone it is worth noting.

And now we must get back to the first room, and make a fresh start, lest we be accused of attempting to shirk it; for it is in the first room that you will see all the critics wagging their heads and listening furtively to what the others are saying, or blandly to what they are saying themselves. The committee no doubt hoped that they would all settle on the "Cuyt" which is temptingly displayed in the second room; but it is in Room I. that most of the controversial interest centres.

To begin with, there is a portrait of a lady with a red rose that is called Holbein, and another of a lady with a white rose that is not; though to our mind the latter seems much more likely to be Holbein's than the former. The face has been partly restored, but as a whole it is the finer picture of the two, and it is to be hoped that the lady's identity will be established, as it surely ought to be with its many accessories to guide conjecture. The catalogue is of scant assistance in this direction, and besides omitting several details that in a case like this are of real importance, gravely states that the gold cup is attached by a gold chain to the lady's waist!

With Lucidel's beautiful portrait the catalogue again distinguishes itself, the obvious fact being that the painter has distributed his inscription over her apron and the medallion, "Anna v. Botzheim aetat xxv."—for the bearded face on the medallion cannot possibly be that of a youth—so that there need be no question at all as to the subject of the portrait.

The value of any little scrap of lettering on old portraits is even better instanced in No. 20, which Miss Edith Hewett has lately discovered at Tullymore. That it was the work of Ambrogio de Predis was soon allowed, but it was Mr. Kerr-Lawson's discovery of the tiny device on the belt-buckle that really established it, and also established the connection of this lady with the Court of Ludovico il Moro—a discovery which has a very important bearing on the history of other pictures besides this one.

Antonio More's portrait of himself (8) is a wonderful piece, and in perfect condition; whereas that of the lady with a parrot (18) looks as if it had been entirely repainted (saving the parrot) by some provincial dealer during the Great Exhibition period. At the further end of the large room there are three portraits which are of more than usual interest, though not of such beauty as the galaxy that surrounds them—Reynolds's Lady Spencer ought to have a room all to itself in order to give others a chance. First there is Sir Ralph Assheton and his lady (Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Sapcote Harington) at full length. An inscription, which must be of considerably later date than the painting, states that it is the work of "S^r Peter Leley," and as there is probably no doubt that the picture is by him, it is worthy of more than passing attention; for nearly all that is known of Lely's work is a number of conventional portraits of Court beauties that were painted with unfailing regularity of pose and feature in the palmy days of the Restoration. A portrait like this is worth a dozen of the others, and a little judicious cleaning would probably disclose that, apart from its importance, it is hardly inferior in mere charm to many of the over-restored Nells and Molls with which the public is familiar. As Sir Ralph was born in 1603, it can hardly have been painted later than 1650; and as he married this lady (his second wife) in 1644, it is quite probable that it is earlier still, if not indeed one of the first portraits that Lely painted in England.

Next to this (save for the beautiful little Velasquez head) is Lady Frances Devereux, by Van Dyck, a portrait not mentioned by Mr. Lionel Cust, but which can hardly, we suppose, be questioned. Save for a stray curl that falls over the neck, severity is the prevailing note of the picture, and the wonderful painting of each hand lends additional force to a face in which at least a trace of the high-handed Essex is discernible. Close to this again (105) is the Portrait of the Earl of Northumberland. That this is the work of Rubens, as stated, seems more probable than that it represents the Earl of Northumberland, even though it is unknown to Mr. Max Rooses; for it is certainly characteristic of Rubens, and in every respect worthy of him. But Northumberland, unless we are mistaken, was rather a politician than the navigator here depicted, with almanack and celestial globe; while his appointment as Lord High Admiral dated from only three or four years before Rubens's death.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE SECRET OF THE TOTEM"

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Howitt (ACADEMY, January 12, 1907, p. 44) appears (if I understand him this time) to ask me to clear myself of "an unpleasant suggestion of manipulation"—of his text.

How can I reply? If I am capable of intentionally garbling a passage, to be then "used as the ground for a charge" (against Mr. Howitt) of "overlooking his own facts" I am also capable of falsely denying that of which I seem to be suspected. I leave Mr. Howitt to the enjoyment of his own suspicions—if he suspects me.

A. LANG.

January 13.

MR. HARDY AND TENNYSON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I find so much that is orthodox and informing, in general, in your bibliographical and literary notes, that it is with regret I read your comparison of Mr. Thomas Hardy's New Year verses in The Fortnightly with Tennyson's well-known lines in No. LVI. of "In Memoriam," in Number 1809 of the ACADEMY, whereby you appear to join him along with Mr. Hardy's pessimism.

Tennyson was not in any sense the poet of pessimism, and it is unfair to take an isolated passage from his great poem and give it as conclusive when he himself answers his own thought by some grander hope within him in a later mood. When we read his "two voices" where he is really setting forth the same problems we take our meaning of his message from the evolution of his argument—the divine Hope he solaces himself with that "all is well." So here. The very last line you quote after

What hope of answer or redress?
Behind the veil, behind the veil clinches the matter in his faith. I have never read the passages you quote without feeling that Tennyson who accepts everywhere evolution

Evolution ever working after some ideal good really meant it monstrous to think

That man her [nature's] last work should have no purpose in his nobler striving, that if it were not so he was the greater monster

Dragons in their prime
That tore each other in their slime
Were mellow music matched with him.

To the poet of evolution this seems so monstrous he will never accept it. (He indicates pessimism in these very comparisons.) Nor does he: cxx 5 In Memoriam:

Whatever I have said or sung—
Some bitter notes my heart would give—
Yea, though there often seemed to live
A contradiction on the tongue,
Yet Hope had never lost her youth;
She did but look through dimmer eyes
Or Love but play'd with gracious lies,
Because he felt so fix'd in truth
Love is and ever was my Lord and King.

And all is well, though faith and form
Be sundered in the night of fear;
Well roars the storm to those that hear
A deeper voice across the storm, and this were enough to remove the stigma, were it not further emphasised in:

That God that ever lives and loves
One God, one Law, one element
And one far-off divine event
To which the whole creation moves.

Mr. Hardy can find a voice within him greater than the infinite of which he is only the creature? His God is not Tennyson's:

That ever lives and loves.

Shorthouse, in "John Inglesant" knows a better way:

"Only the infinite pity is sufficient for the infinite pathos of life."

If one were to take Mr. Hardy's "New Year" verses seriously, who could work forward to any higher hope—the ideal would perish from off the earth. What has poetry to do with anything but the ideal? Mr. Hardy has looked so long on the tragic side of life (and we sympathise with him so long as he keeps to nature) that it has become to him the only fact. It is as if a man should declare, after being so long in a dungeon, there could not be any blue sky or golden sun. A child would know better.

There is another side to tragedy, and Tennyson holds the key. It is Love. Therefore he believes and hopes. At any rate, the comparison of Hardy to Tennyson is odious.

BARNARD GEORGE HOARE.

January 15.

JOHN DOUGLAS COOK

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have not seen Mr. Escott's story, which you refer to in this week's notes, but I gather from your reference that the great editor, John Douglas Cook, is said to have so far forgotten himself as not only to swear at Mrs. Lynn Linton, but to strike her. Now, with all due deference to Mr. Escott, I very much doubt this. For the last ten years of her life I was on terms of close intimacy with Mrs. Linton, eventually, as you may remember, being appointed her biographer, and, although she often spoke of her Morning Chronicle days and of Cook's astonishing lack of self-control she never accused him of actually raising his hand to strike her. Nor do I trust merely to my memory. Those who would have an unpromising picture of the man in his relations to Mrs. Linton should refer to the most interesting, but least read, of all her novels, "Christopher Kirkland," which is her own thinly veiled autobiography. There, under the guise of Mr. Dundas, she tells the whole story of Cook as she knew him, and states explicitly; "I had nothing worse to bear than an outburst of imprecations which let off the steam and broke no one's bones . . . and once he forgot himself so far as to shake his fist in my face. That was when trouble had come between us; and it may be easily understood that this day saw my last visit to the office. It was the rift which was never mended." Eventually when Cook assumed the first editorship of the Saturday Review, she became one of its active contributors, but the old familiarity was never restored. Nevertheless she heartily admired his admirable qualities and wrote: "He had his grand good points. He was generous and affectionate: utterly devoid of all treacherous instincts, and he bore no malice. He was brutal if you will; but the core of him was sound, and his fidelity to his friends was very beautiful."

G. S. LAYARD.

January 12.

SHAKESPEARE AND ARISTOPHANES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following parallel, unique of its kind, between "Clouds," ll. 345-8, and Hamlet, iii. 2, I succeeded in unearthing last year, and communicated soon after to the New York Evening Post in that paper's literary notes. From the fact that no mention is made of it in the ordinary editions of Shakespeare, in Dyce, the Cambridge, Furness or Dowden, perhaps it may prove somewhat of a novelty to English scholars, as well as to the ordinary readers of the ACADEMY.

When my curiosity was first aroused on reading Aristophanes in the very serviceable Bohn edition, I had recourse quite naturally to the early commentators: to Pope, Theobald, Johnson, Steevens, Capell, and Knight, only to find them silent on the subject of Shakespeare's indebtedness to classical authorities. A little later, on reverting to W. J. Hickie's translation I observed a footnote which directed me to Porson; so after going diligently through the works of that distinguished scholar I at length came upon the desired information in his "Notæ in Aristophanem," where ample confirmation was obtained as to the supposed originality of the much hackneyed "whale" incident in Hamlet. By placing the two passages in juxtaposition the close resemblance between them will appear sufficiently striking, if not startling, to convince, I think, all but the most prejudiced that here, at any rate, there is something very like plagiarism on the part of the English dramatist:

ARISTOPHANES.

Soc. Have you ever, when you looked up, seen a cloud like to a centaur, or a panther, or a wolf, or a bull?

Strep. By Jupiter, have I! But what of that?

Soc. They become all things, whatever they please.

SHAKESPEARE.

Ham. Do you see yonder cloud, that's almost in shape of a camel?

Pol. By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.

Ham. Methinks, it is like a weasel.

Pol. It is backed like a weasel.

Ham. Or a whale?

Pol. Very like a whale.

By resorting to the text of the First Quarto edition it will be seen that the resemblance to Aristophanes is far less obvious—the adoration of Polonius is wanting—than in the late edition. From this one is inclined to think that some of Shakespeare's literary confrères, a Nash, a Bacon, or a Ben Jonson, may have detected the borrowing; and that the poet afterwards made the episode more in the nature of a translation, thus showing his willingness to acknowledge the source of his obligation.

Porson, in his note to the "Clouds," while refraining from any verbal comment, refers the reader to Cicero, De Div. ii. 21, to Swift, "Tale of a Tub," Epistle Dedicatory; and to Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 14, as well as to Hamlet, iii. 2, in Malone's Shakespeare. As Malone credits the former reference to Sir William Rawlinson, a politician of the reign of William III., and says nothing about the scene in Hamlet, the merit of that discovery is doubtless due to Porson, whose wide reading, retentive memory and scrupulous regard for truth were in his day proverbial. It will be seen at a glance that the dialogue which follows, so far from being a plagiarism in any sense of the word, is nothing more than a reminiscence, or at most a perfectly legitimate imitation of the Greek poet:

Ant. Sometimes we see a cloud that's dragonish:

A vapour sometime, like a bear, or lion,

A tower'd citadel, a pendent rock,

A forked mountain, a blue promontory

With trees upon 't that nod unto the world

And mock our eyes with air: thou hast seen these signs;

They are black vesper's pageants.

Eros. Ay, my lord.

Ant. That which is now a horse even with a thought;

The rack dislimbs and makes it indistinct

As water is in water.

In the famous passage of arms between Polonius and Hamlet the language, instead of being highly figurative and elevated, is almost identical with that of Aristophanes, and the metaphors are crude, but striking; the situation is, however, exquisitely comic, and almost an exact counterpart of that between Strepsiades and Socrates, the philosopher in each case putting his antagonist triumphantly in the wrong.

That Shakespeare had more than an average acquaintance with the Latin classical writers has been proved, I think, beyond cavil by the late Mr. T. S. Barnes; while Professor Churton Collins has assembled a multiplicity of quotations in his "Studies in Shakespeare," that point to the probability of our master poet having made himself familiar also with the tragedies of Æschylus, Sophocles and Euripides by means of Latin translations from the Greek, of which there were several current at the close of the sixteenth century. In the same way perhaps, from what I have been able to bring to light, Aristophanes may henceforward have to be added to the list of those ancient authors from whom Shakespeare occasionally drew, fittingly enough, some of his best thoughts and inspirations.

N. W. HILL.

Philadelphia,
December 31.

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is fitting that an answer to Mr. George Stronach's inquiry should come from Stratford-upon-Avon, and for this reason I may be allowed to express an opinion upon the dictum of that great actor and interpreter of Shakespeare, the late Sir Henry Irving, "that the hand of the actor is visible in all his [Shakespeare's] dramatic work," and to offer an explanation.

To me the statement admits of no denial when I once realise that in the days of Queen Elizabeth plays were represented upon a platform admitting of no change of scenery, and were played with no intervals between the scenes, and at most only one or two waits in their whole course. Thus, the scenes of ten or a dozen lines present no difficulty to the actor, and the action proceeds quickly from scene to scene. Dr. Poel and the Elizabethan Stage Society have demonstrated this of late years by their performances at the Temple, the Mansion House, and elsewhere.

As first published separately in small quarto volumes, the plays of Shakespeare are not divided into acts and scenes, and it was not till 1623, in the first collected edition in folio, that these arbitrary divisions appeared, marking the advance made in stage-craft from the simple Elizabethan method towards the more elaborate arrangements of the theatres of the Restoration period. While it cannot be denied that students of the drama thoroughly enjoy the simple arrangement and quick action of the old method, it must be admitted that a modern revival, with all its concomitants of elaborate scenery, careful dressing, and archaeological detail as a background to the artist's interpretation of the poet's creation, appeals more directly and forcibly to the general public; though this enjoyment can only be had at the sacrifice of much of the text, and a transposition of scenes. Yet I venture to think that in the near future the more educated portion of the public will demand a return to the old method, with possibly some slight modifications necessary for the interpretation of ancient drama to modern audiences.

From a long experience I am convinced that there is not an impossible exit, or entrance, in the whole of Shakespeare's plays, and this proves a complete knowledge of stage-craft on the part of their author.

WILLIAM SALT BRASSINGTON.

Stratford-upon-Avon,
January 8.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Stronach's letter in your issue of the 5th inst., it may be observed that Lord Penzance, in his able work on the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy, published in 1903, suggests that, in preparing the plays for the stage, Shakespeare made such additions and alterations as he thought would suit the taste of the audience. Sir Henry Irving was probably right, therefore, that the plays, or some of them, show a special knowledge of "stage craft." But Antony and Cleopatra was never acted in Shakespeare's time, and was not printed or published until he had been seven years in the grave. It is therefore probable that the play never passed through his hands, but was printed in the "folio" in 1623 without ever having been altered, or prepared, by the illustrious "acting-manager" who edited, revised, and to some extent re-wrote, the plays for the theatre.

AMBROSE T. PEYTON.

January 7.

THE DECAY OF ILLUSTRATION

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Since the angel-correspondents have feared to tread on this ground, with one exception who was merely quoted, I, being what I am, feel impelled to rush in. The department of illustration is that in which I am supposed to win my (butterless) bread; therefore I may be regarded as speaking with authority and not as the scribes when I point out that what looks like decay to one who fans through the leaves of a magazine, is not really decay but dilution. The dozen or so of illustrators in the famous 'sixties can be more than matched to-day; but, nevertheless, there are not enough willing to work at the present market-prices. Restore the tariff of the 'sixties and immediately better work would be seen. But, of course, that's impossible. Modern reproduction has changed all that. In the old days it used to cost from five pounds to fifty to engrave good work, and it was worth while paying a decent price for a drawing on which so much had to be spent. Process-work changes pounds into shillings in reproduction; hence publishers can afford to engrave anything. Magazines spring up like mushrooms, "fully illustrated," and the public buy, marvelling at the benefits of progress. The Strand, the first success, has scores of imitators, and as they all must have drawings, the good artists are too few to go round, so in steps the amateur; the untutored wretch who doesn't know what illustration means; but who copies badly a model to illustrate "He walked to the door," and then slobbers in a background of nothing to fill up the paper. Some even "draw out of their head" with dire results. All this stuff finds its way into the magazines because it is cheap; but it blocks the way for better. Young ladies with well-to-do fathers are great sinners in this respect. For the sake of pin-money, and the idea that they are "independent," they offer drawings of nursery subjects for five shillings each, and rather than foil their vanity they have been known to give them gratis for the sake of posing before their friends. Immature art students are another pest. Without any art education worthy the name they join "black-and-white" classes at the art schools (more progress), and expect in a term or so to go out into the world and illustrate for a living (I know; I teach 'em!). This disgusting state of things will go on until it gets so bad that even the low level of art-editorial taste is passed, and then perhaps some enterprising publisher with taste—though enterprise and taste rarely go hand-in-hand—will start a magazine well illustrated, and intended to sell more for its drawings than for its literature, as did the Harper of the 'eighties.

I don't think there is anything in your contributor's point that wash-work has been the downfall of illustration. Why should it have been? It's a difference of tweedledum and tweedledee. There was as much wash as line used on the wood-block drawings of the 'sixties. Besides, a bad process-block of a line drawing is a much more miserable thing than a bad block of a wash-drawing; although people who don't see the originals might not think so. There is not so much opportunity for things to be altered in a half-tone block.

As to photographs, they are necessary for certain classes of work. But they are hideous when they make pictorial claims. The public don't want them. I never heard anybody say they were delightful. It's the editor who wants them; to lighten matter that is not fiction, and to make a big show on cheap terms. The fool of a public takes what is offered; but it has never been known to refuse the best. Changes for the worse have come about by the economy of production, not by any demand of the public. The public do not demand; they simply swallow.

F. C. TILNEY.

[Our correspondent has not, evidently, studied any fine art-photographs.—ED.]

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We enclose a complete list of branches. The ones that have been underlined are the only ones which do not open daily."

A friend criticises the use of "ones" in the above sentence as being ungrammatical and improper. I should be glad of your opinion, for which I thank you in anticipation.

H. H. W.

January 8.

[As there can be no plural of one, the use of "ones" is incorrect, although it is often employed colloquially.—ED.]

"A RECORD OF SPANISH PAINTING"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has only recently been drawn to some remarks which concern myself occurring on page 19 of "A Record of Spanish Painting," by Mrs. W. Gallichan (London, 1904); and it is not too late to point out their inaccuracies. There is no such place as "San Teruel." Teruel is a station on the railway from Calatayud (near the ruins of Bilbilis) to Sagunto. For "Mudijar" read Mudejar. So far as I now recollect, "the scenes" in these most interesting pictures are entirely non-Moorish, and evidently the work of a Christian who wished to celebrate the triumph of the Christian Court of Aragon, after the defeat of the Moors at the Reconquista. The Bishop of Teruel at the time when I saw them, 1902, a few weeks before I met Mr. and Mrs. Gallichan at Avila and Zamora, was most zealous for their preservation, and hoped that copies of them would be taken. He told me that he knew where certain panels which had been stolen were to be found. To him the public owes the greater facility of access which has been offered since that time, when the climb on to the roof was most dangerous. He feared that the removal of the false roof below them, which conceals them from view to those in the nave of the Cathedral, would be very unpopular in the city. There can be no doubt that to its existence the pictures owe their preservation; though it is an architectural atrocity. The old artesonado with the paintings ought to be removed to a museum, and a new roof in the same style erected in its place; the operation being accompanied by the removal of the boveda which spoils the church. Soon after my visit I wrote to the authorities of the Museum at South Kensington, asking them to take copies of these instructive pictures, but received an unsatisfactory answer. I believe, however, that they have since then received the attention of a society in Spain. Mrs. Gallichan omits to state that there are similar paintings, perhaps from the same hand, or hands, in the remains of the Royal Palace, in the Juderia, at Teruel, etc., on the artesonado, above another false boveda, in a church at Ciudad Real. I am not "the author," but the editor, of the Baskish New Testament printed at Oxford in 1903; though I am the author of a partly published work on the Verb which is used in that translation. On p. 309, Eibar is not in Biscaya, but in Guipuscoa; and Zuloaga should be Zuloaga.

EDWARD S. DOBSON.

"THE SIGN OF THE CLEFT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be much obliged if you or any of your readers can inform me who is the author of the recitation entitled "The Sign of the Cleft." A reader at these libraries informs me he thinks it is by a J. Heart, but of this we are unable to obtain confirmation. I am anxious to trace the author and also the collection in which the recitation can be found.

L. STANLEY JAST.

Croydon Public Libraries.

BETHNAL GREEN FREE LIBRARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The committee of this institution, which is supported by voluntary contributions, have lost so many old subscribers during the past few years, through death and other causes, that they are compelled to make a special effort to obtain new subscribers to enable them to meet expenses. Considerable increase in the number of these has become imperative if the institution is to be maintained. Letters of warm congratulation have been received by the committee on the attainment of the library's thirtieth birthday, all bearing testimony to the work which it has achieved. Its bankers are Barclay and Co., Ltd., Lombard Street, E.C., to whom donations may be sent, or to the secretary and librarian,

G. F. HILCHEN.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—What I most object to is orthographic anarchy. There is Mr. Greevz Fysher's system, for instance, which, so far as I know, he has never induced any other man to accept. We do not want a new Tower of Babel. We want a system which will unite men, not divide them. I do not care a button how anomalous the present system is so long as it constitutes a recognised nexus of thought between English speaking people. Introduce a better system if you like; that is if you can get it universally accepted. Any simplifications, such as those proposed by Mr. Roosevelt, if accepted by a large body of men, mark a step in the right direction. I certainly think Mr. Greevz Fysher should drop his system until he has submitted it to a million or so of English people and induced them to accept it. Nobody wants it or recognises the least shred of merit in it. If they did they would adopt it. I am in favour of tentative simplifications to be dropped if they do not commend themselves to a large majority of writers.

The written word is not essentially a symbol of sound. It is a symbol of thought. Except for the purpose of reading aloud, a thing that nobody does nowadays, it does not matter a jot how the word written is pronounced.

E. A. FISHER.

January 8.

BOOKS RECEIVED

CLASSICS.

The Medea of Euripides. Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with explanatory notes, by Gilbert Murray. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 96. Allen, 2s. net.

DRAMA.

Cruso, H. A. A. Sir Walter Raleigh. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 178. Unwin, 5s. net.
[A drama in five acts.]

ETHNOLOGY.

Thomas, Northcote W. Kinship Organisations and Group Marriage in Australia. 8½ × 5½. Pp. xvi, 163. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.

[In the "Cambridge Archaeological and Ethnological Series." Bibliography; index of Subjects and of Phratry, Blood and Class Names; maps of (1) Rule of Descent, (2) Class Organisations, (3) Phratry Organisation.]

FICTION.

Rhodes, Harrison G. Charles Edward. Illustrated by Penrhyn Stanlaws. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 359. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Bailey, H. C. Springtime. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 320. Murray, 6s.

Bindloss, Harold. The Dust of Conflict. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 354. Long, 6s.

Cleeve, Lucas. Selma. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.

Yorke, Curtis. The World and Delia. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.

Findlater, Mary. A Blind Bird's Joy. Illustrated. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 313. Methuen, 6s.

Shiel, M. P. The Last Miracle. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 320. Werner Laurie, 6s.

Courlander, Alphonse. The Sacrifice. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 336. Unwin, 6s.

Talbot, L. A. The Footstool of the Virtues. 7½ × 5. Pp. 296. Sisley's, 6s.

Cross, Victoria. Life's Shop Window. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 358. Werner Laurie, 6s.

HISTORY.

Doyle, J. A. The Middle Colonies; and The Colonies under the House of Hanover. Each 9½ × 6½. Pp. xvi, 563 and xvi, Longmans, 14s. net each.

[The fourth and fifth volumes of a series entitled "The English in America," earlier volumes of which appeared in 1882 and 1886.]

Séménoff, E. The Russian Government and the Massacres. Authorised translation from the French, with an introduction by Lucien Wolf. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 265. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.

[A page of the Russian counter-revolution.]

LITERATURE.

Smith, Arnold. The Main Tendencies of Victorian Poetry. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 208. Simpkin, Marshall, 5s. net.

[“Studies in the thought and art of the greater poets.” The substance of this book was contained in a series of University Extension lectures, delivered “in connection with” the University College of South Wales and Merionethshire.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The Summoning of Everyman. Edited, with an Introduction, Note-Book and Word-List, by John S. Farmer. 7 × 4½. Pp. x, 36. Published by Gibbings and Co. for the Early English Drama Society, 2s. net.

[In the “Museum Dramatists” series. This version, Mr. Farmer states in his introduction, is based on Hazlitt's text. “In its preparation,” he says, “the two impressions by Pynson, unknown to Hawkins, and one of those issued by Skot about 1530, have been collated.”]

Broughton, Rhoda. Foes in Law. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 358. Macmillan, 2s.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Jerningham, Sir Hubert. From West to East: Notes by the Way. With maps and illustrations. 9 × 6. Pp. 351. Murray, 15s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

A Text-Book of Irish Literature. By Eleanor Hull. (Nutt, 3s. net.) This “Text-book of Irish Literature” has been prepared, the author informs us, to meet the needs of the students under the Intermediate Board; and it carries the reader up to the early years of the sixteenth century. As Miss Hull says, “For a great part of the early literature no chronological order can, for the present, at all events, be followed. The earlier existing secular material comes to us for the most part gathered into great vellum compilations made by the assiduity of the scribes of the twelfth and following centuries; but the contents of these volumes are of various ages; and the actual date of the composition of any particular piece can only be approximately calculated either by casual allusions contained in it to persons or events whose dates can be verified from other sources, or by the language of the piece itself. Often such calculations can only be fixed within the wide limits of three or more centuries.” She has grouped her materials under general heads, even when they do not indicate the chronological order, so that the student may “more readily find any particular piece he may be in search of under its own subject.” As the book is intended for those studying for Intermediate Board examinations—of all people the least likely to be seeking any particular piece—this seems a curious reason. We suggest that the arrangement is due to the fact that the subject can be “got up” more quickly when presented in this way than it could be if a chronological arrangement had been attempted. Any one with a fairly good memory could get marks after running through this book three or four times. With a chronological order it would be necessary for them to possess not only a fairly good memory, but a certain amount of intelligence and understanding. A short chronological table is prefixed to the volume, from which the student under the Intermediate Board may glean such illuminating details as these concerning the makers of the “literature” of Ireland:

Lugaidh, son of Ith and nephew of Milesius. Lament on the death of his wife.

Ollamh Fodhla, law-giver and monarch of Ireland, and reputed founder of a College for Law and Poetry.

Roigne, or Roynne the Poetic. Poem on the partition of Ireland among the sons of Milesius. . . .

d. 500. St. Fiacc, Bishop of Sletty. Poem on St. Patrick ascribed to him.

525. St. Brigit. Abbess of Kildare. A hymn is ascribed to her.

570. St. Ita. Poem on the Infant Jesus.

We hope the students will lay them to heart. Some of the entries, needless to say, are more full than these. Miss Hull's preface suggests that “The Literature of Ireland” has recently been added to the list of subjects to be taken by candidates presenting themselves for examination by the Intermediate Board. If this be so, and it be due to the initiative of the Gaelic League, we would like to know what recompense they are prepared to offer students for the loss of time involved in “cramming.” The great defect of the book seems to us to be that it lends itself to the pernicious system of “cramming,” which the methods of the Intermediate Board foster. Its learning is undeniable, and its accuracy may pass unchallenged. If we were to grant the necessity for its form and existence—which we do not—we should call it, within its limits, an excellent book. But its limits are so considerable that we prefer to call it a useful book of reference. Remembering Miss Hull's “Pagan Ireland” and her “Early Christian Ireland,” we could wish that the volume before us had not come into our hands for review.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY have the pleasure to announce that they have now made arrangements under which they are enabled to publish Autotypes of a number of the more important of the Works of the late Mr. G. F. WATTS, R.A.

The Reproductions are made in Permanent Carbon, and include the following :

"Hope."	"For He Had Great Pos- sessions."
"Love and Life."	"Dawn."
"Love and Death."	"Fata Morgana."
"Good Luck to Your Fishing."	"Time, Death and Judg- ment."
"Orpheus and Eurydice."	"Thetis."
"Paolo and Francesca."	"Britomart and Her Nurse."

etc. etc. etc.

Published in two sizes—

About 18 ins. by 14 ins., 12s. ; and 10 ins. by 6 ins., 5s. each.

Or, framed complete—

From 21s. for the large size, and
10s. 6d. for the small size.

The first three on the list are also published in a larger size, about 27 ins. in height. Price £1 10s. ; or framed complete, £2 15s.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
FINE ART GALLERY, 74 NEW OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resumé of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1812

JANUARY 26, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SPA, BELGIUM.—Pensionnat de Demoiselles. S—Madame Lecoy requires young lady to teach English one hour daily; she would receive lessons in French and German; half fees. References in England from parents.

Books for Sale.

HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY by Sir J. W. KAYE and Col. G. B. MALLISON. Large type. Library edition, 6 vols. 8vo, cloth, with Index, Maps, and Plans. Published at £6 ros. 6d. for 47s. 6d. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set, 12 vols., as issued, 35s.; {Archæologia Cantiana, 26 vols., £10 10s.; Encyclopædia Britannica, 36 vols., "Times" edition, half morocco, as published, £9 9s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue. Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.LIT.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row E.C.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWSON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY OHRONIOLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the our Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co., 57A Coleman Street, London, E.C. Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

The Library of Useful Stories

A SERIES OF POPULAR ILLUSTRATED
MANUALS ON SCIENTIFIC SUBJECTS,
WRITTEN BY SPECIALISTS. POTT 8vo,
CLOTH, 1s. EACH ; POST FREE, 1s. 2d. EACH.

The Story of

- A Grain of Wheat. By William C. Edgar.
Alchemy: or, The Beginnings of Chemistry. By M. M. Pattison Muir.
Alpine Climbing. By Francis Gribble.
Animal Life. By B. Lindsay.
A Piece of Coal. By A. E. Martin.
Architecture. By P. L. Waterhouse.
Art in the British Isles. By J. E. Phythian.
Bird Life. By W. P. Pycraft.
Books. By G. B. Rawlings.
British Coinage. By G. B. Rawlings.
British Trade and Industry. By James Burnley.
Eclipses. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
Lost England. By Beckles Willson.
Music. By F. J. Crowest.
Photography. By A. T. Story.
Primitive Man. By Edward Clodd.
Rapid Transit. By Beckles Willson.
Religions. By E. D. Price, F.G.S.
Reptile Life. By W. P. Pycraft.
The Alphabet. By Edward Clodd.
The Army. By Captain Owen Wheeler.
The Atlantic Cable. By Charles Bright, F.R.S.E.
The Atmosphere. By Douglas Archibald, M.A.
The British Race. By J. Munro.
The Cotton Plant. By F. Wilkinson, F.G.S.
Electricity. By J. Munro.
Euclid. By W. B. Frankland.
Extinct Civilisations of the East. By R. E. Anderson, M.A.
Extinct Civilisations of the West. By R. E. Anderson, M.A.
Fish Life. By W. P. Pycraft.
Forest and Stream. By James Rodway, F.L.S.
Geographical Discovery. By Joseph Jacobs.
Germ Life: Bacteria. By H. W. Conn.
Ice, in the Present and Past. By W. A. Brend, B.A.
King Alfred. By Sir Walter Besant.
Life in the Seas. By Sydney J. Hickson, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Life's Mechanism. By W. H. Conn.
The Chemical Elements. By M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A.
The Earth in Past Ages. By H. G. Seeley, F.R.S.
The Empire. By Edward Salmon.
The Mind. By Professor J. M. Baldwin.
The Plants. By Grant Allen.
The Potter. By C. F. Binns.
The Solar System. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
The Stars. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
The Wanderings of Atoms. By M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A.
The Weather. By G. F. Chambers, F.R.A.S.
Thought and Feeling. By F. Ryland, M.A.
Wild Flowers. By the Rev. Professor Henslow.
Wireless Telegraphy. By A. T. Story.

50 Volumes. 10,480 Pages.
1720 Illustrations.

Of all Booksellers, or from

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE BEST ATLASES

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CITI-

ZEN'S ATLAS. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. 156 Maps. Introductory Text, Statistical Tables, Descriptive Gazetteer, and General Index. Extra crown folio, art canvas, 21s. net; half morocco, 25s. net. Postage, 10d. extra.

"A splendid atlas. The very best atlas which can be purchased at the price."

Daily Express.

THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENT'S

ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. A Series of 105 Physical, Political, and Statistical Maps, compiled from British and Foreign Surveys, and the latest results of International Research. Under the direction of J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E., F.R.G.S., etc. Royal 4to, cloth, 6s. net. Post free, 6s. 6d.

"A boon to all students of the world's contemporary history."—Daily Telegraph.

THE HANDY SHILLING ATLAS OF

THE WORLD. Containing 120 pages of Fully Coloured Maps, by J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, and a Gazetteer with 10,000 entries. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net. Post free, 1s. 2d.

THE HANDY TOURING ATLAS OF

THE BRITISH ISLES. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. Being the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Ireland in miniature, contained in 120 Coloured Maps. Size, 6 in. by 4 in. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

THE HANDY ATLAS of the BRITISH

EMPIRE. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E. A Series of 120 Maps and Plans, illustrating the Geography of the Colonies, with Statistical Notes and Tables. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage, 2d. extra.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED,

3 TO 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THEY MEET ALL NEEDS

AND SUIT ALL POCKETS

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	83	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Hic Jacet	94
Select Epigrams	85	Fiction	95
The Pedestrian Muse	86	Drama:
Australian Marriage Rules	87	Lavedan's "Le Marquis de
Lafcadio Hearn	88	Priola" at the New Royalty	97
Plain and Coloured	89	Fine Art:
A Cultured Dilettante	90	Modern Portraits	97
Leighton	91	Forthcoming Books	98
The Library Table	92	Correspondence	98
Sayings of Children—IV	93	Books Received	101
The Bookshelf	102

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

A RECENTLY published volume, "The Public Schools from Within" (Sampson Low), contains an interesting paper by Mr. J. O'Regan on "The School Magazine." The particular school magazine he writes of is The Marlburian, which has a record, in all, of nearly sixty years' life, and can number among its contributors Messrs. Anthony Hope Hawkins, E. F. Benson, Eustace Miles, E. K. Chambers, S. H. Butcher, A. C. Hilton and C. L. Graves—a good list. The editors (there were four) of The Marlburian seem to have been a little severe. They rejected most of the contributions from outside and wrote the greater part of the paper themselves. And in apology they published the following stanza:

Our strictures, like House-masters' "measures in season,"
Are all for the best, though they're harsh at the time;
'Tis a kindness to show you your essays lack reason,
As much as your verse is deficient in rhyme.

—A kindness for which many editors, and not only of school-magazines, have had to suffer the reproaches of the rejected.

Mr. O'Regan declares that school magazines have often had to give up the attempt to encourage literature in the school for lack of worthy material. On the other hand, many budding talents have been fostered by these school-papers, and have learned to do better by their early mistakes. How feeble one's things in prose and verse used to appear when printed! Or—according to the author's temperament—how grand did they not seem! And there has been many a case of really brilliant work first published in a school-paper. After all, it is largely written by men (?) of eighteen or nineteen, an age at which many a poet outside the public school circles has published of his best.

Not long ago the Eton paper contained some exceedingly clever light verses which have since been collected and published; the author conceals himself under the difficult name of "Signa Severa." A good many of the late Lionel Johnson's poems appeared in the pages of The Wykehamist; and we remember the pages of that journal giving much space one summer term to a long correspondence on the vocabulary of Victor Hugo, which sat cheek by jowl with cricket reports, in the happy jumble typical of the school-boy mind. And not of the school-boy mind only. We have seen papers for adults which were equally "various."

In the same volume ("The Public Schools from Within") Mr. Kennedy of Haileybury, discoursing on School Libraries, pleads for a little novel-reading to be permitted. The plea is a good one. It is a choice between reading novels and talking shop, and a little change is good, if only the novels are carefully chosen. When the present writer was about eighteen, and rather prided himself, perhaps, on a dawning knowledge of English literature, he was asked by a maiden lady whether at his school the boys were allowed to read any books they liked. His scorn rendered him almost dumb (he had lately finished "Tom Jones"); but, if (which Heaven forbid!) he were ever to be a schoolmaster, he would try to exercise a severe supervision over the books read, to the exclusion, not so much of the so-called "coarse" or "immoral," as of the feeble, the washy and the affected. "Tom Jones" would be on the shelves; "The Sorrows of Satan" would not. There would be all the old ballads, and none of the modern dilutions of them; Byron's poems complete, but not a line of Mr. A. B. or Miss X. Y. Z. And the novels should be made, so far as possible, stepping-stones, as the poet rather inaccurately puts it, to higher (or stiffer) things. We owe an immense debt of gratitude to the schoolmaster who, finding us yawning over a feeble novel, suggested: "Why not read Macaulay's History?" and added, with a twinkle in his eye, the old jest: "It's more exciting than any novel!" And so it proved.

One of the most interesting books published in connection with the annual celebration of the birthday of Burns is that by Mr. T. F. Henderson on Ayrshire as it was in the time of the poet. Mr. Henderson is an expert on Burns, for he had to do the lion's share of the research work when he and Henley published their well-known edition. But perhaps more interesting than the text are the pictures in this book. Mr. Monro S. Orr has probably worked from drawings and old prints. At any rate "the auld clay biggin" with its thatched roof covered with snow is exactly like the place in which the Scottish cotter used to live. He has also given a very realistic picture of the Tam o' Shanter Inn at Ayr, the "chapman billies" being carefully studied in regard to dress. The bridges, that is to say, the Auld Brig at Ayr and that at Doon, are very fine studies and help us greatly to realise the scenes that must have struck the eye of the young poet. The book has an interest beyond mere illustration, as the picture recalls a very interesting Scotland that has completely changed since the time of Burns.

There is a manuscript volume somewhere about the world (it appears from an old newspaper cutting) which literary "fanciers" would give a good deal to find. In it are transcribed some of the Paraphrases of the Psalms. Every alternate page is blank, and on these pages are entered certain emendations in three different hands, one of which is described as "masculine, massy, mysterious." The cutting goes on to add that this portentously described caligraphy was submitted, in lithographed facsimile, to the eldest son of Robert Burns, who identified it as his father's. "No man ever wrote like Burns," he said, "but I never knew before that my father had been consulted regarding the Paraphrases." The Paraphrases, however, were naturally congenial to the Burns who was accustomed to read the Bible to his assembled farm-hands at Ellisland, and who wrote "The Cotter's Saturday Night." Nor need we be surprised to learn that the poet's alterations, which are embodied in the authorised collection of the Paraphrases, are an improvement on the original versions.

There seems to be no limit to the field touched upon by anthologists, the latest compilation, called "A Garden of Spiritual Flowers," being a collection of prayers from the devotional books of the reign of Elizabeth. It is a singular fact, that has often been noted, that the art of writing prayers has been practically lost. At any rate, no petition made in modern times will compare with these beautiful compositions of the reign of Elizabeth. The Book of Common Prayer possesses a literary interest scarcely inferior to that of the Revised Version itself. Its language is invariably pure and often touches a grace and beauty unexcelled in any other prose of the language. Never, we think, did Ruskin make a greater mistake than when he found fault with what he considered the redundancies. In spite of what he said the language is almost perfect.

A very interesting note appears to the new edition of Sonnets of Samuel Waddington. The author says :

The late illustrious critic, Mr. W. E. Henley, in an otherwise favourable review of my "Century of Sonnets," took exception to the occasional use therein of variant forms of the sonnet, such as that with octosyllabic lines ; and the poet, Mr. William Watson, in a letter he addressed to me in 1890, expressed somewhat similar views. I fully concur with both of these writers in thinking that the legitimate form of the Guittonian sonnet with decasyllabic lines is the best, and I have almost invariably used it.

It may be interesting to quote the sonnet which is generally thought to be Waddington's best, and which was included in the "Century of Sonnets" :

It was late summer, and the grass again
Had grown knee-deep,—we stood, my love and I,
A while in silence where the stream runs by ;
Idly we listened to a plaintive strain—
A young maid singing to her youthful swain—
Ah me, dead days remembered make us sigh,
And tears will sometimes flow we know not why ;
"If spring be past," I said, "shall love remain ?"

She moved aside, yet soon she answered me,
Turning her gaze responsive to mine own—
"Spring days are gone, and yet the grass, we see Unto a goodly height again hath grown ;
Belovèd, thus love's aftermath may be
A richer growth than e'er spring-days have known."

If authors were to be judged by their fertility and copiousness, a very high place would have to be awarded to Mrs. Stannard, who claims that her last novel is the ninety-sixth which has come out under her pen-name of John Strange Winter. Nor does the ninety-six include everything, as she informs us that there are, in addition, nine long supplements to the Family Herald. It is no wonder that at the end she has to confess, "I am now tired of writing novels"; and it sounds pathetic when she adds, "But it does not do to be tired of earning one's living." The confession altogether is a very sad one. We are afraid that earning one's living and literature have, in the case of novels, very little to do with each other.

Novelists who try to trim their sails to the breeze ought to study the halfpenny press. If they do they will come upon such treasures as the following, which is described in a large-type heading as "A Romantic Reunion of Old Village Lovers" :

A broken village courtship has just had an interesting sequel. After more than fifty years of separation, Mrs. Ellen Briggs of Stevenage, Herts, is going out to Australia to marry the lover of her early days. Mrs. Briggs, who is seventy-six years of age, lost trace of her sweetheart, and has since been three times married. The man himself has survived four wives. Now he has communicated with the object of his youthful affections, and is anxious to marry his sweetheart of half a century ago.

The romance attaching to a marriage after three weddings had been gone through by one of the parties and four by the other is a very modern product.

No one would associate the appalling disaster in Jamaica with any touch of the absurd. Mr. Hall Caine, however, is able to adorn every subject with colours of his own choosing. Like a conjurer, he produces oranges and rabbits from the most unlikely places. On January 16 he took occasion to inform the audience of the Adelphi, where his own play is running, that he had received a personal communication from Mr. Winston Churchill in regard to his brother's safety. How many of the audience were thirsting for news of Mr. Ralph Hall Caine we do not know. It is reasonable to suppose that if any of them were suffering from anxiety for near relatives in the island they would have foregone or postponed the pleasure of seeing The Bondman; but even the prospect of a new Lycidas, another Adonais, or a twentieth-century Thyrsis being added to our literature would hardly have compensated them for the loss of Mr. Ralph Hall Caine, whom we are glad to see contributing some days later to a contemporary a healthy account of the disaster. It suggests a new reading for Milton :

Where the great vision on the Greeba mount Looks towards Namanzos, and Hall Cainia's hold.

It is a curious literary and dramatic precedent which, consciously or unconsciously, Mr. Hall Caine has established. How odd it will seem if one evening after the curtain has fallen on The Doctor's Dilemma, Mr. Bernard Shaw announces that he has just received a telegram from Sir Frederick Treves saying that his uncle, from whom he has expectations, was successfully operated on for appendicitis! Or if we read in the morning paper: "At the close of the performance of The New Aladdin last night Mr. George Edwardes announced that he had received a telegram from the Home Office, saying that in a recent railway disaster at Salisbury no one had been identified as an habitual visitor at the Gaiety Theatre." Or that, "At the Garrick Theatre last night Mr. Arthur Boucher announced before the curtain rose that in a recent dynamite explosion at Liverpool only one dramatic critic was killed." At His Majesty's Theatre on Wednesday evening Mr. Beerbohm Tree, in the entr'acte, read a telegram from Lord Northcliffe: "Your brother Max has arrived at Naples; Vesuvius is quite safe."

The season of German Opera is now in full swing, and the performances have been as well attended as their excellence deserves. The popularity of Grand Opera is becoming so great that the good day is not far distant when music lovers will not be obliged to wait for foreign visitors and to pay exorbitant prices for seats or be crowded into impossible places, as is now too often the case at Covent Garden. One of the most interesting features of this Winter Season is the production of Weber's Freischütz. It has not been given for many years in England and is seldom heard even on the Continent. Yet the opera is pure music, full of melody and grace, and the story is simple and delightful. We can see no reason why it should not be played for a run, as they say; and its production would considerably ease the strain of perpetual Musical Comedy with its incessant suggestion and vulgarity. People like to feel that they are being educated (Weber would educate them musically), and if they went with set and serious faces, they would soon find their hearts lightened and their ears thrilled by the exquisite, simple melodies and the gay insouciance of the work.

The applause that broke in after Caspar's great drinking song and Agathe's "Leise, leise" showed that the audience could not keep their delight within the bounds which usually obtain at the Opera that is haloed by the epithet Grand. Many useful recruits have been found, of whom we feel confident that more will one day be heard: notably Madame Mary Grey, who has not previously, we believe, appeared in Opera, but whose recital last year bore witness to a superb quality of voice and a fine capacity for comprehending great music. We hope that the Winter Opera Season will become a permanent institution: it is not possible to have too much of such a conspicuously good thing.

A correspondent writes: Beside the amended Liturgy of which your contributor gave us the other week some delightful examples, the rendering of the 23rd Psalm found in a native hut in West Africa—according to a daily paper, which reproduces it—deserves to take its place:

Diety is my pastor. I shall not be indigent.
He maketh me to recumb on the verdant lawns. He leadeth me beside the unrippled liquidities.

He restoreth my spirit. He conducteth me in the avenues of restitude for the cillibry of his appellations.

Indubitably though I perambulate through the glen of the umbrages of the sepulchral dormitories I shall not be perturbed by any appalling catastrophe, for thou art present thy wand and thy crook insinuate delectation.

Thou spreadest a reflection before me in the midst of inimical scrupulations. Thou performest my locks with odoriferous ugent my chalice excubrates.

Unquestionably benignity and commiseration shall continue all the diuturnity of my vitality and I shall eternize my habinance the mistropolis of nature.

God Save the King!

We should like further particulars concerning this remarkable translation.

To Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, though we cannot agree with Pope:

In beauty or wit
No mortal as yet
To question your Empire has dared, we owe a debt of gratitude for the light she has thrown in her letters on the manners of her age. She quarrelled with her ardent admirer in the end, and her temper does not appear to have been an equable one, but she possessed the qualities of sound common sense and humour, united to a love of literature and no small measure of discrimination, and we are interested to learn that the lady who styles herself "George Paston" has unearthed a number of hitherto unpublished letters among the Wortley Montagu manuscripts at Sandon Hall, which are to be embodied in a new Life to be published this spring by Messrs. Methuen.

The net book system is very far-reaching in its effects. One phase of the question is its influence on the public libraries of the country. We have touched upon this aspect of the matter in these columns on several occasions. The Council of the Library Association has been actively engaged in endeavouring to obtain concessions similar to those given to public libraries on the Continent and in America, and to Governmental libraries in this country, but up to the present without success. "As the great extension of the net book system and the new regulation prohibiting the sale of new books at second-hand within six months of publication are matters of grave importance to libraries generally," a special conference of libraries and delegates will be held at 20 Hanover Square on February 27 at 4.30 P.M.

The list of Mr. Carnegie's gifts, to which we referred a few weeks since, contains the names of twenty-five libraries. Five of these obtained small sums, as additions to those previously received, for the completion of buildings, or to defray excess expenditure. Four only are sums under £2000. This is satisfactory as showing that the number of small libraries, which can hope for success only in a comprehensive county scheme, is not increasing proportionately. Ten of the gifts were for the extension, or rebuilding of existing libraries, or for the provision of branches. These particulars do not include those of gifts to the libraries in our colonies, nor to those in the United States. The greatest need of the public library movement in this country, apart from the needs embodied in the Omnibus Library Bill and already referred to on several occasions in these columns, is the foundation of a professorial chair. Compared with the sums freely given for the erection of libraries the cost of the endowment of this would be insignificant.

LITERATURE

SELECT EPIGRAMS

Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology. Edited with revised Text, Translation, Introduction and Notes, by J. W. MACKAIL. New edition revised throughout. (Longmans, 14s. net.)

Is there any fixed standard of literary taste? Juvenal speaks of Statius as an enchanting poet, and Addison shared his enthusiasm. Dante, Addison and Macaulay regarded Lucan as one of the great poets of the world; now it is rare to meet a man who has read through the "Pharsalia" or the "Thebais," and Martial doubts whether Lucan is a poet, though he sells well; as did Martin Tupper fifty years ago, though now his "Proverbial Philosophy" shares the oblivion which has overwhelmed Montgomery's "Satan" and Pollok's "Course of Time." Lord Chesterfield, writing to his son on January 25, 1745, calls the Greek epigrams "the worst company in the world," adding "Martial has wit, and is worth your looking into sometimes." Mr. Mackail, in his "Latin Literature," says of Martial:

He appealed strongly to all that was worst in Roman taste—its heavy-handedness, its admiration of verbal cleverness, its tendency towards brutality.

He likens some of Martial's epigrams to the cracker mottoes of modern times, and, in contrasting him with the Greek Anthology in its flourishing period, writes:

The art practised with such infinite grace by Greek artists of almost every age between Solon and Justinian was at this [Martial's] period sunk to a low ebb. The contemporary Greek epigrammatists all show the same heaviness of handling and the same tiresome insistence on making a point.

Mr. Mackail's Introduction is an entirely delightful piece of work. The subtle and beautifully expressed analysis of the Oxford Professor of Poetry makes it quite a different thing from the ordinary introduction to a classical edition by an editor who, however excellent as a scholar, is seldom trained to investigate minutely how our sensibilities and emotions are related to the art of expression and affected by the mystery of the external world. Mr. Mackail is no indiscriminate eulogist of the epigrammatists even at their zenith. He admits that Nature has a smaller part in the Anthology than in modern poetry:

The appeal from man to Nature, and especially the appeal to Nature as knowing more about man's destiny than he knows himself, was unknown to the Greek poets.

One cannot imagine a Greek poet taking Nature into his confidence or emphasising her sympathy with his moods as in Tennyson's:

On the bald street breaks the blank day;

or Lytton's:

The day comes up above the roofs
All sallow from a night of rain.

When Burns sings:

Ye banks and braes o' bonie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae weary, fu' o' care!

he craves sympathy. When Meleager (about B.C. 100) asks the meadows why they laugh in vain, it is only to point out that they need not aspire to rival the radiance of Zenophiles's smile.

The Greek, like the Japanese, anthologists had an intensely sensuous love of the outer world, the delights of soft grass, flowers, cool waters, sunshine, shade and murmuring sound; but none of them would have thought of saying, with Wordsworth, of a lovely maiden:

And beauty born of murmuring sound
Shall pass into her face;

or with Shelley:

I love snow, and all the forms
Of the radiant frost;
I love waves, and winds, and storms,
Everything almost
Which is Nature's, and may be Untainted by man's misery.

Which of them had a heart that danced with the daffodils, or was in love with the sweet jargon of all the little birds that are? Even the "Thalysia" of Theocritus, "that perfect example of the poetry of a summer day," stops short of describing natural objects for their own sake apart from their relations to man. On this Mr. Mackail makes an interesting comment:

Perhaps the nearest approach that Greek poetry makes to this is a remarkable fragment of Sophocles describing the shiver that runs through the leaves of a poplar when all the other trees stand silent and motionless.

He compares the fragment (Ageus, fr. 24) with the glorious simile in Keats's "Hyperion" beginning:

As when upon a tranced summer night,

in which the forest trees are "green-robed senators."

We have said that the Greek poet could not have uttered the sentiment of Shelley quoted above; but we do not mean that he did not share Shelley's sense of man's misery. Death and great darkness after death lay like a pall over the pageant of the world:

Medio de fonte leporum
Surgit amari aliquid quod in ipsis floribus angat.

Sometimes life is a thorn without a rose. Here is a wail from Leonidas of Tarentum, § 12, 27 (fl. B.C. 270):

Infinite, O man, was the foretime until thou camest to thy dawn, and what remains is infinite on through Hades. What share is left for life but the bigness of a pinprick, and tinier than a pinprick if such there be? Little is thy life and afflicted: not sweet, but more loathed than hateful death.

Sometimes, too, the rose finds a place. Rufinus (fl. under Justinian), sending a garland to Rhodoclea (§ 9, 2), adds:

Garlanding thyself with these flowers cease to be high-minded: even as the garland thou also dost flower and fall.

Anon there is the gentle resignation of Wordsworth, in an epitaph (§ 3, 42) on a girl who died young, by Callimachus (fl. B.C. 250):

The daughters of the Samians often require (δίδονται) Crethis, the teller of tales, who knew pretty games, sweetest of workfellows, ever talking: but she sleeps here the sleep to which they all must come.

One feels what a delightful creature was Crethis, and one is reminded of that charming poem of Mr. Arnold, "Strew on her roses, roses," which is so redolent of Greek Anthology, especially in the verse:

Her mirth the world required:
She bathed it in smiles of glee.
But her heart was tired, tired,
And now they let her be.

Here is a desperate saying (§ 3, 62) of Callimachus, in which the poet questions the dead man, who answers:

O Charidas, what of the under world? Great darkness. And what of the resurrection? A lie. And Pluto? A fable: we perish utterly.

But, again, many of the epigrammatists find consolation in the sources to which Omar Khayyam so constantly appeals. Of this vein a good example is xii. 13, by Zonas (fl. B.C. 80):

Give me the sweet cup wrought of the earth, from which I was born and under which I shall lie dead.

And this, xii. 2, by Nicarchus (probably under Nero):

Must I not die? What matters it to me whether I depart to Hades gouty or fleet of foot? For many will carry me. Let me go lame, I will not leave my revelling, I fancy, to save them labour.

The great majority of the epigrams, however, breathe a spirit of gaiety and light-heartedness, which in Roman times often degenerated into crudity and even vulgarity. We have the snake-bite when:

The man recovered of the bite,
The snake it was that died, and the lady who can boast that her hair is her own because it is bought and paid for. Jest of Roman times on tumours, ruptures, and other bodily infirmities suggest a low standard of taste; but they form a very infinitesimal fraction among more than five thousand epigrams embracing a thousand years; and no offensive pieces, of course, have found their way into the five hundred selected by Mr. Mackail. The notes, as might be expected from the Professor of Poetry, are full of delightful parallels from modern literature, and they show finished scholarship.

Mr. Mackail justly remarks that most readers would agree on three-fourths of the epigrams to be admitted, while with regard to the remainder, perhaps hardly two persons would be in accordance. We own we missed a few favourites. We should have welcomed more from that consummate artist Paulus Silentiarius, who, under Justinian, rivalled the grace of Meleager. We missed Herodicus with his admirable description of the dry-as-dust pedants who "settled Hoti's business" in the ancient world:

γωνιοβύμβυκες, μονοσύλλαβοι, οἱσι μέμλε τὸ σφίγν καὶ σφῶιν καὶ τὸ μίγν ἦδὲ τὸ νίγν.

But most of all do we regret the absence of one epigram of Callimachus, not only on account of its cleverness, but because it illustrates Bentley's amazing powers as an emendator. The epigram before Bentley ran thus:

τὴν ἀλὴν Εὐδήμος, ἐφ' ἧς ἄλα λιτὸν ἐπελθὼν χειμῶνας μεγάλους ἐξέφυγεν Δαναῶν.

The last word was the correction of a supposed error, δανέων, debts, found in all the manuscripts. With this correction the meaning was supposed to be:

Eudemus dedicates the ship in which, after crossing a smooth sea, he escaped great storms of the Danaï (i.e., such as they encountered).

Bentley [saw what poor stuff this was, that ἀλὴ was "a saltcellar," and δανέων, debts, was right. The change of one letter turned nonsense into wit; he corrected ἐπελθὼν to ἐπίσθων and translated:

Eudemus dedicates his saltcellar with which by picking from it a frugal grain of salt he escaped the ill winds of debt.

Beautiful as is Mr. Mackail's prose translation, one craves verse. Perhaps that is an impossible consummation, though devoutly to be wished. If it should ever be achieved, Mr. Mackail is the man to do it. It would have been pleasant to quote a few of the best verse renderings, but they would probably be familiar to many of our readers.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE PEDESTRIAN MUSE

Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays. By the Hon. ALBERT S. G. CANNING. (Unwin, 16s. net.)

ONCE upon a time, when one of the Napoleons who have parcelled out the field of modern journalism among them was in the making, he was advised to secure the services of a young man of brilliant promise. The latter had written a book—one of those made with blood and tears—and sent it as the only credential he cared to show. In reply the said Napoleon suggested a series of "catching" articles, and added: "I will peruse your volume." And that was the last communication that passed between them. "Peruse" was the word that killed the correspondence. "I have perused a bill, and, sad to say, I have perused a summons; but to peruse my book!" Whereupon the young man bestowed much bad language upon the budding Napoleon, and applied to him many slangy and irreverent terms, of which the mildest was "rotter." A memory of this incident was suggested by the book before us. Its author is a master of the prosaic, nor have we encountered any other commentator equally skilled in the art of reducing noble poetry to small beer. The book contains more than five hundred pages of solid print, and the plan adopted is to make a running analysis of each play accompanied by a description of the most famous passages. Here, taken at random, is a description of the three witches in Macbeth:

These three, in their first conversation together, reveal malignant hatred to the human race, as well as their great, yet strangely limited power, and also their complete union in design and thought. One of the witches relates having been refused some chestnuts by a sailor's wife, and vindictively discloses her plan of revenge on the husband, regretfully admitting her limited powers of mischief, which enable her to torment the luckless sailor for a certain time, but not to destroy his vessel.

"Vindictively discloses her plan of revenge"; "regretfully admitting"—do not these attain to a delicious perfection of commonplace? The following characterisation of Lady Macbeth is equally worthy of notice:

She is a thoroughly hardened, ambitious woman, resolute and utterly unscrupulous. Her love for Macbeth, upon which so much stress has been laid, seems, when considered in reference to her worldly position and interests, worthy of little, if any, commendation. She knows her fortunes are now linked with his, and that with his increasing power her own will rise proportionately, owing to her influence over him.

Study and analysis indeed! "Worthy of little, if any, commendation" is a phrase to be proud of—excellent "good words." Mr. Canning's reprehension of Macbeth and his wife is done in a style that would not disgrace a village schoolmaster. "They are merely a cruel, ungrateful, selfish couple." They pursue a mean object, and the Hon. A. S. G. Canning is astonished that "Lady Macbeth has been represented both on the stage and in song with a dignity and grandeur almost worthy of Catherine of Aragon, Joan of Arc, or Margaret of Anjou."

At the risk of boring our readers we must give ourselves the pleasure of quoting one more passage about Lady Macbeth:

She is evidently meant to be a person of great spirit and daring but her plot against the King is worthy of the most cowardly assassin who was ever deservedly executed. Shakespeare makes Lady Macbeth confess that, had not Duncan resembled her own father when asleep, she would have slain him herself. This very slight touch of human feeling has been much commented on, as if it were rather redeeming, yet, if examined, it is surely of very little consequence. She was about to commit a deliberate murder, but fancied the intended victim resembled one of her own family, so preferred to have him killed by another, while fully resolved on his death. Had he resembled any one else, she would have murdered him herself without scruple.

But at times the author is suggestive, as when, after the passage: "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased," etc., he remarks that this "passionate appeal would have been more suitably addressed to a clergyman, or trusted friend, than to a medical man"! The zenith of the quotidian is, however, reached in the description of the celebrated lines:

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow; a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more: it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing

This is "a brief yet wise reflection on the shortness and uncertainty of human life." Enough of Macbeth and the excursions into the bathos it has prompted. A word must be devoted to Sir John Falstaff. The Hon. A. S. G. Canning comments on the first part of Henry IV. in the very spirit of paterfamilias! "Sir John is a compound of self-indulgence, falsehood, licentiousness and shameless roguery," while Hal, Prince Henry he is primly called, is dealt with thus:

Satisfying his too easy conscience by purposing reformation, he never considers the vile example every hour of his life sets even to his younger brothers—none of whom, happily, follow it—nor the grief and shame, if not danger, which it causes to his toil-worn father, to whose sense and energy he owes alike his present position and high expectations. He flatters himself that the more dissolute he now is the more noble will his altered conduct make him appear in future, forgetting that he might die at any moment, leaving a reputation disgraceful and even dangerous to his family and the nation.

After that it would be creating a surfeit of good things if we were to quote the unconscious humour of the analysis, paraphrase or solemn travesty of Sir John's witty speeches. No equal revelation of the absolute commonplace has ever appeared in an English book. One would have imagined it to be almost incredible that any one should be attracted to the study of Shakespeare who did not take a deep delight in those exquisite passages in which we see the genius of the poet raised to its utmost heights; but to these the author seems blind.

AUSTRALIAN MARRIAGE RULES

Kinship Organisations and Group Marriage in Australia. By N. W. THOMAS. (Cambridge: University Press, 6s. net.)

MR. THOMAS'S book of a hundred and sixty pages is the necessary complement, and to some extent the criticism, of the large collections of facts which we owe to Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, Dr. Roth, Dr. Howitt, Mrs. Langlois Parker, and to the less widely known "Ethnological Notes" of Mr. R. W. Mathews (Sydney: F. W. White, 1905). Mr. Thomas has also studied many scientific periodicals, German, Australian, and American, and many books of the prescientific period, which occasionally yield us useful facts or clues. It may be said that "what he does not know is not knowledge," as far as printed records of the native ways are concerned. He is also able to point out the imperfections and inconsistencies which occur in our most recent and elaborate records; and, when occasion arises, he demonstrates that even the best qualified observers are not, when they stray into theory, necessarily impeccable logicians.

Mr. Thomas's first chapter contains a highly condensed account of savage social organisations—tribes, kinship groups, totem kins, and phratries (intermarrying exogamous divisions of the tribe), not in Australia only, but wherever they occur, in America, Africa, Melanesia, New Guinea, India and elsewhere. The references are copious and often novel. The second chapter deals with descent, whether in the paternal or maternal line, and (pp. 12, 13) is not precisely favourable to the new theory of "conceptional" totemism, as "primitive." However, he admits that "patrilineal descent may have been directly evolved without the intermediate form of reckoning through females." Anything may have occurred "in the dark backward and abysm of Time," but "whereas evidence of the passage from female to male reckoning may be observed, there is virtually none of a change in the opposite direction." "The problem is probably insoluble. . . . All that can be said is that in the kinship organisations known to us female descent seems to have prevailed in the vast majority of cases, and probably existed in the residual class of indeterminable examples."

But why did early mankind, almost if not quite universally, reckon descent of the kin-name, and inheritance of things hereditary, first in the female line? Why have many races shifted to reckoning in the male line? We can only offer hypotheses, and of these hypotheses we can only prefer such as are self-consistent to such as are self-contradictory. As to the second question, why was the transition made from reckoning in the female to reckoning in the male line, Mr. Thomas justly says that "the subject needs to be discussed in detail for each particular area before general conclusions can be formulated." Thus many Australian tribes, on a very low level of material culture, have made the transition from female to male reckoning long ago; while Melanesian peoples, much more advanced in civilisation, are, even now, still struggling towards the transition. The truth is that we cannot, with our present knowledge, and on the strength of evidence sometimes self-contradictory (pp. 22, 23), answer the questions about descent.

We next turn to the organisations called totem kins, phratries, and matrimonial classes, in their various combinations, and Mr. Thomas illustrates, by maps and "tables," the territorial distribution of these associations, all over known Australia. This is a work of great labour, very efficiently performed. Mr. Thomas makes it clear that when the names of the phratries and matrimonial classes can be translated, they are names of animals, which indicates some relationship, probably, between the phratries and classes, on the one hand, and the system of totemism, on the other. But, among the class names, only a few are translated with certainty, and no stress is laid on probable but conjectural renderings. As to the phratry names, out of fifty-eight, nineteen can be certainly translated—they are animal names—and some six others can be guessed at with much probability. Mr. Thomas prefers the view that "the phratry names" (say Black and White Cockatoo, Crow and White Cockatoo, Crow and Eagle Hawk) "were selected in some way, and were not due to some accident of savage wit." As far as we know the phratry names usually indicate contrasts, either in the colour of the animals, or in their habitats. To two opposed sets of persons in the tribe, names indicative of opposition were given. The sets were contrasted but allied: all persons were, say, either White or Black Cockatoos; Black Cockatoos could marry only White Cockatoos, and vice versa. This archaic rule was either the result (1) of more or less unconscious evolution; or (2) of a conscious and purposeful reformation of a previous promiscuity. Mr. Thomas decides against the second theory, that of conscious reformation. His arguments (pp. 68–70) seem difficult to answer, for we are not told how anybody could dream that there was anything to reform; while the arrangement does not attain the supposed reformatory purpose; and the hypotheses of the partisans of a theory of conscious reform are vague and self-contradictory. Mr. Thomas is averse from the theory of primitive promiscuity, and tears into shreds the arguments in favour of the actual existence of "group marriage" among certain tribes. He dissects the late Mr. Morgan's elaborate hypothesis, which is hardly necessary, for "Morgan is utterly inconsistent," that is, has nothing that can be called a theory. Chapters xii. and xiii. contain criticisms of the "Group marriage" theory of Dr. Howitt and of Messrs. Spencer and Gillen. No doubt they will have replies to make; of what nature these may be we can know nothing till they are placed before us. Perhaps they will adduce new facts, or correct previous statements; for, as Mr. Thomas says, "it will be seen that our information is very fragmentary, and what we have is neither precise nor free from contradiction." This is not extraordinary, when we consider that the tribes are decadent and dwindling, that their dialects are obscurely known; that, for all we are told, they sometimes give evidence in "pidgeon" English; and that their customary laws are breaking down under the many strains of contact with colonial civilisation. We have to thank, not to blame, the energetic collectors of information; but we cannot, at present, say that their facts are a safe basis of a consistent theory.

Mr. Thomas's book is a severely critical and much-needed essay in restraint of the making of hasty theories. A similar work by him on Australian Magic and Religion would satisfy a want acutely felt by students.

ANDREW LANG.

LAFCADIO HEARN

Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn. By ELIZABETH BISLAND. (Constable, 24s. net.)

IN the late 'forties England still held the Ionian Islands. The Surgeon-Major in the 76th Foot, when the regiment was ordered to Greece, was a certain Charles Bush Hearn. He was a handsome young Irishman with Dorsetshire blood in his veins (for the family went to Ireland only in 1693) and gipsy blood, too, legend says, Hearn being a good Romany name. Between the garrison and the islanders of Cerigo fierce animosity prevailed: but no danger could prevent the Surgeon-Major from falling passionately in love with a beautiful Greek girl, Rosa Cerigota, and from winning her love. Her brothers stabbed him and left him on the road-side for dead. The girl found him, and, hiding him in a barn, nursed him back to life. Then the lovers ran away to Santa Maura and were married. Their first child died at birth: their second child, born in 1850, was called after the island Lefkada and his name was Lafcadio—Lafcadio Hearn. On his palm was a strange thumb-print, and that thumb-print is well known to be the certain mark of Romany descent.

In the Ionian Islands Lafcadio Hearn was born. "I have memory of a place and a magical time, in which the sun and the moon were larger and brighter than now. . . . I know the sky was very much more blue and nearer to the world." And it is memorable that George Gissing won his way at last against desperate odds, fighting poverty, ill-health and starvation, to the same Greek islands from which Hearn started his life and from which he took the memory of One who ruled those islands and who told him of a charm "that I must never never lose because it would keep me young and give me power to return." It remained with him even in straits as desperate as any that had gripped George Gissing, that charm which keeps man aloof from bitterness; for the One who ruled those islands was Beauty. The hope of Beauty kept Gissing alive until Beauty welcomed him at last to this domain of hers; and she set her influence upon the child Lafcadio and sent him through the world—her impassioned troubadour. Beauty is not limited in her presence; but it is a pleasant phantasy, this breathing-space of the two men, proper artists, contemporary almost and strangely dissimilar, the one starting life and the other meeting death, by the Ionian sea where the sky is "very much more blue and nearer to the world."

Six years Lafcadio Hearn lived there: then the family left Cerigo and returned to Dublin, where trouble came upon him. His father and mother quarrelled and Rosa ran away with a cousin back to the blue islands and the boy was given into the charge of a strict aunt, Mrs. Brenane, who frightened him with tales of God and turned his love of beauty into a reproach. The child fought against her narrow evil teaching and was counted wicked. "For the best of possible reasons I then believed in ghosts and goblins, because I saw them both by day and by night. Before going to sleep I would always cover up my head to prevent them from looking at me; and I used to scream when I felt them pulling at the bedclothes." And when Mrs. Brenane tried to make clear to him the meaning of the invocation, In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, it is small wonder that only the last Being was of any interest to him, and that the only impression left upon his mind was that the "Holy Ghost was a white ghost and not in the habit of making faces at small people after dusk." But his cousin Jane, whose spirit he saw one day when she was alive and far away from the house, was the chief origin of his terror; and to her strenuous efforts to impress him with a proper sense of sin and fear of the tortures of hell, he owed the feeling of horror, impending like a doom, that filled his heart with distrust. "Woe, woe, thou didst destroy it, the beautiful world!" But just at the time when his sympathy with the enemies of cousin Jane's God was strengthening, he came upon great folio books on Greek mythology with many illustrations of nymphs and fairies and gods and heroes; and he came into his own. By a kind of childish instinct he realised that these gods had been belied because they were beautiful. "Blindly and gropingly I had touched a truth—the ugly truth that beauty of the highest order whether mental or moral or physical must ever be hated by the many and loved only by the few!" All honour to Mrs. Brenane and to cousin Jane. They did their thankless negative work thoroughly: they even laid hands on those folios and cut out with a penknife the breasts of the nymphs and inked in clothes on the splendid naked limbs of the goddesses. Thereby they helped Lafcadio to know their real beauty more than many lectures could have done and filled him with a lasting rage against all enemies of beauty. Mrs. Brenane too gave him food and comfortable shelter; cousin Jane left him a library of books collected before she became devout. Of that kind of narrow superstition he wrote afterwards—"its horizon is solid stone, its sky a material vault."

This child of a passionate love, with the Romany thumb-print upon his palm, who seemed born with a memory of other lives, and who, with that vision which the blinding of one eye with a knotted rope could not affect, always saw a little further than other children of men, became the apostle of the Old, the Queer, the Exotic, the Monstrous. But he never lapsed into pettiness, because he remained in touch with the whole greatness of things by reason of his great understanding of Beauty. Beauty was his religion and through the power of Beauty he attained to that ultimate harmony between himself and life which the eccentric is apt to miss.

Upon the surroundings of his childhood and early youth Miss Elizabeth Bisland dwells. As much as possible she endeavours to tell the story from fragments of autobiography and from chance words which Mrs. Hearn remembers and relates with Japanese charm in exquisitely dainty English. The facts of his later life Miss Bisland tells with exactly the brevity and precision with which such facts should be told. Indeed, it is a pleasure to feel that too much praise cannot be given for the ability and reverence with which she has done her work. Facts become insignificant compared with the interest and importance of the comment upon them which the letters afford. In 1869 Hearn was starving in New York, where his only friend was an Irish carpenter. Then he went to Cincinnati and eventually became a hack-journalist who rose on the paper through the lurid cleverness of his treatment of a murder. The year 1877 finds him in New Orleans, still a journalist, but translating Gautier in his spare time, when his eyesight allowed him, and working at his first book, "Chinese Ghosts." The books were sold, and he had the opportunity of visiting the Tropics, which laid their spell over him for ever. Gradually he overcame the giant Circumstance in spite of ill-health, and in 1890 he arrived in Japan, and by teaching in schools, lecturing in colleges, and writing, he was at length enabled to live in happiness. He married Setsu Roizumi, a Japanese lady, and became a Japanese subject. In the last fourteen years of his life he found his life's work. At the age of forty, when most men have done learning, and the crust of habit has formed upon their minds and manners, Lafcadio Hearn began to learn a new language and was able to understand a new people, to enter into their mode of thought and mode of living, and to do so without losing his own personality.

The letters show the gradual growth in him of that power in his character which made this possible. He remained sensitive, and his life vindicates the truth of the great saying that Nature is on the side of the most sensitive. Men are apt in daily life to stigmatise such a character glibly as shrinking, weak, timid, and to pass on without recognising the strength and vitality and courage which are needed to keep such a personality from the easy lapse into indifference. Lafcadio Hearn was able to remain sensitive through that power of his, noticeable in his earliest childhood, of seeing a little beyond the material fact and of trusting in his vision. He welcomed the hardest facts of science as a kind of challenge: and he looked at them until they were illumined by the light from beyond and he could see them truly. "Isolated facts," he wrote, "are worthy of consideration only in their relation to universal, and, perhaps, eternal laws." All his work is informed by this sensitive disposition; his delicate handling of words, his subtle perception, his strange fascination, his choice of theme: these are signs of it. But in his letters its unveiled beauty is apparent. Therein lies their extreme charm. Whether he is writing to his friend Krebbiel to prevent his depression on feeling himself too small a man for the Art of Music—

The Vatican with its sixty thousand rooms is but a child's toy house compared with but one of the countless wings of Art's infinite temples; and the outer world, viewing only the entrance, narrow and low as that of a pyramid, can no more comprehend the illimitable that lies beyond it than they can measure the deeps of the Eternities beyond the fixed stars. . . . It seems to me that want of confidence in one's self is not less a curse than it appears to be a consequence of knowledge; —or whether he is writing to an old pupil, a Japanese with all the instinct of the Samurai, who has quarrelled with his wife and is showing him her point of view, as he does show it with infinite delicacy and quiet firmness, always and in all his relations with men and women, the very inspiration of tenderness and of understanding seems to be expressed, and to colour his humour, his style, his view of life, everything indeed that he touched with the sacred colour of Beauty. One never forgets that he was born in a place where the sky was very much more blue and nearer to the world than are the places in which most men are born.

PLAIN AND COLOURED

Firelight Fancies. By WALLACE BERTRAM NICHOLS. (The Tallis Press, 2s. 6d.)

The Truce of God, and other Poems. By WILLIAM STEVENS. (Dent, 2s. 6d. net.)

The Lady Beautiful. By F. E. WALROND. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.)

The Re-union of Adam and Eve. By DAVID DAVENPORT. (Hammond, 1s. net.)

Songs to Desideria and other Poems. By the Hon. STEPHEN COLERIDGE. (Lane, 2s. net.)

Lyrics of Life and Beauty. By MARCUS S. C. RICKARDS. (Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d. net.)

Paper Pellets. By JESSIE POPE. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.)

A Sheaf of Songs. By MRS. CALVERT SPENSLEY. (Gay & Bird, 1s. net.)

Meditata. By WALTER HOGG. (Wellwood, 1s. 6d. net.)

A Book of Masks. By WILBUR UNDERWOOD. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. 6d. net.)

For indeed 'tis a sweet and peculiar pleasure,
And blest is the man who such happiness finds
To enjoy but a span in the hours of leisure
Of elegant, pure, and aerial minds.

THE undoubted fact that Keats is the author of the above lines, and that, when he wrote them, he was several years older than Master Wallace Bertram Nichols was when he wrote the verses contained in "Firelight Fancies" (we are informed, in a publisher's note, that they are the work of a schoolboy, and written between the ages of thirteen and sixteen) will not deter us from saying that Master Nichols would be much better employed in reading poetry than in attempting to write it, or at any rate to publish it. We do not war on babes and sucklings and it would be unkind to overweight this statement of opinion with quotations from the volume. A boy may write very poor poetry at the age of fifteen and may yet live to become a great poet. On the other hand he may not. In either case he is pretty sure, sooner or later, to regret the publication of immature work.

In the case of Mr. William Stevens, the author of "The Truce of God," we are confronted by a very much worse state of affairs. Mr. Stevens has rashly ornamented his volume with his own portrait, thereby providing the reviewer with evidence that he has reached an age when he can no longer have any valid excuse for imagining that he can write poetry. It is true that in the preface to his book we are informed that, in acknowledging a copy of these poems, Mr. Gladstone wrote that he "much admired their sentiment and feeling, which cannot but influence favourably the minds of all who may become acquainted with them." But our belief in the infallibility of Mr. Gladstone as a judge of literature did not survive the publication of his own poetical works. Mr. Stevens goes on in his preface to say that the residue of the first edition, thus blessed by Mr. Gladstone, was consumed in an outbreak of fire, and that the present re-issue of the book is due to "the suggestion of a friend." Mr. Stevens is evidently a hardened offender, and we feel that it is our duty to quote. Here are the five opening lines of "An Idyll of the City," a poem in blank (very blank) verse:

Success had crowned our venture once again.
My fortunes founded, and provision made
To keep my heirs in wealth, I now had reached
The goal of my desires, so long pursued.
A life of labour sought its end in rest.

Mr. Francis Ernley Walrond is an ecstatic poet, but his ecstasy unfortunately takes the form of exclamation marks and vain repetition. Here is a stanza from "The Skylark's Song":

Spring! Spring! Spring!
O the brave Spring!
Spring! Spring! Spring! Spring! Spring!
Spring!!
There is no Spring like our Spring.
There is no world like our world.

There are four more lines to the stanza, but perhaps our readers have had enough. Mr. Francis Ernley Walrond reminds us of Mr. Micawber when he likened himself to the leopard, which before making a leap crouches down to the very lowest possible point. Mr. Walrond gets very low down indeed, but he does not spring: he sinks.

Mr. David Davenport writes of "the re-union of Adam and Eve," who, as he informs us, according to an ancient legend rejoined each other after a separation of a hundred years. As Adam explains:

So year on year we lived
In constant wrangling, till at last she rose
With bitter tauntings and a fierce farewell.

However, like the Jumlies in Edward Lear's delightful rhyme, in a hundred years she came back, and though she was, not unnaturally, rather nervous as to the sort of reception she might get after such a comparatively long absence—

Misgivings vex me lest relentless Time
Have marred my beauty—

Adam, who perhaps had missed her less than she thought, received her very kindly, and showed a pleasing readiness to let bygones be bygones. We should wish to extend the same charity to Mr. Davenport, but we confess that it requires an effort.

In "Songs to Desideria," by Mr. Stephen Coleridge, we find tuneful and easy verse, informed now and then with feeling and emotion which we feel to be real. The volume is slight but pleasing.

The same cannot be said of Mr. Marcus Rickards's ambitiously named "Lyrics of Life and Beauty." While the verses it contains are free from faults of taste, and are not ill-written, they are dull and heavy, and there seems to be no reason why they should have been published. They have not even the saving grace of that unconscious humour that has cheered the weary reviewer through the arid wastes of the greater portion of the books reviewed in this article: But we are unfair to Mr. Rickards: we are blaming him because his verses are not bad enough to be funny.

We find that "Paper Pellets," a volume of humorous verse by Miss Jessie Pope, has strayed into the serious company of this batch of "poets." The greater part of Miss Pope's volume consists of pieces reprinted from Punch. The best we can say about them is that they are occasionally mildly amusing. But what can be said of this sort of sentiment, except that it is mawkish and silly? It is about a little boy and his governess:

The baby eyes were blue and sweet
He lifted to her face.
First he attended to his feet
And put his hands in place,
Then said with stiff and rigid spine,
"Please will you be my Valentine?"

Small Jimmie conquered in a fray
Where stalwart men would flee.
The governess pushed her book away
And took him on her knee.
The end of the affair was this—
A wistful sigh, a tender kiss.

Reader, have you a lump in your throat? We have one in ours. We are rough men, but we have our feelings.

In "A Sheaf of Songs" by Mrs. Calvert Spensley we have some charmingly felt and well written poetry. We wish we had space to quote "In Early Spring" (it cannot be quoted except in its entirety without spoiling its delicate beauty). This small volume also contains some good sonnets.

Mr. Walter Hogg, in "Meditata," gives us a volume entirely composed of sonnets. They are written with considerable skill and distinction in spite of an occasionally irritating arrangement of rhymes in his sextets.

"A Book of Masks," by Wilbur Underwood reveals a sensitive soul and a skilful hand. The author derives from Ernest Dowson and further back from Mr. Swinburne. When we say that he derives from Ernest Dowson we would not wish it to be thought that he is an imitator or even necessarily a disciple of that poet; we see merely a kinship of thought and manner. We are not at all sure that Dowson ever wrote anything better than the best that appears in this dainty volume. We would particularly commend "Bal Céleste," an exquisite and plaintive little lyric. Here is the last verse:

It is a dream with love aglow
Seen only by the childlike wise;
A child-heart dreamed it long ago—
A fête-champêtre in Paradise.

And here are two stanzas from "The Children of Night":

Let us go hence, with all the nights that were,
The vast expectant waters thrill and stir
In passionate joy of morning strong and free.
The morning that is not for you and me.

Let us go hence, our joy is overcast,
The pallid peace of night is o'er at last;
Far in the depths with shadows we must flee,
Dawn's breath is on the sea.

"The Masquerade" is perhaps more original and therefore more characteristic of this delicate poet whose future work we shall await with interest.

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

A CULTURED DILETTANTE

The Life of Sir Charles J. F. Bunbury. Edited by his sister-in-law, Mrs. HENRY LYELL. 2 vols. (Murray, 30s. net.)

IT is easy to understand the admiration and affection with which Sir Charles Bunbury inspired his family circle. We cannot, indeed, read the letters and diaries contained in these two substantial volumes without being to some extent affected by similar feelings; but we doubt very much whether Sir Charles Bunbury's achievements were of a character greatly to interest the public. At the most he was a learned amateur in science who yet made no conspicuous contributions to science. The greater part of the seven hundred pages of this biography consists of discussions on subjects connected with geology, botany, and biology, or of accounts of meetings at the Geographical or Geological Society. Sir Charles was no doubt quite competent to criticise the newer theories which were being put forward by Darwin, Sir Charles Lyell and Huxley and others; but his own original work was inconsiderable, though his life as a country gentleman of ample means and leisure afforded him opportunities which his more eminent contemporaries were not fortunate enough to possess.

The main interest of the memoirs is to be found in his references to these contemporaries. He was the son of Sir Henry Edward Bunbury, a distinguished Peninsular soldier who married a niece of Charles James Fox, so that Sir Charles was naturally often at Holland House; his memoirs contain much of the kind of information and anecdote with which we are familiar about the Holland House coterie. When the war was over he travelled in Sicily, where his father had served, in France and Italy, then to the Mauritius and to Buenos Ayres.

His correspondence and his diaries appear to have been preserved carefully, and they are reproduced here with a fulness of detail which of itself shows that their author was one of those fortunate people nati consumere fruges terræ and little else. He married a daughter of a president of the Geological Society, and he and Sir Charles Lyell, who had married another daughter, became brothers-in-law. His domestic circle and his scientific circle were thus largely the same, and his voluminous correspondence is a mélange of science and domesticity. Natural selection and the question of species were the topics of the day; most of his friends were mixed up with them in some branch of science or another, and he had the merit of being amongst the first who understood, and appreciated and accepted the new theories. Many of these letters and learned résumés of books and essays and discussions are records of opinion in the making on these theories. They have now lost their freshness, and, in any case, are only readable by those acquainted with the technicalities of at least three or four sciences.

Sir Charles was a man of some literary cultivation, and as in science so in literature, if he was mediocre himself he delighted to meet the literary and other celebrities of his time, and about these his letters and diaries contain much interesting gossip. Though he never held any political or administrative office he followed political events both at home and abroad with the intelligent curiosity of a man who had lived amongst those who controlled the political machine; but he was never of importance in politics, and the many references to politics contain nothing calling for special observation. He was an amiable, high-principled man who, we can well believe, was highly valued for character and knowledge somewhat above the average even of men of his class. At first the Memoirs were intended only for private circulation. This was a true instinct as to their real province. Their appeal is not to a public personally unacquainted with Sir Charles Bunbury.

LEIGHTON

The Life, Letters and Work of Frederick Leighton. By Mrs. RUSSELL BARRINGTON. 2 vols. (Allen, 42s. net.)

IF Mrs. Russell Barrington's discretion and discernment were equal to her industry and enthusiasm, her two ponderous volumes, which constitute the long-expected official account of Lord Leighton's career and achievements, would be far more satisfactory both as biography and criticism. Unfortunately her work is marred, from either standpoint, by a total lack of discrimination, and the biographical portions of the book are as wanting in coherence, continuity and compression as her critical judgments are in balance and proportion. Overwhelmed alike by the mass of material at her disposal and her intense admiration for a fascinating personality, Mrs. Barrington has proved unequal to the task of sifting the wheat from the chaff, and though the result of her labours will prove a rich mine for future biographers to delve in, she fails to give her readers either a clear image of the man or a consecutive account of his career. Leighton's letters to his parents during his student days in Rome and his life-long correspondence with his friend and master, the Frankfort painter, Steinle, provide the book with its most enjoyable and informative passages, but there was no need for the author to emphasise their importance by repeated quotations and re-quotations from letters already given in full. The same failing results in our reading the same incident first in Leighton's own words, then in those of a friend, and again in Mrs. Barrington's own commentary.

The son of a man of means, Frederick Leighton was not exposed in his youth to the tribulations which often beset aspiring artists, and his early days were calm and uneventful. Familiar from early childhood with the Continent, Leighton began his serious art studies at Frankfort, where he unfortunately fell under the full influence of the arid attempts to revive classical painting in Germany. But Overbeck and Cornelius were at that time great names in the art world, and though Leighton soon discovered for himself the artificiality and lack of vitality in their paintings, affection blinded him to the similar defects in the work of his own master, Steinle, who for all his delicacy and correctness of draughtsmanship and learnedness in design, was little more than a disciple of Overbeck. From Frankfort Leighton was sent to Rome with introductions to Cornelius, Overbeck and other German painters, but he wisely sought their society less than that of Mrs. Sartoris (Adelaide Kemble), who mothered the young exile and introduced him to her brilliant circle. Thus Leighton became intimate with Browning and many other celebrities and laid the foundations of his future social successes. His days at Rome were, in his own words, the happiest of his life, and his story of them, told in letters to his parents and his old master Steinle, is certainly the best portion of Mrs. Barrington's book. From Rome he sent to the Royal Academy his painting of Cimabue's Madonna, the purchase of which by the Queen contributed quite as much to the immediate fame of the artist as its intrinsic artistic qualities.

Henceforward it becomes more and more difficult to search out the main stream of Leighton's career from a maze of unrelated incidents and unconnected letters: Returning to London, the young painter entered upon a variety of activities which have sadly confused his biographer. We are spasmodically informed of his prowess as a volunteer, his patronage of music, his acquaintance with the great, his many kindly acts towards struggling fellow artists, and we travel backwards and forwards, down to the footnotes and up to the text, till we are reduced to a bewildered unconsciousness of time and place. We are baldly told of his election as Associate, Academician and finally President, but of the events leading up to these distinctions we are given no clear conception, and the claims of Millais to the presidency are ignored. We hear of a stay in Paris, where Leighton appears to have preferred the art of Robert Fleury, Ary Scheffer and Delaroche to that of Couture and Delacroix, and consequently we are not surprised that he derived little benefit from his studies there. We are given an unabridged diary of a tour in Egypt which becomes wearisome in its dull recital of spiritless facts, we are invited to dwell with delight on the specifications for the Arab Hall at Leighton House, and we are treated to innumerable notes from celebrities congratulating Leighton on various distinctions in very ordinary terms.

An undue respect for persons appears to have blinded the authoress to the fact that letters are more important for their contents than their signature.

Unsatisfactory as biography, these volumes are entirely valueless as criticism. Instead of disentangling the real merits of Leighton's work from less admirable characteristics, Mrs. Barrington vaguely couples him with Phidias and the Old Masters, and urges claims so absurd as to tax severely the patience and perseverance of all educated readers. Leighton was almost a great draughtsman, and his drawing is distinguished for its delicacy and elegance rather than its strength and simplicity. He is far nearer akin to Praxiteles than Phidias, though his art, being derivative, has not the vitality of the Greek's. A false ideal of finish, misdirected conscientiousness, and a failure to know where to stop, caused Leighton to over-elaborate his works and gradually rob them of that spontaneity which many of them at one stage possessed. Although he asserted his reverence for the Venetian painters, he appears to have learnt from them neither the value of breadth nor the sense of quality in paint, and he certainly never succeeded in rivalling their achievements as did his great contemporary Watts. He came far nearer to emulating the naïvety of early Florentine drawing and colour in a sophisticated manner, and his designs and groupings of large masses of figures, though often rhythmical and always possessing great scholastic merit, had never that unexpected balance which distinguishes the work of the greatest creative designers.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

With Byron in Italy. An Illustrated Selection of his Poems and Letters. By ANNA B. McMAHAN. (Unwin, 5s. net.)

THIS is the first of a series of books "showing on the one hand"—to quote from the publisher's note—"the influence of Italy on great English writers, and on the other, the light which their works throw on Italian life, Italian history and Italian art." This volume on Byron is illustrated by "a series of photographs of scenes made famous by him." Among the scenes which have had fame conferred on them by Byron are, curiously enough, the Coliseum, Lake Albano, the Rialto bridge, the Venus de' Medici, the tomb of Dante and many other places and monuments which we remember hearing about before we read much Byron. In the Introduction Mrs. McMahan seems to make a further claim for the usefulness of the book. Speaking of the failure of Byron's contemporaries to understand him, she says: "Not even now . . . can it be said that we have any adequate analysis of this most complex and puzzling character among the English poets. Until a psychologist equal to the occasion shall come, the best means of arriving at an individual opinion may be to read side by side the poems and the letters [written] during the most mature and most productive period of Byron's life—the years of his Italian residence." No light undertaking, this, to compile and edit a book which shall be illuminating on the subject of Italy in Byron's time, reveal that country's influence on his work, and offer the best material for the formation of an individual opinion of his character! In one sense the compiler is certainly a follower of Byron—in the carelessness of her style. Without counting a few footnotes to the selections, the volume contains in all eighteen pages of her own writing. In this short space we notice—besides the sentence we have quoted above, with some such word as we have supplied necessary to complete the sense—that the first sentence of the biographical part is ungrammatical. It runs: "Arriving in Venice late in the year 1816, this city became at once to Byron 'the fairy city of his heart.'" At the beginning of a paragraph on p. 146 there is a use of the personal pronoun typical of the style of a fourth-form boy in his English Essay: "During these years Italy was in a state of tremendous political ferment. His letters are full of tales of duels . . ." etc. For the rest, the contents of the book are just what the compiler's style would lead us to expect. The information which she imparts could be read just as easily in almost any literary history. The selections from the letters and poems are aggravatingly cut about by lacunæ and curtailments. By means of these jumbled fragments of prose and verse the patient reader is forcibly reminded of Byron's hatred of England and the English, and less forcibly of his undoubtedly sincere love of Italy. A good deal of space is given to letters arranging for the publication of his poems; scraps of drama plucked from their context are also to be found, and long though plenteously starred passages in Byron's best guide-book manner. These last excerpts, of course, furnish excellent material for illustration. The page bearing the words, "The goddess loves in stone" faces a photograph of the Venus. The lines about the Wolf at Rome, "Dost thou yet Guard thine immortal cubs . . . ?" is not far from an illustration which we have only to glance at to be immediately assured that she does still guard them. But we look in vain for one picture which would have been most appropriately included in this book.

Roll on, thou deep and dark-blue ocean, roll!

Facing this line, there surely should have been a portrait of the ocean, rolling.

Don Juan. Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. (Murray, 6s.)

A REVISED and enlarged edition of Byron's great poem comes as something of a surprise to a public which has forgotten the idolatry of the day before yesterday. The numerous notes and quotations are retranscribed from the early editions, the text being founded on the original manuscripts in the possession of Lady Dorchester and Mr. John Murray, and the introduction tells all there is to know of the publication and sources of the poem. The remarks of Mr. Coleridge on the poem itself are both just and sympathetic. He seems to think that the vindication of the natural man in it contained in fact Byron's "criticism of Life" and society. Every admirer of the poem must regret the blemishes of taste and modesty which are only too evident to the superficial reader, but all do not recognise, as Mr. Coleridge well says, that these are merely included in the survey of a vast and various whole and on reflection "dwindle into natural and so comparative insignificance." Byron himself was furious at the charge of immorality applied to the poem in his day, when the mention of "Don Juan" made respectable people shudder. He wanted to show "by the white light of truth, the great things of the world: Love and war, and Death by sea and land, and man half-angel half-demon—the comedy of his fortunes, the tragedy of his passions and fate." If we leave out the palpably gross and offensive references the poem forms a magnificent and sparkling picture of life. All the energy, the beauty and aspiration of humanity find a voice in it in the accents of real poetry. Sir Walter Scott maintained that it "embraced every topic of human life, and sounded every string of the divine harp, from its slightest to its most powerful . . . tones." The more sensible judgment of a later day has followed in the wake of Scott's sane approval and this fine volume will have many readers.

The Greedy Book: A Gastronomical Anthology. By FRANK SCHLOESSER. (Gay & Bird, 5s. net.)

AT the dinner-table of a certain Oxford gourmet, the present writer once found himself next to a stranger who looked critically down the menu, then turned and asked: "Are you greedy?" On receiving a half-apologetic but decided plea of guilty, he replied: "Good! Then we won't talk till after the game." It must not be supposed that he said nothing till then; he knew that—to quote one of Mr. Schloesser's slovenly but wise sentences—"a dinner partaking of Wordsworth's Peter Bell's party in a parlour, 'all silent and all damned,' is contrary to the best gastro-nomic traditions." But a casual word or two was enough while the art of eating claimed attention; it was later, when the art of talking had its turn, that he showed himself as brilliant a talker as he was reverent and discriminating an eater. To such a man Mr. Schloesser's slipshod, scrappy, odd, amusing book, would offer many points of interest. Both take the act of eating seriously—not gloomily, but gravely, as a thing worth study and care; and both—to judge from the stranger's conversation and Mr. Schloesser's book—have a fund of anecdote and quotation which makes them capital company. In the volume before us Mr. Schloesser remains an impressionist critic of the art; he describes his sensations rather than details the rules and the recipes; but that does not prevent him from displaying a large amount of sound thought and wisdom, the result, clearly, of carefully acquired experience. Like the sluggard whom Dr. Watts blamed, in our opinion with unnecessary acerbity, he "talks of eating and drinking"; letting his fancy roam where it will, and no more troubling about consecutive ideas or ordered discourse than the good talker at a dinner-table, who knows that an apt story or a lively description is better than logic at meal-time. It is a pity that his English is so colloquial and his proofs so ill-read. To take a single instance, Mrs. Glasse (whose other name was Harris), appears at the top of eight pages as Mrs. Grasse.

A History of Dancing. By REGINALD ST. JOHNSTON. (Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a pleasant and not too technical work on an interesting and graceful subject. Recalling the far-off past, when dancing was considered an accomplishment to be acquired by every true knight, the author deplores the indications he finds of decadence in dancing, and he has endeavoured to show the origin of our dances and to trace their gradual development. His method of treatment will be best gathered from the titles of his chapters. Thus, starting with the birth of dancing, pictured in the Greek mythology—the personification of all that is graceful and pleasing in beautiful motion—he takes us on to dancing as a religious ceremony: not only the dances of Osiris, Bacchus, and Dionysia, but also those connected with the rites and ceremonies of the uncivilised nations. From the semi-sacred dances of a pantomimic nature to the drama and the connection of the dance with the theatre is but a short step to dancing as a popular amusement. Our author describes some early forms of English dancing, particularly that of the Maypole and the Maurice, the former for many centuries the chief dance of rustic England, and probably of Druidical origin. The Maurice, on the other hand, was introduced by the gypsies, and it was not until the characters had been adapted to the country, in the shape of Robin Hood and the Sherwood foresters, that it took a firm hold upon the people. Allegorical dances among the primitive nations, quaint dances in civilised countries, and dancing as a social pastime are all skilfully and adequately dealt with, but the greater part of the last chapters is devoted to stage dancing and dancers on the stage. The book would have been improved if in these final chapters there had been less repetition of the names of certain well-known players and more discrimination in the praise of certain well-known dancers, so many pages being devoted to one person and her history that for the moment we fancied we had drifted into the advertisement columns of a theatrical paper. The illustrations might have been better chosen if the intention was to show how beautiful and picturesque a thing a dance well done may be.

SAYINGS OF CHILDREN—IV

THERE are children who have an unconscious poetry of diction. These do not fall into the habit of such sayings as "I didn't used to" and "I don't know but what I won't," and similar utterances learnt from the illiterate. It seems they prefer to say things prettily:

"I see all the stars of the sky, with my heart"; or:

"Do you ever cry, Moth', when you say sad songs to yourself in bed?"; or this darker saying:

"And when the lights were put out I saw in the corner something like Jezebel, doing idols"; or:

"Your room was all dark and nothing at all! Just a lucky moon behind a little branch and one peculiar star."

Sometimes a child holds in his mind a substitute for some ordinary word, that he evidently thinks is equally customary:

"And did Goliath go to battle with tower on?"

"With tower?"

"Yes—with tin clothes."

He modernises the Scriptures: "God didn't like David sending Maria where they would kill him."

"What did we read of yesterday?"

"David, and his great friend Johnson."

Nevertheless his own language is sometimes scriptural: "And dreaming I saw a King's Throne, and his servant beside it."

The children once helped their Mother to paint her garden chairs green. Overalls on and a brush apiece, they were happy, working in silence. Then Blynken: "This is wretched work for your intelligence, Mummie."

"This is an awkward house, I think. I said so to Mademoiselle and she asked me what I meant."

"And what did you say?"

"Me? O, I said, there seems to be lots of room till you find that there isn't."

"I do like Marryat's books so much, they are such nice stories in the way they go on, all about so many different things. Not always about love, like Shakespeare."

"You know, now that the boys at school know that I have got a watch, they treat me as nothing but a tool for time."

"O, this pain, this pain! and I shouldn't be having this pain now if that dashed old Eve hadn't eaten the apple." Then swiftly turning, "Well, she did take it first, didn't she?" [Adam, Adam!]

Patterfoot, naturally, asks questions of a different calibre:

"Could I swim if I had whale's things on?"

"What does a sheep mean when it's lame?"

"I dreamt last night that Nod threw a whole boxful of toys at my forehead. A whole boxful. But I had an engine to fling back at him."

"That's not like Nod," said his Mother, "not a bit like what dear Nod would do."

"But this Nod wasn't ours in my dream, he was an Indian Nod, a forest Nod. We was both forest boys."

How sorry one may be when some familiar mispronunciation is one day self-corrected, and the speech gets perfected as the months go on.

As long as the stairs however are taken properly, that is to say two steps to one stair-step, in true nursery fashion, a Mother should not repine. It is Southey I think who has said: "No household is complete without a kitten rising four months, and a child rising four years."

Probably every one knows what it is to transpose the initial letters in some phrase. To say roaring with pain, for instance, instead of pouring with rain. But as a rule it is swiftly corrected. Nod however, on having his first little breeks on was alive to nothing else. All the way downstairs did his Mother hear him coming, foot by foot, solidly. And as each step was taken, she heard: "Brown one ons . . . brown one ons."

One night (and his Mother is ashamed of it), after hearing Patterfoot's prayers and all the wealth of love they evidence, his Mother wasn't satisfied.

"What would you do if one day Daddy told you Mummie had died?"

"I would kill myself beside you."

"But how would you do it?"

"I would lean on a tin thing."

To the story of Bathsheba and David, told discreetly, he listened earnestly. "And this was a great sin on David's part," continues the little book, "for Bathsheba was another man's wife. A man was allowed more than one wife then, now a man may only have one wife."

This was listened to with pondering eye. "And who is our wife here I should like to know?"

At last the children, all three snugly pillowed, have said good-night.

To the great relief of those in attendance they are hushed to silence.

A warm red light falls upon dimity curtains, and the shadow of the fender is patterned large upon the wall.

And a voice from the shadow:

"Bears hug badly. Polars."

PAMELA TENNANT.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

HIC JACET

A FORTNIGHT ago attention was directed in these pages to the poem with which Mr. Thomas Hardy opened the New Year. It was a bitter greeting. Man was represented Job-like asking his Maker bitterly: Why, when it was so easy not to call into being "an ill-used race of men," did you commit the cruel enormity of creation? The answer was stern and contemptuous. It was, in effect, that he who was responsible for the world sat weaving successive New Years automatically, neither caring for suffering nor knowing of it. Man is a creature of many moods, and on this occasion Mr. Hardy was accurately expressing one of them. Because of the very fulness of life in our day men are often disposed to turn round and greet the last enemy as a friend. "Eloquent, just and mightie death" has received more hymns of praise in modern poetry than he did in the morning light of the world when it was considered better to be the thrall of a landless man than to reign over all the nations of the dead. Even R. L. Stevenson, who entered with gusto into the pleasures of life, saw in the end only a vision of peace and comfort such as awaits the hunter home from the hill and the sailor home from the sea. It was a creed of the set to which he belonged. One recognises the same attitude in his friend Henley's fine lines:

So be my passing!
My task accomplish'd and the long day done,
My wages taken, and in my heart
Some late lark singing,
Let me be gather'd to the quiet west,
The sundown splendid and serene,
Death.

The passage is not personal in the sense in which Macbeth was personal when he said:

I have liv'd long enough, my way of life
Is fallen into the sere and yellow leaf.

or

I 'gin to be a-weary of the sun
And wish the state o' the world were now undone.

They are voices of this age, an age in which it has come to be a doctrine more and more accepted that "I came like Water and like Wind I go." Even Christina Rossetti got no further with her fine faith than:

Haply I may remember
And haply may forget.

And in Tennyson's lines we seem to hear an echo of the sentiment that prefers quiet incineration to the obsequies and funeral rites of an older time:

Pass on weak heart and leave me where I lie
Go by, go by.

In these matters Walt Whitman was second to none as an interpreter of his age and as an inspiration to the school of Henley and Stevenson. His last word is to be found not so much in the "Come, lovely and soothing death . . . serenely arriving, arriving," as in the perfectly executed invocation:

At the last, tenderly,
From the walls of the powerful fortress'd house,
From the clasp of the knitted locks, from the keep of the well-closed doors,
Let me be waited.

Let me glide noiselessly forth;
With the key of softness unlock the locks—with a whisper,
Set ope the doors, O Soul.

Tenderly—be not impatient,
(Strong is your hold, O mortal flesh, Strong is your hold, O love.)

There, hope for the future, if it exists, is of the vaguest. At bottom and behind is the sad consciousness that the ephemeral race of men is as a cloud of insects blown across dry land out of the sea into the sea. The note struck with such fine simplicity by Lady Nairne is a lost chord:

We'll meet, and we'll be fain,
In the land o' the leal.

Or, as it is put with more force of language though not with as much delicacy of thought by Campion:

Never weather-beaten sail more willing bent to shore
Never tired pilgrim's limbs affected slumber more,
Than my wearied sprite now longs to fly out of my troubled breast,
O come quickly, sweetest Lord, and take my soul to rest!

Ever blooming are the joys of heaven's high Paradise,
Cold age deaf not there our ears, nor vapours dim our eyes:
Glory there the sun outshines whose beams the blessed only see.
O come quickly, glorious Lord, and raise my sprite to Thee.

Now it seems to me that the importance of these passages is that of an echo, but it is the echo which a fine woman's conversation renders of thoughts originated by the man she loves. There is a masculine and a feminine in the spirit of the age. Out of the former have come our Darwinian theories and nebular hypotheses, our march forward in scientific knowledge, our mechanical and practical achievements. These are the doings of the bread-winner. While he is out labouring, the feminine counterpart sits at home and sings of his deeds and thoughts or represents them in painting or sculpture. What the man of action inarticulately believes, that the man of taste and intellect weaves into the annals of the literature and art of the time. Thus the voices of the poets are authentic interpretations. Knowledge, spreading and advancing, is ever turning the flank of belief. But, as has been said, the minds of men vary, and every generalisation must omit somebody. The problem of death has always rivalled that of life as a subject for meditation, since the most flippant cannot fail to be reminded at times that though the daye be never so long

At last it ringeth to evensong.

Or in the more elaborate verse of Drummond of Hawthornden:

This world a hunting is,
The prey poor man, the Nimrod fierce is death;
His speedy greyhounds are
Lust, sickness, envy, care,
Strife that ne'er falls amiss,
With all those ills which haunt us while we breathe.
Now, if by chance we fly
Of those the eager chase,
Old age with stealing pace
Casts up his nets, and there we panting die.

As to what comes after, we still remain in doubt after all the speculation and teaching of three thousand years. Science with cold passivity refuses to pronounce on what may be, but asserts that there is at present no sufficient evidence of personal immortality. Here and there a poet or philosopher strikes out some theory which rests only on what he will term intuition. Such is Browning's:

And I shall thereupon
Take rest, ere I be gone
Once more on my adventure brave and new;
Fearless and unperplexed,
When I wage battle next,
What weapons to select, what armour to indue.

A noble and invigorating creed, but it rests on no foundation. It is a guess, and the odds against it being right are at least ten million to one. Nor, for my part, do I find anything more solid to build upon in the ingenuities of psychical research people, spiritualists, thought-readers, and the other successors to Anthony Mesmer. After the Hic Jacet of the tombstone there is little to add beyond what was said by Clough:

Where lies the land to which the ship would go?
Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know.
And where the land she travels from? Away,
Far, far behind, is all that they can say.

We cannot imagine a time or circumstance when the mind of man will not be fascinated by the problem of death. Were the prognostications of Elie Metchnikoff to be realised so that at the appointed time it arrived and was accepted as naturally as sleep by a race purged of disease by centuries of stern and forced attention to hygienic laws, still the young and vigorous would continue to regard it as a dreadful mystery. And science has not yet given to the great question an answer that leaves no room for doubt. The imagination of the modern man will not follow pagan examples and build stately Valhallas or flower-strewn Elysian fields. His logical mind may reject such theoretic solutions as, for example, the Transmigration of Souls, but it sees that there are many doors for which knowledge has not yet found a key. The riddle of life is still unanswered, but every new generation approaches it with purified thought and enlarged conception. It is incredible that any real loss can be sustained by the shearing away of excrescence and misleading hypotheses.

P.

FICTION

The Whirlwind. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

MR. PHILLPOTTS is at his best in this his latest novel, which made its first appearance in the pages of the Fortnightly Review. His standard is a high one. His method is conceived on a large scale. It is no other than to bring all the aspects of nature—the changing sky, with its range of colours, the wind that blows across his Devon moors, the trees, the flowers, the animals, all the denizens of Earth—into league with him in telling one great story of passion or love or disaster. His human characters emerge from this great background: first you see the village of Lydford nestling quietly in a nook of the wide moor—then the farmhouse Ruddyford and the old peat mine, the place in which his chief characters live, and gradually the chief characters themselves stand out from their fellow villagers and over them something of the eternal greatness of things is thrown, something which comes from the greatness of their setting. In the carrying out of this conception he brings great skill to bear. But the result is not on the level of the intention. If it were so, Mr. Phillpotts's work would take a high place in English literature, a place above that of Thomas Hardy. There is something lacking: there is an element of disappointment: for though his descriptions of natural scenery and events are vivid and at times beautiful, though his grip on his characters never relaxes and their doings are always interesting, yet the two are never moulded into shape by a view of things the scope of which is sufficiently wide to present one all-embracing outlook. Each remains separate. There is no dominant idea which would create the requisite unity in design. This defect is noticeable in "The Whirlwind," though the story is one which never fails to hold the attention and to hold it strongly. In isolated detail—for example in the character of Hilary Woodrow, a remarkably subtle study, or in the character of Sarah Jane, a magnificent woman, or in many descriptions of moorland scenery and of superb happenings in the heavens—Mr. Phillpotts has done nothing better. But there is a lack of inevitability about the final tragedy, and that lack lends to the tragedy an element of sordidness which is belittling. Great art takes facts which may be in themselves brutal and by its magic touch raises them above themselves, by showing that which lies beyond every fact and the beauty which is a part of all suffering. This transforming touch is absent from "The Whirlwind," as it is absent from all Mr. Phillpotts's work, and its absence prevents his work rising to the high place which the excellence of his actual writing, his knowledge of humanity, his love of Nature, would otherwise command.

Springtime. By H. C. BAILEY. (Murray, 6s.)

LIONARDO DA FELTRE had in him the heart of the spring, and this Lionardo is the hero of the story which Mr. Bailey tells with all the spirit and gusto which we expect from the author of "Beaujeu." The buoyant freshness of spring lives and breathes in the pages, as it should in a book, bearing the happy name of "Springtime," about a Duke with such a possession in his heart as had Lionardo, Duke of Vellano. "All lived every moment of their lives," Mr. Bailey writes: and he bears out ably the truth of his bold statement. He raises a high standard, but he is equal to its height. For whether the character be Squarcia, the great condottiere, who was brother to all men and women not his actual enemies, who was loyal as he was fat, and fat as he was brave; or the treacherous Castracane of Castagnaro, the black hero of a hundred murders; or the bright little peasant girl Bianca whom he gives to a leopard to devour and whom the Duke avenges; or the great Lionardo da Feltre himself—they one and all do live during every moment of the time that we spend in their company, through all the sudden phases of their love and anger, through all the reckless moods of laughter and of fighting. No lover of gay romance should miss reading Mr. Bailey's book.

In Statu Pupillari. (Sonnenschein, 6s.)

CLEVER, lively, and well-written is the story of Eva Blumberg's life at an English University, and it possesses a particular attraction for a certain class of readers who will be curious to compare experiences. Although the anonymous author is careful to explain that "all the personages and incidents are fictitious," yet girl graduates past and present will eagerly scan these pages for portraits and characteristics of the well-known people of their day. A slight love-story runs through the graver interest of lectures and the struggle for honours, but neither in love nor in learning does victory's crown rest where it might have been expected. The crowd of girls, dons and friends is handled with the skill of experience, and there are many excellent character-sketches. As an intimate study of the inner working of a woman's college with its striving and unrest, its contrasts and good fellowship, the book has a peculiar interest of its own.

The Sacrifice. By ALPHONSE COURLANDER. (Unwin, 6s.)

THERE is no effect so hard to attain as that of simplicity, especially in dealing with emotion. Though Mr. Courlander writes with care and ability, his story lacks conviction. It is the story of a country girl who is betrothed to a gentle, adoring man and is swept away by her feeling for a great fierce sailor-tramp, who breaks in upon her peace and forces her to be his mate. The story reads more like the well-put statement of a credible case than a living drama of what is known as primeval passion; for Mr. Courlander is apt to explain his characters and to explain them without much insight, whereas the essential business of a novelist is to show his characters in action. Mora Targitt suffers principally from this. At one time she is shown to be a very near and simple daughter of Mother Earth; at another, a complex creature of civilisation. The two, of course, may exist in the same person, but Mr. Courlander never welds them together as he should into one being. Mark Porey is well done; but his weakness is exaggerated and spoils the proper balance of the story; we have so little sympathy with him that we cannot but welcome his ultimate desertion. The best scenes in the book are those which take place in the Barley Sheaf inn; they bear that stamp of life which is absent from the more important phases of the work.

The Caloré Girl. By HARRY TIGHE. (Routledge, 6s.)

MANUELA was one of the Gitanos who live in the cave-dwellings near Granada, but she had noble Spanish blood in her veins and never learned to lie and steal like a true gypsy. Her faithful heart—mentioned in the second title of the story—was given to Pepindorio, a gypsy blade who asks nothing better of life than to ride off successfully with other people's horses. He goes to the horse fair at Seville to exercise his chosen trade and Manuela follows him. She makes friends there with a fair-haired dancer who was once a nun and she makes an enemy of the great lady with whom she is allied by blood and whom she closely resembles. The lady's nobility is offended by her cousinship with a low-born gypsy and so she instantly pursues Manuela with hatred and malice. But her actions, like the actions of every one else in the story, are quite ineffective. The author, in spite of endless descriptions, has not produced an atmosphere, his gypsies are mere pasteboard figures painted in picturesque rags, and his great lady is farcical.

The Mistress of Aydon. By R. H. FORSTER. (Long, 6s.)

THIS is what R. L. S. called "tushery," but it is well-written tushery, with a breath of genuine north-country air to redeem the staleness of its paraphernalia. We have met all the people a thousand times, and we are always a little bored by them. The beautiful heiress who is a minor, her avaricious guardian, her lovers, one brutal, one doltish, one perfection, a garrulous housekeeper, a crabbed man-at-arms, two impish boys—they are as hackneyed as clown and pantaloons in a harlequinade. Luckily, however, for those who write tushery there is an enormous reading public that does not care a fig for life. It enjoys the alarms and excursions of pasteboard figures with various flamboyant adjectives and picturesque Christian names. These it will get just as well served up in Mr. Forster's novel as in the romances of more widely known authors, and it will get in addition a careful though sometimes heavy style and pleasant descriptions of the country around Tynedale and of the castles and fortresses there in the fourteenth century. But it will get nothing more.

The Second Bloom. By HELEN PORTER. (Greening, 6s.)

THERE are dramatic moments in this story of a nineteenth-century Pretender, a grandson of Flora Macdonald's Pretender. Indeed we see a play in the novel, a play with thrilling scenes, costumes, a love-story, and Mr. Lewis Waller in the chief part. The meeting between "Charlie" and the secret Jacobite society would have a fine effect on the stage. The members howl at him for a traitor because, bound by his oath, he refuses to join them; one flings wine in his face; a moment later they are all on their knees kissing the hand of their king. The love-story, too, is a pretty one and has its situations, for "Charlie" woos Lady Jean as a maid of low degree before she descends the stairs of her father's castle to open the ball given in her royal lover's honour. Then there is the great culminating scene where "Charlie," within reach of success, refuses to grasp it because a dying priest has told him that he is illegitimate and has no right to the throne. It is a well-told story of the king with no kingdom and of the loyal men and women who faced beggary and death for him. The Stuart of this romance, unlike the Stuarts of history, deserved the sacrifices made for him, and we wish that he had lived longer, happy in the love of Jean, who, of course, married him—after he had discovered that the dying priest was wrong.

The Duke's Dilemma. By SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY. (Long, 6s.)

DUKES are generally hardly used in fiction; they are either as unapproachable as the haughty Duke of Somerset, or ready to sell their strawberry leaves to the highest bidder. In this comedy of errors the dissipated Duke of Devizes desires to catch the Vanstone millions, yet has not wit enough to discover the identity of pert, pretty Joyce, the maid of the inn. He blunders into countless difficulties, serious and farcical, according to the ancient rules of the game; and the usual soliloquy and appeal to his mother's portrait are fortunately overheard by the right person, and the curtain is rung down upon a happy ending. The lightly-constructed story runs gaily along, avoiding or ignoring obstacles in the way; and the reader who desires to be amused and is willing to accept everything as it comes will find "The Duke's Dilemma" a very entertaining little comedy.

The Outer Darkness. By R. H. WRIGHT. (Greening, 6s.)

WHATEVER little palliation newly invented details may bring to it, the device of manuscripts found in boxes or corners or crevices of trees is played out. At such an introduction the imp of incredulity leaps into instant being; and he grows to a monstrous size as the story proceeds. For here is imagination in wild disorder, allied with small power of expression. Teeth gnash, as of course they are bound to do in the circumstances; but the book misses the creep which is its object and would be its excuse, and prolongs itself interminably through pages of tedious horror.

The Love of Philip Hampden. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER. (White, 6s.)

THE love of Philip Hampden for the mysterious Lady Armitage was but a slight episode in his career, but he had the makings of a tolerable husband to a wife who did not ask too much. The middle-aged Philip breaks away from his cloth warehouse and the influence of an early Victorian aunt to see life and have his fling; his adventures are exciting, varied, and ingenious, compounded from an old prescription adapted to modern requirements. He is successful in detecting the schemes of villains of the deepest dye, and in keeping himself and his friend out of the clutches of a secret society given to torturing its victims in ways that suggest that even that terrible "something in the nature of boiling oil" would not be thought excessive. It is not the kind of story in which the author of "Bootle's Baby" is seen to advantage, but there is plenty of "go" in it, it is brisk and lively, and two scenes at least will be read with breathless haste to obtain the assurance that the principal characters have not met with violent deaths, regardless of the claims of the last page.

Izelle of the Dunes. By G. GUISE MITFORD. (Long, 6s.)

THIS is in part an idyllic love-story, all simplicity and innocence, set in fresh picturesque surroundings in a little island in the North Sea; and for the rest it is a highly coloured sensational tale of revenge. The author is inventive, the plot has good points, but the details have not been sufficiently thought out, and the principal situations are too absurd for acceptance. In the intentionally thrilling scenes there is no difficulty whatever in making the reader shudder; Strangsways, who tells the story, is daring, and does not hesitate to express himself strongly to that end. The fair Izelle's father is blind, drunken, unclean: "his appearance was so revolting that I felt a nausea rising in my throat," and as Strangsways's realistic description proceeds the reader suffers with him. Yet there are exciting scenes too, so well told that they lure the reader on, and some charming descriptions of the Frieslanders and their quaint friendly ways.

DRAMA

LAVEDAN'S "LE MARQUIS DE PRIOLA" AT THE NEW ROYALTY

CHARLES BAUDELAIRE has shown, in a famous sonnet, Don Juan being ferried across the Styx by Charon, while the shades of all the women he has loved hover on the bank and lament or curse his cruelty:

Mais le calme héros courbé sur sa rapière
Regardait le sillage et n'daignait rien voir.

In the pitiless strength of the man there is a kind of dreadful majesty: his absolute disdain makes him horrible, but it makes him also sublime, for he dares magnificently to be his infamous self. Such a man M. Lavedan has attempted to draw in his Marquis de Priola. But he has failed to achieve success. He treats his Marquis sentimentally and even tries to draw a moral from him, with the result that in the various scenes where he triumphs over various women the stupidity of the women is more remarkable than the triumph of the man. The Marquis really is much nearer to the Bel Ami type of sensual adventurer, a Bel Ami whose vulgarity is made more apparent by a certain facile distinction in perverted thought. He is more often ridiculous than great. Even in the last act, when he is finally subdued by the paralysis which has been creeping upon him, no other feeling than one of detestation, mingled with contempt, is aroused, as for a shameful creature caught by a shameful death. So M. le Bargy was justified in cutting out the serious passages of the play, and he cut freely. In his hands the play became a diabolical farce, full of brilliant wit and what used to be called fin de siècle idea—yesterday's name for the smart sophistries of yesterday.

M. le Bargy played the Marquis de Priola with amazing cleverness. He did not attempt to show him as the sublime Don Juan, the superman of infamy. He gave him no shred of dignity, but was content to portray him as he really is—as an educated, rather well-bred Bel Ami, a man who could lose his temper, a man who so far from controlling his passions to his own end is the slave of the most paltry vices. By his cleverness he made this strange incredible creature almost live. Nothing could have been more finished than the way in which he showed the gradual oncoming of disease and brought out the fascination of the fellow. The part has opportunities for an actor of an exceptional kind, and not one was missed. That is doubtless one reason why the play was given. Mlle. Gabrielle Dorziat played Madame de Vailleroy, a small and extremely difficult part, with grace and her own distinction. In the great scene in the second act, where she comes to see the Marquis and his famous almanacks, her playing was incomparably subtle. M. Lebreys was an amusing Brabançon, the jackal to the lion (that king of beasts), and all the other parts were rendered with that degree of excellence which makes it always a pleasure to welcome the arrival of the French Season.

Next week M. Coquelin Aîné, with the entire company of the Théâtre de la Porte St. Martin, will appear in plays by Molière, Labiche and Rostand.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

MODERN PORTRAITS

OF the many new art societies which have sprung into existence during the last decade, few could hope better to justify their existence than the Modern Society of Portrait Painters, now holding its first exhibition at the Institute galleries in Piccadilly.

Of the thirty members who at present constitute this society, three (Messrs. Alexander Jamieson, George W. Lambert and Joseph Oppenheimer) are already reckoned among the younger associates of the International Society; two (Messrs. Francis Dodd and Gerard Chowne) belong to the New English Art Club; one (Mr. J. D. Fergusson) is a prominent member of the Royal Society of British Artists; and another (Mr. Sholto Johnstone Douglas) is a well-known Academy exhibitor; but with these exceptions the society is composed of painters who are attached to no other body, and whose work has seldom, if ever, been seen before in London. A novelty in the names of the exhibitors, however, does not necessarily entail any novelty in the exhibits, and it must be confessed that several of the Modern Portrait Painters are little more than imitators of their seniors; some emulating the sugary and stylish confections of Mr. Ellis Jeffreys, others, more laudably, if less successfully, following at a distance the lead of the late C. W. Furse. Such contributions do not materially affect the exhibition save that they tend to lower the standard otherwise maintained; for, viewed as a whole, the collection is of an unusually high order considering the youth of the exhibitors, shows a refreshing individuality of outlook, and contains much of promise, even a little of definite achievement.

If to our "arrived" painters, men old in experience, exhibition is still a temptation, how much more so must it be to their juniors? Competition is keen, patrons are few, and to the painter comes the tempter saying: "You must make your work different from the exhibits of the other man if you want it to attract attention." But how to make it different? Some strive to give novelty to the treatment, the technique; others to the arrangement, the presentation of the subject. Mr. Fergusson, a young Scotsman of undoubted originality and considerable powers, clamours for attention by his treatment. His Man in a Tall Hat (16) cleverly depicts a London type with a rare economy of brushwork and a subtle appreciation of colour. But, apparently, a desire to prove how much can be expressed by a minimum of touches has led to his undoing in his other exhibits, which are only carried far enough to show the painter's dexterous mannerisms, and not so far that the mannerisms are lost sight of in the vitality of the thing painted. Mr. William J. Clackens, an American painter, bids differently for fame by presenting as a portrait a picture of a man and a lady (10) seated amid the glitter of a New York restaurant. The picture is cleverly handled, as is the same painter's rendering of a pink-skirted little dancer (12), but how many patrons would choose to be portrayed amid such surroundings? Mr. David Neave, again, paints a number of interiors in each of which a lady is seated. They are not unpleasant as pictures, but as portraits are the sitters given sufficient importance? And Mr. G. W. Lambert, who sends a striking and dramatic portrait of F. Derwent Wood (56), labels as Portrait Group (54) a very charming figure-composition of two ladies going down to the sea, one carrying a child about to paddle, while by her side trots a naked youngster eager for his swim. It is a delightful little work, charming in colour and composition, and the contrast of the nude and clothed figures is as successful and natural here as it is unnatural and forced in the same artist's The Sonnet at the New Gallery. But is such a picture a portrait group?

No doubt some latitude must be given in an exhibition of portraits, but we doubt whether patrons are more likely to be attracted by these novelties of arrangement than they are by eccentricities of brushwork. Nor does the adoption of either method lead to the best results.

No portrait at the Institute bears more deeply the impress of the artist's individuality than Mr. Gerald F. Kelly's Alex en fourrures (103), refreshingly free from any deliberate attempt at ostentatious originality. Warm sunlight falls sideways on the pensive face of this charming blonde, and forms with the furs which enwrap her figure—a ravishing harmony in brown and gold. We feel that the painter loves Titian and reveres Rembrandt, but he has imitated neither, and a loving study of the Old Masters has, according to Sir Joshua's prophecy, led him unconsciously to develop a true originality. Here is no parade of skill, the art by higher art is with subtlety concealed, but for those who search them out high technical qualities are present, in the skilful manipulation of light and shade, the rich tonality, the distinctive quality of texture.

Two other portraits deserve praise for their unostentatious virtues and solid merits. Mr. Francis Dodd has been exhibiting for some years now at the New English Art Club, but he has never attained a higher level of accomplishment than in his Signora Lotto (73), a work remarkable alike for its searching characterisation, its firm rendering of form and the restrained power of the painting. Another New English clubman, Mr. Gerald Chowne, is chiefly known by his admirable flower-paintings, but in his portrait of the Lord Mayor of Liverpool (70), in his robes, he has succeeded in investing a very difficult subject with a Titianesque dignity and simplicity. Few presentation portraits in the provinces—or in London for that matter—have equal artistic qualities, and a bad blunder was committed by those who, having the sense to give Mr. Chowne the commission, were foolish enough to reject the admirable painting he produced.

A last word of praise is due to the Hanging Committee for its good sense and excellent taste in keeping each member's exhibits together and in allowing only a single row of pictures on the walls.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

No more useful series of reprints are at present on the market than Messrs. Routledge's "Muses' Library" and their "New Universal Library." The poems and poets included in them are in many cases unobtainable elsewhere, or obtainable only at a price far beyond the limits of the ordinary book-lover's pocket, and in reprinting the poems of Thomas Lovell Beddoes in the "Muses' Library" they are doing good work. Dr. Ramsay Colles, who is editing the edition—which is complete save for a few unimportant fragments the copyright of which has not yet expired—contributes an introduction.

Mr. Frowde is adding several new volumes to the World's Classics. They include Scott's Lives of the Novelists, with introduction by Mr. Austin Dobson; Thackeray's Pendennis, with introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse; Sheridan's Plays, with introduction by Mr. Joseph Knight; Oliver Wendell Holmes's The Poet and the Professor at the Breakfast Table, with introductions by Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll (we wonder why); and another volume of Burke's complete works.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus's first eleven half-crown novels will be: "The Spanish Necklace," by B. M. Croker; "Israel Rank," by Roy Horniman; "The Ghost," by Arnold Bennett; "A Free Solitude," by Alice Perrin; "The Obliging Husband," by Frank Barrett; "The Last of the Mammoths," by Raymond Turenne; "Her Honour," by Robert Machray; "Monsieur de Paris," by Mary C. Rowsell; "His Wife's Revenge," by George R. Sims; "Love will Venture In," by Amelia E. Barr; and "The Dream of Simon Usher," by Algernon Gissing.

Mr. Manmath C. Mallik, the author of a work on Indian philosophy entitled "The Problem of Existence in the Light of Aryan Wisdom," has written a new book entitled "Impressions of a Wanderer," which Mr. Unwin will publish on January 28.

Following Messrs. Longman's example, Messrs. Routledge have decided to offer on and after Monday, January 28, all their books, including the forthcoming "Universal Ruskin" (15 vols.), "on subscription," "subject to the following condition, viz.: That one-third of the number of copies of a book bought on subscription shall be subject to return, if in good saleable condition and carriage paid, within six months of the last day of the month in which subscription was effected."

A book which should appeal to readers and writers is "Cassell's Book of Quotations," announced for early publication. The preparation of the work has, we learn, occupied its author, Mr. W. Gurney Benham, nearly twenty years. It is "absolutely up-to-date," and includes quotations from such modern writers as Mr. John Morley, Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, and Mr. W. S. Gilbert. "Any comparison of Mr. Benham's work with existing books of quotations," the publishers modestly claim, "will serve to emphasise its superiority." We hope that their claim will be justified.

Early in February Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish "The State of the Navy in 1907," by "Civis." The object with which these letters were written and published in the Spectator, where they attracted much attention, and with which they are now republished with two additional letters, is to show the need of a close and impartial enquiry into the present state of the Navy. The additions deal with the distribution of a fleet in commission at sea, the abolition and reduction of the naval dockyards and bases abroad, and the numerous changes that have been made in the arrangements of the fleet in reserve. The choice of the Dreadnought as the flagship of the new Home Fleet is fully discussed. Mr. St. Loe Strachey gives an introduction and emphasises the arguments used by "Civis" in his plea for enquiry.

"Essays on Glass, China and Silver" is the title of a new book for connoisseurs which Mr. Werner Laurie will issue. The author, Mr. F. Coenen, is the curator of the Willet Holthuysen Museum in Amsterdam, and in his book he deals with the many valuable treasures under his charge. The work will be illustrated with thirty-two reproductions of vases and silver work.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton will publish early in February a new novel entitled "Running Water," by Mr. A. E. W. Mason. It is, we are informed, "a novel of adventure and intrigue as well as of character development." Its action begins in the Alps, shifts to England, and then back to the Alps.

Mr. John Long will shortly publish "The Second Evil," by Sadi Grant. "Two young ladies are left almost unprotected for by the sudden death of their benefactor, but soon, by the help of Plain William, a rough and ready millionaire, who is in love with the younger girl, they take a trip to Japan." It sounds strikingly original.

Mr. Werner Laurie is about to publish a novel on what he quaintly styles "an untouched theme," by Mr. Arthur Stringer, a young Canadian. The chief character makes his living by intercepting Stock Exchange and other messages and using the information so gained for his own benefit. The title of the book will be "The Wire Tappers." It is, the publisher informs us, "a combination of love and electricity"!

CORRESPONDENCE

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think you're wrong in saying "there can be no plural of one." (ACADEMY, January 19, p. 77, col. 2, line 11.) Surely you can say "three ones in sequence (111) make one hundred and eleven," and "four ones added together make 4." One can have a plural just as unit can.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

January 19.

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—In logic, there may be no plural of one; but grammar (I am glad to say) is not bound down by logic. The plural ones is not merely "colloquial," but standard English. Virgil has una as a neuter plural; Æneid, ii. 642. French has les unes as well as les autres. The Anglo-Saxon æn, our "one," is often used in the plural. The number 11 is written with two ones. Shakespeare has little ones, pretty ones, married ones, and the like. Chaucer says that Palamon and Arcite were both "in oon armes," answering to the Old French phrase en unes armes. Bunyan introduces us to the Shining Ones at the end of his "Pilgrim's Progress."

Any one who will consult the N.E.D. (Neglected English Dictionary) will find the facts there, under section vi.

It would be a sad loss to miss the ones, which forms so fine a climax to the famous letter of the polite undergraduate, which ran, as nearly as I can remember, as follows: "Mr. Jones presents his compliments to Mr. Smith, and I beg leave to say that he finds he has a cap which is not mine. If Mr. Smith finds that you have a cap which is not his, no doubt those are the ones."

Beginners in English grammar may try to parse the sentence in the Prayer-book version of the Psalms: "many a one there be."

WALTER W. SKEAT.

CHAUCER AGAIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for December 29, Professor Skeat exhibits the most delightful methods of proving his case. Where readings differ he selects the reading that favours his case and anathematizes the other reading. Where both readings are against him he boldly emends the text—sometimes, I admit, not without a show of plausibility—and anathematizes—this is the import of his exclamation points—anybody who refuses to admit that his emendations are anything better than emendations. It is impossible to quarrel. As Abraham Lincoln once remarked, "If people like that sort of thing that is the sort of thing they like." I have pointed out that, sometimes according to both of the earliest copies, sometimes according to only one, there are both Northernisms and imperfect rimes, in both the A- and the B-fragments of the "Romaunt of the Rose." Professor Skeat retorts that the Northernisms are corruptions, thereby clearly begging the question. He further insinuates that the imperfect rimes are not Northernisms, quite as if I had said that they were. He even goes so far as to urge that one of the Northernisms of the "Romaunt" occurs also in the "Knight's Tale," as if that proved that Chaucer could not have written the "Romaunt." And yet he says that my arguments are "flimsy." I have already admitted that they are inconclusive. They involve assumptions which are not, and perhaps cannot be, perfectly established. But what adjective does Professor Skeat apply to his own arguments?

I regret that the great editor of Chaucer, to whom all cultivated men in the English-speaking world owe so much, should have given the discussion a turn that promises nothing better than the threshing of old straw. My letter contained two suggestions that I believe to be new to the public: first that Chaucer studied the "Ywayne and Gawin" in his youth, and shows the effects of this study, for example, in the "Knight's Tale"; secondly that he owed partly to this study a certain fondness for the Northern dialect, and exhibited this fondness in the more or less Northernised B-fragment of the "Romaunt." His use of Northernisms in the "Reeve's Tale" may be due exclusively to other causes, being a device old among comic writers. Aristophanes, for example, uses Laconian in the "Lysistrata," and Megarian and Boeotian in "The Acharnians" for the same purpose; namely, that of making people talk in character. Yet it is wholly possible that even the Northernisms of the "Reeve's Tale" would not have occurred had not Chaucer at an early age become familiar with the Northern dialect, whether through his residence at Hatfield or through the study of "Ywayne and Gawin," or through both.

There is no difficulty in showing that great poets have sometimes used more than one dialect. Theocritus, Burns and Tennyson are examples of the practice. One might even dare to suggest that Chaucer wrote the B-fragment, without attempting to explain the Northernisms at all. I have, however, endeavoured to suggest a reason for his using those forms, if indeed he actually did write the B-fragment. I am open to conviction in the matter, but it must be for reasons wholly different from any that have yet been aired. The imperfect rimes, I will add, seem to offer no serious difficulty to my theory. Nothing is more likely than that Chaucer indulged in this licence more freely in his youth than in his age.

HENRY BARRETT HINCKLEY.

January 10.

VERSE TRANSLATIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The recent publication of two verse translations of the "Æneid" suggest once more the question—What purpose are such translations intended to serve? Are they intended to heighten the critic's appreciation of the Latin poet, or to introduce him to readers who do not know Latin? Or are they a purely academic tour-de-force, like the prize poems of which Macaulay wrote with pungent irony that prize sheep are only fit to make tallow candles, and prize poems are only fit to light them? It will, I suppose, be admitted that no poetry which deserves the name can be adequately represented in the poetical garb of another language, that it is a flower sui generis, which can only bloom on its native soil. To reduce the question to its narrowest limits, no English metre can possibly reproduce the Homeric or Virgilian hexameter, the terza rima of Dante, or even the rhymed couplets of the "Misanthrope"; and all the English poets sitting in conclave, with Shakespeare and Milton at their head, could not give a worthy verse rendering of such single lines as

Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento,
and
Sunt lacrimae rerum, et mentem mortalia tangunt.

Milton translated into verse one of the simplest odes of Horace, and Shakespeare turned into poetry Plutarch's prose—a very different kind of task. The converse is equally true; and if Homer and Virgil still write verses in the Elysian fields they may well be challenged to turn Milton's "Lycidas," Gray's "Elegy," or Keats's "Ode to a nightingale" into Greek or Latin verse which shall recall the special beauties of the originals. Yet we still persist in weaving ropes of sand by essaying the impossible and translating the untranslatable. If we wish to reproduce the "matter" of a poem, prose will do it as well as verse; and if we wish to reproduce the "form" the attempt must be hopeless.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

FAVOURITE LINES

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Your mention in the ACADEMY of the 12th inst. page 31, of an essay on melody in poetry and Johnson's favourite verse in Vergil's first Eclogue:

Formosam resonare doces Amaryllida silvas,
reminds me of the following extract from Boswell:

Mr. Warton writes: "As we were leaving the college he [Johnson] said, 'Here I translated Pope's "Messiah." Which do you think is the best line in it? My own favourite is Vallis aromaticas fundit Saronica nubes.'

I told him, I thought it a very sonorous hexameter."

W. G. R. HERD.

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I inferred from Mr. George Stronach's letter, that he was of opinion that in the original edition of the Play, which is to be found in the First Folio, it was split up into the extraordinary number of scenes tabulated by him. But what is the fact? It is quite true that at the commencement of the Play we find the heading "Actus Primus, Scæna Prima,"; but thereafter there is no definite indication of Act or Scene. Such indication as there may be by the spacing of certain "entrances," and by "exits" and "exeunts," will be found, I think, on a slight examination to be of no reliable character. It is not quite fair to toist upon Shakespeare the divisions into Acts and Scenes adopted in the Globe edition. But I have been more than once surprised to find that critics of some reputation hold, in perfect good faith, that the Globe edition reproduces minutely the First Folio, save only that the spelling is modernised. The sooner any such delusion is dispelled the better will it be for the cause of true criticism.

I am inclined to think that the stage directions in the First Folio and the Quartos deserve more study than they have hitherto received. Here is a quaint one from this very Play (after II. ii. 173): "Flourish. Exit omnes. Manet Enobarbus, Agrippa, Mecnas."

ALFRED E. THISELTON,

January 21.

QUESTIONS FOR CHILDREN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Apropos of the curious examination questions for children referred to in the ACADEMY, it is (mis)understood that the following supplementary questions were by some mistake omitted by the examiners at the last moment:

- (1) How is it that English hairdressers' assistants never eat reindeer?
- (2) How is it that Shepherd's Bush is not in the Isle of Man?
- (3) How is it that the Mayor of Holborn is not a descendant of the Incas?
- (4) How is it that Sutherlandshire dentists do not keep porpoises?
- (5) How is it that the New York liners from Southampton do not call at Clacton?
- (6) How is it that the office of the Local Government Board is not situated at Gibraltar?

F. E.

MR. HARDY AND TENNYSON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In publishing my letter on Mr. Hardy and Tennyson in the ACADEMY of last week a printer's error occurs, which as it affects my whole contention, kindly allow me to correct. In the phrase "He (Tennyson) indicates pessimism in these very comparisons" I think I used "this" where you print pessimism, that is, of course, the reverse, i.e., optimism, as the letter infers.

BARNARD GEORGE HOARE.

[Our correspondent's letter was printed, word for word, as it reached us.—ED.]

CHATEAUBRIAND IN SUFFOLK

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am engaged on a work on Chateaubriand's exile in England, 1793-1800. In his Memoirs this writer says that in 1794 he went down to Beccles to translate, for a society of Suffolk antiquaries, certain old French manuscripts from the Collection de Camden. I am anxious to know whether such a thing was possible; whether Camden left any collection of manuscripts at all; and whether, that being the case, these manuscripts were not housed in London, never to be lent out to local societies. Chateaubriand is not to be trusted. As far as I have been able to ascertain none of his statements concerning his stay in Suffolk are correct; if I could prove that Camden manuscripts were out of the question, as I believe they were, the proof would be complete that all the rest of the story is fictitious.

E. DICK.

January 21.

A RECORD OF SPANISH PAINTING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I trust that you will allow me to reply on behalf of my wife (C. Gasquoine Hartley) to your correspondent's references to "inaccuracies" in her "Record of Spanish Painting." It is unfortunate that a gentleman of Mr. Dodgson's ability should waste his time in searching the pages of a big book, in order to discover three or four printer's errors and one or two trivial slips of the author's pen. Mrs. Gallichan's information concerning the pictures at Teruel was obtained from Mr. Dodgson's own word of mouth. In a footnote, on page 19 of "A Record of Spanish Painting," she writes: "I have not personally seen these pictures. I received my information about them from Mr. Dodgson, of Oxford, upon whose judgment I have every reason to rely. Mr. Dodgson knows Spain well. He is a translator of the Basque Testament, and is a great authority upon all Spanish antiquarian subjects." Surely Mr. Dodgson should be satisfied with such full acknowledgment of his assistance in this matter. Yet apparently for the three years since the book was published he has endured a bitter sense of injury because Teruel is given as "San Teruel"! Mr. Dodgson is also dejected by the hallucination that my wife has announced him as "the author" of the Basque Testament. A reference to the passage which I have just quoted will, I hope, relieve Mrs. Gallichan from any further allusion to "inaccuracies," for Mr. Dodgson will therein find himself described as the "translator" of the Testament. Both my wife and I certainly were under the impression that Mr. Dodgson translated the volume. May I say in conclusion, that Mrs. Gallichan spent several months in Spain, studying the pictures in many public and private collections, and that her book represents two years diligent labour. The praise accorded to the work by competent reviewers, and the judgment expressed in letters to my wife from those who have made Spanish painting their study should serve as sufficient proof that the "Record" is as free from "inaccuracies" as it is possible for a volume of such length to be.

WALTER M. GALLICHAN.

January 21.

THEATRE AUDIENCES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—That audiences are more critical than in days of yore there can be no manner of doubt. Time was when the playgoer had so much for his money that little time was left for criticism of play or players during the performance, and at curtain fall the playgoer was too tired to discuss anything but supper. In these days, an audience, or at all events the pit and gallery portion thereof, will wait in the street for a couple of hours before the doors open, passing the time in criticising plays they have seen, and the play that they have come to see. Should the latter be something entirely new and original, they know all about it, and they are intimately acquainted with the author (provided he be a popular and successful one). When their period of purgatory is passed, and the doors are opened, they hustle and jostle into the theatre, and with hot heads and cold feet continue to air their views until the curtain rises, and oftentimes after it has risen. Seated within earshot of these worthies, one's interest in the play droops and dwindles, the laughter rings hollow, and the applause lacks fire.

Come we then to the lethargic and unsympathetic audience. At a recent performance of a popular musical play, it was noticeable that as favourite after favourite made his or her entrance on the stage, not a hand was raised nor a stick or umbrella thumped by way of welcome. Strange, is it not, that some audiences would rather laugh at a player than with him? In other words, they enjoy some unfortunate mishap on the stage more than the finest exposition of the actor's art. An instance of this occurred at a provincial theatre during the performance of a romantic drama in which the principal character was impersonated by the stage manager. An impressive speech, and a still more impressive death scene, were received in chilling silence, and the curtain would have fallen "without a hand." But the curtain didn't fall—it stuck! And when that dead hero arose, walked to the wings, mounted a ladder, set things right, returned to the centre of the stage, and solemnly died again, the rafters rang with applause, and the air teemed with sympathetic shouts of "Encore!"

Take the case of a performance by amateurs. The amateur audience is coldly critical, or at the best, politely appreciative, until some contretemps occurs. Then it wakes up, and remains on the qui vive for some further disaster to befall, and the more dire that disaster, the louder will be the laughter.

Nothing can be more stimulating to the actor than an alert and appreciative audience, but nothing can be more fatal to play and players than ill-timed applause and comments on the part of "Kind friends in front." An audience would very properly resent any remark addressed to it from the stage during the performance of a play. Surely it is equally reprehensible on the part of any member of an audience to hurl epithets at actor, author, or manager. The stage and the auditorium are things apart, and the dividing line should not be crossed.

In these days of theatrical clubs and debating societies, every member is a self-constituted critic, and authors great and small fall under the lash of his sarcasm. But do the authors wince? Out upon them—no! They opine that to abuse is to advertise, and in the case of musical comedy, the louder the abuse the longer the run.

It is interesting to watch the demeanour of an audience during the performance of one of the last-named variety shows. In the first Act there is usually something in the nature of a story or plot that arrests and holds the attention, and gives promise of better things to come. In Act 2 the plot wilts away, and with it the attention of the audience. They begin to exhibit signs of impatience, and as "turn" succeeds "turn" these signs become more marked. It takes a phenomenally good song or dance to arouse their enthusiasm, and ere the end is reached the want of sustained interest in the story is painfully apparent. A remark frequently overheard on quitting the theatre is: "And we waited outside two solid hours for that." On a wet night, the remark is couched in more forcible language.

To sum up, audiences of to-day are patient, long-suffering, and merciful. Patient before the curtain goes up, long suffering while it is up, and merciful when it falls. Merciful enough to warn their friends against going through the ordeal that they have just managed to survive.

H. G.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART.

- Cruttwell, Maud. Antonio Pollaiuolo. 8 x 6. Pp. 286. Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.
- Reinach, S. Apollo. Translated from the French by Florence Simmonds. With 600 illustrations. 7½ x 5. Pp. 351. Heinemann, 6s. net.
- [An illustrated manual of the history of art through the ages. This new edition has been revised by the author and additions and alterations have been made.]
- Tucker, T. G. Life in Ancient Athens. The Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day. 8 x 5½. Macmillan, 5s.
- [In the "Handbook of Archæology and Antiquities" series.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Huchon, R. Mrs. Montagu: 1720-1800. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 301. Murray, 6s. net.
- [“An essay proposed as a thesis to the Faculty of Letters of the University of Paris.”]
- Dressler, Friedrich August. Moltke in his Home. Authorised translation by Mrs. Charles Edward Barrett-Lennard. With an introduction by General Lord Methuen. 9 x 5½. Pp. 163. Murray, 6s. net.
- Letters and Journals of Samuel Gridley Howe during the Greek Revolution*. Edited by his Daughter, Laura E. Richards; with an introduction and notes by Mrs. John Lane. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 419. Lane, 16s. net.
- [Portrait and map of Southern Greece.]
- Simpson, Selwyn G. Thomas Edward Brown, the Manx Poet. An appreciation. With a preface by the Rev. J. M. Wilson. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 244. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 6s.

EDUCATION.

- The Major Dramas of Richard Brinsley Sheridan*. Edited, with introductions and notes, by George Henry Nettleton. 7½ x 5. Pp. cxvii, 331. Ginn, 4s.
- [In the "Athenæum Press" series. Contains The Rivals, The School for Scandal and The Critic. Bibliographical note.]

FICTION.

- Yolland, E. Under the Stars. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. White, 6s.
- Blyth, James. Amazement. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 334. Long, 6s.
- Phillimore, Mrs. C. E. Two Women and a Maharajah. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 347. Long, 6s.
- Memoirs of a Person of Quality*. Edited by Ashton Hilliers. Heinemann, 6s.
- [“Being extracts from certain journals written at different times by my great uncle, the Honble. George Augustus Frederick Chorley Fanshawe, second son of the fifth Earl of Blakenham and Bramford in the County of Sussex, wherein are given the authentic particulars of his connection with the —th Regiment of Dragoon Guards; his breach with his family, residence among the Yorkshire Quakers, his restoration to Society and other matters. Privately printed A.D. 18—.”]
- Elkington, E. Way. The Two Forces. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 290. Long, 6s.
- Cobb, Thomas. The Amateur Emigrants. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 302. Alston Rivers, 6s.
- Cleeve, Lucas. The Rose Geranium. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 311. Unwin, 6s.
- Vacaresco, Hélène. The King's Wife. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 275. Werner Laurie, 6s.
- Gouldsbury, Cullen. God's Outpost. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 366. Nash, 6s.
- Scott, John Reed. The Colonel of the Red Huzzars. With illustrations in colour by Clarence F. Underwood. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 341. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- De Polen, Narcissa Lucien. Clarice. The Story of a Crystal Heart. Being a Chronicle mainly true. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 138. Unwin, 3s. 6d.

HISTORY.

- Rhodes, James Ford. History of the United States from the Compromise of 1850 to the Final Restoration of Home Rule at the South in 1877. Vol. vii.—1872-1877. 8½ x 6. Pp. 431. Macmillan, 12s.

LITERATURE.

- Canning, the Hon. Albert S. G. Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 545. Unwin, 16s. net.
- Ellis, Edwin J. The Real Blake. A Portrait Biography. With 13 illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 443. Chatto & Windus, 12s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Lockyer, Sir Norman. Education and National Progress. Essays and Addresses, 1870-1905. With an introduction by the Right Honourable R. B. Haldane. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 269. Macmillan, 5s. net.
- Browne, J. H. Balfour. Essays Critical and Political. Vol. i., Critical; vol. ii., Political. 9 x 6. Pp. 307 and 333. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.
- Scott, Sir J. George. Burma: a Handbook of Practical Information. With numerous illustrations by the author and others. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 519. Moring, 10s. 6d. net.
- [“With special articles by recognised authorities on Burma.”]
- The Schoolmasters' Year-book and Directory, 1907*. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 1046. Sonnenschein, 6s. net.
- [Fifth annual issue.]
- Willing's Press Guide, 1907*. An Advertiser's Directory and Handbook. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 424. Willing, 1s.
- [Thirty-fourth annual issue.]
- The Writers' and Artists' Year-book, 1907*. A Directory for Writers, Artists, and Photographers. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 93. Black, 1s. net.
- [Second year of new issue.]
- Life's Mystical Links*. By Alexander Connell Maclaren. Collected and arranged by Rachel Challice. 7½ x 5. Pp. 210. Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.

POETRY.

- Poems of Life and Death*. Edited by G. K. A. Bell. 6½ x 4. Pp. 234. Routledge, 1s. net.
- [In the "Golden Anthologies" series.]
- Doughty, Charles M. The Dawn in Britain. Vols. v. and vi. (concluding the work). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 252 and 249. Duckworth, 9s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Kropotkin, P. Memoirs of a Revolutionist. With portrait. 8 x 5½. Pp. 468. Sonnenschein, 6s.
- [With a preface by Dr. Brandes and a new preface to this edition in which the author deals with events in Russia up to 1906.]
- The Modern Cyclopaedia*. New edition, revised and extended. Edited by Charles Annandale. Vol. v.—Ima—Mom. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 544. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.
- [“A handy book of reference on all subjects and for all readers.”]
- Mackinder, H. J. Britain and the British Seas. With maps and diagrams. Second edition. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 375. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.
- Select Statistics and other Constitutional Documents*, illustrative of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Edited by G. W. Prothero. Third edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 490. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d.
- McCarthy, Justin. Sir Robert Peel. Fourth edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 194. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
- [In the "Prime Ministers of England" series.]

SCIENCE.

- Le Bon, Gustave. The Evolution of Matter. Translated from the Third Edition, with an introduction and notes, by F. Legge. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 436. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 5s.

THEOLOGY.

- The Hymnal Appendix*. Compiled by A. Leigh Barker. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 122. Skeffington, 4d.
- [“A supplement to 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' (both editions), 'Church Hymns' (both editions), and 'The Hymnal Companion.'” It contains no hymn not excluded from one or other, and in most cases from more than one, of these books. Paper covers.]
- Brooks, the Rev. Phillips. The Influence of Jesus. 7½ x 5. Pp. 274. Allenson, 2s. 6d. net.
- [The Bohlen Lectures, delivered in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, in February 1879.]

Holland, Canon Henry Scott. Vital Values. 7½ x 5. Pp. 227. Wells, Gardner, 3s. 6d.

[Sermons.]

Atwood, the Rev. H. C. At His Feet. The Place of Faith in the Incarnate World. 7½ x 5. Pp. 164. Wells Gardner, 2s. 6d.

Mayor, Joseph B. The World's Desire, and other Sermons. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 178. Griffiths, 3s. net.

The Old Covenant, commonly called The Old Testament: translated from the Septuagint by Charles Thomson. A new edition by S. F. Pells. 2 vols. 8½ x 6. Hove, England: Published by the Editor, n.p.

["This Bible," says the Editor, "is a facsimile reprint, page for page, and line for line, of the first translation of the Septuagint into English. The copy from which this reprint is made was published in America, A.D. 1808, at Philadelphia." The author had been Secretary to the Congress of the United States.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Bell, Gertrude Lowthian. The Desert and the Sown. With many illustrations and a map. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 347. Heinemann, 16s. net.

Grimshaw, Beatrice. From Fiji to the Cannibal Islands. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 356. Nash, 12s. 6d. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

The Apocalypse of St. John. The Greek Text, with Introduction, Notes and Indices. By HENRY BARCLAY SWETE. (Macmillan, 15s.)—It is a commonplace of the schools that prophecy was not, as ordinary English thought for many years supposed, prediction so much as preaching. "If the future were foretold, it was the prediction of dissatisfaction, the prediction of hope, of anticipation, of awakened thoughts, of human possibility and Divine nearness" rather than a formal announcement of coming events. This voice of prophecy in the chilling frosts of the Scribes' domination was almost hushed, for some hundred and fifty years before the Christian era. But then it broke out again when the great Forerunner and the Lord Himself began to preach, and ever since age after age has seen some member of the order rise.

In the long history of prophecy one episode, it may be said, was that of Apocalypse. "To the earlier prophets the Day of the Lord, the crisis of the world, is a definite point in history: full of terrible, divine events, yet 'natural' ones. . . . After it history is still to flow on, common days come back." In Apocalypse "the Day of the Lord begins to assume what we call the 'supernatural' . . . tenus to become the Last Day." Finding almost its first beginning in Zephaniah, it reached in Daniel its highest altitude under the Jewish Dispensation. It culminated in the Canonical Revelation and sank gradually away through an apocryphal Apocalypse of Peter until it disappeared. The full story of its rise and fall would fill one of the most interesting and curious chapters in literary and religious history, and another, more curious if less interesting, might be written on the interpretations that these Apocalypses—especially those of Daniel and St. John—have been made to endure. The revolution in the trend of theological thought which has taken place in the last fifty years can be gauged by the character of the new Commentary on the Revelation which the Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge has just issued. Thirty years ago the diligent study of the Apocalypse was looked on as either dangerous to the safe equipoise of the reason or as insufficiently productive to be worth the pains of the attempt: now we have an interpretation which makes the book interesting, edifying and generally intelligible.

The rival motives, the antagonistic germinal principles which produced on the one side Cæsarism, on the other the Church, had now developed side by side for at least half a century. The imperial idea had at first attracted to itself the enthusiasm and devotion of such men as Vergil by the magnetism of its good government and police, and of the higher civilisation it represented for barbarian subjects. St. Paul had not been dead to its commendable side, and had bidden those whom his words would influence to "honour the Emperor." But towards the close of the first century the deification of material comfort, latent almost from the first in this admiration of civil tranquillity, leapt from the modest dimensions of an extravagance permitted to grateful and effusive provinces, to the gigantic proportions of a compulsory faith. "Cæsar or Christ?" merely focussed into a point of opposition, from the first inherent, long unconsciously developing like the tares while men slept, and now declared in open battle. And this world-wide struggle to the Seer's eye was but an accident, however typical, of the great War—wide a. time and pregnant with eternal issues—between Good and Evil.

It was the fashion twenty years ago to date the book from a time shortly after Nero's death, so that the wounded head of the Beast which afterwards was healed was the apocalyptic reference to the legend widely current in the East for at least twenty years that Nero was in hiding and would again appear to take up the reins of Empire. Dr. Swete agrees that this reference must be correct, but he believes that Domitian is regarded as the re-embodiment of Nero, the Beast that was not and yet is—a rival to the risen Christ. The older school of Cambridge theologians seem to have been influenced partly by the need, if the writer was the same as the Evangelist, to give time for the Hebraic-Greek style of the Apocalypse to mature into the elegant Greek of the Gospel. But Professor Swete very properly observes that this is quite supererogatory trouble. If the writer be the same—and the seven Churches to whom letters are addressed in the Apocalypse are in the very district where the writer of the Gospel is supposed to have ministered—the wide difference in style can find sufficient explanation in the circumstance of the Apocalypse being the writer's work unaided by others owing to his confinement in Patmos, while the Gospel, a tradition specifically states, was written under others' supervision—quite possibly by another's pen. Dr. Swete therefore pronounces for the view "that the Apocalypse at least in its present form, belongs, as Irenæus believed, to the reign of Domitian and to the last years of that reign (90-96). This date appears to be consistent with the general character or purpose of the book. The Apocalypse as a whole presupposes a period when in Asia, at least, the Church was compelled to choose between Cæsar and Christ. And the prophet foresees that this is no local or passing storm, but one which will spread over the whole Empire, and run a long course, ending only with the fall of paganism and of Rome. The Coming of the Lord is no longer connected with the Fall of Jerusalem, which is viewed as an event of past history."

Those who can read Greek should certainly procure this edition if they would have in a compendious form all the information now accessible for an intelligent study of the Book. Ministers of religion should purvey its learning to their congregations. Yet, it is fair to state, they must be prepared to find that even now much is left undetermined. The illuminating and discriminating touch, the instantaneous insight, of a master is not always possible. There is learning, labour, research, impartiality, sanity of judgment—but originality and decision at times are out of place, and the reader finds what seems almost an embarrassment before a mass of material, a contentment to record and tabulate others' opinions, and a calm submission to what rash spirits feel to be the pain of suspending judgment and confessing ignorance. Thus the curious reader will be disappointed when he finds that the Number of the Beast is to Dr. Swete insoluble. Perhaps, indeed, it may be claimed with some reason that this is necessarily venial, although as the Professor himself points out, the writer seems to imply that the meaning is patent enough to intelligence and reflection. Similarly the mysterious substance χαλκολιθῆνος mentioned in Rev. i. 15, is left with its etymology uncertain, though the editor decides rightly enough that it is a metal.

It has been said that Dr. Swete is satisfied that the difference in style between the Gospel and the Apocalypse makes it not impossible to accept the traditional view that both proceed from one pen. The reader will expect that, having thus removed what is generally treated as a difficulty, the Professor will conclude that the author is St. John, the son of Zebedee. He will find, however, that two apparently unconnected witnesses have been discovered to the fact that Papias, the date of whose writing may be accepted as about 100 A.D., testifies that this John like his brother James was put to death by the Jews. "While inclining," Dr. Swete writes, "to the traditional view which holds that the author of the Apocalypse was the Apostle John, the present writer desires to keep an open mind upon the question. Fresh evidence may at any time be produced which will turn the scale in favour of the Elder"—another John, long known to us from another fragment of Papias. If this be correct, it would mean that no single Gospel proceeds in its present form from an Apostle, though the Fourth would be from a disciple and eyewitness. It is to be noticed, however, that if John the brother of James was martyred before 70 A.D., and another John lived at Ephesus till at least 98 A.D. as Irenæus says, the whole problem needs reinvestigation, for the various arguments assume a very different relative weight.

It is to be feared that some will find Dr. Swete's judgment disturbing. They may be re-assured by observing the attitude of the early Christian towards the books of the Bible. Dionysius the Bishop from 247 to 265 A.D. of the Patriarchal See of Alexandria writes: "That John is the writer of this book, we must believe, for he says so himself: but who this was, is doubtful."

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

PAUL'S INKS

ARE UNIQUE!

Black, Blue, Red, Green, Violet, etc.

IN SPECIAL DECANTERS WITH
PATENT STOPPERS. NO CORKS
TO DRAW. NO SPLASHING. NO
INKY FINGERS. Ask your Stationers
for PAUL'S (6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s.), or send 13 stamps for sample (any colour
and full particulars.

PAUL'S INK (Ltd.), Birmingham.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74 New Oxford Street, London.

Invite Inquiries from those seeking

Permanent Photographic

Reproductions

Of the Highest Possible Excellence.

THE COMPANY'S PROCESSES

Autotype Solar (Carbon).
Autotype Mechanical (Collotype).
Auto-Gravure (Copperplate Engraving).

ARE EMPLOYED BY

The Trustees of the British Museum.
The Local Government Board.
Many Learned Societies, Leading Publishers, and Artists of Repute.

Examples of Work may be inspected and all information obtained at

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

BUY AND READ

The Saturday Westminster

BECAUSE

It contains all "F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week

BECAUSE

of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."

BECAUSE

of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.

BECAUSE

of its variety of General Articles and Short Stories.

BECAUSE

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind and

COSTS BUT A PENNY A WEEK.

Issued by the "Westminster Gazette"

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s Publications.

THE NEW PHYSICS AND CHEMISTRY:

A Series of Popular Essays on Physical and Chemical Subjects. By W. A. SHENSTONE, F.R.S., Senior Science Master in Clifton College.

Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SCHOOLMASTER.—"In every way suitable for those whose knowledge of science is not very deep, but who are able to follow with intelligence a reasonably clever exposition. To such we cordially recommend the book."

NEW VOLUME OF THE "HISTORICAL SERIES FOR BIBLE STUDENTS."

OUTLINES OF BIBLICAL HISTORY AND LITERATURE.

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO 200 A.D.

By FRANK KNIGHT SANDERS, Ph.D., D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

* * These outlines enable the student to get at the Bible itself in a most helpful way, to realise vividly the story which it relates, supplements or develops, and to appreciate the various stages in the gradual development of the Israel which became the world's religious teacher." [Immediately.]

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF MARTIN'S "THE STONES OF PARIS."

In 1 vol. With many Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE STONES OF PARIS IN HISTORY AND LETTERS.

By BENJAMIN ELLIS MARTIN, and CHARLOTTE M. MARTIN. [Immediately.]

* * A few copies of the two-volume edition are still to be had. Price 18s.

THE GREAT DAYS OF VERSAILLES.

STUDIES FROM COURT LIFE IN THE LATER YEARS OF LOUIS XIV.

By G. F. BRADBY. With Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

STANDARD.—"Written with scholarly care and with a fine sense of historical perspective. . . . There is much in the picture which is of dramatic and abiding interest."

RICHARD III: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER REVIEWED IN THE LIGHT OF RECENT RESEARCH.

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S.

With a Portrait and Map. 10s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Our author is very careful to base all his facts on distinct authorities, and, so far as it is possible, on contemporary evidence; he writes so persuasively and so ingeniously that we are tempted to accept his version to the full."

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE NETHERLANDS.

By J. ELLIS BARKER,

Author of "Modern Germany," etc. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. J. L. GARVIN, in the FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW, says: "There is nothing in any language like it, and when all is said, it remains one of the most striking additions recently made to the political library."

THE LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

By S. G. TALLENTYRE.

New and Cheaper Edition. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and other Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"As a piece of pure biography there can be no question of his brilliant success. Voltaire lives unmistakably in these pages."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Elliot Stock's New Books

NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS.

In crown 8vo, gilt lettered, price 3s. net.

MANY-COLOURED ESSAYS. By CHARLE J. DUNPHIE.

NEW NOVELS AND STORIES.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, 6s.

MY NEIGHBOUR. A Tale of Our Own Times. By E. G. STEVENSON.

"The book has a simple charm, while the wholesome love interest it contains will commend it to readers."—DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

HOLMWOOD PRIDE. Who Had the Best of It? By ADA HEATH.

"The story is well told, and brings out in bold relief the best and worst points of its various characters."—SCOTSMAN.

"The story is interesting throughout, and is written well."—FINANCIAL STANDARD.

CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo, appropriately bound, price 1s. net.

IN A COUNTRY TOWN. Some Old-World Stories. By CHARLOTTE HUNTER.

"A pretty little volume, containing seven stories dealing with life in a quiet, old-world settlement. . . . They are good enough to make the reader wish for more."—CHURCH TIMES.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 8vo, bound in leatherette, illustrated, price 1s.

A FAREWELL TO ETON, and other Poems By K. FENTON, Author of "Dora" and "Easter Memories."

"This is a collection of really good poems. Those who have read 'Easter Memories' will enjoy this little work by the same author."—LAYMAN.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, gilt lettered, price 3s. 6d.

THE TRIUMPH OF MAN. By PERCY SCHOFIELD.

"We can heartily commend this volume to all true lovers of poetry, for, to say the least, it reaches a mark which places it considerably above the average in this class of literature." CHRISTIAN AGE.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

CHEAP EDITIONS OF RUSKIN

Published by any other firm than that of GEORGE ALLEN, 156 Charing Cross Road, are NOT the Complete Works as Revised and Corrected by the AUTHOR.

POPULAR EDITIONS, with Notes, from 1s. per Volume, issued by GEORGE ALLEN, London.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1813

FEBRUARY 2, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Books for Sale.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set, 12 vols., as issued, 35s.; Archæologia Cantiana, 26 vols., £10 10s.; Encyclopædia Britannica, 36 vols., "Times" edition, half morocco, as published, £9 9s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

MS. TYPED with care and accuracy, 10d. per 1000 words. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

Books Wanted

DICKENS (Charles). Posthumous Papers of the Cadgers' Club, Lloyd, n d
Pickwick in America, Lloyd, n d
Posthumous Papers of the Wonderful Discovery Club, 1898
The Pickwick Almanac, 1838
Lloyd's Pickwickian Songster, Lloyd, n d
The Sam Weller Scrap Sheet
The Post-humorous Notes of the Pickwickian Club, Lloyd, n d
The Penny Pickwick, or any numbers
The Life and Adventures of Oliver Twist, n d
Scenes from Nickleby Married, 1840
Nicholas Nickleberry, by Bos, Lloyd, n d
Mister Humfrise's Clock, Lloyd, n d
John Jasper's Secret, 1872, or any parts
Digby Grand, 2 vols, 1853
Dobson (Austin) Vignettes in Rhyme, 1873
Proverbs in Porcelain, 1877
Domestic Architecture in England, 4 vols, 1857
Donovan (E.) Any Works on Natural History
Don Juan, his Life in London, 1821-22
Don Quixote, 3 vols, 1833
Donne (John) Poems, 1633, 1635, 1639, 1654, 1669
Doran (D.) Their Majesties' Servants, 2 vols, 1864
Dorando, a Spanish Tale, 1767
Dorat, Les Baissers and Mois de Mai, 8vo, 1770, title in red and black Dover (G.) Annalia Dubrensis (Cotswold Games), 4to, 1636
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street W.O.

SPECIAL BOOK OFFERS.

GLAISHER'S Supplementary Catalogue. Now Ready.

LATEST PURCHASES AND LOWEST PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER.

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,
265 High Holborn, London, W.C.

Also a New, Greatly Extended and much Improved Catalogue of POPULAR CURRENT LITERATURE, STANDARD BOOKS, HANDY REPRINTS, the BEST FICTION, etc. etc.

All Lists Free on Application.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row E.C.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWSON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY OHRONIOLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

A BERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

READY at commencement of
PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

1907 Edition

Illustrated with 500 Armorial Engravings.

DEBRET'S HOUSE OF COMMONS
AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH

A full and complete Parliamentary Guide, with particulars of all pollings at last two General and all subsequent Bye Elections; changes in personnel of the House since last appeal to Constituencies; Abridged Peerage; List of Privy Council; and Biographies of Judges of High and County Courts, Recorders, Colonial Judges, etc. etc.

480 pp. cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY
AND AFTER
FEBRUARY

The Revived Channel Tunnel Project:

- (1) By the EDITOR—(2) By Major-General Sir FREDERICK MAURICE, K.C.B.—(3) By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.—(4) By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL—(5) By Sir JOHN MACDONELL, C.B., LL.D.—(6) By Sir JOHN WOLFE BARRY, K.C.B.

Recent Attacks on the Admiralty. By JULIAN S. CORBETT
Germany at the Parting of the Ways. By J. ELLIS BARKER
Women and Politics. By Miss CAROLINE E. STEPHEN
An Attempt to Revive the Dramatic Habit. By FRANK R. BENSON
Ibsen's Imperialism. By WILLIAM ARCHER
The Background of Drama. By E. A. BAUGHAN
The Forests of India and their Administration. By JOHN NISBET
(late Indian Forest Service)
"The Decay of Manners." By ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST
The Tragedy of the "Ex." By Mrs. JOHN LANE
The Marriage of Peleus and Thetis (after Catullus). By the Right Hon. Lord BURGHCLERE
Montenegro. By Lady THOMPSON
The Employment of Mercenaries. By WALTER COPELAND PERRY
A Democrat's Defence of the House of Lords. By M. MALTMAN BARRIE

Supplement.

The Channel Tunnel and Public Opinion.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE.

From the DE LA MORE PRESS List

Some Pages of Levantine History

By the Rev. H. F. T. DUCKWORTH, M.A.

Professor of Divinity, Toronto; formerly Assistant Chaplain in Cyprus, Postmaster of Merton College, Oxford. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

CONTENTS.—Great Britain and Cyprus, a Rider to the Eastern Question—The Latin Conquest of Cyprus—Athens in the Twelfth Century—The Frankish Conquest.

* * This little book is of interest to all who desire new, curious, and topical information bearing on the ever-present problem as to the possession of Constantinople and the adequate guarding of our strategical route to India. The unique position and importance of Cyprus as a factor in the problem, the Cypriote claims, the relations between Great Britain and the Porte with regard to Cyprus, and, finally, the age-long conflict between the Greek and Latin churches in the Levant, are here set forth in a manner that makes the book most fascinating and instructive reading. There are eight fine full-page illustrations.

A Notable Discovery by Mr. Robert Mond.

Aramaic Papyri: Discovered at Assuan

Edited by Prof. A. H. SAYCE, with the assistance of A. E. COWLEY; and with Appendices by W. SPIEGELBERG and SEYMOUR DE RICCI. Double crown folio, in portfolio, 1 Guinea net.

Burma: A Handbook of Practical, Commercial, and Political Information.

By Sir GEORGE SCOTT, K.C.I.E., Author of "The Burman: his Life and Notions." Special Cover Design, with many Illustrations and Map, Appendices on the Shan States, and other subjects. Crown 8vo, cloth ros. 6d. net.

Hypnotism: its History, Practice and Theory.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s. net. The chief aim of this monograph is to draw the attention of medical men to the therapeutic value of hypnotism.

Logic, Deductive and Inductive.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Study of Plant Life for Young People.

By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc. London. Designed Cover. Illustrated with Plates and numerous Diagrams. Royal 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

A First German Course for Science Students.

By Professor H. G. FIELDER and F. E. SANDBACH. With Diagrams. Square 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German.

BY THE SAME AUTHORS.

A Second German Course for Science Students.

Readings from Recent German Scientific Publications. Square 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"Buck" Whaley's Memoirs.

Written by HIMSELF. Edited, with Notes, Introductions, and 10 Illustrations in Photogravure. By Sir EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. Now published for the first time from the original manuscript of 1797. Royal 8vo, 21s. net.

A Manual of Costume as Illustrated by Monumental Brasses.

By HERBERT DRUITT. Indispensable Handbook for all interested in Brasses, Costume and Mediæval Archaeology. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net. Indispensable Handbook for all interested in Brasses, Costume, and Mediæval Archaeology.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd., 32 George St., Hanover Sq., London, W.

CONTENTS

	[Page]		Page
The Literary Week . . .	107	Shelley as a Proof-Reader . . .	118
Literature :		A Literary Causerie :
Criticism by Testimonial . .	109	A Canon of Style . . .	119
Echoes from Kottabos . . .	110	Fiction	120
The Elegant Mrs. Montagu . .	111	Drama :
Sheridan	112	Coquelin and Molière . . .	121
Young London	113	Fine Art :
The Allegory of the Purgatorio .	114	Paintings and Pansies . . .	122
Parish Life	115	Forthcoming Books	123
Ancient Egypt	116	Correspondence	123
Pictures of Life	117	Books Received	125
The Library Table	118	The Bookshelf	126

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

ONE of the noteworthy events of the week is the appointment of Mr. H. W. Massingham to be Editor of our contemporary The Speaker. Mr. Massingham is a brilliant and able journalist, and it is a pleasure to be able to congratulate him on the appointment. He has, since his emergence from provincial life at Norwich, held many positions and discharged many duties with marked capacity. No doubt, therefore, he will add to the distinctions of the periodical that was started by the late Sir Wemyss Reid.

Yet it would be idle to hide certain misgivings. To an impartial onlooker who is inclined to say "A plague on both your houses" and does not profess to hold any political opinions with vehemence, it seems that one reason why many political journals that have been conducted with great ability have not been truly successful is that the editors have been much too partisan. The standing example of a new paper that succeeded without even giving news or using any of the adventitious aids to popularity now commonly employed is the Saturday Review of the 'sixties.

Its Editor, Douglas Cook, was able, if he held any deep convictions, to keep them in check. The journal was professedly Conservative, and yet its most biting sarcasms were directed against the leaders of the Conservative party. Nor did the Editor attempt to show only one side of the question. On a matter of finance he was as keen to have Mr. Gladstone as a contributor as he was to have Lord Salisbury on a crisis in diplomacy. In other words he put his journal first and its political objects second. No succeeding Editor that we know of has been able with such conspicuous ability to steer an independent course through the shoals of politics.

Now Mr. Massingham, so far, has been an extreme partisan. In the position to which he is elected it devolves upon him to show that he can at the proper moment take a wide and critical view of a situation. There would be nothing extraordinary in the fact of his developing this faculty, as we see the same thing constantly done in another profession. Take, for example, an extremely able barrister. Probably during years of successful practice he has accustomed himself to argue one side of the case as though his existence depended upon it; yet when the time comes that he is elevated to the Bench the chances are that he will make a sound and impartial judge. His days of special pleading are ended, and he recognises it to be his duty to see both sides of the case. It is our admiration of Mr. Massingham that prompts the hope that in the new position to which he is called he will be able to evolve those judicial qualities that would make his paper authoritative in the eyes of Conservatives as well as Liberals. He may very well take an example from the Westminster Gazette, which has succeeded in winning this respect without in the slightest degree surrendering its principles. But it must be admitted that the conditions of modern journalism militate against editorial independence.

A correspondent writes:—Professor Churton Collins, nearly five years ago, compared Swift and Rabelais, the perfectly refined and the grotesquely extravagant; now comes Signor Pietro Toldo, of Turin, who deepens the question of comparison and difference. Collecting points of similarity between Cyrano de Bergerac and Swift, he quotes Rohdes's "Erzählung des Odysseus bei Alcinous (ist eine) älteste Robinsonade," which is, let us hope, unknown to Mr. Andrew Lang as the view of any mortal man! Goodwin's "Domingo Gonzalez," done into French in 1648 by Jean Baudoin, is the supposed source of both Cyrano and "Gulliver" (especially at Laputa).

"Sindbad the Sailor" is not alien from the Dean's work, all proportions being kept. "Le soleil de Londres n'a pas les mêmes rayons que celui de l'Orient." Gulliver's awakening in durance is Philostratus's Heracles among the Pygmies (Icon. II. xxii.), whom the Scots of Rabelais call manches d'estrilles (II. xxvii.), and whom the Bâle professor of anatomy lately mentioned in discussing the "missing link" of Dubois. We all know H. M. Stanley's and Dr. Schweinfurt's homunculi. Swift, unlike Rabelais, knew that measurements must be given if probability was to be attained. So we have the exact calculations of the smallest details, whereas the giant Pantagruel sits in his subjects' cottages without any apparent discomfort.

There are no minutiae, realism, véraisemblance, in the priest of Chinon. The priest of St. Patrick's has ever his compass and foot-rule. As tailors, or breeches-makers, nothing so careless as the former, nothing so curiously minute as the latter. Rabelais had read "Furioso," and Swift Rabelais; but the outcome of their respective mental crucibles is very disparate. Gulliver's fire-brigade exploit is from the "Ricciardetto" of Forteguerra (vi., 82 seqq.) and a reminiscence of Gargantua at Paris. Lucian's "Menippus" (xix., 774) gave the idea of likening men to liliputians and to ants, or "Myrmidons." Erasmus, in his "Praise of Folly," had likened courtiers to wasps or gnats. To Liliput the "Civitas Solis" of Campanella is not unlike enough to repel a charge of borrowing. In each are punishments for ingratitude, lying, and such foibles; men march delicately through most pellucid air, as in Euripides's Athens; there are mixed schools for the sexes, as in Plato's "Republic" or in "Les Transatlantiques," which sexes "escono alla campagna, ove s'esercitano alla corsa," etc. The archibugio is more revered than the archibugiardo, instead of the contrary, as now. So Campanella inspired Cyrano and Cyrano Swift.

As we are all what the Coptic priest called the Hellenes, "children ever," but nowadays scientific grown-up children, we pine for explanations of our fairy hornbooks. Even Homer to Erwin Rohde is, we have seen, a Defoe, his Odysseys being Crusoe. Nearer us are Lucian—influenced by India—Rabelais, Cyrano, Swift. "Human nature," says my Lord Bacon, "is ever in appetite," demanding whence came these tales, what of truth do they embody? Mr. H. G. Wells for us, and M. C. Flammarion for the French, write what is "un genre bâtarde fondé sur des équivoques scientifiques," the best pabulum for our age, a link between youth and maturity.

Jules Verne's lucubrations have been more than once realised in practice. The Nautilus, for instance, has long left the brain for the main. For a savant, Verne lived in an "ante-chamber," almost in the chamber "of applied science." The creator of Phineas Fogg had seized, and always acted on, the truism that children, now especially, must have their tales probable: if the event portrayed did not happen, it must be such as could have happened.

And Swift is precisely the satirical humourist that at the same time owes much, perhaps the best, of his inspiration to Cyrano de Bergerac, and amuses best both children and adults. Proportion and tempered reasonableness are the qualities of the Travels. Even in proportion and reason the mean is kept. "The wit of Swift is the perfection of refined ingenuity," says Mr. Churton Collins. Rabelais is "drunk with animal spirits." For Herr Thierkopf, of Magdeburg, in the Dean's and Abbé's view, "ist . . . die ganz Welt ein Narrenhaus." This last word is terribly true of Swift, unless Sir William Wilde's contention of his sanity be upheld. At any rate, the sæva indignatio has never been denied, nor his perfect adaptability to the taste of at least two of man's Four Ages. While children take the obvious sense, the older infants among us seek at the same time the esoteric meaning and the sources. These latter the Turin scholar very fully and eruditely helps us to unearth.

A book by Madison Cawein, published by E. P. Dutton and Co., of New York, gives rise to a suggestion. Suppose its editor or publisher were to employ a clerk to go over it and delete the epithets mechanically, how vastly its literary merits would be improved! In order to show our meaning a passage is selected at random:

On a low fern-based rock—mossy shrine of the wood-god who has this particular forest under his protection—before which, like a candelabrum before an altar, burning with many silken flames of greenish gold, a young hickory lifted up its hundred pointed leaf-sheaths, and a paw-paw shook its sacramental bells of bronze—I laid an offering of wild flowers this last day of April.

Now mark how much better it would read after an application of the blue pencil:

On a rock before which a hickory lifted up its leaf-sheaths and a paw-paw shook its bells, I laid an offering of wild flowers this last day of April.

Sixty-four words are reduced to twenty-nine, and is not the improvement apparent? Nothing essential is lost.

Yet the author, as may be seen from the following extract, aspires to a certain kind of superiority:

How true is this of a great many of our suddenly successful writers, whose works meet with such overwhelming applause from the public, which is the vulgar, and reach such phenomenal sales. I never hear of a new book that everybody praises and recommends but that I am straightway suspicious of its literary merit and avoid reading it, feeling sure that the author has probably "committed some great blunder."

What are "phenomenal" sales?

It is such writing as this that has brought "prose poetry" into ridicule. Ten years ago there was a fashion for it in this country which has, luckily, passed away. The writers, many of whom are not without refinement, would be quick to recognise the vulgarity of a woman who tricked herself out with a multitude of false jewels, yet this prose, overloaded with epithet and sham ornament, is as vulgar and ill-bred as the wearer of paste diamonds.

Mr. Frederick Morgan Padelford has a curious article in the Cornhill Magazine entitled "Browning out West." From it we learn that the American youth takes much more readily to Browning than he does to Tennyson.

According to one student, to read Tennyson is "to be confined in a prim garden of heavy-scented flowers," while, on the other hand, looking "to the spirit and mystery of the poet and not to his teaching," it is said that they recognise in Browning a great elemental genius. The impression that one carries away from reading the article is that the American youth can have no real appreciation of poetry. Among other things it explains why America has not succeeded in developing a great poet.

The following characteristic letter has been written by M. Mistral in reply to the suggestion of MM. Paul Bourget and François Coppée that the Provençal poet should become a candidate for membership of the French Academy:

I am accustomed, like Simon Stylites, to stand isolated on my pillar, and if God should grant me four or five years more of life to finish my work, it would be unwise to rush over the ground. Parva domus, magna quies and the Academy is a large house! . . . My sole ambition has been to preserve the Provençal language and to do honour to my race, and this by means of poetry.

I have never had so much as a thought for my personal glory . . . everything has been added from outside—witness the proposal you make me now, as did my good friends Legouvé first and then Claretie, in bygone days.

Last week, at a meeting of the French Academy, it was announced that the following were candidates for the seat left vacant by the death of M. Ferdinand Brunetière: M. Pierre de Nolhac, who has written a history of the Court of Versailles; M. Edmond Haraucourt, M. Jules Delafosse, the senator, and M. Léon Séché. It is likely that other names will be added to this list. The election is fixed for Thursday, the 7th.

The Musée at Antwerp will be enriched under the will of the late Marquise Maison, of Paris, who was Belgian by birth, by the addition to its fine collection of the following valuable pictures, viz.: Van Dyck's Portrait of Charles II. as a child, a Christ by Duquesnoy, a seascape by Charles Vernet, and Slingeneyer's Woman in a Bath.

A correspondent writes:—By the sudden death of Miss Alice Oldham, B.A., the cause of the higher education of women has suffered a great loss, for there was no more zealous and indefatigable worker in Ireland than she was, from the days of the Intermediate Education Act to the day of her death. Miss Oldham was one of the earliest women graduates of an Irish University, obtaining first-class honours in Latin, and honours in Natural Science and in Logic and Ethics during her University career. She became a teacher and lecturer in Alexandra College in Dublin, and lectured on such subjects as "Egoism as a Principle of Ethical Conduct; its History and Position To-day," and "Some Modern Views of the Nature of Mind and their Practical Application." Miss Oldham, as honorary secretary of the Irish Schoolmistresses Association played a leading part in securing the opening of Dublin University to the women. Though in many respects a remarkably clever woman, she published little, devoting the greater part of her time to the cause she espoused.

We notice with interest that the Stage Society has developed the scope of the News Sheet which is sent out to every member before each performance. In the number which is lying before us, Mr. Grein writes an interesting little article which he calls "A Short History of the Independent Theatre." It appears that the basis of the Independent Theatre was laid in Holland: for it was at Amsterdam that The Profligate and The Middleman by Mr. Pinero and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones respectively, were first produced, owing to the persistent energy of Mr. Grien. So great was their success that the managers of the Royal Subsidised Theatre sent Mr. Grein a cheque for fifty pounds for the furtherance of dramatic art in England. And so the Independent Theatre gradually came into being. Among the notable plays that were produced, are—George Bernard Shaw's first play, Widowers' Houses, Mr. George Moore's The Strike at Arlingford, a one-act play by Mr. Arthur Symonds, founded on a story by Mr. Frank Harris, and The Black Cat by Dr. Todhunter. But perhaps the most famous achievement was the production of Ghosts under the direction of Mr. Cecil Raleigh on March 9, 1891.

Any sign of exuberance, such as the extension of their little paper, is to be welcomed in a body so admirable as the Stage Society; for the work they have done is excellent and is only comparable in importance with the work that remains for them to do. And on this point of future work we notice that a pertinent letter has been written to the paper by Mr. Middleton Fox. "I think," he writes, "we are inclined to neglect (if I may be pardoned for coining another term) the fantastic-poetic drama." And he goes on to warn the society against the policy of producing too many censor-forbidden plays. "It will be fatal to us if we give any handle to the idea that we are a society for exploiting unpleasant and 'improper' plays. We cannot be too careful in limiting our liberty in this respect." That is very wisely said.

There are, we believe, some fifteen hundred members of the Stage Society, and we see that the Council of Management has decided that when the number of ordinary members on the register reaches sixteen hundred the list will be closed, and membership will become a matter of some difficulty. Meanwhile we would point out to our readers that they can obtain all particulars from the Secretary, 9 Arundel Street, Strand. The plays to be produced this season are The Cassilis Engagement, by Mr. St. John Hankin, Brieux's Les Hannelons, an original comedy by a new writer, and Don Juan in Hell, which is the dream omitted from the acting version of Mr. Bernard Shaw's Man and Superman.

Some interesting particulars of the discoveries made by Dr. Stein in the sand-buried ruins of Khotan, are given in the Indian papers. His first operations were at the great Stupa of Rawak, which he had partly excavated in the year 1900. On the last occasion he found a ruined temple on the Hanguya Tati, which yielded some interesting terra-cotta reliefs. Their style was plainly derived from models of Græco-Buddhist Art. The best results were obtained from a group of small ruined sites in the shrub-covered desert, not far from the village of Domoko, east of Khotan. In a Buddhist shrine at Khadalik, Dr. Stein recovered a large number of manuscripts in Sanskrit, Chinese, and the "unknown" language of old Khotan, besides many wooden tablets inscribed in the same language and some in Tibetan.

The same temple also furnished portions of a far older Sanskrit manuscript on birch-bark, no doubt imported from India. All these records dated from the eighth century or earlier. Apparently these towns were abandoned about that period. In a rubbish mound near the southern edge of the Domoko oasis were found documents in the Brahmi script of old Khotan and a large collection of Chinese records on wood, the latter dealing with questions of administration.

At a general assembly of Academicians and Associates, held on January 30, Mr. George Henry was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy.

LITERATURE

CRITICISM BY TESTIMONIAL

Thomas Edward Brown, the Manx Poet. By SELWYN G. SIMPSON. With a Preface by J. M. WILSON, D.D. (Walter Scott Publishing Co., 6s.)

If the writer of a medical treatise were to begin his first chapter with a statement from one of Mother Seigel's advertisements the book would be instantly damned. The line between the qualified and the unqualified is drawn straight in medicine. With literature the case is different. Public approval is the only test of merit or authority, and though it be true that the addition of a million cyphers to one another gives only nought as the sum total, the verdict of the ignorant is a handy tool for the juggler. We are sorry to open our remarks on the Life of so worthy a poet and prose writer as the late Mr. T. E. Brown with an ungenerous comparison. Not on him is any reflection cast. On the contrary, our judgment coincides almost exactly with that expressed by Canon Wilson in the restrained and capable preface which he has contributed to this foolish book. He describes the characteristics of Brown with a sure and precise touch. His originality, his talent as a teller of stories, and his art, at once self-effacing and self-expressing, are the points most to be admired in Brown. But a great writer has no need of such testimonials as are huddled together in the following passage:

Great writers found him long ago. George Eliot wrote enthusiastically to Maecilian when "Betsy Lee" first appeared. Max Müller, to whom with others, when staying at the Maloja Hotel in 1885, I read "The Doctor," put it in his list of the hundred best books of the world. He borrowed my copy, then unpublished, and read it to Browning at Venice, and afterwards to the Empress Frederick at Berlin; and told me of their delight in it; and others known in the literary world, rank Brown among the Great Poets.

When we turn to the book itself it is like entering a different atmosphere, and we are forcibly reminded of Canon Wilson's careful reference to the youth of his friend. Mr. Simpson opens his chapter with Mr. Hall Caine's boast that "Mr. Brown is the first of Manxmen living or dead." He might as well have described him as "that puissant officer the headborough of Little Pedlington." Has the Isle of Man been rich in prophets? Thus the text and the sermon in its ejaculatory way proceeds: "Mr. Caine, in his last three words, their children will, has expressed a fact [sic] . . . Brown's day is yet to come." Then once more the testimonial dodge is brought into play (extract from Mr. Canton). Bang goes the author next with the extraordinary statement: "And Brown is superior to the Scotchman [Burns] in intellect, culture and refinement." Exactly in the style of Mother Seigel's follows a testimonial from Mr. William Storr. Next, Mr. Henley has "proved"—mark the word!—"the superiority of the Manx poet over the 'thrice-laurelled Laureate.'" It was easy to tolerate such extravagance in Mr. Henley, who was naturally unable to write as an impartial judge of his own schoolmaster; but it is odd that such absurdities should be repeated in a book pretending to be critical. Not once, by-the-by, but twenty times, did Henley say to the present writer that the worst of all his mistakes was that of allowing Brown to review one of Mr. Caine's novels in the National Observer. However, our author proceeds on his wonted way:

But it is useless to compare Brown with the ordinary run of great men. He was volcanic.

In support of this statement he inserts a testimonial from the Bishop of Hereford in which, sure enough, we find a reference to "the volcanic outbursts" of Brown. There is a delicious phrase in this document—"the average run of distinguished men"—which deserves noting. No doubt the Bishop of Hereford is so much accustomed to the company of men of genius that he has more opportunities to strike an average than less-favoured mortals. It would take long to examine in detail the vast number of testimonials collected by the industrious Mr. Simpson. They come from all quarters, including the ACADEMY, which in 1897 published an article on Brown from which we would to-day dissent in a very slight degree. But the author rests his case mainly upon the evidence of two witnesses. W. E. Henley and Mr. Hall Caine surely are an extraordinary pair of names to be coupled together. The junction is purely accidental, due to each having a personal acquaintance with the poet. In his generous way, Henley used to declare that he owed all he was to Brown. The schoolmaster it was who first brushed the clay from his eyes and enabled him to see. And it is altogether to the credit of the pupil's warm heart that in later life he was always the impassioned advocate, never the impartial judge, of his teacher. With Mr. Hall Caine the case is different. The alliance between him and Brown caused many a keenly scrutinising glance to be cast on the work of the latter, on the principle that a man is known by his friends. Brown's love for Manxland blinded him to every failing of an author hailing from that beloved country. Mr. Caine returned the friendship by praise which was never in any true sense critical, but consisted of glowing and rhetorical generalities. "So strong, so powerful a man has this island seldom produced," is language that might be addressed to a dignitary of any sort. That Brown himself was no critic will be apparent to any one who studies the examples given in the book, where the mighty Hardy is cast down from his seat and the unspeakable Caine exalted. Mr. Simpson appears to have adopted this view. Indeed, it is the revelation of his standards that saps his authority. When he ranges himself on the side of Hall Caine and against Burns and Tennyson he renders discussion of his opinions superfluous. What would the poet have thought of such extravagance as this?—

If Brown has not Shakespeare's richness and vast compass, or Milton's sublime and unflagging strength, or Dante's severe, vivid, ardent force of vision, he has a joyous picturesqueness and fellow-feeling, a freedom of eye and heart, or, in a word, a general healthiness that prove him to be amongst the foremost writers of modern literature.

A comparison with William Barnes would have been more appropriate, but with Mr. Simpson's book as a text we must decline to enter upon any discussion of the merits of T. E. Brown.

ECHOES FROM KOTTABOS

Echoes from Kottabos. Edited by R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D., D.C.L., LL.D., and Sir EDWARD SULLIVAN, Bart. (E. Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN 1882, it is hardly necessary to remind our readers, a selection of classical exercises was issued under the title of "Dublin Translations into Greek and Latin." The book before us consists for the most part of selections from what may be called the non-classical side of Kottabos. The editors have had some fifty numbers of Kottabos from which to select, and it would be difficult to praise too highly the rare discrimination and sound literary judgment which have guided their choice. There is only one piece which we would have excluded: Max Cullinan's "Terrier in my Granny's hall." For the rest, the selections bear testimony to a very high standard of literary ability among the students of Trinity College, Dublin; and, taken together, the two volumes form a splendid vindication of the Irish University as the home of scholarship, culture and refined taste.

It is a noticeable feature in Kottabos that much of the English verse was of a serious cast. The volume opens with a sad poem by Charles Pelham Mulvany entitled "Scepticism." Perhaps his best poem is "Swift on Stella," but "L'Amour qui Passe," though unequal, has many merits. We shall see, when dealing with the humorous pieces, that he had another side to his genius.

The late Thomas E. Webb contributed some very graceful verses, notably a couple of translations or paraphrases from de Musset. The poem called "Remember" is even finer than the sonnet entitled "Never." We wish we could quote both.

There is a delightful series of "Poems Written in Discipleship," which, we are told, "are in no sense parodies, but intend to be affectionate studies or sketches in the manner of some of the masters of song." In the first of them (of the school of Tennyson) Dr. Dowden has caught the manner of the late Laureate:

The gloom of the sea-fronting cliffs
Lay on the water, violet dark,
The pennon drooped, the sail fell in,
And slowly moved our bark.

A golden day: the summer dream'd
In heaven, and on the whispering sea
Within our hearts the summer dream'd;
It was pure bliss to be.

Then rose the girls with bonnets loosed,
And shining tresses lightly blown,
Alice and Adela, and sang
A song from Mendelssohn.

O sweet and sad, and wildly clear,
Through summer air it sinks and swells,
Sweet with a measureless desire,
And sad with all farewells.

The poem entitled "Sea-Roses," by J. E. Healy, is so fine that we reproduce it:

Where the sea-roses grow down to the sea,
And where the white ripples laugh up to the roses;
Where the gorse and the heather are nodding together,
And the bud of the pimpernel opens and closes;
Where the curlew dips to the kiss of the wave,
And the grey-green wings of the plover whirr
By the languorous motion and swaying of ocean,
There I am dreaming of her.

Sweet sea-rose, you were always sweet,
Yellow of petal, and greenly glowing
In warm sea-places 'mid soft embraces
And tender touches of night-winds blowing.
The first full ray of the moon on you
Falls in the quiet of night begun;
And lovingly tender, in slanting splendour,
The first red shaft of the sun.

Ah, but now you are queen of the flowers,
Queen of the queens of the summer weather;
For here where the plover were wheeling above her,
Here in your glory we met together.
Rose, you were happy, but happier far
I, as I thrill'd with ecstasy,
When she pluck'd you stooping, her dark eyes drooping,— Pluck'd you, and gave you to me.

It is with no slight regret that we refrain from quoting Sir Edward Sullivan's "Francesca," but it is too long to reproduce, and extracts would not do justice to it. In addition to many other merits, Sir Edward has followed the terza rima of the original, and has thus earned the gratitude of Dante's admirers. One of the best pieces of its kind is this author's translation of Goethe's King of Thule into the Scottish dialect. This dialect has been essayed before in rendering German into English, but seldom more successfully. For downright weirdness, W. G. Wills's "Graf Bröm" could hardly be surpassed. William Wilkins's "In the Engine Shed" is a study in realism of very great merit, and he contributes several other good things, notably his "Study on the River Dodder" and "Actaeon."

By way of transition to the humorous side, we reproduce "A Flattering Illusion," by Geoffrey Clark:

I thank you for the flowers you sent, she said.
And then she pouted, blush'd, and droop'd her head.
Forgive me for the words I spoke last night:
The flowers have sweetly proved that you are right.
Then I forgave her, took her hand in mine,
Seal'd her forgiveness with the old, old sign;
And as we wander'd through the dim-lit bowers,
I wonder'd who had really sent the flowers.

The greater number of the humorous poems are the work of Mulvany, and most of them are excellent. One of the best of his contributions is "The Examination Hall"—a parody of "Locksley Hall," of course. The "Song of the Lines" is another College reminiscence which will appeal to all Dublin students. Next after Mulvany we place John Martley and Samuel Kennedy Cowan, between whose merits it is difficult to choose. Martley's best are "Our Lady of Gain" and "The Deserted City"; but Cowan's "A Supplemental Examination," "Locksley Hall Hotel, the Morning After," and "After Study," a parody of Swinburne's weird "Four Boards of the Coffin Lid," reach, perhaps, as high a level. Another clever Swinburnean parody is "At Lawn Tennis in College (Atalanta out of Calydon)," by George Wilkins. We like, too, J. S. Drennan's "Epitaph on an Attorney":

Here lies Misther Quirk,—
Still at the ould work!

and we hope that Mr. Francis Thompson read Dr. Tyrrell's recast of Wordsworth's "She dwelt among the untrodden ways" in his Latinised style:

A violet by a muscose stone
Semi-occult,
Formose as asre when but one
Ostends its vult.

Dr. Tyrrell's "Another Way of Art" is a clever parody of Browning, and his "Caliban upon Kottabos" should not be missed. We should like to see a parody of "Mr. Sludge" from the same pen. We hardly know where to class the late Arthur Palmer's "Flight of the Muses." It is humorous in form—but facit indignatio versus. Palmer keenly resented the insult and injury with which classical study was threatened, by the proposed exclusion of Greek verse composition from the Scholarship examination; but, happily, the threat was not fulfilled, and the honour belongs largely to him.

The prose in the Echoes is wholly humorous. Almost every one is familiar with Littledale's "Oxford Solar Myth." Dr. Tyrrell has the lion's share of the rest, John Martley coming next. Mr. Newcomen's "Orgulous Artificer" is a clever squib in an archaic setting, and Mr. Pooler's essay "Of Poesie" is a capital parody of Bacon's style. The Latin rhymes are wholly contributed by Dr. Tyrrell. Readers will be glad to have the complete copy of his ingenious version of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs." Many will also be well pleased with the rhyme, "In Praepositi Pavonem"—an original composition.

It is difficult to convey in a short review a fair idea of the merit of these Echoes; but on the whole, as we have said, the pieces maintain a remarkably high level. Many of the best poems are too long to quote, and we must leave our readers to make their acquaintance in the volume itself. That there are no less than fifty-three contributors to Kottabos represented in this selection says much for the versatility of the scholars of T.C.D.

It is a pity that the editors did not provide the book with an index giving the pieces under their authors' names, as well as an index of first lines.

THE ELEGANT MRS. MONTAGU

Mrs. Montagu and Her Friends. By R. HUCHON. (Murray, 6s. net.)

A LADY who before she was eight years old had copied out the whole of Addison's "Spectator"; who from the age of twelve to the age of seventy-two corresponded regularly with another lady, who was Prior's lovely Peggy, and with her sisters "Fidget"; who entertained royalty at breakfast in a room hung with feathered tapestry of her own making, and regaled the chimney-sweepers of London to beef and plum-pudding on her own lawn; who took up the cudgels for Shakespeare against Voltaire and wielded them with some effect; a lady in whose drawing-room the word blue-stocking was coined, certainly does not deserve to be forgotten. All this and more gave feature to the life of Mrs. Montagu. And yet the name conjures up the vision of vaccination rather than the vision of the most exquisite leader of fashion who ever preferred literary animadversion to cards and scandal and frivolity. Mr. Huchon blows valourously at the dust of oblivion which has settled upon her. His essay is none the worse for being a little pompous: its austerity forms a proper background to the quoted wit, and throws into agreeable relief the figure of the fragile, spirited lady about whom he is writing. She was, indeed, a typical daughter of that flippant age of decorum which Dr. Johnson ruled with his rod of reason, an age which preferred elegance before beauty and common sense before everything; in which men and women talked literature even more judiciously than they wrote it.

Elizabeth was the eldest daughter of Matthew Robinson, a rich country gentleman who married at eighteen, had twelve children, and at last, after his wife died, attained to his heart's wish of becoming a man about London town, as, we are told, he had been before his marriage. Elizabeth was born in 1720. She was never troubled by the romantic longings which burdened her indolent father. In 1742 she was wise enough to marry Edward Montagu, a very rich man well past middle age, even in years, with whom she lived in comfort and happiness, or rather—perhaps it would be better to use a more reasonable word—satisfaction. Her eyes were never dimmed by the "purple mist of love": but when he died he left her £7000 a year and estates, which no man of business could manage better than she. His wealth enabled her to achieve the distinction in life which she coveted, but which wealth unallied with her own brilliance could never have given her—the distinction of being a great hostess, whose house was the resort of all that was excellent in the world of fashion, of letters and of politics. For fifty years her position was pre-eminent. Neither Mrs. Vesey nor Mrs. Thrale nor Mrs. Boscawen, her rivals, could withstand the combination of wealth and wit that was found in Mrs. Montagu's house. But her parties never reached the intellectual standard of those held in Paris by Madame Geoffrin, or by Madame de Defland or Mademoiselle de Lespinasse. The assemblies at Hill Street, and at Bolton Row, as Mr. Huchon puts it, were inferior to those at the Convent St. Joseph or the Rues St. Dominique and St. Honoré. Mrs. Montagu had a very English difficulty to cope with, and a very great one, in the fact that the men she wanted in her Pekin room or in her room of Cupidons or withdrawing-room, hankered ungallantly after their own society and their own club-room. Pipes, perhaps, and port, they found more stimulating than the most elegant femininity. Men are like that: coarse creatures at best.

Many distinguished men came, however. Dr. Johnson often visited Hill Street. "Sir," he once said to James Boswell, "conversing with her you may find variety in one." And he must have been entertained in the battle of wit that invariably took place between Mrs. Thrale and Mrs. Montagu whenever those ladies met. Dr. Johnson's presence was a feature of the gatherings. The indefatigable Boswell records that he had no opinion of the lady's powers as a critic. "Sir," he said (what pronouncement of his is complete without that arresting monosyllable? He knew its value) "Sir, that Essay contains no single word of criticism." With this remark he finished with the famous discourse on Shakespeare, peremptorily. Whether or not Mrs. Montagu knew of this judgment, friendship prevailed between them until the Doctor published his "Life of Lord Lyttelton," in which he said of the lord's poems: "they have nothing to be despised but little to be admired," and of the "Dialogues of the Dead," the last three of which were written by Mrs. Montagu herself, "they were kindly commended by the Critical Reviewers"; and poor Lyttelton with humble gratitude returned in a note acknowledgments which can never be proper, since they must be paid either for flattery or for justice." This was more than the sensitive lady could brook, and it occasioned a lasting breach between them.

Burke she knew before he was famous. In 1758 she wrote of him as "a young lawyer by profession tho' an author by practice." She remained on terms of intimacy with him, though she was unable to accede to his request to use her influence with Mr. Secretary Pitt to obtain for him the post of Consul at Madrid, which he wanted. David Garrick came to her drawing-room, and was obliging enough to recite speeches from plays of Shakespeare for the entertainment of her guests. He was not a frequent visitor at the Conversation Parties, but was asked to dinner when distinguished politicians or royalties were to be present. Mrs. Montagu had a genius for tact as a hostess. Beattie, the mildly philosophic poet, Lyttelton, Horace Walpole, Sir Joshua Reynolds, William Wilberforce, and many other well-known men, figured at her assemblies. Cowper, the gentle-hearted Cowper, was too much occupied with his religious difficulties and his hares to enter society much, but he read her Essay and wrote to Lady Hesketh, "I no longer wonder that Mrs. Montagu stands at the head of all that is learned and that every critic veils his bonnet to her superior judgment." One critic at least cocked up his bonnet at it: but no matter. Cowper was always gently gallant. He heard of the famous feather room and his enthusiasm was roused to the pitch of couplets on the occasion. They are printed in his poetical works, where students of English literature may find and study them.

Literary ladies, too, found their way to Hill Street and Portman Square. Hannah More was a devoted admirer of Mrs. Montagu. Her poem, "Bas Bleu," is a tribute of her esteem, a little monument reared in honour of her friend:

She who Shakespeare's wrongs redrest
Prov'd that the brightest are the best.

Until Mrs. Montagu appeared "Conversation's setting light Lay half obscured in Gothic night," by such trumperies as whist, "that desolating Hun," or as quadrille, "that Vandal of colloquial wit." But to Fanny Burney belongs the distinction of describing her friend and hostess most vividly. "I found her," she writes, "brilliant in diamonds, solid in judgment and critical in talk, and deemed her a person to respect rather than to love." That is a description as witty as it is true; though no reference is made to Mrs. Montagu's amazing vitality, which enabled her to live on strenuously almost to the last day of her long life.

SHERIDAN

The Dramatic Works of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. With an Introduction by JOSEPH KNIGHT. (Frowde, 2s.)

The Major Dramas of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Edited with Introduction and Notes by GEORGE HENRY NETTLETON. (Ginn, 4s.)

If there be any one who has never studied Sheridan, we recommend these two books as the best on which to begin the study. An "Oxford text," edited by so ripe a scholar and so profound a critic of the drama as Mr. Joseph Knight, might seem good enough by itself; but Mr. Nettleton's volume, devoting less space to text, devotes much more to biography, introduction and notes, and he succeeds, not only in giving all the information needed by beginners with sterling fulness and accuracy, but in adding a great deal that will interest those who have already a good working knowledge of the plays. The aim of the book is to give a critical study of Sheridan's major dramas (The Rivals, The School for Scandal, and The Critic) based primarily on contemporary evidence. Contemporary evidence, after all, is the best, if not the only evidence worth consulting in the case of a man who held the mirror up to his own age as Sheridan did; and Mr. Nettleton, following in the footsteps of Sheridan's biographer, Mr. Fraser Rae, has conferred, in this unpretentious little "school-book," a lasting benefit on students of Sheridan by his assiduity in searching newspaperfiles, literature contemporary with Sheridan, and all kinds of sources for facts, and again facts, and facts. Does the reader wish to know more about Lydia Languish's library? Mr. Nettleton throws a bright light on Sheridan's object in putting down this apparently jumbled catalogue, by turning up the books mentioned and giving us, in addition, quotations from the earliest reviews of them. Eighteenth-century Bath is studied, as essential to the understanding of The Rivals. Sheridan's debts to his predecessors, French and English, are examined, and every claim receives fair consideration, however lenient is the judgment against the debtor. More important, the text is edited with great care.

These things, however, are matters of which the student will discover the nature for himself on looking into Mr. Nettleton's book. The result of studying it will be to support Sheridan's claim to be considered the greatest writer of post-Shakespearean comedy. That he was a man of genius is recognised by all. If he had never written a play in his life his five-hours "Begum Speech" on Warren Hastings and the Begums of Oude in Parliament in February 1787 and, later, his speeches during the trial in Westminster Hall must send him down to posterity as one of the greatest of English orators. But oratory, like acting, dies. We know Burke (to his advantage, no doubt) as a prose-writer, not as an orator. If Pitt and Fox spoke as they speak in Mr. Hardy's The Dynasts they must have been mere Mad Hatters at the art: Sheridan's oratorical genius we know only from the testimony of his friends and enemies and from the garbled versions of his speeches that appear in print. Sheridan the playwright we know not only from the printed book but from the modern stage, and, if we study The Critic with Mr. Nettleton's aid and are careful not to judge it by the form in which it appears nowadays at charity matinées, we must realise that here is the perfection of burlesque, just as in The School for Scandal is the perfection of comedy.

Perfection is a hard word; but its use is very nearly justified. It is, or was, not uncommon to find this desperate young Irishman who had eloped with a reigning beauty, fought two duels, written three plays and become manager of Drury Lane, all before he was twenty-five, regarded as a rank plagiarist, who combined what he stole with unblushing imitation, in the manner of Foote, of living people, and tossed the two on to paper without revision or care. Plays written in that manner do not live for a century and a half. And one of Mr. Nettleton's good services is his insistence on the facts that Sheridan was not a plagiarist, that he did not unduly make game of actual people, and that he worked at and published his plays in a way that even Flaubert would not have disdained. The two versions of The Rivals are there to prove the latter point, if, indeed, further proof were needed than, in The School for Scandal, such dialogue as that between Sir Peter and Lady Teazle in Act II. scene i. That Sheridan owed nothing to former writers is a thesis as impossible to maintain as it would be in the case of any other author in all the history of literature; but it is pretty clear that, besides being all that we have said, Sheridan had found time to be a well-read man, and that like other authors, like Milton in his very different way, for instance, he incorporated his knowledge, half consciously, half unconsciously, in his work, having always made it his own before reproducing it. Mrs. Malaprop may derive from Mrs. Slipslop, from Tabitha Bramble, from Mrs. Heidelberg, from Dogberry, and from Mrs. Tryfort in Sheridan's mother's comedy, A Journey to Bath; but she remains Mrs. Malaprop, the œuvre type, the consummation of the class. And though Sir Fretful Plagiary was called Richard Cumberland in real life, he is no bald copy of an actual man.

The genius of Sheridan becomes clearer when we contrast his work as playwright with that of his predecessors and successors. We find him gathering up into himself the best of all that had gone before; after him we find no comedy that can compare with his. He is the fair flower of English comedy. From the Elizabethans he takes nothing but a quotation or two; unless the reader likes to follow Mr. Nettleton in deriving from Ben Jonson the characteristic of the comedy of "humours," which regarded each person as the expression of a single quality and gave him a name to correspond. This seems to us to be going needlessly behind Sheridan's great originals, the Restoration comedies. In practice, this is what always happens to the minor characters. There being no room to develop them, they are treated from a single point of view, which, whether a corresponding name be given or not, is all that they are wanted for. We cannot admit that Sheridan is Jonsonian in any of his major characters; or, as it might be better expressed, he is at least not Shadwellian. If Joseph Surface has a leading characteristic, he is a complete being, not an exaggerated expression of a single quality. That matter of nomenclature was a heritage from the Restoration comedies, which, as we have said, were Sheridan's great originals, and which, with Etherege and those who followed him, swept the Jonsonian comedy of "humours" off the stage in favour of a finer type. This realistic comedy Sheridan, living in a chaster age, was able to purify. He caught up the comedy of Steele, and rescued it from decay. Adding his shaft of ridicule to those already sticking in the backs of the sentimentalists, and avoiding the pitfall of farce into which Goldsmith had fallen, he produced the highest type of comedy, which exposes folly and vice without indignation, is polished without artificiality (though the old complaint about the witty servants must be allowed to be deserved), broad-minded without coarseness, and directly aimed at an actual state of society without sacrifice of universality. The School for Scandal is the perfect finish of a hundred years of preparation; and, having reached the summit, English comedy declined thenceforward.

YOUNG LONDON

Mediæval London. Vol ii.: Ecclesiastical. By Sir WALTER BESANT. (Black, 30s. net.)

VOLUME after volume attests the enthusiasm and industry of the late Sir Walter Besant as an historian of London. It is possible to regret that he attempted to cover so much ground. As each instalment is issued we recognise a well-worked quarry rather than an edifice.

The present volume is the second dealing with Mediæval London. It surveys the ecclesiastical life, institutions, and influences of the Norman and Plantagenet centuries. The first eight chapters, however, are concerned with the rise of London's municipal government. We are reminded that the wish of the merchants and citizens of London to possess a commune was whetted, if not created, by the examples of continental cities with which they traded:

What they desired was a Corporation, a municipality and self-government within their own walls. It is certain that London looked with eyes of envy upon Rouen, a city with which it was closely connected by ties of relationship, as well as those of trade, because Rouen obtained her Commune fifteen years before London obtained the mere shadow of one.

Sir Walter Besant adds that "the connection between London and Rouen was much closer than we are generally willing to recognise." Why should we be unwilling? The assumption enables the author to continue:

Communication was easy, the Channel could be crossed whenever the wind was favourable, the Englishman was on a friendly soil when he landed in Normandy, a country ruled by his own Prince. The Normans found themselves among a friendly people on the soil of England. They came over in great numbers, especially to London. The merchants of Rouen had their port at Dowgate from the age of Edward the Confessor.

The rather dingy and forbidding vista of Dowgate Hill, alongside Cannon Street station, takes on a new interest from this little fact. The Spring of London's self-government came slowly up that way. Never was a city riper for independence, and when at last Henry FitzAlwin took up the office of Mayor the citizens outdid their posterity by declaring: "Come what will, in London we will never have another king except our Mayor, Henry Fitzailwin of London Stone."

The historical and documentary details of this great period are set forth in Sir Walter Besant's ample pages, and the government of the Wards, the duties of Aldermen, the early factions, and the birth of the Guilds, are illustrated by a multitude of facts. When the nature of the material permits the story is unfolded with agreeable literary effect. We notice here and there a lack of references, usually associated with a passage of minor historical importance in which Sir Walter Besant found opportunity to write in his novel-background manner. For example, in the interesting chapters on Trial by Ordeal we have a vivid descriptive report of an actual ordeal by hot water which was conducted in Smithfield at some date unnamed. One would like to know whether Sir Walter Besant worked up the description (in a legitimate way of course) from a meagre record; or whether we are indebted to a reporter born while Carmelite Street was still dominated by Carmelites. There were four men, all belonging to the Ward of Cheap, and their offences were serious: robbery and murder. The men were known "roreres"; in other words, they were wanted by the police. As a desperate hope, these men claimed the right to prove their innocence by ordeal of boiling water.

This sort of thing was not an everyday and tiresome occurrence even in the Middle Ages, and even in Smithfield. An eager crowd assembled, and the authorities did everything decently and in order. The culprits were taken across the road from Newgate to hear mass in St. Sepulchre's Church, where they swore upon saintly relics that they were innocent of the murder in Cheap-side and demanded the right to prove it by ordeal. At once a seemly procession was formed. "The whiffers marched first, followed by the clergy and the singing boys"; then the prisoners, followed by a great mob. One of the prisoners wore a confident look, the other three appeared depressed. At Smithfield a cauldron of boiling water was ready, and when the whiffers had ceased their untimely whiffing, the sheriff, who was attended by the Alderman of Chepe, began his exordium. Probably he was told to speak up. He told the prisoners in his best official manner that at the bottom of the cauldron lay a round white stone. Each would have to dip his arm into the boiling water and bring up that stone without receiving a scald. The painful climax is described by Sir Walter Besant thus:

The first to essay the adventure was the prisoner of the cheerful and the confident countenance; the guards took off his doublet; they rolled a thin piece of linen round his arm and sealed it with lead. They then bade him advance. He stepped forward; he stood beside the cauldron, his arm raised; the Priest and singing men began a Psalm.

The smoke and the steam blew this way and that way; the man could not be seen sometimes for the fumes; when the wind blew aside, the people saw him still, hand upraised, watching the boiling water. Suddenly the smoke and the steam were blown aside; he plunged his arm; the smoke was blown back again; but he stood before the officers, the white stone in his hand.

The crowd shouted. The Lord had proved his innocence.

He was set aside; he would be taken back to Newgate; three days afterwards, the covering would be taken from his arm, and if there were no signs of scalding he would be set free.

The next man stepped forward.

He plunged his hand at once; he groped about for the stone; he drew out his hand; he plunged again; he drew it out with a yell of agony. No need to look at the arm searchingly, it was horribly scalded. They hanged him up at once.

The third man was brought forward.

He looked at his companion hanging; he looked at the caldron and the fire. He fell on his knees confessing the crime

So, likewise, did the fourth man.

So, out of four ropes, three were wanted ; and for four of them who were accused, the Lord Himself had pronounced the guilt of three and established the innocence of one.

When a story, four hundred years old, is told so graphically as this, we would like to know something about the authority for it.

Very few people, when they look at the crowded spires of the City from Waterloo Bridge, realise the extent to which faith, of which these spires are symbols, dominated the life of London in the Middle Ages. But Sir Walter Besant impresses his readers once for all with the omnipotence of the Church. There were one hundred and twenty-six parish churches for one hundred and twenty thousand people. But then all the people went to church, and the church went to all the people. The belief in Purgatory was profound, and caused the poor to haunt the churches and the rich to build them. The monasteries and nunneries, with all their activities, were ever before the eye. Here are some curious calculations :

There were, large and small, about twenty-four Religious Houses in and outside London. If we take an average of seventy people of various trades attached to and living by each House, and an average of thirty brethren and sisters, we have nearly seven thousand people belonging to them. To sum up, therefore, there were nearly twenty thousand people in the City of London and its suburbs engaged in working for, and living by, the Churches and Religious Houses. About one-fifth of the population of London lived by the Church. This is a moderate estimate.

Immersed in religious exercises, spectacles, and fears, the Londoner who had a day to spare could take his way to one of eleven holy wells, nearly all of which were within what is now the cab-radius. A popular place beyond this distance was the chapel at Muswell Hill, where a miraculous figure of the Virgin, of black oak, was preserved in the midst of that portion of the great Middlesex forest :

Outside the chapel there were taverns and merry-making places. First the pilgrim knelt at the shrine ; sometimes he went round it on his knees ; and prayed, with simple belief, if not with fervour ; faith made the sick man whole ; faith absolved the penitent ; faith made the most careless happy in the belief that Our Lady of Muswell had knocked off many—he knew not how many—years of purgatory. The religious act finished, no one objected to pleasure and merriment. There are indications that the merriment was not always seemly, nor was the pleasure always sinless.

Such pictures of the past may be culled in numbers from these pages, which form a good example of tessellated history. The numerous illustrations add to the value of the volume.

THE ALLEGORY OF THE PURGATORIO

Prisoners of Hope. An Exposition of Dante's "Purgatorio." By the Rev. JOHN S. CARROLL. (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.)

"PRISONERS OF HOPE" is the work of a scholar who knows Dante, in all his writings, intimately and accurately. It is by no means a complete commentary on the Purgatorio : it is obviously addressed to those whose sole or chief preoccupation is to know what Dante taught. To quote from the author's Preface, "it is an exposition, canto by canto, with the special purpose of bringing out the ethical significance" of the Cantica. Literary and artistic criticism are left almost entirely on one side. Very little attention is paid to textual difficulties, variae lectiones, or conflicting interpretations, except where such issues affect the main purpose of the study—the ethical aspect of the poem. Dante's words are seldom quoted : they are presented, in a careful, though, from a literary point of view, singularly unattractive translation. The author passes lightly and amiably over the astronomical and other technical allusions, about which much has been written.

On the other hand, the historical passages receive adequate explanation and discussion, while Mr. Carroll enters fully and with zest into Dante's theology and philosophy, with which his political ideas were intimately connected, and into the allegorical meaning of every detail of the narrative. For the performance of this task he is well equipped. Not only has he that acquaintance with the "minor" works which is one of the first requisites for a complete understanding of Dante's thought, but it is evident, from his apposite and illuminating quotations, that he has a good knowledge of the philosophers and theologians whom Dante chiefly followed—Aristotle, St. Augustine, St. Gregory and, above all, St. Thomas Aquinas. Beyond this, his knowledge of Dante literature is evidently wide, although, perhaps because it was his intention to write chiefly for English readers, he seldom refers to any except English commentators.

A typical example of Mr. Carroll's method may be found in his treatment of Purg. xv. 16-23 :

Come quando dall' acqua o dallo specchio
Salta lo raggio all' opposita porte,
Salendo su per lo modo parecchio
A quel che scende, e tanto si diparte
Dal cader dalla pietra in egual tratta,
Si come mostra esperienza ed arte ;
Così mi parve da luce, rifratta
Ivi dinanzi a sì, esser percosso.

"As usual," says he, "the commentators spend a great deal of time explaining Dante's harmless little piece of scientific vanity over his knowledge of the law of the angles of incidence and reflection, and leave unexplained what was his chief concern, the ethical law of which all this was the mere symbol." And he passes on without more ado to explain the allegory, which is that the Sun (regarded on this terrace as representing the bountiful love of God—the opposite of Envy) has gained so much additional brilliance owing to the presence of the Angel of Brotherly Love, that the bare livid rock (the arid prospect on which Envy looks out) has become changed into a mirror which reflects the heavenly light. All this, of course, is true. But we fancy most readers will agree with us in seeing in these lines something more than "a harmless little piece of scientific vanity." Surely the accuracy and clarity of the passage—its mere cleverness—make it a delight to read ; and it is characteristic of Dante at his best to bring vividly before us some incident of his journey, following upon a canto devoted to a denunciation of the degeneration of Romagna and Tuscany. Yet, in the main, Mr. Carroll is right in insisting on the primary importance of the moral and allegorical interpretation of Dante, the poet of Righteousness. If we were seriously to doubt this after honest consideration of his writings as a whole, we should still have to reckon with the words in the dedicatory letter to Can Grande : "Dicendum est breviter, quod finis totius et partis est, removere viventes in hac vita de statu miseriae, et perducere ad statum felicitatis."

We would also draw special attention to our author's exposition of the intensely allegorical cantos of the Antepurgatorio, and to his remarks on Statius. It is generally taken that Statius, the supposed convert to Christianity, is a bridge between Virgil (Human Reason) and Beatrice (Revelation or Theology). But Mr. Carroll defines his position with greater exactness. If it be remembered, first, that it was Matelda (Active Life) who finally led Dante to Beatrice, and second, that Statius says he owed his conversion to the prophecies contained in Virgil's fourth Eclogue, and that in life he had been but a lukewarm Christian, it will not be hard to see that he is a most appropriate link between Virgil and Matelda. He represents, then, a semi-Christianised Philosophy, "able indeed to expound the mystery of the human soul in relation to the natural body of earth and the aerial body of Purgatory, but not yet capable of the positive obedience and service of the Active Life." Also, in connection with Statius, Mr. Carroll offers an answer to a question which has often been asked, namely, Why is it that, whereas Virgil's guidance was sufficient for Dante through the terraces of Pride, Envy, Anger and Sloth, the more distinctively Christian power, represented by Statius, should be necessary for overcoming the sins of the flesh—Avarice, Gluttony and Sensuality? The suggested explanation, which commends itself very much to us, is that it is the natural element in these last sins which makes it especially hard for the Reason alone to overcome them. They are all forms of excessive love of things not in themselves wrong, and it is their nature to pass the bounds of reason. "Statius, is therefore joined with Virgil, a more spiritual element with the rational, perhaps in fulfilment of St. Paul's injunction 'Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.'"

The division and arrangement of the book go a long way towards making the geographical and allegorical scheme of the Mountain of Purgatory easy to grasp. Although the author is occasionally slipshod, he is never ambiguous; and it is impossible to quarrel with a writer in whom learning and soundness are united to an admirable clarity of expression.

PARISH LIFE

Parochial Life in Mediæval England. By Abbot GASQUET. The Antiquary's Books. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

WE must confess to some disappointment after reading this book. Abbot Gasquet's knowledge and his researches into the history of Mediæval England had led us to hope that he would have dealt with the way in which the Church fostered the parochial life as opposed to the manorial. The manor represented the feudal side, the parish the popular, and we regret that while Abbot Gasquet fully recognises this—for he tells us that:

in those far off days the Parish Church was the centre of popular life all the country over and the priest and other parochial officials were the recognised managers of many interests beyond those of a strictly ecclesiastical nature —his book deals almost wholly with the ecclesiastical side. Important as this was, it was only a part of the parochial life, and it is unfortunate that, popularly, the term parish has always an ecclesiastical ring about it. Yet probably it was the civil rather than the ecclesiastical position of the parish priest that made him a person of importance: the facts that he was a freeholder among the villein tenants of the manor, that while they could be removed "at the will of the lord" he was immovable, and that while others had a variable income his was to a great extent fixed, tended to magnify his office. When to this is added the spiritual power he possessed it is at once obvious that the position of the parish priest was one of great importance in the daily life of the country. Still greater was its importance when it became legally recognised that the vicar and churchwardens were a body that never died, a corporation with a perpetual succession. In the eye of the law the legal power of the lord of the manor did not extend beyond his tenants; on the other hand, the legal power of the Church extended to all the people who dwelt in the parish, without reference to whether they were the lord's tenants or not. They were parishioners, they had a legal right to attend the Church and to partake of its privileges, and in the Church all class differences vanished: the proudest lord and the vilest villain were equally parishioners and nothing more.

Abbot Gasquet rightly dispels the popular idea that one of the abuses of mediæval time was the appropriation of parochial tithe to a religious house, leaving the poor vicar to subsist on such "miserable stipend" as remained after the rich monastery had received all that was worth receiving. This was not the fact. All agreements as to the appropriation of tithe had to be approved by the bishop, and he had a real personal interest which made him take particular care that the sum payable to the vicar was a living wage, for if it were not the bishop had to support him. The state of things with which we are familiar—of the great tithes being in the hand of some rich layman and the parish priest being left to do the work on a mere pittance—is not a mediæval abuse and could not have occurred in mediæval times, as the agreement of impropriation could be adjusted if the circumstances altered; it is the direct result of the spoliation of Henry VIII. in handing over the property of the monasteries to his courtiers without any provision for revision.

On the position of the clergy Abbot Gasquet has much to say. While we admit that it was one of the glories of the English Church that the clergy were drawn from "all sorts and conditions of men," we are not sure that some of the dispensations referred to as being granted to the sons of villeins to become priests were not for persons of illegitimate birth to do so. In the Middle Ages there were only two professions open—that of arms and that of orders—and it was from the estates of the Church, the great landowner of that time, that these two great professions were recruited.

A very interesting point is raised as to the position and duties of chantry priests. The usual idea is that they said mass in the chantry for the souls of the founder, the persons named in the foundation deed, and all other Christians, but Abbot Gasquet contends that this was only part of their work: that they also had to assist in parochial duties, and were, in fact, curates in the modern use of the term. The question is one of some importance, for if the view here stated be correct it puts an entirely new construction on the legislation of Edward VI. If up to that time the large parishes had what may be called endowed curacies, and these curacies were suddenly swept away, leaving the parish priest single-handed, a blow was struck at the Church which may be said to have been the foundation of dissent. The great cry of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was that three ministers were not sufficient to do the work of the Church, so "prophesyings" arose under Elizabeth and "lectureships" under the first two Stuarts. Abbot Gasquet says that this confiscation of the chantries, "the spoliation of the rich and needy," as he calls it, was deliberately done, and that the Crown of England deliberately took away "the pittance of the poor." It may be so, but we want some stronger evidence than is here given to prove that such a deadly blow was aimed at the Church by the Tudor kings and statesmen.

Another point of great interest is how the funds for meeting the expenses of the Church were raised in mediæval times. It is said that "the people voluntarily offered" the necessary funds both by gifts during their lives and by sums left in their wills. There is no doubt that these gifts were numerous and large, but they could never have been enough to meet all the requirements of the Churches. Resort was also had to collections, but the amount of money in circulation was not sufficient to make the collections of great value. Moreover, the Church was overdone with collections—for Papal Envoys, for Peter Pence, for some great public building abroad or at home, or for some bridge or other public work. All these appear over and over again in episcopal registers. There could not have been much left for Church expenses. All sorts of contrivances for raising money were invented, and we who are ignorant of the needs of the Church are content to speak of all these methods as the pious fraud of a corrupt clergy. This is what the Protestant reformers alleged and what we have been taught to believe. If Abbot Gasquet's book does nothing else than help to dispel this fiction it will not have been written in vain.

We have not space to follow the author into that part of his book which treats of the religious services in the parish churches. Many points are raised, and we are not in accord with all that Abbot Gasquet states as to practice. His picture seems to us to be drawn rather from what writers say things ought to have been than from what they actually were. We do not believe that through England as a whole the influence of the Church was sufficient to enforce such a rule of life as is here sketched out. Neither can we discuss the very important subject of guilds and fraternities—idealised trade unions they might be called, flourishing under the patronage of the most powerful organisation of those days, the Church. Here again we are on several points not wholly in accord with Abbot Gasquet, but whether we agree with him or not we have to thank him for a very interesting book which has put in an accessible and comprehensive form a number of scattered and minute materials which tend to support the views he advocates. Those views are not what we have been taught, but that does not make them erroneous. Abbot Gasquet says he feels sure that the result, as far as it goes, is correct as to the outline of the picture. This may be so, but we are not thoroughly satisfied with the correctness of all its details.

ANCIENT EGYPT

Ancient Records of Egypt. Historical Documents from the earliest times to the Persian Conquest. Collected, edited and translated by JAMES HENRY BREASTED. 4 vols. (Luzac.)

The Egyptian Heaven and Hell. By E. A. WALLIS BUDGE. 3 vols. (Kegan Paul.)

THE four volumes of Professor Breasted's translations, taken in conjunction with the careful and exhaustive editions of the historical texts in hieroglyphic now being issued by German scholars in Steindorff's "Urkunden des Aegyptischen Alterthums," furnish a very valuable basis for the study of an important branch of Egyptology. They classify the material and focus it beneath the eye, and if such corpora inscriptionum aegyptiacarum can be continued and extended to all departments, they will render the student to a great extent independent of the old cumbersome and widely-scattered publications of inscriptions and enabled him to pursue his researches profitably far away from the great public libraries and museums.

Seth's and Schaefer's editions of the inscriptions are admirably careful and at the same time show brilliant insight in the restoration of lacunæ; these seem likely to remain the standard texts for a long time to come. On the other hand all translations and commentaries must be taken as provisional, being dependent on knowledge that is rapidly growing, in the one case of the Egyptian language, in the other of the details of the history and archaeology in the widest sense. Study of the language is now well advanced, but it is obvious that in regard to the rest our knowledge must be far from complete.

If Professor Breasted's collection of historical texts is not exhaustive, it is at least very full, the term historical being generously interpreted. The translations are uniform, being all from his own pen; and they contain a multitude of suggestive renderings with illuminating comments. There is perhaps little here published absolutely for the first time, but, speaking for himself, the present writer, though he may now and then miss some piece that he would wish to have seen included, finds in the work important texts that he has never seen before. In gathering the materials the author has made good use of excellent opportunities; he has studied in Berlin and at most of the European museums, and has travelled in Egypt itself in order to examine the originals again before re-translating. While still in manuscript the whole work was divided into its volumes and numbered paragraphs; thus in his History of Egypt, published in the autumn of 1905, the narrative flows uninterrupted by discussions and extracts from authorities, such matter being effectually replaced by occasional references at the foot of the page to volume and paragraph of the Records. Every one interested in ancient Egypt should obtain the History, and probably many will desire, further, the documents and discussions in these Records on which it was founded. The inscriptions of the Old Kingdom (Dynasties I.–VI.) and Middle Kingdom (VII.–XVII.) are contained in the first volume; two great dynasties of the New Empire alone furnish the second and third, and the Twentieth Dynasty fills more than half of the fourth volume, two hundred and thirty pages sufficing for the six later dynasties to the Persian conquest. It is unfortunate that the dynasty of Psammetichus, contemporary with Gyges, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus and a host of others, is miserably represented in the Egyptian documents. The north was then the vital part of Egypt; and the humid climate of the Delta has destroyed the papyri, while the limekiln and stonemason's hammer have made away with the less frail records. Stelae from the Serapeum have indeed fixed the chronology of the kings, and two monuments from Thebes are important for the internal history; but a granite stela which touches the narrative of Herodotus concerning the conflict between Apries and Amasis has come down to us in such worn condition that hardly any of it is intelligible. Our knowledge of the political history of Egypt is and probably will remain exceedingly fragmentary. If we seek to supplement the evidence of the monuments by that of archaeology and of the Hebrew, cuneiform and Greek records, we shall find the latter illuminating, but they cannot fill the gaps. While, however, most of the evidence has been lost or destroyed, that which remains is of the most varied character and for some periods abundant.

The famous Papyrus of Kings in Turin, when complete, recorded the names of all the kings down to Ramesses II. with the length of their reigns. But the most remarkable fragment of Egyptian historical work that remains dates from the Old Kingdom. Under the Fifth Dynasty the annals of Egypt, as far back as knowledge reached, were engraved on front and back of a great slab of hard stone set up in one of the temples. For the earliest periods the information was scanty. Yet the top register, of which a short length remains, was probably filled with the names of the kings of Upper and Lower Egypt before Menes united the two lands. Then followed the First Dynasty, with a brief record of the principal events in each year—the height of the Nile, feasts celebrated, censuses held. Gradually the chronicle expands, with notes of palaces and temples founded. In the portion preserved relating to the Third Dynasty five or six entries occur for each year; notes of an expedition to Nubia and, the amount of spoil brought thence, and of making the cedar-wood doors of the king's palace, show the character of the information. One complete year in the Fifth Dynasty displays no less than seventeen entries: at this time the priests were no longer compiling or copying annals, but recording contemporary events as they occurred, as can be seen by the irregular cutting and spacing. If such chronicles were kept continuously a splendid framework of authentic history may be awaiting us somewhere under the soil of Egypt. But destruction has fallen so impartially on good and bad that it must be extraordinarily good fortune that would preserve the document complete for us. Manetho can hardly have used a full chronicle; his history is probably founded on a mere abstract of names of kings and lengths of reigns (like the Turin papyrus) and embellished by garbled versions of popular tales and traditions. The slab of annals is by no means the only interesting document of the old kingdom. The biographical inscriptions of Una and Herkhuf are as full of information as any that have come down to us from any period.

The Eighteenth Dynasty, the most brilliant period of the Egyptian empire, is represented by a magnificent series of documents—feats of warriors and acts of officials, recorded in their tombs, victorious expeditions of kings (throughout Syria as far as the Euphrates or southward as far as Napata), their buildings, endowments, and ordinances recorded in the temples; and when Akhenaton abolished polytheism and introduced the sole cult of the sun we have the hymn which he composed to the new deity. The inscriptions of Ramesses II., which occupy the greater part of the third volume, often begin with extraordinary laudations of that hero's might; amongst them is the treaty with the Hittite king of which Winckler has just discovered the cuneiform version at the citadel of Boghaz Keui in Cappadocia. Ramesses's son Mineptah has left some important records; the stela of the victory over the Libyans, in which the Israelites are mentioned, for the first and only time in Egyptian inscriptions, is especially noteworthy. The records of judicial proceedings in connection with a conspiracy in the harim at the end of the reign of Ramesses III. are very curious: so also are those concerning robberies of tombs in the Theban necropolis (including the royal tombs) in the reign of Ramesses IX. Tomb-robbing was a regular trade in Ancient Egypt: the most elaborate artifices in the way of portcullis-stones and false passages did not save a single pyramid from desecration in earlier days. The common graves of the Twentieth Dynasty, with pottery coffins, must generally have been plundered soon after they were closed and before the precise position of the body had been forgotten; for in many cases, to the disgust of modern excavators, the thieves have descended exactly upon the breast (where the ornaments lay) leaving the rest of the grave wholly undisturbed.

To analyse Professor Breasted's volumes would occupy more space than we can spare. The above remarks will indicate to some extent the variety of their contents. In a work of such extent and difficulty there is inevitably much to criticise: and one cannot in reading it avoid the reflection that six months of steady revision of the whole of it are required in order to bring the work up to the high standard at which the author aims and which is to be looked for from one endowed with his comprehensive insight. The English throughout is crude, there are many mistakes in renderings and descriptions, and many hasty judgments. But had the author waited till he could spare six months for this revision, we might have been deprived of his results for many years and that would have been a great misfortune. As each volume appeared it established itself as one of the few indispensable works in the Egyptologist's library. The promised Index volume will add much to the value of the work.

In a new edition the author's excellent device for marking doubtful words should be more freely used. It would probably be better, too, to re-unite fragments of biographical inscriptions that are here parcelled out among the different reigns under which the same subject saw service. The names of foreign peoples should be given under their Egyptian forms rather than translated, e.g., Inu-Mentu would be preferable to Troglodytes, and to fetter the reader by the word "Greeks" when the original has Haunebu is hardly fair even in the reign of Apries. Most titles of dignity and office, too, hardly bear translation.

Dr. Budge has provided an inquisitive public with three attractive-looking little books full of hieroglyphic texts and pictures photographed from facsimiles in various publications. (Vol. i. deals with the Book Am-tuat; vol. ii. with the short form of the Book Am-tuat and the Book of Gates; and in vol. iii. the author describes and compares the books of the Other World.) Doubtless many will be glad to have the mysterious scenes of the under-world (which form a considerable part of the decoration on the walls of the royal tombs at Thebes) reproduced in such a convenient size. The accompanying inscriptions are printed in full in hieroglyphic type. The third volume offers a good deal of information about Egyptian ideas relating to life after death, and references to the original authorities.

PICTURES OF LIFE

The Old Engravers of England in their Relation to Contemporary Life and Art (1540-1800). By MALCOLM C. SALAMAN. (Cassell, 5s. net.)

THIS is a novel, interesting and almost romantic book. It clothes the dry bones of black-and-white prints with human attributes, and makes them live. In a brief compass the author cannot do more than glance at many of the two hundred and more engravers whom he mentions, but his description of the principal characters is adequate, and the whole army is marshalled before the reader in strict relation to the object of the book, and though the canvas is crowded it is not confused.

Mr. Salaman writes con amore. He is an enthusiast, who laments the decay of the beautiful art of line engraving, while he writes its history, illustrated by the history of what it illustrates. From William Rogers to William Sharp, from Elstrack and Delaram to Strange and Woollett, all those who live by conferring immortality on others here find a niche in the temple.

"Faber's prints show a wide range of sympathy and a catholicity of interest." We may take them as an example of the effect produced on the author's mind by the study of old pictures:

... The guns of Dettingen and Fontenoy, Sheriffmuir and Preston, Falkirk and Culloden, seem to echo as we look at the Generals, Lord Carpenter, Lord Cathcart, William Blakeney, the Earl of Stair, Wade, Lord Loudoun, in Highland uniform, and the great Duke of Argyll, 'The State's whole thunder born to wield, And shake alike the Senate and the field,' as well as the veteran Major Faubert, who made soldiers, and turned out many a general, at his famous Military Academy in Leicester Fields. Here too are the admirals, Boscawen, Cloudesley Shovel, John Leake, and the unfortunate Byng, who when the Government murdered him on the quarter-deck to "encourage the others," would consent to cover his face only lest his fearless eyes might frighten the men appointed to shoot him; also Admiral Sir Thomas Smith, "Tom of Ten Thousand," as the fleet called him, who presided at Byng's trial, and the "aspens" Duke of Newcastle, who must always bear the obloquy of that national disgrace. . . .

It is in this spirit that the book is written, but the engravers themselves are, of course, treated more in detail. Of Hollar, for instance, who might have been a lawyer at Prague, like his father, the description is full and interesting. His chequered career throws light on the condition of London during the civil war, the plague, and the great fire. To few artists is it given to sketch on the spot a sea-fight between a Mary Rose and seven Algerian pirate ships, but Hollar saw it, came home with the victorious Kempthorne and died peacefully in his bed at the age of seventy. Loggan's adventures at Oxford and Cambridge, Von Siegen's great invention of the mezzotint ground, and its communication to the impetuous Prince Rupert, the tasteless Courts of George I. and George II., the revival of mezzotint, the brilliant Irish engravers McArdell and Houston, all in order receive their due, and colour-prints and stipple engraving are not neglected. We see Blake refusing, though a mere boy, to become the pupil of Ryland, "Engraver to the King," because "he looks as if he'll live to be hanged," and sure enough the prophecy comes true. We are shown Major, a Londoner, engraving in the Bastille, and Strange, the rebel Jacobite (whose real name was Strang), accepting a knighthood from the "Elector of Hanover." And all the while through the centuries these people were spending the greater part of their lives in scratching and scraping metal plates, and considering and wondering, in moments of danger, of poverty, or of sickness, "which way" they will lay the lines on a coat.

The illustrations, considering the low price of the book, are exceptionally good: in fact, some of them may be said to be remarkably beautiful. We can catch something of the fascination of "the beautiful Miss Gunnings" in the picture (by Finlayson) of Elizabeth, the fortunate young lady who, without any advantage of birth, married two dukes and refused a third; and, to mention another at random, Romney's "Lt.-Col. the Hon. Charles Cathcart," by Sharp, is a delightful example.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

George Crabbe : Poems. Edited by ADOLPHUS WILLIAM WARD.
Vol. iii. (Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.)

WITH this third volume Dr. Ward brings his edition of Crabbe to a close; and it is hard to believe that another will be needed for a hundred years. A glance at the preface, at the list of variants, and the bibliography (the last compiled by Mr. A. T. Bartholomew) will show the thoroughness and care with which every edition of Crabbe, every scrap of manuscript in his handwriting and every newspaper in which he might have published poems have been ransacked for unpublished verses, variant readings and displaced fragments. It seems almost safe to say that nothing more is likely to be discovered. This is the way to edit a man's works, with scholarship and exhaustive thoroughness; add a good apparatus criticus and a bibliography, and leave the reader to select for himself the passages of poetry or prose that suit his taste and his needs. It is unlikely that any but professed students of literature will read every word of the poems, previously published or unpublished, which Dr. Ward has collected at the end of this volume from all kinds of printed and manuscript sources. Still, there they are if they are wanted; here is the whole of Crabbe, so far as the most erudite of his admirers can discover, and the edition stands foursquare against time. The "Tales of the Hall," which are here completed, all must read; the "Posthumous Tales" and "The Farewell and Return" should not be neglected; the remaining poems—occasional verses, lyrics, addresses and so forth—will yield many delights to those who try them. The Crabbe manuscripts belonging to the Cambridge University Press, to Mr. Buxton Forman, and others, have yielded a few fragments of tales, and though lyrical poetry was not Crabbe's best medium of expression, the sincerity of one or two of the devotional pieces renders them well worth preserving. It is interesting to note that Crabbe, like Milton, is read and admired in Russia; extracts from "The Parish Register" and "The Borough" have been translated into Russian, and in 1857 a Russian man of letters published an essay with selections from Crabbe's poems.

The Old Cornish Drama. By THURSTAN C. PETER. (Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. PETER'S volume, which is a reprint of a lecture, is admirably calculated to introduce the student to the very interesting subject of the Cornish mediæval drama. That drama had one or two interesting points of difference from the plays and performance of the four cycles from the north and the midlands—the York, Towneley, Chester and Coventry—which have survived. The most important, perhaps, consists in the scene of production. At Chester, at any rate, the miracles, as is well known, were played on movable "pageants," wooden erections on wheels, which were drawn in succession through the town. In Cornwall, the plays were performed in the "rounds," the open spaces on the moors, more or less circular, and surrounded by rising ground, which was called plân-an-guare, and resembled, in some sort, the open-air theatre of the Greeks and Romans. In the centre of this, it seems, was fixed a platform, with or without an upper and a lower storey, and round it tents for the residences of David, Abraham, Pharaoh, or whoever the characters might be. The Cornish plays, again, were acted, not by different bands of players, who divided, according to their trade-gilds, the various plays making up a cycle, but by the same company throughout, and (or so Mr. Peter thinks) without previous study of the "book," a prompter or "ordinary" standing by and telling each man what he had to say as his turn came. Mr. Peter describes the surviving Cornish dramas, the three parts of the "Ordinalia," and the play of Saint Meriasek; and possibly the side-lights he throws on them from his knowledge of Cornish customs and antiquities form the most valuable part of his book. Every one who has spent a childhood in the West Country will have seen (and far further north than Cornwall) the "mummers," or "guise dancers" as they are called in the duchy, at Christmas time. It is interesting to note that their strange play, which is handed on orally from generation to generation (without the aid of the printed texts compiled by Mrs. Ewing and others from notes) derived straight from the early Cornish drama. On one point we disagree with Mr. Peter. The descent of the modern theatre from the plân-an-guare is not so clear as he appears to think. Its shape is quite as likely to be a compound of the town-green with its pageant in the centre, an inn-yard, a large private hall with its dais at one end, and the arena for bull-fights and bear-fights. The point, that is, is not to find an ancestor for the modern theatre, but to decide how it could possibly have been other than it is.

The Log of the Sun. By C. WILLIAM BEEBE. (New York: Holt.)

THIS is one of the best nature-books we have had from America. It is a year-book of nature in which the author, evidently a writer of taste and culture as well as a careful observer, notes the changes that occur with the passing of the seasons. He is interested in all forms of life, and does not confine himself to birds and beasts. One of the most interesting sections is that in which the formation of snow crystals is explained. But chiefly the book is notable for the exact and intelligible manner in which the author describes the habits of wild creatures. The English reader will find himself very quickly on familiar terms with a fauna altogether different from that to which he is accustomed, The chickadee and the bobolink, juncos and tree swallows, the fox sparrow and the hermit thrush, take the place of those that render musical an English spring. Mr. Beebe is excellent also when treating of snakes, fishes and their kind. He is fortunate in having secured a capable illustrator in the person of Mr. Walter King Store, whose pictures not only adorn but illuminate the text. The book, which is handsomely bound and got up, would form a most acceptable present for a boy who loves natural history and who already knows most of the English classics on the subject.

SHELLEY AS A PROOF-READER

LORD BYRON remarked to a friend that few persons could understand Shelley's "Revolt of Islam," and that of these few, he was not one. The epic, indeed, cannot be fairly criticised by ordinary canons, for example by those of Aristotle in his "Poetics." Shelley can scarcely be said, like Homer in the Odyssey, to "make the impossible seem possible" when he raises, at a moment's notice, an army of millions of Greeks; converts the whole force to vegetarianism and total abstinence; and provides them with plenty of roots and fruits, though they are destitute of a commissariat. There is nothing like this in Homer's account of the supplies of the Achæan host under Ilium.

As Shelley remarked (it is the one humorous thing which he is recorded to have said), we might as well ask him for human nature as try to purchase a leg of mutton at a ginshop. His critics have also hinted that they "could do with" better grammar and better rhymes; and that he is a very careless poet. Mr. Forman, in his laudable edition of 1876, has defended Shelley from the charge of want of care, and adds that the "copy" which he sent to the printers was written in a hand "most careful and beautiful." He gives a photograph of Shelley's corrections on a proof-sheet of "The Revolt of Islam." The writing is excellent, except where the poet has huddled one or two words up, from want of marginal space, or where the pen has spluttered, as on the paper of proof-sheets pens are apt to do.

These facts being accepted, one is the more puzzled by the following stanza (Canto viii. stanza xi.) of "The Revolt of Islam," written in 1817. In the first edition (1818) the stanza runs thus :

O love ! who to the hearts of wandering men
Art as the calm to Ocean's weary waves !
Justice, or truth, or joy ! thou only can
From slavery and religion's labyrinth caves
Guide us, as one clear star the seaman saves.
To give to all an equal share of good,
To track the steps of freedom tho' thro' graves
She pass, to suffer all in patient mood,
To weep for crime, tho' stained
With thy friend's dearest blood.

If Lord Byron read as far as this, he probably read no farther. No mortal could find it lucid; "men" is an ill rhyme for "can"; and "thou can" is impossible grammar. Mr. W. M. Rossetti, in his edition, punctuates as he pleases; gives "man" periculo suo, in place of men; and puts "those" (namely love, justice, truth, and joy) instead of "thou." In a note he states that he corrects "thou" into "those" "from the first edition." But, as we saw, the first edition reads "thou." This is puzzling, and we are "wildered" (a word of Professor Dowden's) when we turn to Shelley's errata. He says that we must "for these, read those," but there is no "these" in his text; where "thou" is given. Moreover he says that for "Justice, and truth, and joy," in the same line, we must read "Justice, or truth, or joy." But there are no "ands" in his text! Why are we to make corrections which cannot be made? There are no "ands" to become "ors," no "these" to alter into "those": we have "thou," not "these."

Confronted with such problems, we are inclined to think that Shelley, by a temporary and trivial hallucination, had misread his own printed text. His grammar was in a tangle! If we read "Justice, and truth, and joy" (plus "love" in the first line), how can four abstractions be addressed as "thou"? If we read "or" for "and," how can four abstractions (love, justice, truth, joy) "guide us, as one clear star the seaman saves"? There would be four stars. If, on the other hand, love, justice, truth and joy are all different names for the same thing (as apparently they are), then that thing may be addressed as "thou," which leaves us with the impossible "thou can." It is clear that Shelley originally printed "Justice, and truth, and joy," and when he made the errata, saw the difficulty about four abstractions being like one star. But, as the "ors," intended to save the grammatical situation, were already in his text, why, in the errata, did he tell us to place them there, instead of the "ands"? The ordinary brain reels in presence of these mysteries: not so the brain of Mr. Forman. "Wildered" as I was, I accidentally strolled into the light which beacons from his Appendix to "Laon and Cythna" ("Poetical Works of Shelley," vol. i. pp. 385-386, 1876). Shelley's poem was originally styled "Laon and Cythna." He had done all he could with it, down to the page of errata. But Shelley's publisher, Mr. Ollier, happened to look into the book, after he had distributed a few copies, and found Shelley picking a quarrel with exogamy and averring that the best marriages (or rather unions) were those between brothers and sisters. He gave an example, in a luscious scene; "And such is Nature's modesty," said he ("Laon and Cythna," canto vi. stanza xl.). This was "too steep" for Mr. Ollier, and he threatened to withdraw from publication an epic so endogamous. Shelley, therefore, cancelled some leaves, and inserted others with alterations. Among these leaves was that containing canto viii. stanza xi., the puzzling stanza. Says Mr. Forman, "He did not touch stanzas x, xi. which, being on the same leaf, were also to be reprinted, and for which three corrections were provided in the list of errata."

Though he did not touch stanzas x. and xi., while making alterations in points of what we call morality and religion (better described as "the anarch custom," and "bloody faith"), Shelley, on receiving fresh proofs, did touch stanza xi., though he left standing in stanza x. an error corrected in the errata. He put in his "ors" for "ands," and the printers got them right. He put in his "those" for "these," but the ingenious printer took his "those" for "thou," and left it so, standing where it ought not. The errata were also left as they had been. The result was the impenetrable jungle of stanza xi. Shelley, in short, like other people, was passing weary of his proof-sheets; did not read all of them; and had no revise or did not read it if he had. Meanwhile both Mr. Forman and Mr. Rossetti alter the punctuation of this weary stanza à plaisir, and differently.

As for the rhyme, "men" and "can," Mr. Forman thinks Shelley "very capable of having it happen to him," as Marlborough said of the Dutch general who was reported to have incurred a defeat. In stanza xii. Shelley made "none," "down," and "alone" rhyme; he was capable de tout, and a rebel at large. Like Lord Peter:

He broke the laws of God, and man, and metre.

It is to be feared that he was rather "careless"; was, as Keats said, in too great a hurry. At the bottom of his troubles were "justice, or truth, or joy," which, whether you combine them by "ands," or separate them by "ors," cause a grammatical difficulty, when spoken of in the plural (those), and also likened to a solitary "clear star." A constellation of several stars, the Bear, was the guide of Odysseus in Homer, and might have been got into the line, but then the "ors"—disjunctive—put a constellation out of the question; just as the "ands" made a single star impossible, which Shelley perceived. The only safe thing to do was to get rid of justice, and truth, and joy, but Shelley shrank from the sacrifice.

ANDREW LANG.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

A CANON OF STYLE

Is modern art or modern literature superior to ancient? Progress, let it be admitted, has been achieved in scientific knowledge and in mechanical appliances: has any been achieved in art and literature? It is often argued by those who have acquaintance with Greek, that Greek sculpture is still unsurpassed, that Greek poetry and prose present masterpieces yet unrivalled. Those who make these assertions exhibit, indeed, too often in their writing such barbarism of taste as to make those who hear them doubt the reality of the Greek influence, and the power—loudly vaunted—of the Greek spirit to refine and elevate. We need make no attempt here to explain why these damaging advocates of Greek show no better fruit in themselves from the tree of knowledge which they avow that they have delighted to have grafted upon them. It may be that their advocacy is but cant, the professional iteration of platitudes to their own interest, the brainless record of their youthful learning reproduced as by a gramophone. But, however this may be, there are sufficient guarantees of the perfection of Greek art and literature for it to be worth while to regard them as models for our consideration. If Greek literature, and above all Attic literature, supply the forms that our word-artists must study as diligently as sculptors must study Greek statuary, it must be useful now and again to recur to those great originals with new questions in our minds.

Here the labours of great scholars often assist their successors. To mention but one instance, the late Headmaster of Westminster, in an elaborate volume which sums up the reflections of many years, has very justly insisted on one aspect of Greek literature too often obsured. He points out, and establishes his contention with a wealth of irrefragable illustration, that the first foundation of a true Greek style was the spoken word. The very word for style divides the barbarian and the Greek. The Greek speaks of λέξις, the way of speaking: the barbarian must needs think of the pen, the "stilus," used in his cloistered lucubrations. This Attic taste gives the matchless charm of ease to the Dialogues of Plato: he writes as so delightful a gentleman would speak. Three-fourths of the obscurities in Thucydides become relumed when the reader grasps this torch to guide him: the austerity of the grave historian dulled not his Attic ear to the music of the spoken word, and, dark though his meditations might be, he laboured to give them the manner of conversation by copying the flexible, changing, shifting syntax and cast of sentence which men use in conversation. Not less remarkable is the observance of the same canon in oratory. Andocides perhaps might be passed by as an untrained speaker, a gentleman who spoke from the fulness of his heart. But Demosthenes and Lysias and Isaeus aim at this very thing—they seek to catch the tone, the style, the character, of each several client and give to the speech they write for his mouth to utter the manner and the nature of his talk.

It is true that one peculiarity of the Attic civilisation is lost for ever. Athens contained within her walls the entire Attic-speaking world. Those who left her for long, lost like Xenophon something of their native delicacy and precision in dialect. Yet the English world of letters is not so unlike Athens as would at first sight be thought. The provincial idioms of millions mark them off as the analogues of Boeotians, Dorians, and the rest. But those who speak that Mercian dialect which Shakespeare, Milton, and a hundred others have stamped as the English of literature—they all may claim to be Athenians.

The barbarous notion that literature was separate in style and diction from conversation may be traced through Quintilian and Cicero to Isocrates. This writer of political pamphlets was deterred from the normal career of public speakers by a timid bashfulness and hypochondriac nervousness that incapacitated him. Like the incompetent, to-day almost extinct, who "unaccustomed as he was to public speaking," felt that a "speech" was so remote from "talking" that he could say nothing. Isocrates, too shy to speak as others, began to write speeches unlike others. The un-Attic vices to which Gorgias and other professors had for a little time given a vogue, not unnaturally allured Isocrates. He wrote long sentences whose correct syntax and symmetrical balance of sound and syllable, would have been impossible in a speaker. His periods grew stiff with particles, and passed the wit of man to follow except with the eye. Yet he remained Attic in this that he still used the grammatical forms and the vocabulary of those amongst whom he lived, and he was numbered therefore among the Ten Attic Orators.

Nothing could have been more unfortunate. Greeks of Attic culture and taste like Dionysius still taught that Demosthenes, not Isocrates, was the crown of Attic oratory, that Plato was divine, that Thucydides was the greatest of Athenian historians. But the barbarian Romans could not catch the Attic fire: they could not speak with the inspired tongue of a true Athenian. The mannerisms of Isocrates they could copy: where he was not veritably Attic they admired him: what had set him in the Sacred Ten, with the exception of his music, they did not understand. And therefore they distinguished the vocabulary, the syntax, the rhythm, the order of words to be used in speeches from those natural in conversation, and soon went on to write history and philosophy as they would not write a public speech. At last then the ruin is complete: the true instinct of style is lost: the canon forgotten.

It would be a long inquiry to follow the course by which the barbarous tradition of Roman literature filtered down to our time. Suffice it here to indicate briefly the bearing of this recovered Attic canon of style on some modern discussions. We must, however, first premise that in the degenerate days of Graeco-Roman civilisation armies of critics and professors of literature, to the worse confounding of confusion, fought in their blindness, for the avoidance of phrases, forms, constructions familiar to every one's tongue, because they were un-Attic. They understood not the Attic spirit—that men should write as they talked—they knew not that, Attic being dead, it was for them to create a new and worthy literary tongue.

What, then, of ourselves? If we should at all times write as we speak, may we drop relatives as did our fathers before us, and thereupon end a sentence with a preposition? When Ruskin writes:

[I believe that good men . . . would be grieved to think] that this, with all the record it bore of them, and of all material things that they had loved and ruled over, and set the stamp of themselves upon—was to be swept away, is he reproducing the tone of conversation? and is such a turn worthy of commendation, and is it to be adopted also in a history? When every lady freely uses the "split-infinitive," is she not Attic, and is therefore the construction not correct in literature? Even the barbarian Cicero was conscious that a lady's speech was a better model than most men's. The late Queen, no less than millions of others, wrote "very pleased." Does not our Attic canon show that they are pedants of degenerate taste who do not recognise that this general use stamps the phrase as Attic, however the grammarian may explain the fact?

And what shall we say of the bepummelled "like" idiom? It is not the occasional occurrence of its use as a conjunction in books that is the strength of the case for it: it is the indisputable fact that it is regular in the conversation of most men and women, whose employment of the Mercian or literary dialect cannot be questioned. Professor Tyrrell (quem honoris causa nomino) denounces the term as a solecism: but the professor himself employs the "split infinitive." Quis custodes—?

In his "Correspondence of Cicero," vol. iv. p. 1., he makes Cicero say: "The work that remains for me is not to foolishly say any rash word." But if he will permit himself to be justified, he may point out that the contention of the pedants rests upon the assumption that the infinitive is made of the preposition to indivisibly joined to the verbal form, and that to the validity of this assumption such a term as "to love, honour and obey" is entirely contrariant. "To love, to honour, and to obey," must be necessary. Yet Milton, who if any one may be put forward as an English scholar with Attic taste, writes "What boots it. . . . To tend the . . . shepherd's trade. And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?"

The plain truth is that, the Attic canon lost, men have erred to the right hand and to the left. Some make no effort to lend clearness, force, restraint, charm to their style: others denounce them not for the neglect of these qualities, but for using "non-literary idioms." The watchword for all should be exemplaria Graeca

Nocturna versate manu, versate diurna.

T. NICKLIN

FICTION

Harry and Ursula. By W. E. NORRIS. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. NORRIS gains a distinct air of freshness by his method of making each of his lovers recount the story of their love from his or her own point of view. The different aspects of the affair are most entertaining, and are worked out with amusing insight, though without any pretence at going beneath the surface. The lovers are charming and light-hearted; and no one could fail to be pleased that their troubles, which are always interesting and at times pleasantly exciting, end as such troubles should end, in mutual understanding and happiness. The tragic incident of the letter, forged by Ursula's father, is introduced with great dexterity. Mr. Norris's touch is light, but it is sure.

The Fighting Chance. By ROBERT CHAMBERS. (Constable, 6s.)

HAPPILY for his admirers, Mr. Chambers has resisted any temptation to settle down to one line of fiction, and stick to it. No two successive stories from his facile pen present the same kind of interest, and "The Reckoning," "Iole," and "The Fighting Chance," show what a many-sided author can do, and do admirably. This story deals with society in New York, or with that circle of it given up to luxury and pleasure, and two of its popular members provide studies in heredity. There is nothing new in that, nor, indeed, in the book as a whole, but out of the inherited forces that influence Stephen Siward and Sylvia Landis the author has built a strong and fascinating story. The hereditary taint in Siward is drink; in Sylvia's case she frankly admits three generations of broken marriage vows—"where women of my race loved they usually found the way—rather unconventionally": afraid of herself she decides to accept the millionaire Quarrier as a sort of barrier against temptation, and holds to the engagement when she falls in love with Siward. She is too ambitious and selfish to give up her brilliant prospects for love, yet Siward resolves to take the fighting chance to overcome his master-vice and win Sylvia. The problem before the reader is whether, and how, Siward will "win out" against overwhelming odds, and whether Sylvia will find love stronger than Quarrier's millions. In spite of her family history and upbringing she is both innocent and ignorant; the author convinces us of it, and that is a triumph in its way. She analyses her feelings minutely, talks far too much, a common fault with all the feminine characters—the author audibly prompting their outbursts of biting comment, and worldly-wise philosophy. Deeply interesting as it is, "The Fighting Chance" is not without flaws and imperfections. It is over-elaborated, confused, crowded with small details; it is also exciting—there is not a restful scene in the whole four hundred and forty-two pages—but the cleverness, vivacity, and insight into human nature will deservedly secure for it as great a success in England as it already enjoys in America.

The Two Forces. By E. WAY ELKINGTON. (Long, 6s.)

IN this novel Mr. Way Elkington seems to have set himself a serious task—to show that evil and good, the two forces, may go hand in hand. We cannot think, however, that Mr. Elkington meant us to take him seriously, and when he invites us, lightheartedly, to believe that a highwayman who "holds up" a coach by night may be a philanthropist, dreaming his dreams, by day, we expect entertainment. As a highwayman Richard Terrill is beyond reproach—is even fascinating; his daring feats fill us with envious admiration, and we feel sure that, did we know how to disguise a greyhound till all the world would swear it were a collie, our fortune would be made. We follow the dashing robber breathlessly, foiling Red Indians and whites in their well-intentioned efforts to secure (according to taste) his scalp or person, till his two "mates" meet their ends in approved violent fashion. Then our hopes are blighted. We thought we had at last found a descendant of "Captain Starlight," and are disappointed to find he is merely a "millionaire philanthropist." A sturdy Irishman called Murphy, with a rooted objection to work, is the only amusing character in the book: except Mr. Elkington when he begins to explain about those two forces—which, we are afraid, cost him sleepless nights. There is some excellent description of wild mountain scenery, and on p. 111 there is a chasm: "a sheer drop of three thousand feet." We should like to have seen that chasm.

DRAMA

COQUELIN AND MOLIERE

THIS week London has been fortunate enough, through the enterprise of M. Gaston Mayer, to have the opportunity of seeing the greatest living actor in some of his greatest parts. M. Coquelin has been appearing at the New Royalty Theatre. M. Coquelin is supreme. Many actors plays certain parts, which have been written to fit their personality or which their personality happens to fit, so that their performance seems to touch perfection by a kind of happy coincidence. The man himself constantly shows in the character he is portraying even as his features peer through his make-up. The art of M. Coquelin, like many great arts, is impersonal. Fully to understand his supremacy it is necessary to see him in two parts so widely different as Jourdain, le bourgeois gentilhomme, and Tartufe, le faux dévot. In Jourdain Molière shows an amiable fool—a rich middle-class man with a passion for aping the manners of the nobility, a passion which leads him to the heights of absurdity. Save for this weakness M. Jourdain is a good-hearted fellow. He is kept from the meanness of the snob by the childish delight he takes in his own magnificence, by his childish behaviour, and his more than childish simplicity. He is like an overgrown boy with the means and money to enable him to carry out his boy's fancies. You cannot help loving, while you laugh at, this Monsieur Jourdain. That is not the case with Tartufe. Your laughter is hardened by hatred. For Molière is in him exposing hypocrisy, about which he felt as strongly as Milton felt when he called it the blackest sin. Tartufe is that most detestable of scoundrels, the sanctimonious scoundrel. Whereas Molière treats the bourgeois in a light-hearted manner, prose-comedy mingled with ballet and farce, he treats Tartufe with all the formal strength of comedy and uses the recognised formal couplet. He leaves nothing unsaid or undone that can make his portrait of the impostor more telling or more hideous.

In representing these characters M. Coquelin has not a free hand. Their portrayal is governed by long-standing tradition. He cannot, as many actors would fain do, manipulate them to suit his own personality. That, even if he desired it, would not be tolerated. The parts exist, made on hard and fast lines, handed down through generations, for him to take or leave. He takes them and triumphs over all difficulties with such perfect ease, his performance is so fresh and so convincing, that it becomes almost impossible not to believe that each part must have been written specially for him, or must at least have been created by him for the first time. One of the most valuable points about the repertory system is that you are able to see an actor in two such parts on two successive nights. There is no better way of gauging his true worth. To see M. Coquelin as Tartufe with the memory of his bourgeois gentilhomme vivid in the mind is to obtain what is nothing short of a revelation of the possibilities of the art of acting. It is then possible to feel the full astonishment such genius as that of M. Coquelin should arouse. Moreover, although there is a wide difference between the two characters, the parts have indubitable similarities. Both plays are of the seventeenth century, and contain the same stiffness of construction, the same formality in design. Both characters are in their own way ridiculous: both are types rather than individuals.

But in M. Coquelin's playing of them there was not a movement, not a gesture, hardly an intonation, that was the same: in both his face was clean-shaven, yet the range of his facial expression changed completely, his very features seemed to be different. For he has more control over his mouth than most actors have over their right hands.

In the first two acts of Le bourgeois gentilhomme (which are practically played as one) M. Jourdain makes his famous entrance to the Masters of Music and of Dancing, dressed in the splendid morning-gown, which covers the yellow satin déshabille. Delight at his own splendour beamed from him so irresistibly that the whole house was immediately conquered and obliged to share his enjoyment. It is a notable entrance, and all through the act his different demeanour—with the masters of the polite arts, with the ferocious fencing-master, with the austere philosopher: from all of whom he hoped to learn some elements of gentility—was inimitably brought out. He patronised the musician, was terribly afraid of the fencer, was humble to the philosopher, astonished, too, and delighted when that worthy made clear to him the wonderful fact that for forty years he had been talking prose without knowing it. And the patronage, the awe, the humility, the astonishment and delight were each expressed perfectly.

And remembering that most charming of scenes, full as it is of boyish merriment, the great scene in Tartufe where he makes sly love to his benefactor's wife, becomes doubly wonderful. It seemed incredible that the man who was now so insinuatingly lecherous, who with that strange blink of the eyes and solemn mouthing of his words became so exactly Tartufe and so odious, could be the person who had the night before been the ingenuous bourgeois, at whom every one had laughed.

M. Coquelin is incomparable. The company that supported him reached a high level of excellence, as would be expected from a company containing such members as M. Coste, who played Orgon in Tartufe, as M. Monteux, as Mlle. Lynnès, of the Comédie Française. All were accomplished to their finger-tips; every detail of production was carefully studied; nothing was slurred over: hardly a word missed.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

PAINTINGS AND PANSIES

THE sextette of landscape painters who are holding their twelfth annual joint-exhibition at the galleries of the Old Water-Colour Society have a pleasing habit of prefixing to the catalogue of their works some saying about art by a famous artist, some dictum which presumably sets forth the aim of the associated exhibitors. This year they have gone to Jean François Millet, and on the fly-leaf we find:

Every artist ought to have a central thought, une pensée mère, which he expresses with all the strength of his soul, and tries to stamp on the hearts of others.

Applying to the exhibits the test which the exhibitors themselves have chosen, we find few works in which the central thought is expressed with sufficient clearness to be easily intelligible. In the case of Mr. A. D. Peppercorn we do find in all his work a salient characteristic, but we hesitate to say whether this should be classified as a central thought or a mannerism. Clearly, Mr. Peppercorn thinks Nature most beautiful in her most sombre moods, her lowest tones, and he expresses his conviction with all the strength which unadulterated black can yield. There is so much vigour in the sweep of Mr. Peppercorn's brush, such skill in his handling of rich pigment, that his rigid convention of colour often mars an otherwise fine performance, and when he extends his range of colour, as in the impressive seascape The Cliff (4), with its luminous sky, we receive more than a hint of the heights to which the painter might soar were his sense of colour as keen and true as is his sense of mass. Mr. Peppercorn's landscapes are in the grand style. He views Nature as a whole, each part related, but none so accentuated as to distract attention to itself. In the stricter and older sense of the word he is an impressionist, giving personal renderings of moods of nature and not mere topographical statements. But he is not a luminist; with truth to Nature's lightning, with the subtle beauties of colour revealed to the searching eye in her lights and in her shadows, he is not concerned. He makes a sort of précis of her chiaroscuro, and simplifies her colouring into a shorthand of his own. These are his limitations; in spite, or because of them, he attains a distinction of style denied to many landscape painters of wider outlook.

Mr. T. Austen Brown has a keener sense of colour, and gilds with sunset hues, reminiscent of the Venetians, his rustic scenes anglicised from Mauve and Millet. His eye for the decorative in composition is effectively displayed in A Market Cart (14), picturesquely set in a leafy avenue. The rich colour and creamy surface of this artist's paint endow his works with a quality rarely found in modern pictures, but though these characteristics will of themselves delight the craftsman, his exhibits here are a little disappointing, often lacking other and necessary virtues. Mr. Brown needs to watch his vision rather than his handling, for what doth it profit a painter beautifully to express that which is not beautifully seen?

With paint more liquid than that of Messrs. Brown and Peppercorn, Mr. J. Aumonier delicately chases the fugitive colour of our English downlands. At his best he is unequalled by any living painter in his refined renderings of these typically British landscapes, but with the possible exception of Evening on the Downs (16) he is not seen at his best in Pall Mall. Too many of his landscapes are tainted with prettiness, prettiness of vision, prettiness of treatment—and prettiness, philologists say, derives from meretricious trickery. Of the works by the remaining exhibitors, Messrs. R. W. Allan, Leslie Thomson, and James S. Hill, none save the Daubignesque A Dorset River (44) of the second, and the Hope Cove, Devonshire (46), of the third, approaching the grave austerity of a Cottet, deserve special mention.

The "central thought" so difficult to find in the Pall Mall landscapes may readily be traced in the fifteen oil paintings shown by Mr. Charles H. Shannon at the Leicester Galleries. A passionate sense of beauty informs the idylls of this true pictorial poet, and if his idea of beauty be largely derived from the School of Giorgione via Watts, he has succeeded in making the idea his own. "Little groups of real men and women, amid congruous furniture or landscape—morsels of actual life, conversation or music or play, refined upon or idealised, till they come to seem like glimpses of life from afar." So Pater summarised the pictures of Giorgione, and the description is not altogether inapplicable to those of Mr. C. H. Shannon. There is, however, more direct reference to life in the old master than in the modern, who compensates his occasional excursions into portraiture by harking back to classical legend when opportunity permits. Yet Pater's words may stand when Mr. Shannon is most himself, when he takes the facts of women at their toilet or bathing in a pool or by the seashore, and then refines upon and idealises these glimpses of life till to a generation deserted by the sense of beauty they seem the fancies of a poet's dream. But for all the skill of a sensitive colourist the fancies are most potent in their appeal when they have a substratum of modern fact. At the New Gallery Mr. C. H. Shannon shows a painting, larger than any in Leicester Square but less successful than most there, and its title is The Golden Age. Mr. Shannon would recreate in paint a time when women were naked and unashamed, and the sons of the gods walked on earth, and beasts came to man to receive their titles. But we miss the "morsel of actual life" and seem given a glimpse not so much of the golden age of the world as of the golden age of painting, and overwhelmed by a flood of recollection our thoughts leap from the painting before us to the paintings that were before. Mr. Shannon has received a noble inheritance from the Venetians, but he must not live on his capital: he must invest it in his own way in modern life if he would himself increase its interest.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

LEGENDS of St. Edmund abound, and many attempts have been made to extract from them a history of the East Anglian hero and martyr. But hitherto even the legends themselves have not been adequately examined in the spirit of scientific criticism, nor have the data supplied by the chronicles and poets of the Middle Ages been duly collated with the facts of East Anglian history as revealed in early coins, or with the materials afforded by ancient grants and charters, and by dedication of churches and chapels. In the "Corolla Sancti Eadmundi: The Garland of St. Edmund," which Mr. Murray will publish shortly, the information furnished by the chief literary authorities is marshalled with substantial regard to chronological sequence, so as to exhibit the growth of the legend; and an attempt is made to co-ordinate the narrative thus obtained with the indications derived from the sources above-mentioned. In the result Edmund appears to be of genuine English parentage, and nearly connected on one side with Egbert, the last of the Bretwaldas, and thus with the house of Cerdic; on the other side with the kings of Kent, and so, through St. Sexburt, with the ancient royal line of East Anglia. Much that the volume contains is taken from hitherto unpublished manuscripts.

The magnificent sixteenth-century manuscript of the "Hortulus Animae," which is one of the chief treasures of the Imperial Royal Court Library at Vienna, is about to be reproduced in facsimile by Mr. Oosthoek, of Utrecht. All the miniatures (one hundred and nine in number) are being printed in colours and heightened with gold. The work will be issued in eleven parts, to be completed in the course of three years. Messrs. Ellis, of 29 New Bond Street, are the sole agents for the British Isles and Colonies.

Mr. T. S. Osmond has written a volume which Mr. Henry Frowde will publish this month, sketching the history of prosodical criticism in England and America during the last two hundred years. It is entitled "English Metrists of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries." The author has endeavoured not merely to enumerate and summarise treatises, but also to trace the gradual development of sounder views about verse-structure. It is claimed that no such report on the progress of metrical science has appeared in any modern European language.

Mr. Francis Gribble's new work, entitled "Madame de Staël and her Lovers," will be published by Mr. Nash next week. The book deals chiefly with the relations which subsisted for many years between Necker's distinguished daughter and Benjamin Constant, the novelist, pamphleteer, and statesman who led the Liberal Opposition in France in the reigns of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. The episode is one of great interest, though Madame de Staël's previous biographers have passed over it lightly. The intimacy of the lovers was notorious to their contemporaries; and Barras, in his memoirs, even goes so far as to say, totidem verbis, that Benjamin Constant was the father of Albertine de Staël. Benjamin Constant's correspondence, which has lately been made available to biographical students, shows clearly that Benjamin Constant was of the same opinion. The story of this memorable love-affair is now fully told for the first time.

Messrs. Methuen will publish shortly a new novel by Mr. Jack London, entitled "White Fang." In it Mr. London shows us the taming of a wolf, from the time when he first hovers round a dog-sledge, through the long months of his gradual adoption of the ways and habits of man-animals.

Mr. George Allen will have ready for publication by the end of February a new volume of essays by Maurice Maeterlinck, entitled "Life and Flowers," translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. The book will be uniform with the previous works of M. Maeterlinck issued by the same publisher.

A new book by Dr. Max Nordau entitled "On Art and Artists" will be published on February 4 by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. In it the author gives a comprehensive and unconventional view of the development of modern art as represented by some of the best known painters and sculptors—Whistler, Frank Brangwyn, Rodin, Puvis de Chavannes, Meunier, Bartholomé, Gustave Moreau, Carrière, Zorn, Zuloaga, Bouguereau, and many others.

Messrs. Methuen announce a uniform edition of the works of Oscar Wilde. It will be limited to a thousand copies on hand-made paper, and fifty copies on Japanese vellum. The books are reprinted from the latest editions issued under the superintendence of the author, and in many cases will contain his last corrections.

Among Messrs. Alston Rivers's forthcoming novels are "Extor Moor," by Archibald Marshall, "Privy Seal," by Ford Madox Hueffer, "Kit's Woman," by Mrs. Havelock Ellis, and "Arminel of the West," by the author of "A Pixy in Petticoats."

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will publish early this month a novel by the author of "Hazel of Hazeldean," entitled "The House of Rest." The scene of the greater part of the story is laid in the lake district, and it deals with the attempt of a girl who has suddenly become possessed of considerable means to use her wealth for the benefit of those requiring care and rest before resuming their ordinary vocations in life.

Early this month Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton will add to the New Knowledge Series "The Nature and Origin of Life," by Felix le Dantec, Professor of the Faculty of Sciences at the Sorbonne. Professor le Dantec treats of the principles of the continuity in living and dead matter, the dangers of too hasty analysis, the various conditions in which a living body may exist from a chemical point of view, artificial and real functions defined in life, natural selection, equilibrium and order, the phenomena of life compared with the phenomena of non-living matter, the cell in its movements, heredity, appearance of life, etc.

CORRESPONDENCE

SHAKESPEARE AND ARISTOPHANES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I hoped that some recognised Shakespearean scholar would have shown in your last issue the superfluity and unreasonableness of your correspondent's letter under the above heading (ACADEMY, January 19).

Mr. N. W. Hill, of Philadelphia, compares extracts from the two poets to record triumphantly a discovery he has purported to make, in his own words, "to convince all but the most prejudiced that here, at any rate, there is something very like plagiarism on the part of the English dramatist."

It is true that Pope, Theobald, Dr. Johnson, Dyce, Dowden and the other early contemporary commentators, whom he mentions, have missed this discovery. To Porson, indeed, he allows the honour of comparing passages relating to animal-shaped clouds from Aristophanes, Cicero, Swift, Anthony and Cleopatra and Hamlet. But even Porson—poor, dull, dry-as-dust, yet groping and inquiring Porson—failed to perceive that the passage in Hamlet was a plagiarism; failed to perceive that it was, in itself, convincing evidence that Shakespeare went to the Greek dramatists for inspiration. How damning!

Now the answer to Mr. Hill is simple and conclusive. I will put it in the form of two questions: (1) Could Dr. Hill name any grown-up man of his acquaintance (sane, or even partially sane) who has not in his childhood looked up hundreds of times into the sky and audibly noted the shapes of animals there? (2) The comparison of clouds to animals being an ever-recurring occupation of millions of people in all ages, how can the mere fact that Hamlet pointed out one such comparison out to Polonius be proof that Shakespeare knew and borrowed from the Greek authors because Aristophanes also once compared clouds to animals?

And the fact that the ideas set forth by Aristophanes and Shakespeare are essentially different has escaped Mr. Hill—surely an unpardonable oversight in so acute a critic. In the one the idea given is of the ever-changing shapes of clouds. But in the other Hamlet chose a particular cloud (as he might have chosen a neighbouring hill), and whilst it retained its shape, he calls it first a camel, then a weasel, and then a whale, to ascertain if Polonius would fool him to the top of his bent.

The words I have first quoted are irritating. Like all Englishmen I am jealous of the reputation of our great dramatist—the glory and wonder of mankind—and such a phrase as that of Mr. Hill's should not be received unless supported by acceptable evidence. We were rendered uneasy by the Americans who "discovered" the cryptogram. But we now find that the Baconians themselves have abandoned it as evidence against Shakespeare, relying upon new proofs, which will no doubt also be given up in their turn as more plausible arguments are thought of.

At any rate, I would urge that all lovers of Shakespeare should submit to very close scrutiny every statement designed, even so slightly as this one of Mr. Hill's, to belittle him. Otherwise this kind of criticism may, even from its mere volume, gradually sap that love and reverence which so many of us still cherish very closely.

ARTHUR CHAPMAN.

January 30.

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Thistleton says that he "inferred" from my letter on this subject that I was "of opinion that in the original of the play which is to be found in the First Folio, it was split up into the extraordinary number of scenes tabulated by him" [i.e., by me]. I made no such inference, as I had a facsimile of the First Folio before me at the time of writing, and there I noticed the play was not divided into two acts and scenes. Am I correct in inferring from Mr. Thistleton's letter that in his opinion the "split" was performed for the first time in the "Globe" edition of Shakespeare?

As Horace says—Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona multi. So there were many editions published before the "Globe" with the acts and scenes laid down for stage purposes. Nicholas Rowe, in his edition of 1714, was the first to divide and number acts and scenes of the various plays "on rational principles," and to mark the entrances and exits of the characters. He was shortly afterwards followed by Pope and Theobald, who adhered closely to Rowe in the "splits," the latter also making numerous "emendations" in Antony and Cleopatra, one of them singularly ingenious. In the Folio we find Cleopatra speaking of Antony in the following terms:

"For his bounty,
There was no winter in 't; an Anthony it was
That grew the more by reaping."

Theobald knew better than the Editors of the Folio, and altered the words italicised into "an Autumn 'twas," thus transforming rank nonsense into plain common sense.

Rowe's division has, with few variations, been accepted ever since—by Hanmer, Warburton, Johnson, Capell, Steevens, Malone, Reed, Dyce, Knight, Staunton, Delius, Halliwell-Phillipps, Cowden Clarke, Furnivall, and Aldis and Wright in the Cambridge edition, the best edition of the complete works as yet published, although for editions of a number of the separate plays nothing can approach the volumes of the Variorum edition, the work of an American commentator, Mr. Harold Howard Furness.

In regard to the splitting up of the plays into acts and scenes, the unanimity of the editors is wonderful, although on other points they go for each other like full-blown Bengal tigers. Witness Theobald and Pope, for example.

With Mr. Thistleton I might enjoy a performance of Antony and Cleopatra, as originally written (5 acts, 42 scenes), by the Elizabethan Stage Players; but I am afraid it will prove a very "dreich" production, and a few of the audience who witnessed the commencement of the play may not be seen in their seats at its conclusion.

But, as Mr. Tree says, the version we have of Antony and Cleopatra was probably only a "first draft." The Quartos, in many cases, may be considered first drafts, and marvellous improvements were made on them—especially on the historical plays—in the First Folio. There was no Quarto of Antony and Cleopatra, so Mr. Tree is probably correct in his assumption. It is a pity, however, that the author did not see his way to issue a revised version of this strangely-constructed drama, as he did with Hamlet between the Quartos of 1603 and 1604 and the Folio of 1623. We might then have had an equally excellent play fit for stage representation without being submitted to the tender mercies of the scalpel of modern acting-managers.

It is of interest to note that the title of the play in the First Folio is The Tragedie of Anthonie, and Cleopatra, although the heading of the pages runs The Tragedie of Anthony and Cleopatra. Who is responsible for the modern transformation into Antony?

GEORGE STRONACH.

January 26.

A POINT OF GRAMMAR

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—I regret to have read my ACADEMY rather late this week so that this protest may be out of date. Is not the Editorial summary of the matter a little too sweeping?

"We enclose a complete list of branches. The ones that have been underlined are the only ones which do not open daily."

I submit that "one" can be not only a numerical adjective but also a relative pronoun. As a pronoun it is capable of having a plural; and "ones" is as true a plural form of "one" as "them" is of "it." In the sentences quoted, "ones" is a pronoun to avoid repetition of the noun "branches." The use is not merely colloquial but perfectly sound and grammatical. But there are faults of syntax in the passage given. "Ones" being a pronoun for "branches" certainly has not been underlined; the names of the branches may have been. This fault in construction is of frequent occurrence, and betrays the primitive human difficulty in deciding between the thing and its symbol.

"We enclose a complete list of branches. The names underlined are those of the only ones which do not open daily." This is clearly what the notice was intended to say.

S. CUNNINGTON.

January 26.

A RECORD OF SPANISH PAINTINGS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Gallichan's letter of January 21, 1907, I beg leave to remark that, as the authoress of "A Record of Spanish Painting" promised not to reproduce in her book the information which I had given her, and which I believe her to have noted accurately, without sending me a proof of that addition to it, but failed to do so, I had some right to be vexed, for her own sake, as well as my own, at the inaccuracies which her published notes contain. She took my address at Oxford at the same time, as indeed appears in her book. At the beginning of it, moreover, she announces that accuracy had been her aim in writing it. The difference between "translator" and "author of a translation" may be apparent to Mr. Gallichan, but not to me, in spite of the "ability" with which he credits me! The inaccuracy shown in writing "San Teruel" instead of Teruel has not caused me "a bitter sense of injury" for three years: because I first saw the book last December, when I had again met Mr. and Mrs. Gallichan, in the British Museum. I disclaim equally the "great authority upon all Spanish antiquarian subjects," which is so flatteringly attributed to me. There are other inaccuracies in the book, which ought to disappear, if a new edition of it should be published. Such a wish is surely a proof of friendliness.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

LAFCADIO HEARN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Am I right in saying that the last sentence of the finely felt and well written article, headed Lafcadio Hearn, in your present issue (January 26), is clotted nonsense! Are "the places in which most men are born" very much inferior in point of blueness and proximity to the world than the sky, etc.?!! The analysis of the sentence seems to bear out this construction.

GEORGE SMITH.

January 27.

[We do not think that our correspondent is right.—ED.]

"STREW ON HER ROSES, ROSES"

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—I should be so much obliged if some one would kindly tell me through the medium of your Correspondence column, in what paper, periodical or Anthology of verse published lately—the poem by Arnold quoted this week in your article "Select Epigrams," and beginning "Strew on her roses, roses," was printed; or, failing that, in what book it is to be found.

A. LA T.

January 23.

[The title of the poem is, of course, "Requiescat." Our correspondent will find it in the shilling editions of the Poems of Matthew Arnold issued by Mr. Henry Frowde in the World's Classics and by Messrs. Routledge in the Muses' Library.—ED.]

A CORRECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your paper to correct an error in my book, "Recollections of a Lucknow Veteran;" and which was pointed out to me in your review of the work, viz., That the Flag was hoisted on the Mess House by Captain Wolseley, whereas it should have been "By Lieutenant Roberts," now F.-M. Lord Roberts. I know that the impression we all had at the time, was that the former officer hoisted the Flag, and at the time of writing I suppose that impression was running in my mind and led me to make the mistake.

J. RUGGLES,
Major-General.

FROM THE FOURPENNY BOX

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Among the joys of la chasse au bouquin not the least may be counted that of dreaming, over a pipe and the latest trouvaille, of the erstwhile owner of the new-found treasure. A day to be marked with a white stone was that on which I picked up a pocket volume of Béranger bearing the autograph of Shirley Brooks. These thoughts are stirred anew within me by seeing the name "Miss Susannah Brown" traced in the delicate Italian hand of the period on the fly-leaf of a waif which I lately rescued from the limbo of the Fourpenny Box—a slim duodecimo of some eighty odd pages, entitled "The Basia of Johannes Secundus Nicolaius: and the Pancharis of Johannes Bonnefons. Newly translated from the original Text. (London: 1824)"—surely not one of the volumes that one would expect to find on every lady's book-shelf. The date 1824 makes it possible that the fair Susannah may have been educated under the Semiramis of Hammer-smith herself at the selfsame Academy for Young Ladies where Becky Sharp was so unwillingly first pupil then teacher. The reading of the latter included, we know, "The works of the learned Dr. Smollett, of the ingenious Mr. Henry Fielding, of the graceful and fantastic Monsieur Crébillon the younger, and of the universal Monsieur de Voltaire": no unworthy company for the glowing imagery and luscious conceits of the "Basia" and the "Pancharis." Perchance 'twas a birthday gift from some undiscerning friend, to whom a book was just a book, and to whose understanding the luxuriant tropes and metaphors of Secundus and Bonnefons were as so much Hebrew. Peace to your ashes, Susannah Brown!

H. L. N.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. E. A. Fisher's crisp letter in the ACADEMY of January 19 very forcibly expresses the ordinary and familiar objections to the improvement of spelling.

Although as the Simplified Spelling Board has afresh pointed out there is a gradual and scarcely perceptible improvement in spelling always taking place, yet it is so infinitesimal that the mass of spelling at an epoch can be claimed to be fixed and free from confusing variableness. But supposing it were conceivable that the reform could be discussed and elaborated to a point when there was a practical unanimity amongst all printing offices, authors, and dictionary makers and a determination that this final and unimprovable innovation was to be legally and in every other conceivable authoritative way adopted on a given day, yet even then it would be inevitable that a very large amount of diversity or anarchy would for a time prevail. Amongst the dignitaries themselves there would be many and perpetual backslidings, while amongst the population at large there would most probably be many cases of reactionary and obstructive clinging to the good old fashions of the past. It must be admitted that reform would necessitate disturbance.

Your correspondent writes as though he could sympathise with any scheme which could secure general acceptance, though he may imply that as this sort of Babel is inseparable from reform it is therefore impossible and undesirable.

But alas the alternatives allowed by Mr. E. A. Fisher are not to be had for wishing or decreeing them.

Spelling Reform by edict is out of the question. A large and rapid movement could doubtless be inaugurated by agreement amongst a majority of literary men, teachers and statesmen. But the laws of evolution would persist. Nature may be accelerated by art but it cannot be suppressed. In the realm of spelling there are multitudes of questions which can only be solved by trial and elimination. If variety be intolerable and uniformity indispensable then no reform can ever take place. Systems must compete; but before this can take place there must be a general recognition of the fact that future generations have a right to demand from the teachers of to-day a declaration of truth and not a perpetually recurring infliction of old falsehood upon each fresh schoolful of children. This, however, will not involve Babel nor division. The language is the speech not its feeble representation on paper. The more faithfully it can be recorded the better for ultimate unity. Phonograph records tend to promote closer assimilation of pronunciation and so would phonetic spelling. The standard dialect is not indigenous anywhere. It is an average and compromise like one of Galton's Composite Photographs. Its territorial expansion is promoted by admitting of the most perfect interaction of all dialects, and this involves allowing and encouraging all speakers to get as near their own pronunciation as ever the art of writing and spelling will allow them.

Simplifications merely irritate adults and do not benefit the children. What is wanted is phonetic teaching as nearly perfect as can be obtained but untrammelled by the paralysing and sterilising demand for absolute unanimity and uniformity. It cannot be obtained any more than any other good thing without a bit of trouble.

When there is still such an approximation to even an incongruous and confused phonetic idea as English spelling actually presents it is not safe to hold that the written word is a symbol of thought independent of the sound. The mind does not reason with written words. It thinks by suppressed utterance, and will be helped rather than hindered when spelling is more completely logical and reasonable.

GREEVZ FYSHER.

January 29.

THE PERSONAL EQUATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you or any of your readers be so kind as to inform me who coined the phrase "personal equation," whether it is good English, and, if not, what synonym may take its place? It is certainly a useful expression, but I do not feel sure about its social status so to say,

A WRITER.

A TARDY NEW-YEAR RESOLUTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I see by the papers that a "National Anti-Lending League" has just been formed. This league, as a contemporary very rightly remarks, is "much-needed." So disastrous have my own experiences been with money-lending, and so miserable has my life been rendered by money-borrowers—these veritable pests of society—that on January 1, 1905, I made the following solemn vow: "I, Algernon Ashton, hereby declare, once and for all, solemnly and on oath, that I shall henceforth never again lend anybody, male or female, any more money, and nothing in the world will induce me to break this resolution." Since then I have already saved close upon £100 by refusing to lend people money! I have come to the conclusion that money-lending is almost, perhaps quite, as reprehensible a practice as money-borrowing, for if there were no money-lenders, there would be no money-borrowers, and one of the most hideous curses in existence would be stamped out. It is devoutly to be hoped that the newly-formed "National Anti-Lending League" will succeed in accomplishing great things, though there is no need for me to join it, in consequence of my having already made that vow which I have quoted.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ART

Cust, Lionel. Van Dyck. 8 × 5½. Pp. 152. Bell, 5s. net.
[In the "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture" series. A condensed version of Mr. Cust's larger work on the Life and Works of Van Dyck, published in 1900.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

Lady Nugent's Journal. Jamaica One Hundred Years Ago. Edited by Frank Cundall. With illustrations and maps. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 404. Published for the Institute of Jamaica by Black, 5s. net.
["Reprinted from a journal kept by Maria, Lady Nugent, from 1801 to 1815, issued for private circulation in 1839."]

FICTION

Miller, Esther. Living Lies. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 372. Methuen, 6s.
Sidgwick, Mrs. Alfred. The Kinsman. With 8 illustrations by C. E. Brock. 7½ × 5. Pp. 323. Methuen, 6s.
Graham, Winifred. World Without End. 7½ × 5. Pp. 311. Alston Rivers, 6s.
Maxwell, H. In Slippery Places. 7½ × 5. Pp. 320. Digby, Long, 6s.
Swan, Edgar. A Fair Widow. 7½ × 5. Pp. 316. Digby, Long, 6s.
Chambers, Robert W. The Fighting Chance. Illustrated by Fred Pegram. 7½ × 5. Pp. 442. Constable, 6s. (See p. 121.)
Norris, W. E. Harry and Ursula. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 309. Methuen, 6s.
["A story with two sides to it." See p. 120.]

- Marriott Watson, H. B. A Midsummer Day's Dream. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 326. Methuen, 6s.
- Bennett, Arnold. The Ghost. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5. Pp. 302. Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.
- [“A fantasia on modern themes.”]
- Underhill, Evelyn. The Lost World. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5. Pp. 316. Heinemann, 6s.
- Grant, Sadi. The Second Evil. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 320. Long, 6s.
- Praed, Mrs. Campbell. The Luck of the Leura. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 320. Long, 6s.
- Langfield, John. A Lighthearted Rebellion. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 316. Long, 6s.
- Wyndham, Horace. The Flare of the Footlights. 8 × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 328. E. Grant Richards, 6s.
- Kernahan, Mrs. Coulson. The Disappearance of the Duke. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 319. White, 6s.
- de la Pasture, Mrs. Henry. The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 386. Murray, 6s.
- Wales, Hubert. The Yoke. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 316. Long, 6s.
- Paternoster, G. Sidney. The Folly of the Wise. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Goron, F. The World of Crime. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 327. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- [“True detective stories.” M. Goron was Chief of the Paris Detective Police. See column 2.]
- Benham, W. Gurney. Cassell's Book of Quotations, Proverbs and Household Words. With full verbal index. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 6. Pp. 1256. Cassell, 10s. 6d. net.
- [“A collection of sayings from British and American authors, with many thousands of proverbs, familiar phrases and sayings, from all sources, including Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Latin, French, German, Spanish, Italian, and other languages.”]
- Meakin, Walter. The Life of an Empire. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 335. Unwin, 6s. net.
- [Deals with the social and other problems of the British Empire.]
- Hershey, Amos S. The International Law and Diplomacy of the Russo-Japanese War. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 394. The Macmillan Co., \$3.00.
- Johnson, Trench H. Phrases and Names, their Origins and their Meanings. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 384. Werner Laurie, 6s.
- Newlandsmith, Ernest. The Temple of Love. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 77. Longmans, 1s. net.
- [The author's intention “is to show how souls may enter upon the Path which leads into the Temple of Love; how Love is the one blessing needful; and how Love upon Earth and Love in the Kingdom of Heaven are to be attained.”]
- The Manufacture of Paupers. A Protest and a Policy*. With an introduction by J. St. Loe Strachey. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 140. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Papers by different authors, mainly reprinted from the Spectator.]
- Dunphie, Charles J. Many-Coloured Essays. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 247. Elliot Stock, 5s. net.
- [Papers on such subjects as “The Misery of Being Respectable,” “The Duty and Delight of being in Debt,” “The Advantages of being Disliked,” “The Pleasure of Lying in Bed,” “Kissing,” and “The Advantages of being Ugly”!]]
- Jephson, Henry. The Sanitary Evolution of London. 9 × 6. Pp. 440. Unwin, 6s. net.
- Albright, M. Catherine. The Common Heritage. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 137. Headley, 2s. 6d. net.
- [A series of undistinguished essays.]

POETRY

- Bell, Alfred Henry Haynes. Child Roland, and other poems. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 239. Elliot Stock, 6s.
- Ross, Ronald. Fables. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 51. Liverpool: University Press, 2s. 6d.
- [Fables in verse.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Calvert, Albert F. The Alhambra. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 480. Lane, 42s. net.
- [“Being a brief record of the Arabian conquest of the Peninsula, with a particular account of the Mohammedan architecture and decoration.” Second edition, with additional plates.]

The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen. With introductions by William Archer. Vols. ii, iii, vi, and vii. Each 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Heinemann, 4s. each.

[These four volumes are the first issued of Mr. Heinemann's complete edition in eleven vols. Mr. Archer supplies introductions to all the plays save Love's Comedy and Brand, and he has revised the translations of all with the exception of these, which are the work of Professor Herford. Vol. ii. contains: The Vikings and The Pretenders; vol. iii.: Brand; vol. vi.: The League of Youth and Pillars of Society; and vol. vii.: A Doll's House and Ghosts.]

Poems by George Crabbe. Edited by Adolphus William Ward. Vol. iii. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ × 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. xx, 568. Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.]

[In the “Cambridge English Classics.” Miscellaneous poems. List of variants and bibliography. See p. 118.]

THE BOOKSHELF

The Music of To-morrow and other Studies, by Laurence Gilman (Lane, 4s. 6d.).—In this volume of eight essays Mr. Laurence Gilman exercises, often very happily, his art of discoursing upon the themes of others. He has an inveterate habit of quotation; page after page is bestrewn with inverted commas. This is sometimes annoying to the reader, especially in the first paper, which gives its title to the book. It is difficult to find out what are the author's notions of music's immediate future because of the number of quotations, save that one gains some idea that they are summed up by the music of Claude Debussy. This is made clearer in the second essay, devoted to that composer's work. In “A Discussion with Vincent D'Indy” Mr. Laurence Gilman holds a brief for the theory which would make the chromatic scale rather than the diatonic the basis of modern music; here he does not consider apparently what an important means of contrast is lost by the process, that of transition from key to key. There is no contrast of tonality in music which “moderates at every beat.” In an essay on modern music Mr. Ernest Newman's criticism of Strauss is his text, and in it he develops the idea that love-music is becoming less a dominant feature of art. He says that songs are not generally now “the most representative expression of their composer's art,” but he cites Grieg as an exception. It is noticeable that he leaves Max Reger entirely out of count. Mr. Gilman next hits out vigorously at Strauss's “Salome,” and it is evident that he, like most critics who delight to think themselves “modern,” had already passed from Strauss to “fresh woods and pastures new.” The most suggestive essay is that on “A neglected page of Wagner's,” in which a comparison of the Paris version of the first act of Tannhäuser with the original is made. Here we only regret the superficial nature of the work. We would willingly have this interesting subject treated in some detail, and could have dispensed with the unimportant essays on “The Place of Liszt” and “Some Maeterlinck Music” for that purpose. The general impression left by this book is that on the whole the title has been well chosen. Mr. Laurence Gilman gives expression to some interesting ideas about music held by himself in common with enthusiastic modern thinkers, but he deals with phases of art which are peculiarly transient; here to-morrow, they may be gone the next day and leave but small influence upon the general course of musical development.

The World of Crime. By F. Goron [late Chief of the Paris Detective Police]. Edited by Albert Keyzer. (Hurst and Blackett, 3s. 6d.).—Perhaps these real detective stories are not as rounded or as complete as the manufactured ones. M. Goron says on one occasion that if only he had been a detective of fiction he could have told by glancing at a man's left boot his age, the name of his dog, and how much money he had at his banker's. As, however, he was merely the Chief of the Paris Detective Police miracles were not possible. But it will seem to most people who read these stories of crime that M. Goron's feats of ingenuity, pluck and observation were as wonderful as any ever imagined and his adventures as exciting and terrible. He seems to have shown extraordinary acumen in cases where an innocent man was placed in circumstances of grave suspicion: while he had the scent of a sleuth-hound for criminals posing as respectable members of society. When their respectability cloaks their present crimes the reader enjoys the chase, but when their past convicts and destroys them, as in the case of Charles Vernet, it is not so easy to take the great detective's point of view. We can well believe M. Goron when he assures us that the post of Chief of the Paris Detective Police is not a bed of roses.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PROBLEMS and PRIZES For Literary Readers

SEE PAGE 6 OF THE

Westminster Gazette

EVERY SATURDAY

Offices: Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Most Beautiful Edition of the Classics

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in., and ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Postage, 3d. extra.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCEY.
BYRON'S WORKS. 2 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.
EVELYN'S DIARY.
LAMB'S WORKS.
THE VISION OF DANTE.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
TENNYSON'S POEMS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS' POEMS.
DON QUIXOTE.
BACON'S WORKS.
SHELLEY'S POEMS.
PEPYS' DIARY.
KEATS' POEMS.
POE'S TALES.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.

OBTAINABLE FROM ALL BOOKSELLERS OR FROM
GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.,
Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

Some : :
Press : :
Opinions : :
Speaker.—"One of the few really valuable of the many series now in the market."
Sportsman.—"Easy to read, convenient to carry, and pleasant to look at."
Yorkshire Post.—"They deserve an antique bookcase with glass doors."
Graphic.—"Even in this age of reprints they have never been surpassed in excellence of type or binding."

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

WHAT TO READ ?

It is always a little problem, especially in these days when there are so many new books. But you can solve it by simply getting the February BOOK MONTHLY, which is now ready, 6d. net. It gives every information about the books of to-day and to-morrow, and has "snap-shot" reviews of the best and best-selling ones. For the rest, it has fresh literary articles and is beautifully illustrated. Write for a specimen copy to the publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

A LIQUID
FOOD

A light, refined, and digestible beverage, unequalled for nourishment, purity, and strength. The most enjoyable cocoa for invalids as well as for those in vigorous health.

Made under ideal conditions of labour in Cadbury's Garden Factory, amidst pure and healthful surroundings.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1814

FEBRUARY 9, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next, February 12, at three o'clock, Professor WILLIAM STIRLING, M.D., LL.D., D.Sc., first of Six Lectures on "The Visual Apparatus of Man and Animals." One Guinea the Course.

Thursday, February 14, at three o'clock, ALFRED HARKER, Esq., M.A., F.R.S., first of Two Lectures on "The Minute Structure of Igneous Rocks and their Significance." Half a Guinea.

Saturday, February 16, at three o'clock, Professor JOSEPH JOHN THOMSON, first of Six Lectures on "Röntgen, Cathode, and Positive Rays."

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 1/2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Books for Sale.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE EDINBURGH ENCYCLOPÆDIA, conducted by Sir David Brewster. 18 vols, 4to, half calf, 1830, 30s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty Guineas (or its equivalent by Instalments) and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:

FIRST. Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists.

SECOND. Permanent Relief in Old Age.

THIRD. Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons.

FOURTH. A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley Hertfordshire) for aged Members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity.

FIFTH. A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence.

SIXTH. A contribution towards Funeral expense when it is needed.

SEVENTH. All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children.

EIGHTH. The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need.

For further information apply to the Secretary Mr GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row E.C.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

ETCHINGS OF WILLIAM STRANG

A.R.A.

CONTAINING FORTY-EIGHT ILLUSTRATIONS,
MOSTLY FULL-PAGE, INCLUDING PORTRAITS OF RUDYARD KIPLING, LORD TENNYSON,
WILLIAM SHARP, ETC.

Several of the Illustrations are tastefully mounted in harmony with the tints in which they are printed.

Paper Boards, Vellum Back, 7/6 net; post free, 7/10

"This beautiful volume of reproductions."—DAILY NEWS.

"The book can be heartily recommended."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A delightful volume."—DAILY MAIL.

New and Important Publication

HOUSES AND GARDENS

By H. M. BAILLIE SCOTT

Over 200 Illustrations in Black and White and 17 in Colours

Art Linen, Medium 4to, 31/6 net; post free, 32/-

In "Houses and Gardens," Mr. Baillie Scott advances principles of house planning which should be studied by all who, dissatisfied with the modern suburban villa, wish to obtain a house or cottage which shall be a real home adapted to meet the actual needs of the daily life of its occupants, physical and psychical, instead of subscribing to the unworthy ideals of the house agent and the jerry builder as expressed in the modern villa residence.

GEO. NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, London, W.C.

THE UNIVERSAL RUSKIN.

1/- a Volume.

A Publishing Enterprise in the Spirit of the Times.

£4000 A YEAR.

JOHN RUSKIN, Critical and Social Philosopher, was born in 1819, and died in 1900. His principal books were written between 1840, when he first made Turner's acquaintance, and 1871, when he founded the Guild of St. George.

The Copyright in his chief books, under 5 and 6 Vict. ch. 45 (Copyright Act, 1842), has now expired, and the opportunity arises of publishing these works at a price bearing a fair ratio to the costs of production.

Ruskin's own method of publication, which has hitherto been protected by the Act, was prohibitive to large sales. Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON explains it in his John Ruskin ("English Men of Letters," Macmillan, p. 168): "Ruskin had long complained of the methods employed in the book-trade by publishers and booksellers, and the business rules and understanding in use; and, with characteristic self-will, he resolved to be his own publisher and bookseller. . . . For many years the whole of Ruskin's works were issued from Orpington on these terms, at the very high prices of Thirteen Shillings unbound for Ordinary Volumes, the Illustrated Volumes at Twenty-two Shillings and Sixpence. . . . We are told that for many years the profits of Mr. Ruskin's complete works amounted on an average to £4000 per annum."

Owing to the lapse of copyright, Ruskin's works are released from this tax of £4000 a year. This annual income earned by Ruskin and his assigns now reverts to the public, and is available for distribution in the form of Cheap Editions of Ruskin's Works.

Messrs. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE and SONS have accordingly the pleasure to announce the publication this day of a Uniform Edition of these works under the collective title of THE UNIVERSAL RUSKIN at the price of 1s. net a volume—bound in art-vellum, cloth, with a graceful gilt-back design, printed on superfine paper, in bold and attractive type, and containing all the Original Coloured and Plain Plates, Illustrations, and Etchings, reproduced throughout on a Super-Calendared Art Paper. The volumes are also issued in a Royal-blue Leather binding at 1s. 6d. net, and in Olive-green Lamb-skin at 2s. net.

The First Vols. of this Edition are as follows:

MODERN PAINTERS. 5 vols.,

316 Illustrations, 5s. net.

THE STONES OF VENICE.

3 vols. 173 Illustrations, 3s. net.

LECTURES ON ARCHITECTURE AND PAINTING. 28

Illustrations, 1s. net.

THE TWO PATHS. 2 Illustrations, 1s. net.

THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF ART (A Joy for Ever). 1s. net.

THE SEVEN LAMPS OF ARCHITECTURE. 14 Illustrations, 1s. net.

UNTO THIS LAST. 1s. net.

THE ELEMENTS OF DRAWING. 48 Illustrations. 1s. net.

SELECTIONS FROM HIS WRITINGS. 1s. net.

Every Book is supplied with an Index, and no pains have been spared to make the SHILLING UNIVERSAL RUSKIN worthy of the author and the occasion.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD.,
Broadway House, E.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	131	Fiction	143
Literature :		Drama :
Political Biography	133	"The Philanderer" at the
The Study of English	134	Court Theatre	144
That Irish Literature	135	M. Georges Berr at the New
Literary Haggis	136	Royalty Theatre	145
Infinite Riches	137	Fine Art :
The Library Table	138	Romance and Symbolism	146
Some Doctored Dilemma	139	Music :
Unpublished Letters from Wil-		The Queen's Hall Orchestra	147
liam and Dorothy Words-		Forthcoming Books	147
worth to Samuel Taylor		Correspondence	148
Coleridge	141	Books Received	149
A Literary Cause:		The Bookshelf	150
Beowulf, Burns & Co.	142

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s. Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It was, we think, Ruskin who once recommended that children should be turned out to graze in a library, reading whatever of the classics appealed to them without any regard to the so-called purity or impurity of the works. This does not seem to be the idea of Mrs. R. L. Devonshire, who in the February number of the National Review draws up lists of "French Books for our Daughters." She classifies them under three headings :

- (1) Books suitable for children under twelve.
- (2) Books suitable for young people and children over twelve.
- (3) Novels, which grown-up people, as well as young girls, can enjoy.

First, however, she gives a list of the classical works of French literature, many of which were the abomination of our childhood, such as "Corneille" and "Racine." A love of Molière survived even the inclusion in such a list as this. But if all children were to be forced to read Montaigne's essays, and Descartes' "Discours sur la Méthode," and the sentimentalism of Lamartine's "Méditations Poétiques" along with a number of more or less elegant extracts, we sincerely pity them. The books for children under twelve form a long list which has a supplement of a few pretty picture-books. For children over twelve we notice that the favourite authors are Mlle. Z. Fleuriot, Jules Verne, and Girardin.

But we assume that the difficulty of Mrs. Devonshire's task was greatest when she began to choose novels. It is a sad fact that the best French novels are those that pay least attention to morality, and yet we do not know that a pure-minded girl would be harmed by them. For purity is more in the eyes of the observer than in the object observed. But if Mrs. Devonshire is serious in her list it seems rather dangerous for her to mention Guy de Maupassant, Emile Zola, and Alphonse Daudet, because it is pretty certain that if any reader felt the attraction of "La Réve" or "Contes Choisis pour la Jeunesse," nothing would hinder her from pursuing her inquiries into that forbidden land where are the books not mentioned here.

A pathetic interest attaches to a little book which Messrs. MacLehose, of Glasgow, have just published. It is called "The Waverley Novels: An Appreciation," and is the work of Charles Alexander Young, whose brief and sad history is known to few. He was born on New Year's Day 1880, and perished in the earthquake of April 1905.

at Dharmasala, India. Thus his span of years amounted only to twenty-five. Writing had been a passion with him since childhood, and the little book which has now received posthumous publication will prove to all what splendid promise has been so rudely stifled.

From another point of view the book is very interesting. It is the fashion among critics of to-day to speak of Sir Walter Scott as though he were obsolete, and not long ago we quoted M. Brunetière to show that the same opinion is current in France. But, as a matter of fact, here we have a young man of the highest promise, educated, too, at such typical seats of learning as Stirling High School and Edinburgh University, whose mind was formed by Scott. The book is that of a writer who can only be described as saturated with Waverley. It would seem therefore to be tolerably near the truth that in spite of what critics may say at their desks Sir Walter Scott still remains as great a favourite with the young of to-day as he was with their elders in the early part of the nineteenth century.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY

Hullo, Master Robin, and what are you doing,
With your red breast throbbing, your bright eyes sueing,
As you preen and flutter and make display?
Why, Master, the matter is Valentine's Day.

The blackbird there with his beak of gold
Is changed to a birdling of meeker mould.
As mild as a mouse goes brisk Jack Daw.
Alas, we follow St. Valentine's law.

The grave old rook from the elm tree tall
Looks out to utter a Romeo-call.
The hedge-wren creeping through last year's stubble
Is out in the open and looks for trouble.

But all are voluble, timid, wild,
Afraid of a shadow, afraid of a child,
Defiant of dangers as big as ricks;
For that is one of St. Valentine's tricks.

He makes the braggart abashed and shy,
And shakes the wood with the ringdove's cry;
And, as for Robin and Jenny Wren,
They set the fashion for maids and men.

NORA CHESON.

In the Monthly Review there is an interesting article on "George Crabbe as a Botanist"—not, be it observed, on the botanical knowledge displayed in his verse, but on his serious work on a branch of science. He studied the flora of the fen very carefully and made many useful contributions to botanical knowledge. During his residence in Suffolk, for instance, he prepared for Loder's "History of Framlingham" and for the "Botanist's Guide" catalogues of local plants which contained many species new to the county. He had also a hobby for cultivating rare English plants. The Rev. John Vaughan has much to say on this account that is very interesting. We select the following passage as an example:

Last summer I visited Aldeburgh for the express purpose of comparing the flora of to-day with what it was when Crabbe described the borough. Most of his species still remained. Docks and worm-woods and mallow and the yellow stonecrop abounded, and if by the "dull nightshade" the poet meant the black nightshade (Solanum nigrum) that too was abundant.

Lord Goschen, whose sudden death took place on Thursday morning, was celebrated chiefly as a financier; but he always had a very lively interest in literature and was himself the author of several important works. "The Life and Times of Georg Joachim Goschen, publisher," is especially interesting just now because of the allusion that was made to it in the negotiations between the Times and the publishers in which Lord Goschen took part some few weeks ago. His other books consist for the most part of reprinted addresses. They are clever and literary in form. Lord Goschen had a great deal of wit, which he employed in the manufacture of phrases such as the celebrated "blank cheque" that epitomised a whole situation in two words. He was also keenly interested in education, a subject on which he held advanced and enlightened views. He was born in 1831; so that he had passed the three score and ten years of the psalmist before he died. In him the House of Lords has lost a most acute and eloquent debater.

Omar Khayyám, closely associated in our minds with fugs of wine and fair women and pleasure generally, is brought out in a new guise, viz., as "a man of lofty yet humble piety" in "The Testament of Omar Khayyám," which Mr. Louis C. Alexander has translated and Mr. John Long has published. Those who know him only in the version—done divinely well—of FitzGerald will make acquaintance with an entirely new individual in this book, one who instead of the quiet fatalism which we know preaches in this wise:

For Good is the end for which the Universe
Travails by Knowledge and Love with Pain entwined;
And Joy is its music, and Death, ah! no curse—
For the enlarged Soul, through it, itself doth find.

He also sings:

The Violet blooms in a modest nest
Of leaves that are low and roots that are wise;
Her fragrance and hues are blessed and best,
Like the souls of God's flow'rs in Paradise.

Later on we shall have something to say about Mr. Haldane Macfall's book on Ibsen (E. Grant Richards). The feature that will strike any one at a first glance is the extraordinary character of the illustrations by Mr. Joseph Simpson. It would be extremely interesting to hear Mr. George Bernard Shaw's comments on the study of his head which adorns the chapter on Ghosts. Whether it is an impressionist sketch or a caricature it will be for the individual reader to determine. The intention of the artist, to adopt a well-known phrase, is "lost in the mists of antiquity." The homely features of "Byornsterne Byornsen" at a first glance seem to glow beneath the head-dress of a Red Indian; but closer attention shows that there is a certain artistry of that kind which is not hidden under a bushel.

Mr. Clement Shorter, in his Literary Letter in the Sphere of February 2, seems deeply distressed that "Astarte," by Lord Lovelace, should still be obtainable. Whether this be due to the regret of the bibliophile that a rare and expensive work is not so rare and expensive as he thought it would be, or to a serious concern for Byron's reputation is not quite clear. Mr. Clement Shorter is, of course, quite entitled to his belief in Byron's integrity, but he ignores the circumstance that without the evidence published in "Astarte" and by Mrs. Beecher Stowe, there is a strong inherent probability for Lord Lovelace's contention, which explains an otherwise meaningless passage in the Manfred, and indeed a good deal of the Byronic pose.

It is difficult to believe (allowing the story to be untrue), that Byron would have been very shocked at the suggestion. Shelley, a much greater puritan than his friend, did not regard what may be called "Theban domesticity," with any particular horror. Laon and Cythna, in the first draft of the "Revolt of Islam," we were reminded the other day by Mr. Andrew Lang, were brother and sister, and this may possibly contain the clue to the whole mystery. "Surely you were something better than innocent," is the irresistible quotation.

Oxford, following the example of Sherborne and Warwick, is to have her Pageant this summer. The time chosen is Commemoration-week, that June festival which annually drives the shy don to seek his peace elsewhere. Among the promoters and organisers of the Pageant "all the (Oxford) talents" are to be found, both those who linger, like Mr. Godley, in her courts, and those who, like Mr. Anthony Hope, once sojourned there. The Pageant is to represent some of the most stirring scenes in the life of the University and City, from the legend of St. Frideswide to the reception of the Allied Sovereigns at the Commemoration of 1814. St. Frideswide's story will be followed by the burning of her church, which was set on fire to destroy the unfortunate Danes who had incurred the displeasure of Ethelred the Unready.

Other episodes presented will be the incident of Fair Rosamund, the famous riots of St. Scholastica's Day, when the "gown" came off so badly, the reception of various Sovereigns, Amy Robsart's funeral, the surrender of the City to the Parliamentarians, and the expulsion of the Fellows of Magdalen by James II. As King Charles I. and his Queen are to arrive by water, it is to be presumed that the Pageant will be played in some meadow bordering the Isis. Alfred the Great, it is to be feared, will not put in an appearance. It is, indeed, chastening to be reminded that our oldest University originated from the arrival of a band of foreign scholars.

Sir Charles Holroyd announces that he has in preparation a new edition of the catalogue of the Foreign Schools at the National Gallery, the numerous errors in which have evoked sharp criticism in our own columns and elsewhere. It is to be hoped that in the new catalogue there will be not only a correction of the many false attributions and false descriptions which at present figure in its pages, but also some modification of the plan of the handbook. A sensible article on this subject is published in the current issue of the Burlington Magazine, and we note that among the improvements suggested is the condensation of biographical notices recommended in these columns some weeks ago. It is further pointed out that the present diffuse histories and descriptions of individual pictures might with advantage be curtailed, while it is urged that the works of each master should be arranged in chronological order, accompanied by a brief bibliography of the chief authorities, and a note of the various attributions in the case of disputed pictures. These points will doubtless have the earnest consideration of the authorities who are anxious to retrieve their errors and in token thereof request that all who notice mistakes and omissions in the present catalogue will communicate with the Secretary of the National Gallery.

A new series of exhibitions will be inaugurated this month in the Whitechapel Art Gallery, two hundred and fifty collectors having promised to lend one or more of their pictures each year for the months of February and March. The East End is thus provided with an admirable substitute for a permanent art collection, and the first exhibition of this series promises to be of exceptional interest. There will be small collections of works by the old masters and living British painters, but the chief feature will be a representative collection of French Art of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Chardin especially is to be strongly represented, and among those lending works will be the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Sutherland, the Earl of Wemyss, Sir Charles Dilke, Sir Edward Tennant and Sir Edgar Vincent.

Like Professor Gollancz, we would like to make the use in schools (except in the higher forms) of any editions of authors, classical or modern, which are either incomplete in the text or have prefaces or notes, a criminal offence. The notes the master is there to supply; the preface the pupil does not want. Choose a work which can be put whole and undefiled by little printed comments into the boy's hands and let the young mind gather what he can from the great one there revealed. He may not gather much, but what he does gather he will digest. At the worst a boy should gain insensibly from Shakespeare directness and the power of clear-cut expression of thought, Does it matter if he be hazy as to who John o' Gaunt was? In spite of Mr. Archer, we shall always consider the acting of a Shakespearean play one of the finest educative agencies which the schoolmaster has at hand.

In the educational world we have heard a great deal lately of the assistant master—his abilities and his desire that they should be recognised by an increased salary. In all this it is impossible not to agree with him. His education has often been a costly one, and when he is proved to have the power of managing boys, he is doing as good work as any man in the world. But when he begins to talk of fixity of tenure he, if an educated, thoughtful and ambitious man, should be ashamed of himself. For what does the phrase imply? A headmaster is chosen who is responsible for the good teaching and general welfare of his school. To attain this end he is given tools—in the shape of assistant masters—and if he finds that one is not efficient from whatever cause, the quicker that particular tool is discarded and a satisfactory one procured the better for the well-being of the school, to ensure which is, or ought to be, more important than to make smooth a path for incompetency.

Is the assistant master not looking forward to becoming a headmaster one day? If not he is hardly qualified to speak for his profession. He is on his own confession one of those who follow, and cannot lead. If, on the other hand, he intends to lead, he cannot be honest in advocating that his most valuable power of promoting efficiency—namely, the ability to discard the inefficient—shall not be his. And the word "efficient" is a pregnant one. This master can teach but cannot, through perhaps no fault of his own, command the respect of the class of boy at a particular school. That one is admirable in his dealings with the boys, but he or his wife's presence is not acceptable to the families of the rest of the staff. In a public school this would be a grave objection. And unless a headmaster can count on the loyalty of his subordinates, nothing will be likely to go right, and nothing can be devised with a greater tendency towards sapping loyalty than this same idea of fixity of tenure among subordinates. Would any business in the City exist for a week where such a system held good?

An interesting development, and one that may prove of great importance, in public library co-operation, has been introduced at the Gravesend Public Library, in the shape of an exhibition of book-production. When it is open to the public the exhibition will show the materials and processes that go to the making of a book, from the Esparto grass in its first state, together with wood pulp, to the finest art-bookbinding of the day; including printing, processes of illustration, and the preparation of leather. At present, however, the most notable feature of the exhibition is the co-operation of a number of public libraries in the scheme. The exhibition will be open at the Gravesend Public Library for a month; after that it will be on view at the Public Libraries of Eltham, Plumstead, Woolwich Central, and Folkestone.

The Inaugural Lecture to the Courses on Japanese Education to be delivered under the Martin White Benefaction in the University of London, by Baron Dairoku Kikuchi, during the Spring and Summer Terms, will be given at the University, South Kensington, on Thursday, February 14, at 5 P.M.

LITERATURE

POLITICAL BIOGRAPHY

Lord Melbourne. By H. DUNCKLEY. (Dent, 2s. 6d. net.)

Lord Derby. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY. (Dent, 2s. 6d. net.)

Lord Randolph Churchill. By LORD ROSEBERY. (Humphreys, 3s. 6d.)

"POLITICS," said Lord Salisbury, "are a cursed profession," and a curse they may prove if they turn to tragedy. Disappointed ambition may easily wreck a career, if the victim takes his ambition too seriously. But in the reading of political biography it is not the curse of politics but their cynicism which strikes us most forcibly. Those who have pursued them with the greatest ardour have taken the lightest view of their purpose and effect, and have generally subordinated the welfare of the country to their own advancement or convenience.

The fact that politics are regarded as a merely liberal profession is in itself a condemnation. A man should aspire to statesmanship in humility and upon his knees. To serve one's country is the loftiest of aspirations, and he who dedicates his life to the state should do it, one might think, with fear and trembling. And of the liberal professions there is none in which the means and end are so widely divorced as in politics. The ostensible end of politics is the proper governance of the country. The means, which have been exaggerated until they appear far greater than the end, are the management of the House of Commons. To snatch a furtive advantage, to catch your opponent bathing and steal his clothes—these are the enterprises not beneath the dignity of the politician. In the controlling of six hundred legislators all excuses are permitted. A leader may without shame suppress the convictions of a lifetime. He may advocate with passionate eloquence a scheme which a brief year ago he condemned with an equal eloquence, an equal passion, and nobody thinks the worse of him for his defection. Indeed, the leader, having betrayed his trust, may even look upon his vice as a virtue. He thinks it enough to murmur "the people's will," and prides himself upon an act of self-sacrifice.

It is a lesson of cynicism, then, that political biography always enforces. Take the three statesmen whose "Lives" suggest the present article: Melbourne, Derby, and Randolph Churchill. They were all honest and honourable men. They all followed politics as a craft or profession. They all might boast a higher endowment of courage and talent than their fellows. They attained to the lofty places which were the end of their ambition. In their lifetime they wore the bays, and even now they are not wholly forgotten. Yet not one of them followed his profession with the single-mindedness which we should expect, for instance, from a general or a poet; not one of them is wholly free from the reproach of intrigue or indifference.

Lord Melbourne, the first on the list, was accomplished both as a scholar and as a man of the world. He had few rivals in the knowledge either of books or of human nature. He had taken up politics because they were then thought an occupation fit for a gentleman, and he became a Whig because his earliest associations connected him with that party. But he was an aristocrat by temperament, a Conservative by conviction. Had he understood the logic of his position doubtless he would have thrown in his lot with the Tories; and when reform came upon him, he was not energetic enough to repel its advance. There was, then, nothing left for him but to make the sacrifice, and to advocate a cause to which he was heartily opposed. Greville, who knew him intimately, sketched the misery of his career with a sure hand:

No position [he said] could be more false than the position in which Melbourne was often placed, and no man ever was more perplexed and tormented than he was by it, for he was remarkably sensitive, and most of the latter years of his administration were passed in a state of dissatisfaction with himself and with all about him. He hated the Reform Bill, which he was obliged to advocate. He saw, indeed, that Reform had become irresistible, and therefore he reconciled it to his conscience to support the Bill.

He reconciled it to his political conscience, no doubt. The conscience of the scholar and gentleman, that he was, must have remained unassuaged, and the one possibility left him of salvation was to preserve an attitude of cynical indifference in the midst of political intrigue.

The temperament of Lord Derby was not wholly unlike Lord Melbourne's. He, too, reconciled himself to the difficulty of politics by declining to take them too seriously. However gravely he considered the translation of Homer, he faced the government of his country with a certain flippancy. He believed, or at least affected to believe, that it was a thing of secondary consideration. "I have had Litchfield with me all the week alone," he once wrote to Lord Malmesbury, "and we have been so busy shooting that I have had no time to give to politics." Even if we allow for the pose, this phrase is succinctly characteristic of English statesmanship. Palmerston confessed that he found horse-racing less exciting than politics. Lord Derby pretended that he willingly surrendered the service of his country to the pleasures of shooting. In either case cynicism may have been a cloak of devotion, but the cynicism was there, and it helps to explain the merely accidental success of English statesmanship.

Neither Melbourne nor Derby, in fact, was of the stuff whereof martyrs are made. Neither would sacrifice the comfort of his daily life to the demands of politics. Both were determined to make the best of both worlds, and they succeeded well enough. If they helped to rule England from hand to mouth, that was all that could be expected of them. They were neither political philosophers, like Bolingbroke, nor the eager slaves of duty like Pitt. They have bequeathed no theories of government, no memories of sacrifice or devotion. They were two gentlemanly cynics, who were driven into statecraft by the convention of their birth and time, and they served their country with all the strength which a sublime indifference could give them.

The cynicism of Lord Randolph was stronger and more dangerous than theirs. He was confronted by a far more formidable adversary—the party machine. Between Lord Derby's retirement and Lord Randolph's accession to the rank of Cabinet Minister English politics had undergone an ominous change. Between a Minister and his office there stood not merely an awakening democracy but a cunning organisation, framed upon the American plan, and the real purpose of politics—the government of the country—was yet more obscurely concealed. The better part of Lord Randolph's career was spent in approaching the inner temple of statecraft. His greatest achievement was to capture the machine. His greatest failure was to lose it again. Lord Rosebery, in his "Lord Randolph Churchill," by far the most lucid contribution to the political literature of the past few years, recognises the difficulty, even the futility, of Lord Randolph's task. Like the realist that he is, Lord Rosebery does not hide from his readers the essential cynicism of politics. He leaves England sternly out of the calculation. "Had Lord Randolph chosen to fight for his hand," he says, "and raise the standard of revolt, it would not have been so easy to suppress him. But he behaved with perfect loyalty and decorum." Loyalty to what? To England? Not a bit of it. Loyalty to the party tie. Again—it is Lord Rosebery who speaks—"we have little more than the Dartford Deliverance to show what he might have done had he remained a Minister, and lived." Yet Lord Randolph yields to few of his contemporaries in the tame which curiosity brings. Books are written concerning his achievements. His sayings are remembered. Anecdote is eloquent to his glory. And he did little or nothing. He trod only the first tottering steps of statesmanship. Surely we might despair of England but for one truth:

it is our habit infinitely to overrate the importance of politics. The citizens of England like to watch the drama of the House of Commons, and they are willing to pay for it. What happens to the chief actors is interesting and not fatal. The government does but spin a Penelope's web, which will presently be undone by an anxious hand. And the conclusion of the whole matter is that Lord Salisbury's epithet of "cursed" is too strong for a profession, which more than any other resembles a serious comedy played upon an ephemeral stage.

THE STUDY OF ENGLISH

Historical Study of the Mother Tongue: an Introduction to Philological Method. By H. C. WYLD. (Murray, 7s. 6d.)

It seems certain that in the near future our mother tongue will be studied in our secondary schools and in our universities with the same seriousness that has hitherto been given to the acquirement of the classical languages. The English language will have its proper place in the education curriculum and will meet Greek and Latin on equal terms. It will be studied as a subject worthy of scientific treatment in our schools, and will be thought worthy of due recognition in our universities in the allotment of a fair share of entrance scholarships by the colleges and of a fair share of marks of distinction by the universities. The time is near at hand when it will be considered a praiseworthy thing to possess a thorough scientific knowledge of our mother tongue, and when such a knowledge will be encouraged by every possible means.

Should there be any one at this time of day who doubts whether the English language is good enough from an educative point of view to take its place as an alternative for one of the classical languages he could not do better than study carefully the excellent text-book which forms the subject of this review. It will be seen from this book that the study of English, with the modern strict scientific methods, will form an excellent training-ground for the development of the intellectual faculties. To many teachers of the classics it will be a matter of great regret that an introduction as clear, accurate, scientific, and complete as this has not yet been written for the young student of the classical languages. Nearly all philological text-books published in this country are mere cram-books, failing to give any general statement of principles, stating the bare facts dogmatically and categorically, without any suggestion to the student as to the methods of arriving at the results stated. The consequence is that after the student has read the books, he has acquired merely the knowledge of a certain number of isolated facts, out of relation to any general principle.

The subject of Mr. Wyld's book is clearly defined on the title-page: "An Historical Study of the Mother Tongue," together with "An Introduction to Philological Method." We have had many "Historical Studies," but hitherto the English student has never been fortunate enough to find in his own language a sound scientific elementary treatise on "Philological Method." For this Mr. Wyld deserves the hearty thanks of every one who desires that English should be brought within the circle of liberal educative studies. As regards the history of the language, we find in this book an interesting sketch of its development from the Parent Aryan to the present time. The book is mainly a discussion of the history of English sounds, and therefore the author begins by giving us a very useful analysis of the sounds of speech and their mode of production. This account would be more easily apprehended by the student if it had been accompanied by a set of diagrams giving the relative positions of the organs which play a part in the production of sounds. The best diagrams I have met with are to be found in Edmonds's "Introduction to Comparative Philology."

(1906). There is one other omission which may be mentioned. The student must often be at a loss to know what is the precise phonetic value of the symbol used in the phonetic exposition. For instance, when he meets with the symbols j and the long s, or the symbols a and ai, he cannot find easily where these symbols are explained. It would be a great boon if there were given after the Table of Contents a Table presenting a synopsis of the phonetic symbols used in the book with their precise value, indicated by examples taken from modern English, or from some other modern language—French or German for example—with which the student would be likely to be acquainted. It is true that these symbols are explained in various parts of the book, but it would be convenient if they could be seen in one view.

What gives an especial value to the book is the clear and accurate statement of philological method, by which Comparative Philology has become one of the exact sciences, instead of being, as formerly, a game of ingenious guess-work. As Mr. Wyld says, most of the text-books teem with references to the Aryan language, and yet he has never found a student who had gathered from their pages the slightest idea how any one had come to know what Aryan was like. The work of Reconstruction is told with admirable clearness in chapter viii. of this book. A great deal of the story is told by means of the history of the little word "tooth." With the help of its Germanic relations the primitive Germanic base is securely established, and then, with the help of its cognates in various families of Aryan speech, one arrives at the primitive Aryan form. In arriving at this result we are made acquainted, step by step, with nine important laws which have held sway for certain periods in certain areas during the long history of the Aryan languages.

Then again, of course, we all know that it is now an accepted fact that the Sanscrit vowel system is not primitive, and that the Greek vowel system is much nearer that of the primitive Aryans. How can this be shown to be true? The existence of an original e, where the Sanscrit now has a, is shown conclusively (on p. 159) by the study of the little enclitic ca (Lat. que, Gr. τε), the palatalisation in Sanscrit (which for a long time was unaccounted for) having been due to the presence of a front vowel e, afterwards levelled under a.

We have space only to add that the book is furnished with bibliographies, containing copious lists of the most important books which have appeared on English philology, arranged according to periods, and useful indices, contributed by an expert English philologist. May the book receive the recognition it deserves.

A. L. MAYHEW.

THAT IRISH LITERATURE

Bards of the Gael and Gall. Examples of the Poetic Literature of Erin. Done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael. By GEORGE SIGERSON. (Unwin, 6s. net.)

If thou, as I, but knew the tale
It sings to all the Ancient Isle,
Thy tears would rise, and thou wouldst fail
To mind thy God, a while, quotes Dr. Sigerson on one of many prefatory pages which lead the reader slowly from the title-page to the matter of this new and enlarged edition of his "Bards of the Gael and Gall." We sincerely hope that no one, learning, as Dr. Sigerson, the tale "it [the book, we suppose] sings to all the Ancient Isle," will do anything of the sort. If they do they will live to regret it; for, needless to say, they will find no compensation here. We know the tale the pieces translated sing to some inhabitants of the Ancient Isle, and we know that, being unintelligible to the vast majority, they sing to them no tale at all; but our tears do not rise, nor have we, critics though we be, any intention of proving the truth of Oisín's assertion. In Spenser's "View of the State of Ireland," from which there is also a quotation on one of Dr. Sigerson's many prefatory pages, Eudoxus, anxious to know something of Irish poetry, inquired of Irenaeus: "Have they any art in their compositions? or bee they anything wittie or well savoured, as poemes should be?" Irenaeus answered and said:

Yea truly, I have caused divers of them to be translated unto me, that I might understand them, and surely they savoured of sweet wit and good invention, . . . sprinkled with some pretty flowers of their naturall device, which gave good grace and comelinesse unto them.

Now with all due deference to Irenaeus, who knew nothing of the poems that he judged, sweet wit is precisely what they lack; pretty flowers there are, but little good invention. We fail to find a sparkling phrase of wit or humour or deep pathos in any piece translated by Dr. Sigerson and included in this volume, though there are several good poems—poems worthy of a place beside the best of English minor poetry.

It is a strange collection that Dr. Sigerson has put before the English reader; it would have gained by a careful but rigorous application of the blue pencil. It is an anthology of Irish song, translated "after the metres and modes" of the original, intended to give some idea of the history of the poetry of Erin, from the Lays of the Milesian invaders to the songs of the eighteenth century. Taken as a whole, we may say that the pieces have been well translated, for Dr. Sigerson has caught the spirit of the originals as few save Mangan have done, though, owing to the necessity of reproducing their form, he gives us less of the actual matter than Mangan often did. In addition, he is a lover of poetry and a discerning critic—when Irish literature is not before him. Then his enthusiasm vitiates his judgments. Had he omitted two-thirds of the pieces in the present volume, he would have strengthened his case considerably. By winnowing the chaff from the grain he might have convinced the average reader that ancient Ireland had a literature equal to, if not greater, than, that of the Greeks.

Passing over the first two pieces—which are neither remarkable for poetic feeling nor deeply interesting—we may take as an example of the stuff that should find its way into no anthology (not even into an anthology of Irish poetry) what Dr. Sigerson calls "The First Elegy." Lugai's wife—who seems to have been an extraordinarily modest lady and a near relation of Mrs. Grundy—is supposed to have seen her husband bathing (in puris naturalibus, of course), and, thinking him a stranger, to have succumbed to the shock. Lugai composed her death-song—it was the least he could do—and this is (Dr. Sigerson suggests) what he wrote:

Sate we [sic] sole, in cliff-bower—
Chill winds shower—
I tremble yet—shock of dread
Sped death's power.
The tale I tell: fate has felled
Fáil most fine.

She a man, bare, beheld,
In sun shine,
Shock of death, death's dread power,
Lowered fell fate,
Bare I came, hence her shame,
Stilled she sate.

Adherence to the form of the original has handicapped the translator severely, but the poem is "distressful," to say the least; and there are many equally poor and equally bewildering.

Dr. Sigerson's enthusiasm, as we have said, stamps its destructive foot on that fine flower we call discrimination. He seems to imagine that because a thing is old it is therefore beautiful. Thus, in his preface to the present edition of his book, he says:

Ireland is the sole representative in literature of that great world, which lived and thrived outside the classic camp, whose thoughts have perished with their lives. So far as the native expression and development of the intellect in these subject nations are concerned, Roman rule meant a massacre of mind. Fortunately one country stood unsubdued, though threatened. Agricola, standing on a hill in Britain looking toward the west, planned an expedition against the one surviving Free Nation, with the avowed purpose of extinguishing the last light of Liberty, whose existence troubled the Empire. It made the subject nations restless and dream dreams in their servile sleep. Had his project been successful, the last light of Literature outside the classic world would also have been destroyed, and the once Free Nations left in dumb darkness. For all who are not confined by the golden chains of classic tradition, who can admire alike the stately Parthenon and the picturesque forest, whose intelligence can welcome the novel work of other minds, the Literature of Ancient Erin has thus a deep and enduring charm.

That concluding sentence will suffice to show our meaning. Not "deep and enduring charm," but "interest" is the permissible term. All the earlier poetry given here has an interest for the antiquary and to some extent for the sociologist, as reflecting the thoughts of a nation's youth, but only a very limited number have charm, and these are, for the most part, the later pieces. We cherish the work of Shakespeare not because he wrote at a time when the children of the lower classes were not taught French and botany in school, but because he is the greatest poet that England, if not the world, has ever produced. We cherish it because it has wit and pathos and fine thought—because it deals with life and mirrors life seen through the mind's eye of one of the world's greatest philosophers—not because it has "pretty flowers." The poetry of ancient Ireland will never rank as immortal literature, because, with few exceptions, it bears little relation to life. True, the poets sing of love and war and death, but their work lacks spontaneity: it is a little too like those "sermons on special occasions" which are issued from time to time in ornate bindings. The one redeeming feature of Irish poetry is the intense love of Nature which is found in almost all the bards. But it, alone, is not sufficient to lift their work to the heights of great poetry. Had Wordsworth sung merely of Nature he would never have spoiled "The Golden Treasury," and he would never have minted immortal lines.

Dr. Sigerson, on page 3 of the book before us, makes a strange claim:

In the themes chosen [he says] they [the poets] appeal to the responsive heart of man. There have been love-songs and war-odes in other ancient languages, but the Gael [sic] were the first to recognise the picturesque in scenery and give us nature songs, to tell of sorrow, to depict the exile's pang, and to sing [of] the calm and tumult of ocean.

Enthusiasm, again, has stamped its destructive foot and crushed the flower of learning.

With only one more point have we space to deal. Dr. Sigerson has an irritating habit of trying to find, if not, like the literary busybody of the twentieth century, "proofs positive" of plagiarism, at least "anticipations" of modern poets, and "suggestions" and so on. Thus, after translating the "First Lay of Fionn MacCumal" on the Dawn of Summer:

Soft Summer's first day!
How radiant the sky!
Merles lilt their full lay,—
Would Laiga were nigh!
Clear call the cuckoos . . .

he thinks it would be interesting to compare two poems on the same subject "composed . . . at a distance in time of possibly a thousand years," and he therefore quotes "Sumer is icumen in"—not, he observes, "inquiring whether or not [it was] suggested by the more ancient Irish poem." His version of the English poem is so curious that we are tempted to reproduce it:

Sumer is i-cumen in Llude sing cuccu:
Groweth sed and bloweth med
And springth the wde [sic] nu,
Sing cuccu, cuccu.

Awe bleteth after lomb
Llouth after calve cu;
Bullock sterteth, bucke verteth,
Murie sing cuccu,
Wel singes thu cuccu,
Ne swik thou nauer nu
Sing cuccu, cuccu.

He thinks that "there is conclusive proof that Tennyson read what had been translated of Irish verse, and derived a few suggestions from it." The conclusive proof is this: in a eulogy of John McDonnell there occur these two lines:

A druid, in whose mind her honey-dew
As in a comb did science richly store;

and Tennyson—gross plagiarist that he was!—wrote:

Was he not
A full-celled honey-comb of eloquence
Stored of all flowers.

Again, of "Eivlin a Rúin":

Fain would I ride with thee,
Eivlin a rúin;
Fain would I ride with thee,
Eivlin a rúin!

Dr. Sigerson says: "The story of this song anticipates and possibly suggested that of the 'Young Lochinvar'; and of 'The Failing Art': 'In this poem Doncad Mor anticipates, by four centuries, the plot of Balzac's novel, 'Le Chef d'Œuvre,' which Mr. Kipling recalls in 'The Light that Failed'—as one who should say: 'Adam and Eve, in the Garden of Eden, anticipated by countless centuries the discovery made in the conservatory a short time since by Mr. Smith and Miss Brown.' Is it necessary to explain to Dr. Sigerson that the poets of ancient Ireland expressed and dealt with thoughts and incidents common to all men in all ages and in all climes, and that they were "anticipated" by the poets and the literature that lie buried beneath the earth and may never be discovered or deciphered by man?

If a third edition of this book be called for, Dr. Sigerson would do well to employ some one to read his proofs.

LITERARY HAGGIS

Phrases and Names, their Origins and Meanings. By TRENCH H. JOHNSON. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THIS is a very curious book that teems with every possible kind of error. Had it been much elaborated and compiled by a man of learning it might have been useful; the hotch-potch before us is almost too bad to serve even as a groundwork for a book of reference. The author does not seem to have read his proofs with any care. Thus on page 8 there is a reference to Aldo Manuzio, "the celebrated printer of Venice in the sixteenth century," and on page 164 this same Aldo Manuzio is called "the celebrated printer of Venice in 1207." Born in 1449, he died in 1515. After this it is not astonishing to learn that Henry Fielding was called "The Addison of the North," and that he wrote "The Man of Feeling"; or that Sir Walter Scott described William Wordsworth as the "Minstrel of the Border"! Another delightful piece of information is that "Blue-stocking" came from the "famous club of literary ladies formed by Mrs. Montague [sic] in 1840"! Absinthe comes from "the Greek apsmithion"; agnostic from "the Greek, a, without, and gnomi, to know"; encyclopædia from "the Greek enkyllos . . . and paideia"; the Greek word "monas" means alone; heliotrope is from "the Greek helios, sun, and tropos, to turn"; idolater comes from "the Greek eidolon, a figure, and latres, worshipper"; sarcophagus is "a Greek compound of sarkos, flesh, and phargo, to eat"; amazon is "Greek, from a, without, and maza, breast"! Our author, it is evident, is well up in his "lanwiches."

His Latin is as good as his Greek. Caitiff is "an old term of contempt for a despicable person, derived from the Latin captivus"; "Carollus" is the Latinised name of Charles; Amiens comes from "the Latin ambiens, surrounded by water"; encore is derived from "hauc horam"; friar is "agreeably to the Latin fratre"; "Girasole" is the Italian name of the sunflower, "from the Latin gyara [!], to turn, and sol, the sun"; and so on. "Waschen" is a German word meaning "to grow."

A dame's school, our author may be surprised to learn, was not necessarily a girls' school. "Journal des Débatés" is not the name of a French paper. Flask Walk is not so called because of "the old hostelry 'The Flash.'" Cursitor does not mean chorister; nor were the Lollards "temp. Elizabeth." Who was "Edward Burke"? It is news to some of us that the "Safety Cab" was patented in 1883 by Joseph Aloysius Hansom. We remember to have ridden in hansom cabs before that date and, as a matter of fact, Hansom died in 1882. Why the author should speak of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts-Bartlett is a mystery. We did not know that Pindar was a Roman poet, nor that the Liguorians were an Order founded by "St. Francis Liguori." Who was "St. Philip Nero"? And is "The Spaniards" at Highgate Heath? The Great Lexicographer would have been angry with another dictionary maker who changed the fourth letter of his title into "o." Martinmas, or the Feast of St. Martin, we are informed, is the fourth of November. We did not know this.

It is scarcely possible to turn over a page without coming across such stupid misprints as "Ayrrian," "Kahn," "Jacopa," "Amorica," "Hockheim," "othordox," and so on. "Phyrric" we might have considered a misprint were it not that it is placed alphabetically under "Ph." Adeste fideles becomes "adesta fidelis." Sophia becomes "Sopia." Under the heading, "Writes like an Angel," our author says: "Dr. Johnson said of Oliver Goldsmith, 'He writes like an angel and talks like a fool,'" which Mrs. Malaprop could scarcely better. Xantippe is spelt with a "Z." "Waterloo Park" for Waterlow Park, and "Sir Sidney Waterloo" for Waterlow are minor errors after some of those we have instanced.

It would be a long and arduous task to go through this book and point out its innumerable blunders. As Mr. Johnson says: "If [the book] be found to contain a plethora of good things, the reader will, of course, take them out in small doses," and we will stay our pen. The author can only be recommended to recall the edition with all possible speed. Should he revise and reissue it a welcome will be ensured provided that in the first place the mistakes be corrected and that in the second a great many stupid and trivial phrases and expressions be removed and many lacunæ filled up. A mere compilation of extraordinary omissions would fill several columns of the ACADEMY. The most surprising statement that the book contains occurs in the preface. It is that "the compilation of this volume has been a pleasant recreation in the intervals of more exacting literary labours." It reminds one of a golf caddie, who when a player, having "foozled" every ball, exclaimed: "I never played so badly in my life!" looked up in his face and said: "Ye hae played before then." That Mr. Trench H. Johnson should have performed "exacting literary labours" on a previous occasion is indeed a surprising statement.

INFINITE RICHES

Apollo. An Illustrated Manual of the History of Art throughout the Ages. By S. REINACH. Translated by FLORENCE SIMMONDS. (Heinemann, 6s. net.)

It is fairly certain that M. Reinach is the only writer who would attempt to compress the history of art from the eleventh millenium B.C. to the present day into twenty-five chapters occupying only three hundred and fifty profusely illustrated pages. It seems equally certain that he alone could hope for even a small degree of success in such a task. But he possesses a natural genius for compression, and this second English edition of his work, which we welcome under its original and more expressive title, is a masterpiece of judicious condensation.

The twenty-five lectures which make up the book have been delivered orally at the École du Louvre, and—with the exception of the final chapter, Art in the Nineteenth Century, which has naturally demanded revision—now appear precisely in the form in which they were delivered in 1902-1903. The primary object of such lectures is, of course, to stimulate and direct further study. M. Reinach's method of achieving this object is to present a rapid sketch of an age, period or school, and to append a brief bibliography at the end of each chapter, consisting of the most modern and accessible authorities upon the subject. The chapter is no more than a bait, the bibliography is the hook to catch the student. A great deal depends upon the nature of the bait, and M. Reinach's is a seductive one. The first chapter, upon the Origin of Art, induces an immediate and living interest in a period so remote that, to many, it has never before had a real existence at all. The art of the cave-dwellers of the glacial period is no longer a museum curiosity. And, in comparing the drawings of reindeer upon a bone from the cave of Lorthet (H. Pyrénées) with an instantaneous photograph of a horse, it is with a feeling of lowered pride that one learns how little modern science has done for human powers of observation. The eye of the cave-dweller was as keen to note the attitude of a galloping animal as is the camera-lens to-day.

There is a continuity in the lectures which is encouraging to the uninformed student. The neolithic and bronze ages, Egypt, Chaldea, and Persia, succeed one another with an appearance of the inevitable which seems to invite the comprehension of the simple, while it offers no challenge to the critic. It may be startling to find the Hittite puzzle dismissed in a single short paragraph; and without notice in the bibliography; but is a relief to see the Phoenicians sternly set in their proper place as hucksters rather than artists or thalassocrats. In the seven pages which he devotes to the "Aegean" art, M. Reinach is skilful in avoiding most points of controversy. His chapter includes the excavations of Mr. Evans at Gnosso and of the Italian School at Phaestos, and he offers a chronology for the Aegean civilisation extending from B.C. 3000 to B.C. 1100. It is matter for doubt, however, whether this or a later civilisation is reflected in the poems of Homer, and whether the processes which brought about the Dark Ages of Greece were precisely those indicated here. We note that Professor Ridgeway's "Early Age of Greece" does not appear in the bibliography of M. Reinach's selection. M. Reinach's suggestion that the Mycenæans were the art descendants of the Reindeer artists opens an alluring vista for research in a new field.

The chapters on Greek Art of the classical periods, while they contain nothing particularly new, are eminently readable and comprehensive. The feature which most arrests attention is a greater appreciation of the sculpture of the Pergamene period than is generally shown to-day. M. Reinach boldly states without argument that the Etruscans were Lydian colonists. His arguments connecting the Roman vault with its Assyrian predecessor are interesting if not conclusive. The chapter on Christian Art in East and West forms a connecting link between the art of an old and a new system, though we think that he is a little harsh in his condemnation of the Byzantine influence as "baleful, bringing the seeds of decay and death with it."

The lover of Gothic sculpture owes M. Reinach a debt of gratitude for his vindication of its freedom and beauty. "Renaissance and Modern Architecture" brings the history of architecture down to our own times, when Ruskin, Morris, Burne-Jones and Crane are credited with originating the movement which has produced the "secessionist" school of Vienna. "To define this new Anglo-Austro-Belgian style would be almost impossible, for it has no credo, and seeks its way in very diverse directions."

A history of European painting occupies the remaining two hundred pages of the book. With extraordinary ease and directness, M. Reinach reviews the renaissance at Siena and Florence, Venetian painting, Lionardo, Raphael, Michael Angelo and Correggio, French, Flemish, German and Spanish painting. In his sketch of the Renaissance in Germany, he cannot altogether conceal his contempt for the earlier efforts of German painting, and waxes merry over the absurdities of Lucas Cranach. Of the former he says: "It is the art of devout peasants, at once coarse and sentimental, which attracts at first by its artlessness and vigour, and finally wearies by its vulgarity, now clamorous, now insignificant."

Sixteenth-century Netherlands art and seventeenth-century art in France have each a chapter. In the last two chapters only—art in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—does English painting find a place, and there only, for the most part, in the brackets which, as the publisher's preface indicates, betoken additions for the English public, made with the author's sanction.

The volume is handy in size, and slips easily into the pocket. The profuse illustrations—there are six hundred—consist, for the most part, of excellent little photographic reproductions. But a few—oddly enough, mostly of works of art in the Louvre—are less satisfactory, and perhaps the worst of all is a wretchedly toneless little block of Millet's Glaneuses, while the Victory of Samothrace fares but little better. The type is clear and good, with very few misprints, and the paper is admirable as a vehicle for both the style of type and the extraordinary number of illustrations. "Apollo" is a book which reflects great credit on its author and its publisher.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Adrift in New Zealand. By E. WAY ELKINGTON. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net.)

MR. WAY ELKINGTON is a vagabond—incorrigible and perfect—whose account of his aimless driftings will appeal to every kindred spirit: to the potential tramp chained by circumstance to the desk's dead wood no less than to the wanderer on the face of the earth who makes his bed in the shade of the living tree. For Mr. Elkington is as one of Jan Trespise's Geese: never happy unless he be—where he baint. Domesticity does not appeal to him: he is a lover of the "spaces washed by the sun," of the sun itself and the moon and the stars and the wind on the heath, because to him they are Life, and Life is ever calling to him to be up and away. Pessimism has no place in his philosophy: life is sweet, he says, and only the man with an empty pocket tastes its deepest joys. Does any one suggest a doubt, he is another Mr. Petulengro:

"Life is sweet, brother. . . . There's night and day, brother, both sweet things; sun, moon and stars, brother, all sweet things; there's likewise the wind on the heath. Life is very sweet, brother. Who would wish to die?"

"I would wish to die——"

"You talk like a Gorgio—which is the same as talking like a fool—were you a Romany chal you would talk wiser. Wish to die, indeed? A Romany chal would wish to live for ever."

"In sickness, Jasper?"

"There's the sun and stars, brother."

"In blindness, Jasper?"

"There's the wind on the heath, brother; if I could only feel that I would gladly live for ever. Dosta, we'll now go to the tents and put on the gloves; and I'll try to make you feel what a sweet thing it is to be alive, brother."

And, metaphorically, Mr. Elkington does put on the gloves and convince us that it is good to be alive. With a sure hand he paints in, with a few rapid strokes of the pen, a living, moving picture of New Zealand as it is today. Each incident he relates, each scene he describes, is perfect in itself, and it is only when the last page has been turned that the reader discovers that they are component parts of a great canvas, and that each is indispensable to the proper understanding of the whole. It is possible that some may regret that Mr. Elkington's enthusiasm has found vent in dark hints concerning Free Trade and Protection, but these things seldom obtrude themselves. The author landed in New Zealand with threepence in his pocket, and, spending his time alternately working and living on the wages gained by the work that his hands had wrought and the labour that he had laboured to do, he had opportunities to see beneath the surface of things which few travellers in the colony have had. Of New Zealand his book gives the best picture of any we have read before, and the illustrations are excellent. In the text, as in the illustrations, there is always the sun or the moon or the stars or the wind on the heath.

Crome's Etchings. A Catalogue and an Appreciation, with some Account of his Paintings. By HENRY STUDDY THEOBALD. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE etchings described in this book number forty-four, and are of great interest to all lovers of that branch of Art, and to other students of the Norwich School, although they were probably unknown to Ruskin, and certainly to Hamerton. They are still known to comparatively few people, partly because they are not common, but chiefly because they have never been sufficiently well printed to do justice to their merits. In the early part of the nineteenth century the process of printing etchings had not been brought to its present state of perfection, and the best sets of proofs printed from Crome's plates were probably not up to the contemporary standard, and can only be described as cold, dry, harsh and unsympathetic impressions. They are a perpetual disappointment. The sets printed by Mrs. Edwards for Mr. Colman, after the plates came into his possession, show that the lines had then become irretrievably ruined and that great opportunities had been lost, not only because fine impressions might have been taken from the original plates, but also because the original plates had in some cases been altered after the painter's death.

But disappointing as they are, the etchings are so plainly the work of a great artist who was a genuine student of Nature, that they compel admiration somewhat resembling that with which we regard one or two of the earlier proofs of Van Dyck's plates. The deficiency in technique is soon forgiven and the failure forgotten in admiration for the spirit of the attempt.

Mr. Theobald's book is a model of what such work should be, at any rate where illustrations cannot be included. It contains a minute and careful description of all the plates, and an interesting essay written in a style which it is difficult to praise too highly. Its chief distinction is a scholarly simplicity. Its author will always be best known as a lawyer, but he is also a collector with a rare knowledge of prints, and he brings to his taste qualities which are not often united. He seems to have made a special study of the Norwich School, and begins his book with chapters on Crome's life and his pictures and an essay on Crome and Cotman. Not the least noticeable feature in the book is the admirable preface, and throughout the author pays a graceful and modest tribute to the work of his predecessors. He might have noted that the removal of the sky in Mousehold Heath, Norwich, which he evidently deplores, gave the third state of the plate a curiously Rembrandtesque appearance; he does not comment upon the novel effect produced in A Composition—Men and Cows, by soft ground etching being superimposed on ordinary lines bitten through a hard ground, or upon the amateurish use of the roulette in the Road by Park Palings; and he has overlooked the fact that in the second state of the Road by Blasted Oak the erasure to which he draws attention is made in the proof and not on the plate.

Sir Walter Raleigh. A Drama in Five Acts. By H. A. A. CRUSO. (Unwin, 5s. net.)

MR. CRUSO's drama is not on the level of his subject. A tragedy could have been made out of the last years of great Raleigh's life. Mr. Cruso has not made it. His work is sound and careful: the historical facts and the historical characters are correct, and whatever atmosphere there is, is Elizabethan. King James, Buckingham, Gondomar (the Spanish ambassador), Sir Walter, his wife and sons, Stucley, Pennington Manourie, the French quack who tricked Raleigh with such deplorable skill—all move on correct lines. He has, moreover, a just opinion of Raleigh's greatness, and his conception is on a properly grand scale. But the play is not dramatic: the verse is thoughtful and at times felicitous, but it never becomes poetry. Mr. Cruso has not condensed his theme; he never culminates. The play wanders on through innumerable scenes, all probable, none actual, none living and convincing. He has been too much fettered, it would seem, by attention to historical accuracy in detail. The only accuracy he need have troubled himself about, as dramatist, was accuracy in broad essentials, in spirit. Everything would have been pardoned to him if he had made the play a convincing tragedy; for poetic truth is more important than scientific truth, when the two are at odds, as occasionally they appear to be. The poet must rise superior to historical fact: it is seldom that life happens quite as the exigencies of dramatic art require. The prestige of a great name is a great gain, as well the Elizabethans knew, who rolled them out magnificently on the least provocation. It is also a great test: for the name cannot lift the subject to its own height: it can grace, like a crown, a subject that has been made great by its treatment. Any failure is, moreover, more apparent to expectation already on the alert.

Moltke in his Home. By F. A. DRESSLER. Translated by Mrs. C. E. BARRETT-LENNARD. (Murray, 6s.)

THE private life of a great soldier is not often so interesting as that which, already well known, is once more described in Herr Dressler's recollections. Lord Methuen, in a brief introduction to the book, remarks on the simplicity and refinement of the Marshal and contrasts him with the other great creator of the German Empire, Bismarck. The comparison is fair and natural enough, but it is more amusing to compare von Moltke, in private life, with Frederick the Great. We have, it is true, no portrait of the former with a phial of poison in one pocket and a quire of bad verses in the other, and in lesser details the comparison emphasises the fact that Moltke was a gentleman and Frederick was not. The comparison may have been for this reason fanciful but it is inevitably suggested by this book. Herr Dressler tells us nothing very new, and a good deal of what he has to say is very small beer, yet his book is interesting because he had excellent opportunities, as a musician in great favour, of observing Moltke in every aspect of private life. Nor does he spare his patron: for instance, he tells how Moltke disliked losing at cards, so that his family were trained to let him win. But the great man showed to better advantage on his country estate or as a musical critic than as a card-player, and best of all on the battlefield or during those arduous years of preparation for the strife. When there was a torchlight procession in his honour, on his ninetieth birthday, he whispered to his adjutant: "Had I but lost a battle, they would be saying 'There goes the old donkey.'" The remark may be true, but Moltke was spared the ill-usage which has befallen many great and successful generals.

"To soldiers," writes Lord Methuen, "he set the example of how to work through and for others, not to play for our own hand, and not to seek to enhance our own interest by means of self-advertisement." That epitaph rings all the more true for having come from the pen of one of the most modest of our living generals.

SOME DOCTORED DILEMMA

A NEW EPILOGUE FOR THE LAST PERFORMANCE OF MR. SHAW'S PLAY

Though Mr. Bernard Shaw has set the fashion in prologues for modern plays his admirers are not altogether satisfied with the epilogue to The Doctor's Dilemma. It is far too short; and leaves us in the dark as to whom "Jennifer Dubedat" married, though we gather that her second husband was rich, as he was able to purchase the entire exhibition of the late Louis Dubedat. Epilogues, as students of English drama will remember, were often composed by other authors. The following experiment ought to have come from the hand of Mr. St. John Hankin, that master of Dramatic Sequels, but his engagement—his "Cassilis Engagement"—at the Stage Society deprived Mr. Shaw of his only possible collaborator.

[SCENE: A Bond Street Picture Gallery—MESSRS. GERSAINT AND CO. The clock strikes ten, and SIR COLENSO RIDGEON is seen going out rather crestfallen by centre door. MR. GERSAINT, the manager, is nailing up a notice ("All works of art for sale, prices on application. Catalogue 1s."). MR. JACK STEPNEY, the secretary, is receiving the private view cards from the visitors who are trooping in; some sneak catalogues as they enter and on being asked for payment protest, and produce visiting cards and press vouchers instead of shillings. Artists, Royal Academicians, MR. EDMUND GOSSE, and other members of the House of Lords discovered; Men of Letters, art critics, connoisseurs, journalists, collectors, dealers, private viewers, impostors, dramatic critics, poets, pick-pockets, politicians crowd the stage. From time to time JACK STEPNEY places a red star on the picture frames in the course of the action.]

J. STEPNEY. I thought all the pictures had been bought by Dr. Schutzmacher.

GERSAINT. So they were, my boy, but he has wired saying they are all to be put up for sale at double the price; capital business, you see we shall get two commissions.

J. STEPNEY. Yes sir. It is fortunate Mrs. Dubedat did not have the prices marked in the Catalogue.

GERSAINT. You mean Mrs. Schutzmacher. [Drives in last nail.]

J. STEPNEY. Yes sir.

Enter a striking looking man, looking not unlike a Holbein drawing, at a distance: but on nearer inspection, as he comes within range of the foot-lights, he is more like an Isaac Oliver or Nicholas Lucidel. He examines the notice and sniffs.

S. L. M. N. U. H. D. Which are the works of Art?

EDMUND GOSSE. Can you tell me who that is? He is one of the few people I don't know by sight. A celebrity of course; and do point out any obscurities. Every one is so distinguished. It is rather confusing.

GERSAINT. That is the Holland Park Wonder, so called because he lives at the top of a tower in Holland Park—the greatest Art Connoisseur in England. Mr. Charles Ricketts—the greatest—

EDMUND GOSSE. Thank you; thank you.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE [interrupting]. Can you tell me whether the frames are included in the prices of the pictures?

J. STEPNEY. No, Sir. They are stock frames, the property of the Gallery, and are only lent for the occasion.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE. Then I fear I cannot buy; a naked picture without a frame is useless to me.

CHARLES RICKETTS. Do you think I could buy a frame without a picture?

JOSEPH PENNELL. I say, Ricketts, it seems a beastly shame we didn't get this show for the International. It would have been a good "ad." What's the use of backers? I see they're selling well.

CHARLES RICKETTS. But my dear Pennell you're doing the Life, aren't you?—the real Dubedat.

JOSEPH PENNELL. Oh, yes, but the family have injunctioned Heinemann from publishing the letters: Mr. Justice Kekewich will probably change his opinion when the weather gets warmer. It is only an interim injunction.

CHARLES RICKETTS. A sort of Clapham Injunction.

SIR WILLIAM RICHMOND, K.C.B., R.A. If I had known what a stupendous genius Dubedat was I should have given him part of the "New Bailey" to decorate.

D. S. MACCOLL. Let us be thankful he's as dead as Bill Bailey.

SIR CHARLES HOLROYD [smoothing things over]. I think we ought to have an example for the Tate. [MACCOLL winces.] The Chantrey Bequest [MACCOLL winces again] might do something; and I must write to Lord Balcarras. The National Arts Collections Fund may have something over from the subscriptions to the Rokeby Velasquez; but I want to see what Colvin is going to choose for the British Museum.

SIDNEY COLVIN. I think we must have this drawing; it stands on its legs. A most interesting fellow Dubedat. He reminds me of Bea—

GEORGE MOORE. Not Stevenson, though he had no talent whatever. My dear Mr. Colvin, have you ever read "Vailima Letters"? I have read parts of them.

SIDNEY COLVIN [coldly]. Ah, really! Did you suffer very much?

HUGH P. LANE. Do you think, Mr. Gersaint, the artist's widow would give me one of the pictures for the Dublin Gallery? We have no money at all. I have no money, but all the artists are giving pictures: Sargent, Shannon, Lavery, Frank Dicksee; and Rodin is giving a plaster cast.

GERSAINT. How charming and insinuating you are, Mr. Lane. We can make special reductions for the Dublin Gallery, but you can hardly expect charitable bequests from Bond Street.

HUGH P. LANE. Oh, but Dowdeswell, Agnew and Sulley, and Wertheimer, P. and D. Colnaghi and Humphrey Ward are all giving me pictures. Now look here, I'll buy these five drawings and you can give me these two. I'll give you a Gainsborough drawing in exchange for them. It has a very good history. First it belonged to Ricketts, then to Rothenstein, then Wilson Steer, and then to the Carfax Gallery and . . . then it came into my possession, and all that in three months. [Bargain concluded.]

MR. PFFUNGST [aside]. But is there any evidence that it belonged to Gainsborough?

HUGH P. LANE [turning to a titled lady]. Oh, do come to tea next Saturday. I want to show you my new Titian which I have just bought for £2100.

TITLED LADY. Mr. Lane, can you tell me who Mrs. Dubedat is now?

HUGH P. LANE. Oh, yes. She married Dr. Schutzmacher, the specialist on bigamy, only this morning.

TITLED LADY. How interesting. I should like to meet her. Dresses divinely, I'm told.

HUGH P. LANE. She's coming to tea next Saturday; such good tea too!

TITLED LADY. That will be delightful.

ST. JOHN HANKIN [loftily]. Can you tell me whether this charman artist is pronounced Dubedat or Dubédât.

W. P. KERR [in deep Scotch]. Non Dubitat. [He does not speak again.]

P. G. KONODY. Oh, Mr. Phillips, do tell me exactly what you think of this artist.

CLAUDE PHILLIPS. I think he wanted a good smacking.

P. G. KONODY. Ah, yes, his art has a smack about it. [Aside.] Good heading for the Daily Mail, "Art with a smack." [Writes in catalogue.]

WILL ROTHENSTEIN. When I see pictures of this kind, my dear Gersaint, they seem to me to explain your existence. An artist without a conscience. . . . [Sees ROGER FRY.] My dear Fry, what are you doing here? Buying for New York? [Laughs meaningly.]

ROGER FRY. Oh, no, but I hear Gersaint has a very fine picture by the Maitresse of the Moulin Rouge. Weale says it is School of Gheel (pronounced Kail).

WILL ROTHENSTEIN. Kail Yard I should think; do look at these things.

ROGER FRY [vaguely]. Who are they by? Oh yes, Dubedat of course.

[FRY and ROTHENSTEIN regard picture with disdain; it withers under their glance. Stage illusion by MASKELYNE and THEODORE ANDREAS COOK. STEPNEY places a red star on it.]

GERSAINT. Well, Mr. Bowyer Nicholls, I hope we shall have a good long notice in the Westminster Gazette. Now if there is any drawing . . .

BOWYER NICHOLLS [very stiffly]. No there isn't. I don't think the Exhibition sufficiently important; everything seems to me cribbed: most of the pictures look like reproductions of John, Orpen and Neville Lytton.

GERSAINT. Ah, no doubt influenced by Neville Lytton. That portrait of Mr. Cutler Walpole has a Neville Lytton feeling. Neville Lytton in his earlier manner.

Enter SIR PATRICK CULLEN, SIR RALPH BLOOMFIELD BONNINGTON and SIR COLENZO RIDGEON.

SIR C. RIDGEON. Ah, Sir Patrick, I have just heard that the pictures are for sale; now I am going to plunge a little. I think they will rise in value; and by the way I want to ask your opinion as a scientific man. If I treat four artists with virus opscena for three weeks what will be the condition of the remaining artists in the fourth week.

SIR P. CULLEN. Colenso, Colenso, you ought to have been a senior wrangler and then abolished.

SIR C. RIDGEON. What a cynic you are. All the same I've had great successes, though Dubedat was one of our failures. A rather anæmic member of the New English Art Club came to me for treatment, and in less than a year he was an Associate of the Royal Academy; what do you say to that?

SIR P. CULLEN. Out of Phagocyte, out of mind.

SIR R. B. B. My dear Sir Patrick, how prejudiced you are. Take MacColl's case; a typical instance of morbus ferox ars nova anglicana; under dear Colenso he became an official at the Tate.

SIR C. RIDGEON. Then there's Sir Charles Holroyd, you remember his high tempera.

SIR P. CULLEN. There has been a relapse I hear from the catalogue.

SIR R. B. B. How grossly unfair; that is a false bulletin issued by the former nurse; "the evil that men do lives after them."

SIR P. CULLEN. My dear B. B. this is not Dubedat's funeral. Do you think Bernard Shaw will like the new epilogue.

BERNARD SHAW. He will; I'm shaw.

L. C. C. INSPECTOR. Excuse me, is Mr. Vedrenne here? Ah! yes, there is Mr. Vedrenne. Will you kindly answer some of my questions? Is that door on the left a real door? in case of fire I cannot allow property doors: the actors might be seized with stage fright and they must have, as Sir B. B. would say, "their exits and their entrances."

VEDRENNE. Everything at the Court Theatre, my dear sir, is real. Ask Mr. Franks, he will tell you the door is not even a jar. The art, the acting, the plays, even the audience is real, except a few dramatic critics whom I cannot exclude. I admit the audience looks improbable at matinées; out of Court is a truth in art of which we are only dimly beginning to understand the significance.

Noise outside—enter JENNIFER dressed in deep mourning.

JENNIFER [with a bright smile]. Mr. Vedrenne, I have just had a telegram saying that my husband Leo was killed in his motor after leaving me at the Synagogue. His last words were, "Jennifer, promise me that you will wear mourning if I die, merely to mark the difference between Dubedat and myself." This afternoon I am going to marry Blenkinsop. How are the sales going?

VEDRENNE. Well I think we might have the catechism or the churning of heroines. What is your name?

JENNIFER. Jennifer.

VEDRENNE. Where did you get that name?

JENNIFER. From Bernard Shaw in my baptism.

MR. REDFORD [Licensor of Plays]. Mr. Shaw, I really must point out that this passage comes from the Anglican prayer book. Are you aware of that? I have a suggestion of my own for ending the play.

BERNARD SHAW. Oh shut up; let us have my ten commandments.

GRANVILLE BARKER. My dear Shaw you sent them to Wells for revision and he lost them in the Tube. I can remember the first one, "Maude spake these words and said: 'Thou shalt have none other Shaws but me.'"

BERNARD SHAW. How careless of Wells. I remember the second. "Do not indulge in craven imitation."

W. L. COURTNEY. The third commandment runs: "Thou shalt not covet George Alexander."

GRANVILLE BARKER. One of them runs: "Do not commit yourself to Beerbohm Tree, though his is His Majesty's . . ." but we shall never get them right. We must offer a reward for their recovery. I vote that Walkley now says the credo. That I think expresses every one's sentiment.

A. B. WALKLEY. I believe in Bernard Shaw, in Granville Barker and in Mr. Vedrenne.

WILLIAM ARCHER. Ite, missa est.

CURTAIN.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS FROM WILLIAM AND DOROTHY WORDS- WORTH TO SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

A REMARKABLE series of Letters, written by William and Dorothy Wordsworth to Samuel Taylor Coleridge between Christmas 1799 and May 1807, have been recently sent to me for incorporation, if possible, in the "Letters of the Wordsworth Family," now in the American press of Messrs. Ginn and Co., Boston. As the two first volumes of that work are already printed (although not yet issued) while the third is revised in proof for press, these newly-found letters will have unfortunately to be placed out of their chronological order, and put into an appendix to volume three. I was not aware of their existence until the eleventh hour of my labour on this work (or rather on the stroke of twelve): but they are too valuable to be left out of a book, which aims at completeness. There is, of course, no such thing as absolute finality in a literary undertaking of this kind; although the collection to be issued, after many years of research, is now approximately complete.

It is impossible to enter into full explanation in these columns as to the subject-matter of the letters, or to explain how they have reached me. This will be done in the preface to the whole series of which they will form a part. Suffice it now to say that they disclose many interesting things which occurred within the humble cottage at Grasmere—that home of "plain living and high thinking"—they refer to the people of the district, to walks in the valley, and expeditions to more distant places in Westmoreland and Yorkshire, to such incidents as the fatality which befell the family of the Greens, to the work and the travels of Coleridge, to some of the verses written by each of the poets, to the pamphlet on "The Convention of Cintra," etc. They also contain some remarkable revelations of the unique friendship of the poets, and a striking interpretation by its author of the meaning which underlies "The White Doe of Rylstone." The series concludes with a letter in which Wordsworth explains to Coleridge how he meant to rearrange his poems in their next issue, which must have special interest to all the students and lovers of this poet. A part of it may therefore be published now as a sample of the rest.

All his readers know that Wordsworth adopted an elaborate and subtle classification of his poems. He placed them in groups, suggested by their subject-matter, without regard to chronological order. These corresponded to what he regarded as the faculties or powers of human nature, to the successive periods of human life or incidents in it, to the localities he visited and described, to the tours he made, etc. Thus there were "Poems written in Youth," "Poems referring to the period of Childhood," "Poems founded on the Affections," "Poems on the Naming of Places," "Poems of the Fancy," "Poems of the Imagination," "Poems of Sentiment and Reflection," "Sonnets," "Memorials of Tours," "Poems referring to Old Age," "Epitaphs and Elegiac Pieces," and so on. If the successive editions from 1807 onwards be examined, it will be found that the groups—within which the poems were placed—underwent change from time to time. They were enlarged, or contracted, as new poems were written. Other classes were formed, and the lists enlarged; while many of the verses included in one group or class in an early edition were transferred to another in a later one. The reason of the change is almost always obvious, and it was sometimes explained in the "Notes" on his poems dictated in his old age by Wordsworth to Miss Fenwick. But it is especially interesting to find that the leading idea of these consecutive groups—half natural, and half artificial, as they were—occurred to him, and was even elaborated by him, so early as the year 1807; and that it was then unfolded, with curious precision and foresight, in a rapidly-written letter addressed to his lifelong friend and fellow worker, Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It is remarkable in many ways, and not the least as affording material for a psychological study of the poet's mind.

What is now printed for the first time is only the conclusion of a long epistle written in May 1807, probably on the 5th of that month; the first, and larger, half of which was devoted to a severe condemnation of the Convention of Cintra.

Wordsworth writes:

I am half in mind to scribble another sheet upon another subject; viz., my published Poems, and the arrangement which I mean to place them in, if they are ever republished during my lifetime. I should begin thus: "Poems relating to Childhood," and such feelings as rise in the mind in after-life in direct contemplation of that state. To these I should prefix the motto, "The child is father of the man," etc. The class would begin with the simplest dawn of the affections or faculties, as in "Foresight," or "Children gathering Flowers," the "Pet Lamb," etc.; and would ascend in a gradual scale of imagination to "Hartley" and "There was a Boy." It would conclude with the Ode, "There was a Time, etc.," which might perhaps be preceded by "We are Seven," if it were not advisable to place that earlier. This class would also contain "Alice Fell," "Lucy Gray," "The Anecdote for Fathers," "Rural Architecture," and "Idle Shepherd Boys." There may be others which I forget.

The Second Class would relate to the Fraternal Affections, to Friendship, to Love, and all those Emotions which follow after childhood, in youth, and early manhood. Here might come in "The Sparrows' Nest," "The Butterflies," the poems about "Lucy," "She was a Phantom," "Louisa," "Dear Child of Nature," "There is a change and I am poor."* But this class would ascend in a scale of imagination, or interest through, "Tis said that some have died for love," and "Ellen Irwin"; concluding with "Ruth," or "The Brothers" printed with a separate title as an adjunct; or this last might be placed elsewhere.

The third class, would include poems relating to Natural Objects, and their influence on the human mind—either as growing, or as in an advanced state. It would begin with the simply human, and after having passed through all stages from objects as they affect the mind by properties with which they are endowed, and as they affect it by properties conferred, conclude with the highly imaginative, as

* It is worthy of note that the inclusion of this poem in a letter addressed to Coleridge almost disproves an opinion widely entertained (which I shared till I read the letter) that the lines referred to Coleridge himself.

"Tintern Abbey." This to be immediately preceded by the "Cuckoo" poems, and "Nutting." In this class would come (I place them at random) "The Daisies," "The Celandines," "The Daffodils," "The Nightingale and Stockdove," "The Green Linnet," "Waterfall and Eglantine," "Oak and Broom," "Poor Susan" perhaps, poem on "Rydal Island," on "Grasmere," "I heard a thousand blended notes;" "The whirl blast from behind the hill," "The kitten and the falling Leaves," "Fidelity," those concerning Tom Hutchinson's dog; but, with respect to the two or three last, I am not sure but that they may be arranged better elsewhere. The above class would be numerous, and conclude—in the manner mentioned above—with "Tintern Abbey."

Next might come "Poems on the Naming of Places," as a transition to those relating to Human Life; which might be connected, harmoniously I may say, by "Poor Susan" (mentioned before, but better perhaps placed here), "Beggars," "Simon Lee," "The last of the Flock," "Goody Blake," etc., to ascend, through a regular scale of imagination, to "The Thorn," "The Highland Girl," "The Leech-Gatherer," "Hartleap Well." This class of poems I suppose to refer chiefly to objects most interesting to a meditative or imaginative mind, not by its personal feelings or a strong appeal to the instincts or natural affection; but either from the moral importance of the pictures, or from the employment they give to the understanding affected through the imagination, and the higher faculties.

Then might come, perhaps, those relating to the Social and Civic Duties, chiefly interesting to the Imagination through the Understanding, and not to the Understanding through the Imagination; as the "Political Sonnets," "The Character of the Happy Warrior," "Rob Roy's Grave," "Personal Talk," "Poet's Epitaph," "Ode to Duty," "To Burns's Sons," etc. Then, perhaps, those relating to the maternal feelings, connubial, or parental. The maternal to ascend from "The Sailor's Mother," through "The Emigrant Mother," "Affliction of M. of —," to "The Mad Mother"; and to conclude with "The Idiot Boy."

Finally, the class of poems on Old Age. "Animal tranquillity and decay," "Though narrow be that old man's cares and near," "The Childless Father," "The two Thieves," "The Matron of Jedborough," those relating to "Mathew," "The Cumberland Beggar," to end perhaps with "Michael," which might conclude the whole. "The Blind Highland Boy" ought to take its place among "The Influences of Natural Objects," the sense of sight being wanting to produce an increase of imagination, and to throw the humblest person into sublime situations; feeling consecrating form, and form ennobling feeling.

This may suffice to give you a notion of my views. The principle of the arrangement is that there should be a scale in each class, and in the whole; and that each poem should be so placed as to direct the reader's attention by its position to its primary interest. I am writing illegibly. . . .

Most affectionately your friend,
W. WORDSWORTH.

Comment on this letter would be out of place, but information regarding it will be found in the book referred to in the opening sentence of this article. I should add that Wordsworth's punctuation and capital letters are not followed; and that in one or two cases the clauses in his letter are transposed, to try to make his meaning clearer; and that the whole is divided into paragraphs, where these naturally occur.

WILLIAM KNIGHT.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

BEOWULF, BURNS & CO.

Beowulf mathelode, beotwordum spræc niehstan siþe: "Ic genethde fela gutha on geogthe."

I AM quite ready to admit that this is not a cheerful way of beginning an article, and I fear that my readers will not be appeased when they hear that, when the above lines are rendered into modern English, they only amount to this: "Beowulf spake, uttered vaunting words for the last time: 'I ventured many battles in my youth.'" However, everything must have a beginning and this is, according to Miss Kate Warren, the beginning, or nearly the beginning, of English literature; and if any one likes it, all he has to do is to purchase Miss Warren's "Treasury of English Literature" (Constable, 7s. 6d. net), and he will find ten pages of it (the Beowulf variety) besides about another two hundred pages of other varieties both in prose and verse. On page 129 he will come to Robert Mannyng of Brunne who wrote at the end of the thirteenth century and who, apparently, was the first English writer to give up the use of the little "wiggles" on the top of the vowels (which our printer—in sorrow I relate it—does not possess). I have a dim and uneasy recollection of having heard in my childhood, of Beowulf and Robert Mannyng and William Langland, the author of a depressing work called "Piers the Plowman," and of having felt aggrieved and indignant at being expected to remember their names. I have not changed my opinion. I daresay I am wrong, but all this sort of thing appears to me to have nothing whatever to do with English literature. I do not admit that there was any English literature before Chaucer and Gavin Douglas, and I cannot conceive anything more calculated to imbue a young student with a loathing for the real English literature than to have these sort of "scrabblings on the wall" presented to him for his consumption as a preliminary to the enjoyment of our glorious legacy of prose and poetry from Chaucer to Swinburne and George Meredith. The wisest and the wittiest man I ever knew once, in my hearing, in the course of a discussion with a friend who was unduly praising Pope, delivered himself of the following epigram. "There are two ways of disliking poetry. One is to dislike it; the other is to like Pope." Substituting Beowulf for Pope, that saying might serve as a basis for the criticism of Miss Warren's anthology. She evidently likes Beowulf or why should she give us ten pages of him while of Sir Thomas Wyatt she only gives one sonnet? And yet, as she is evidently (too evidently) a "student" of English literature, she must be aware that Wyatt was the first Englishman to use the Italian sonnet form in our language, and that he may therefore claim (quite apart from the great beauty of his work) to be the literary ancestor of all the great English sonneteers from Philip Sidney to Rossetti. She likes Beowulf, therefore she dislikes poetry. It is a hard saying, but all the same I believe it to be true, and any one who dislikes poetry can hardly be expected to make a good anthology of English literature. Of course Miss Warren does not know that she dislikes poetry: she imagines that she is very fond of it, and in proof of this she would point to the fact that she has included in her selection fourteen pages from the poetical works of William Cowper. Exactly so; while to Philip Sidney she gives only four pages, to Ben Jonson only two and a half pages, to Surrey two pages, and to Wyatt, as I have already remarked, only fourteen lines, while the name of Webster is not even mentioned! This is clear proof that Miss Warren likes bad poetry better than good poetry, and that is tantamount to "disliking poetry"; for while in an anthology the test of the compiler's appreciation of the various authors whose work he reproduces is not entirely the actual amount of space he devotes to each, nobody could deny that such a vast disproportion as that which I have noted between the space devoted to Cowper (who was not really a poet at all) and the space allowed to the four poets I have cited, is an indication of a hopelessly uncritical mind, an ignorance of relative values, and a complete unfitness for the self-imposed task of selecting poetry. Again, Burns is given twenty-six pages and Drummond of Hawthornden only two. I daresay that I shall not find many people to agree with me when I say that I think Drummond the greater poet of the two. But allowing that to pass, surely more than two pages might be devoted to Drummond in a book where Akenside is allowed three. I hope that I may live till some compiler of an anthology discovers that Barnefield was the author of poems other than "The Nightingale." This:

As it fell upon a day
In the merry month of May,
Sitting in a pleasant shade
Which a grove of myrtles made,
Beasts did leap and birds did sing,
Trees did grow and plants did spring;

has been reproduced as the solitary contribution from Barnefield in every anthology I ever remember. It is quite the least good of all Barnefield's works. Why, I wonder, does no one ever quote the "Affectionate Shepherd," or the very exquisite sonnets, or the extraordinarily brilliant and beautiful "Rape of Helen," written in English hexameters, the only successful hexameters ever made in this language? Even Mrs. Meynell, has condemned poor Barnefield to the eternal "Nightingale" which, I am convinced, if he had any voice in the matter, he would gladly surrender to Shakespeare, to whom it was so long erroneously attributed. And here he is again with his "Nightingale" in Miss Warren's "Treasury," which, comprising, as I have said, nearly two hundred pages of selections from writers of the pre-literary period, stops abruptly with Burns. If any doubts had remained in one's mind as to the fitness or unfitness of Miss Warren to perform that which she has attempted they would surely be dispelled by this fact. I do not wish to be rude, but I must say what I think, and really the extraordinary stupidity (there is no other word) of making a "Treasury of English Literature" and bringing it to an end just before that great period of its splendour which follows immediately after Burns and continues in an unbroken chain of glorious names (Shelley, Keats, Byron, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Swinburne) right down to the present day, is almost incredible, and it effectually destroys any practical value that the anthology might have. But to return to what is in the book: Of Andrew Marvell we are given the beautiful "Emigrant's Song":

Where the remote Bermudas ride
In the ocean's bosom unespied, but the other selections are not happy, and I miss the great Cromwellian ode with the superb and soul-moving lines on Charles the First which are Marvell's greatest glory:

That thence the Royal actor borne
The tragic scaffold might adorn:
While round the armed bands
Did clap their bloody hands. . . .

Crashaw is meagrely represented by one poem; and while I have no fault to find with the selections from Shakespeare, it is hard to see why ten more pages should be allotted to Spenser than to England's greatest poet.

I have purposely confined myself so far in this article to the poetry in Miss Warren's collection because, having to speak strongly, I wish to stand on what I consider to be my strongest ground. All fault-finding criticism is necessarily an invidious thing, and when it is made over one's own signature, one cannot but feel diffident about what is after all only the expression of a personal opinion. But having said that much in deference to my own modesty, I must go on to say that to go critically through the prose portion of Miss Warren's selection would merely involve a repetition of the same criticism in another sphere. Miss Warren in selecting the prose pieces for her anthology shows the same lack of sense of proportion and knowledge of relative values as she displays in the poetical portion of her book. Thus we have seventeen pages of "Ælfred" (Anglicè, Alfred the Great) in this style "Eala, hu gesæglic seo forme eld" etc., and only two pages of Sterne; while from Fielding we have three pages of "Tom Jones" containing the episode of the liberation by Master Blifil of Sophia's bird and its consequent destruction by the hawk, followed by about three quarters of a page on "good and bad characters"—also from "Tom Jones"! Surely this is grotesquely inadequate and misrepresentative of the greatest novelist we ever had in England before the period of the nineteenth century which, as before stated, is altogether omitted in this fantastic collection.

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

FICTION

The Kinsman. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK. (Methuen, 6s.)

THIS book is a new proof of the minor importance of novelty in plot compared with thoroughness and individuality in workmanship. The idea of two men so alike as to be easily mistaken for each other has been the theme of countless novels and plays, and is highly improbable to start with; and yet Mrs. Sidgwick makes it fresh and convincing. For one thing, she begins by explaining why it is that the two young men, the city clerk and the rich Australian, are so much alike that even the women in love with them could not distinguish one from the other; she goes on to construct a plot that never outsteps the bounds of probability and never degenerates into mere plot; and further, she differentiates the characters of the two men with such subtle analysis that the story moves out of the region of concocted fiction, where most of such stories linger, into that of the novel of character. Mrs. Sidgwick is never so good as when depicting people she does not like. Her study of the poor little clerk who tried to wear the Australian's shoes and found them a world too big for him is a typical piece of work; and yet, despite the sharpness of the reading of him, we find no trace of the bitterness which has made some of this author's studies of mean characters too relentless to be acceptable. We find, indeed a delightful stream of keen but pleasant humour, the humour of true comedy; and dialogue in which every word is natural and every word forcible. "The Kinsman" is an entertaining book, one of the best Mrs. Sidgwick has written.

A Midsummer Day's Dream. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON (Methuen, 6s.)

THERE is nothing so desperate as forced cheerfulness nothing so alluring as natural gaiety: and with natural gaiety Mr. Marriott Watson writes. Philip Bannatyne comes to Temple Park at the invitation of Lady Coombe to play Lysander in a Midsummer Night's Dream. Lady Coombe has recklessly filled her house with charming girls and beautiful women. The rehearsals take place by moonlight, the park is perplexingly wooded, the weather warm and beautiful as are the women, and Philip Bannatyne is imaginative and impressionable. There is the framework of Mr. Watson's very graceful and very light comedy. Something of the spirit of the great dream has passed into these amateur presenters of it, and their doings are graced by a fantastic charm which is pleasantly akin to a gentle attack of midsummer madness. For Mr. Marriott Watson enters into the spirit of the thing so valiantly that he takes his readers with him: and they will easily forgive him for prolonging his day-dream a little beyond the actual demands of the story. He has done so from sheer delight in his theme. It is not often that a story which is written with such buoyancy is also written with such care as Mr. Marriott Watson invariably bestows upon his work. It is a consummate jeu d'esprit. In his dedicatory preface to his wife (a most attractive piece of writing) he boasts with proper pride: "we are both incurably romantic" and—he goes on—"even at the end of a long day . . . shall still have faith and see beauty in the disposition of the world. For to be a heretic of romance is to be old indeed. . . ." That is the secret; he has kept the wisdom of youth, and with youth's wisdom, its vitality. Sic itur ad astra.

The Ghost. By ARNOLD BENNETT. (Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.)

THIS is one of Mr. Bennett's Fantasias on Modern Themes, as he calls such works of his as "Teresa of Watling Street" and "Hugo," and does not belong to his Novels, as he calls "Leonora" and "Whom God hath joined." Whether his mood be fantastic or serious, his work is always first-class, and though his output is enormous, signs of haste are never apparent in the writing or construction. It would seem impertinent to wish that he would think a little more and write a little less. Everything he sets his hand to shows that he knows his business and himself more thoroughly than most men, and yet . . . However, "The Ghost" is an exciting story of opera singers and railway accidents and channel-boat disasters and trapdoors and revenge and jealousy that is strong enough to be carried beyond death, and of love that triumphs even over such fatal jealousy. And it is all done with amazing cleverness and astonishing verisimilitude.

The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square. By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE. (Murray, 6s.)

THE enthusiasms, sorrows and crudities of youth appeal strongly to Mrs. de la Pasture; she understands them, is graciously tolerant of them, always with an amused twinkle in the eyes that smile in sympathy and encouragement. She delights in delicately ironical contrasts between the stormy passions and aspirations of youth, and the sober griefs and disillusion of middle age, claiming our interest for each in swift alternation. Her lonely lady is a girl, reared in the narrow circle of a life on a Welsh farm, who finds herself mistress of a house in Grosvenor Square, which, with a fortune, has been bequeathed to a beloved brother, Louis, absent in Somaliland. Jeanne de Courset is at first quite friendless in London except for a lame duke who claims kinship; but for Louis everything may be endured, and everything forgiven. The gallant soldier-brother—who remains personally unknown to the reader—puts the loyal Jeanne's love and faith to a severe test with the arrival of the stately Anne-Marie, Marquise de Courset, upon the scene. The author writes as gracefully and as easily as ever—almost too easily—and her touch both in humour and pathos is light and sure. The story itself presents no striking feature; the tragedy of it, softened by distance and circumstance, does not affect us deeply. The scenes of Jeanne's social blunders and successes, of Anne-Marie's imposing presence in Grosvenor Square, are as natural, touching, or amusing as the author designed them to be: the characters say and do the right things well, and we smile with them over the foolish ones.

Kit's Woman: A Cornish Idyll. By MRS. HAVELOCK ELLIS. (Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.)

IN 1898, under the title "Seaweed," "Kit's Woman" was published in a limited edition. "Considerably revised and in parts rewritten," Mrs. Havelock Ellis reissues what purports to be a Cornish idyll, and dedicates it to all her "Loyal Friends." As the result of her labours we have before us a small volume containing sufficient matter for a short story, or the germ of a long one. "Kit's Woman" is neither one nor the other: it is over-weighted with dull and disagreeable gossip, and it stops far short of its true conclusion. Loose threads are woven in and never "finished off." Choosing a large canvas, Mrs. Ellis has, as it were, daubed over a few inches in the centre, and left the rest untouched. Of the story we are given neither the beginning nor the end; and, while there are some radically good things within its covers, there are many more that are radically bad. She has chosen a subject with which a woman is not competent to deal, and which a man would not handle. Such a story as hers requires an intimate knowledge of the workings of mind in man and woman to which few attain, and a wide understanding of and deep insight into human nature "in the rough." These qualities Mrs. Ellis does not possess. The principal characters are unconvincing, and not, in our judgment, true to the facts of life. "Kit's Woman" could have had no real conception of "soul," and she would not have used the term to illustrate a physical desire. Nor do we find in Mrs. Ellis's pages any justification of the sub-title, "a Cornish Idyll"; and where we looked for beauty there came forth coarseness. It is regrettable that the modern craving for moral dissection should have led a promising writer away from the portrayal of scenes of quiet simplicity. There is good work in this book, even a little that is excellent; but the greater part bears no relation to life. In the mind of the reader there remains the impression that he has been brought into touch with the "realism" of a morbid-minded district visitor.

The Lost Word. By EVELYN UNDERHILL. (Heinemann, 6s.)

"BLANK misgivings of a Creature moving about in Worlds not realised" might well be the motto of this book; and those who are, to use the author's expression, "unconscious of supersensual æsthetics," will have little sympathy with the mystical meanderings of Paul Vickery. This irritating person is charmingly introduced to us as a freckled boy washing the face of a broken angel on a Cathedral roof, but his future career is disappointing. He goes to Oxford and develops materialistic views, but, on being initiated into the mysteries of freemasonry he sees visions and dreams dreams and resolves to be an architect and devote himself to the quest of the "Lost Word" by means of which Solomon built the Temple at Jerusalem. It seems a pity to found a plot on the influence of a secret society, the author's knowledge of which is admittedly—and evidently—limited to the unimportant details which are published to the outside world. Members of the Craft will smile at the account of Paul's initiation, and the uninitiated will find it bewilderingly vague. How a convenient friend gives Paul carte blanche to build a magnificent Church at his expense; how Paul collects a band of visionary artists inspired by the same mediæval yearnings as himself—how he falls in love, indulges in self-torture to preserve his "spiritual chastity," and finally sinks to the commonplace of matrimony, is told with a great deal of mystery and metaphor. But the book is interesting, and, though the men are unconvincing, some of the minor feminine characters are admirably drawn, and whenever the writer ceases to commune with the angels and descends to earth, she writes with epigrammatic vigour and shows originality and insight.

A Blind Bird's Nest. By MARY FINDLATER. (Methuen, 6s.)

MISS FINDLATER's new story fully comes up to our expectation; it is an advance upon her former work. It is a quiet story of country life and country people with a tragedy in the background. Agnes Sorel's childhood is darkened by the knowledge that her father is in prison for a crime committed upon impulse, in defence of the honour of his sister, a worthless creature whose little vanities are not even amusing. The reader's sympathy is entirely with the convict, and horror follows close upon it as the author skilfully suggests rather than describes the demoralising effect of prison life upon a man of impetuous and generous temper. Here the touch is firmer than elsewhere in the book, and more might have been made of the situations arising from his release. But the main interest is intended to lie in the development of Agnes's character, and in her rival lovers, a middle-aged friend of her father's, and a pleasant American boy. The story is sympathetically told and wins the reader by its truth and simplicity, and the style is admirable.

DRAMA

"THE PHILANDERER" AT THE COURT THEATRE

LAST Tuesday afternoon Mr. Bernard Shaw's topical comedy of the eighteen-nineties, The Philanderer, was performed at the Court Theatre before a crowded and bewildered house. It was interesting to have the opportunity of seeing Mr. Shaw's play soon after seeing M. Lavedan's Marquis de Priola. There is a strange similarity between the two pieces, which brings into prominence the contrast between French and English methods of treatment. In both plays the protagonist is a man who has great power over women and whose powers are seen in action. The Marquis de Priola knows exactly what he wants from women; he is in search of sensation, and takes pleasure in his sense of power. What Leonard Charteris, the Philanderer, wants remains a mystery, hidden away in the ill-sounding word "philandering." M. Lavedan is able to use greater freedom of speech, and he makes full use of the privilege. He makes his meaning quite obvious. He has no purpose in writing the play except to amuse and to excite: the Marquis's slow death, on which the curtain falls, raises much the same emotions as the mother's warning to the small boy of pains if he ate too much cake, and the small boy's answer "It's worth it"; only for the small boy it is impossible to feel any disgust, and for the Marquis de Priola it is possible to feel little else. But though the play is ignoble and at times disgusting it is never vulgar. And it is saved from vulgarity by its perfect frankness, its sincerity in viciousness. Some people are so well-bred that they are able to swear in the drawing-room or commit what would be an unpardonable offence in a less well-bred person. The exact reason why this should be so is as subtle a mystery as the thing itself is indisputable fact. In matters of art, too, there is a parallel: there is a kind of breeding in art: something which is akin to breeding in actual life. And that subtle something is lacking in The Philanderer. The Marquis de Priola is a vicious play, as has been said, at times a disgusting play; but it is not vulgar. The Philanderer is not vicious: but it is vulgar, irredeemably vulgar; and not in the least because it deals with vulgar people. But the effect of it is nauseating, so that even the cleverness of the dialogue becomes exasperating.

The Philanderer shows Mr. Shaw at his cleverest and at his worst. It is typical of his earlier manner. Whenever he feels his grip on the subject-matter loosening he indulges in some intellectual caper which is all the more distressing because it is almost invariably laughable. He deems anything preferable to being thought dull. So the play becomes a muddle of farce and tragedy. The result of this lack of all balance is that though each character is true to life and alive, the play as a whole is false, and its falseness reflects an air of unreality upon the characters. Leonard Charteris is a selfish, clever man who attracts the love of women—in which he is interested and for which he has no particular use. He is the Ibsen philosopher, and a prominent member of the Ibsen Club. He wants to marry Grace Tranfield in order that he may escape from the attentions of Julia Craven, of whom he is tired. It seems a singularly poor device for a clever, imaginative man, as he is described in the stage directions, but a credible one. Grace Tranfield is a widow, strong-minded enough to be able to live up to the ideas which pass as Ibsenism in the Ibsen Club, and an excellent foil to Julia Craven, who is a weak and womanly woman: that is to say, a woman who has no control over her emotion and whose emotion in consequence becomes offensive. They are the advanced people of the eighteen-nineties. Colonel Craven and Mr. Cuthbertson, the fathers of the two women, represent the old school. There is a scientist, Dr. Paramore, and a clever little girl, Sylvia, Julia's sister.

The idea that sets the characters in motion, as it were, is the conflict that takes place between thought and feeling when the two are not reconcilable, as is generally the case when an intellectual person first begins to feel, or an emotional person to think. Leonard Charteris has brains but no feeling; his counterpart is Sylvia, who, however, being still a young girl, is attractive. Julia Craven has no brains in comparison with her capacity for emotion. Mrs. Tranfield has both qualities; they are under her control.

Here is an excellent subject for comedy, but one which calls for the utmost delicacy of treatment. And what is Mr. Shaw's method? He borrows with one hand from that kind of broad farce in which one of the stock jokes is to pour ribald fun on the woman or man (but generally the woman: it is considered funnier) whose love is unreturned. All unrequited passion is, from one point of view, ridiculous. The farce, however, keeps to that point of view, for whatever it may be worth. Mr. Shaw does not. He borrows with the other hand from psychology. He holds the woman's very soul out quivering before you, and then twirls her off again to the stock business of the farce. In order to get a pretty position and to raise a laugh, he makes Leonard Charteris read aloud love-letters of Julia and Grace in a club-room to their respective fathers, who stand on either side of him.

"Have you any proper sense of the fact that you're standing between two fathers?"

"Well I'm a little dazed still by standing so long between two daughters; but I think I grasp the situation," says Charteris, and the smartness of the rejoinder does not atone for the bad taste of the whole scene, incredible almost even in the unspeakable cad that Charteris is shown to be.

And so the characters gradually lose their vitality: they come to resemble antic figures in a brilliant masque, symbolising the folly of thought, the folly of emotion, the futility of anything that approaches to beauty.

□ The performance on Tuesday afternoon was in many ways an excellent one. Unfortunately Miss Lillah McCarthy was indisposed, and Miss Mary Barton was obliged to undertake the part of Julia Craven at less than twenty-four hours' notice. Her playing of the part (an extraordinarily difficult one) was in the circumstances nothing less than a tour de force. She took full advantage of the opportunity: and in the last act she was very good. Miss Barton by her personality laid more emphasis on the pathetic side of Julia's character than is probably the case in Miss McCarthy's rendering, but that is no fault. Mr. Ben Webster was far too slow for the nimble-witted Charteris; he spoke his lines without any ease, as though he were puzzled at their dexterity. Though he is admirable in certain parts, he has not the quickness of gesture or the mobility of feature—has not the nervous restless energy—of which it is absolutely necessary for an actor who wishes to impersonate such a type as Charteris to be master. Miss Wynne Matthison played Mrs. Tranfield with dignity and force. Her performance could not have been better. Miss Dorothy Minto was impishly charming as Sylvia, whose rational dress became her, and Mr. Eric Lewis was a perfect Colonel Craven.

H. DE S.

M. GEORGES BERR AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

THIS week M. Georges Berr has been visiting the New Royalty Theatre, and his visit has been of special interest for the reason that, though he is well known in Paris, this is his first appearance on a London stage. His reception was cordial and it is much to be hoped that his return will not be long postponed. An actor of his calibre, with his gifts and his charm, cannot be seen too often. On Monday and Tuesday he appeared in Regnard's amusing old-world comedy, Le Légataire Universel, in the part of Crispin, the proper all-manceuvring valet. Everything in the play is conventional, from the character of the rich old man Geronte, whose whims as to will-making cause all the trouble, to the rhyming verse in which the play is written. It is a sound stock comedy, which is freshened by the shrewdness of the ingenious Crispin. He dresses up, first as a cousin from the country, then as another cousin, a mother of nine children, and finally as the old man himself, so that the money may not be diverted into any wrong channels. For the old miser is unprincipled enough to think seriously of leaving twenty thousand useful pounds to these distant cousins, and is inconsiderate enough to be so upset by the impersonated visits that he is deemed dead, with the will still unmade. Those are the moments of the play. And well did M. Georges Berr avail himself of them. With his loud voice and his brusque heartiness he jarred on the old invalid's weak nerves, now shaking his head with such fervour that his teeth would have rattled had he possessed any, now slamming his tough big stick on tables and chairs, and on his exit giving the old fellow six days to die decently, so that it is small wonder that he effectually settled the prospects of the cousin he pretended to be. And then he enters in a little while as the dolorous insinuating mother of nine children, left a widow, who is so determined to rescue Geronte from the snare of his servant-girl Lisette, that she will even marry him herself. Both situations are really amusing and M. Georges Berr was admirable in them both. But perhaps he was best when he impersonated the old man himself and dictated a just will to the notary. His method is remarkable chiefly for its quickness. In some ways he reminds one of Mr. James Welch. He is amazingly deft in his gesture, and gives the impression of an intense eagerness, which is infectious, and holds the attention irresistibly. His versatility was partially shown by his playing of Boismartin in Meilhac and Halévy's ridiculous farce, Le petit Hôtel; as the absurd and misjudged lover who is obliged to listen to his lady love's calumnies without a word, without a gesture of dissent, and is at last allowed to write down comments, he was as ludicrous and amusing as it was possible to be, and that is saying much, for the situation is ingeniously ridiculous. It will be interesting to see further proof of his versatility in Théodore de Banville's exquisite poetic fancy, Le Baiser, which is to be performed on Wednesday evening and in which he plays the part of the Pierrot. I am writing on Tuesday, and exigencies of time and printing-press forbid its mention.

M. Georges Berr is supported by an excellent company, which includes Mlle. Bertiny and Mlle. Marie Kolb. M. Dutertre gave a remarkable character-study of Geronte, the old man. The perfect skill with which he broke his speeches by a senile cough and spoke with a broadly opened mouth heightened the effect of his rendering.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

ROMANCE AND SYMBOLISM

It may be laid down as an axiom that it is the duty of a painter to express his ideas by his pictures and not by their titles or the title of his exhibition. To the apt phrases, therefore, which decorate the heading of a catalogue it is seldom necessary to pay attention, yet there is food for thought in the title which that serious and advanced artist, Mr. Fred F. Foottet, has chosen for his exhibition of twenty pictures at the Baillie Gallery (54 Baker Street). For these paintings are very different from what the title of the exhibition, "Romance and Symbolism," would lead many to suppose. The word romance conjures up a vision of gallant knights and maidens in distress: symbolism suggests some such anthropomorphic presentation of the abstract as is identified with the name of the late G. F. Watts. Mr. Foottet's imagination, however, is of a more modern order. He finds his romance not in the affairs of men but in the pageant of nature, and his mystic thoughts find utterance in landscapes in which figures are either wholly absent or entirely subordinate.

In the memorable second chapter of his "Nineteenth Century Art" Mr. D. S. MacColl laid stress on the irresistible attraction of landscape to the nineteenth-century painter, whose characteristic attitude is summed up as that of "wistful, brooding reverie, not certain of any divine vision, seeking an escape for thought." This attitude is essentially that of Mr. Foottet, who tells of "things distant, misty and obscure," whose renderings of English river-scenes and countrysides wear an air of mystery and remoteness with their "screen of vapour, secret of shadow, alembic of light." There are landscapes of which we ask no more than "What place is that?" But to inquire too closely about the topography of Mr. Foottet's landscapes would be as absurd as to inquire the whereabouts of Xanadu and the source of Alph. Unfortunately there are many people who "read their Coleridge with delight, but have a suspicion of the painter when he works in the same vein of poetry, when he gives them the romance and mystery of vision, of things half discovered, half engaged in mist, shadow, or light." And since this is precisely what Mr. Foottet offers us, his beautiful pictures are in danger of being condemned by the unjust and thoughtless criticism which judges paintings not according to what they are but by what the critic conceives that they ought to have been.

Rightly to appreciate them, then, we must regard Mr. Foottet's paintings in a spirit akin to that in which the painter himself regards nature, a spirit of brooding reverie. Broadly executed as befits their breadth of conception, they should not be viewed at too near a distance. With the foreground, the near at hand, Mr. Foottet—like Corot and many another modern—is not concerned, and his pictures begin at what would be the middle distance of an older landscape painter. Romanticist though he be, however, Mr. Foottet is not one of the innumerable imitators of the Barbizon School. The minor key, which these painters delighted to use, is rarely touched upon by Mr. Foottet. His romances are in the major, and while the men of 1830 edged towards the bass, our English painter runs up into the treble. A typical example of his art at its best is the fancifully named Song of Sunrise (No. 3), in which a stone bridge over a river, viewed at early morn, gives the painter a theme for an exquisite harmony in Cambridge blue and white. Although his exhibits at Suffolk Street through ensuing seasons have proved the painter to be limited neither in his choice of subject nor his range of colour, the collection at the Baillie Gallery suggests that his compositions are happiest when a bridge forms the leading motive, and his colour most enchanting when the scheme is light blue and white. In support of this statement we may instance the lovely little Study for "May's Herald"; The Bridge, Paris; and The White Wave.

This preference for the lighter and more delicate hues of Nature, together with an easily perceived preoccupation with problems of light, has led to the inclusion of Mr. Foottet among the luminists of modern art. But though Mr. Foottet has, perhaps, more in common with Monet, and especially Segantini, than any other painter, his art is emphatically personal and individual. He has a keener sense of the decorative than Monet, and his landscapes reveal a search for balance and deliberate design; but, like Monet, he prefers the more joyous and lyrical aspects of Nature to the more epic and tragic moods favoured by Segantini. Influenced by the decorative composition and semi-mystical attitude towards Nature of Corot, by the researches into light and fidelity to Nature's colouring of Monet, Mr. Foottet is an imitator of neither painter, but a sincere and original artist who has profited by the lessons of his predecessors in seeking out his own subjects and in expressing these in his own way.

A strong contrast to these loftily conceived canvases is afforded by the collection of caricatures by Messrs. Max Beerbohm, Joseph Simpson, Sime, "Sem," and others at the same gallery. Mr. Beerbohm is triumphantly whimsical in his vision of Mr. Henry James Revisiting America, and the clever work by other well-known humorous artists should make this exhibition extremely popular. Perhaps the promoter of the two exhibitions has a worthy educational purpose, and the populace attracted to the Gallery by caricature will stay to admire Romance and Symbolism.

MUSIC

THE QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

It is as difficult to formulate general principles for the construction of a good concert programme as it is easy to complain of either incongruity or sameness in any one attempt. Sometimes, however, one is conscious that the numbers follow one another particularly well, and so it was at the Symphony Concert of the Queen's Hall Orchestra last Saturday afternoon. The only thing which might have been bettered was the selection from the third act of Die Meistersinger at the beginning, which, though naturally popular in the programmes of the Promenade Concerts, is, after all, only a very effective piece of stage music, and is hardly stalwart enough to begin a serious concert. The prelude would have been more suitable for a modern concert-overture. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a Concertstück for violoncello and orchestra by Ernst von Dohnanyi, heard for the first time in England and given with all the authority that Professor Hugo Becker's playing imparts, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" followed.

A symphony by Beethoven, far from being prejudicial to it, is the best possible preparation for listening to new music. To a superficial listener everything may sound poor after Beethoven, because he only makes rough measurements and compares the bigness of the first with the smallness of what follows. One who really listens closely to the A major symphony gains therefrom a sense of security, of firmly rooted foundation, which prepares him well for what is new. It clears his outlook and helps him to penetrate obscurity, to distinguish the true from the false. Dohnanyi's work, therefore, was placed in the most favourable position that the work of so honest a composer could occupy; coming where it did it was impossible not to realise it as a very sincere piece of expression, moulded in a form sufficiently coherent to make its impression permanent. It is not a concerto, but a single movement bearing the general outlines of "first movement" form, though it contains an adagio as a central episode, returning to the subject-matter of the first part after it. In spite of the unconventional shape, however, it is difficult to escape the sensation that the composer is doing what has been done before, that there is a lack of vitality in the work as a whole. This may be partly due to the fact that the greater part is in a suave 3-4 measure, unrelieved by themes of any very forcible rhythm, and that the interpolation of the adagio lowers its vitality still further, at the point at which the pulse should quicken and the blood stir. The melodies of which it is built are beautiful, but not strikingly original, in fact they show very strongly the influence of Brahms and might almost have been by him. This is of course to praise and to condemn in one breath. The resemblance is strong enough to tempt comparison with the first movements of the second symphony and the violin concerto; both in the same key of D major and beginning with the same gentle mood and time. If in the symphony Brahms had stopped after the appearance of the second subject and not followed it with those vigorous episodes and that commanding development section, or if in the concerto he had rejected the imperious interruption of the episode which the solo violin plays upon three strings, we should have had something of similar temper to this. As such vivid contrasts as those of Brahms are lacking here, not even the virile playing of Professor Becker could relieve it of a certain weakness. Just before the coda, however, is one passage of remarkable force and originality, in which the solo player calls out, as it were, all the violoncelli of the orchestra to follow him. They are divided into four and five parts, and while at first the solo violoncello recalls the themes of the adagio, they accompany piano and then play more important imitative phrases till, led by the soloist, they gather in volume and rise to an exciting climax of tone, which culminates in the principal theme, played by the violoncelli of the orchestra against a long shake on a high note by the solo player. It subsides into the coda, which is made impressive by the reiteration of the first two bars of the principal theme, a waving figure of quavers upon the strings, accompanied by a solemn rhythm upon the drums, gradually dying away to a pianissimo ending. It is a case which proves what dignity is gained by repetition; its place in the coda gives to that little two-bar fragment an importance and a permanence in the memory which no other theme in the work has.

After this graceful but slender work the "pranks" of "Till Eulenspiegel" were very welcome, because, whatever else he has or has not, Strauss possesses an exuberant vitality which cannot help being invigorating. However his later works can be adduced in support of the theory that music in the future will substitute the chromatic for the diatonic scale it is difficult to imagine, though there is some excuse for the misapprehension in view of their difficulties; but "Till Eulenspiegel" certainly knows nothing of such an evolution, in fact it would be pointless but for the tonality of F major which pervades it. Its writhings and twistings are only forcible or quaint, as the case may be, in connection with its diatonic foundation. Other tendencies in Strauss's compositions are more easily understandable in this than in later works, his polyphonic methods and so forth, but besides such things the work is a splendid piece of whimsical writing and it was delightful, at the end of a rather serious concert, to watch Strauss or "Till Eulenspiegel"—it does not much matter which—cutting a caper. Of course writers of analytical notes tell us that we are to take it seriously, and perhaps Strauss means us to, but if he does, he should not choose cap and bells as his preaching garb, and while he does so he must forgive us if we mistake his sermon for a joke. Listened to by the same ears which heard the Seventh Symphony it certainly has something of the humour of the scherzo broadened into grotesque comedy. The twist by which Beethoven within the first twenty bars gains the key of A major and the violent juxtapositions of fortissimo and pianissimo are surely prototypes of the kind of humour which is one of, if not the most conspicuous characteristic of Strauss. Perhaps the difference is that Beethoven had so much to say that was serious that he did not fear the charge of buffoonery in his lighter moments. Strauss is not alone among modern composers who are afraid of allowing themselves to be lighthearted, and are anxious to insist in words upon a deeper meaning than the music implies. Be that as it may, there was no doubt about the merriment of the "pranks" as Mr. Wood and his orchestra interpreted them, and a very fine performance finished a concert in which all the orchestral playing was of a high order.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE scene of Mr. Bagot's forthcoming novel, "Temptation," is again laid in Italy. In his new work the author shifts his canvas from Rome and the intricacies of Roman society, and draws his characters from the ranks of the Italian provincial noblesse. The action of the story takes place in a well-known mediæval city in the Roman province, and is more poignant in its development than is the case in Mr. Bagot's preceding Italian studies. Messrs. Methuen will publish the book on St. Valentine's Day.

Mr. Edward Arnold announces a new novel by George A. Birmingham entitled "Benedict Kavanagh." It is to be published on February 12. Miss Edith Rickert's new novel "The Golden Hawk," of which the scene is laid in Provence, is announced for the 15th. Other books to come from the same house in the next few days are a volume of essays entitled "Six Radical Thinkers," by Professor John MacCunn, of the University of Liverpool, and Sir Rennell Rodd's two volumes on Greece in the Middle Ages, "The Princes of Achaia" and "The Chronicles of Morea."

The first number of the new "Social Problems Series" which Messrs. Jack announce will be a volume by Professor the men who lend." With what a kindly pen does he touch on the peculiarities of the borrower? What a strange quartet does he form of the greatest borrowers of all ages! Alcibiades would have been shrewdly surprised to find himself classed with Falstaff, Sir Richard Steele and the incomparable Brinsley. But there is one class of borrowers that he cannot away with, to wit "your borrowers of books"—those mutilators of collections, spoilers of the symmetry of shelves, and creators of odd volumes." Though to be sure he makes one exception even here: "I counsel thee, shut not thy heart, nor thy library, against S. T. C." Coleridge returned his books with usury; it is sad that the annotations of one's friends so seldom enhance the value of one's books. But people are not so lavish now with their "good things," and are far more likely to put them in their own note-books than in the margins of the books of their friends. Indeed if we are to judge at all by the samples found at random in books that pass through the hands of many readers, the standard of marginal annotation to-day is deplorable.

Many people would echo to-day the sentiment expressed by Lamb in one of his letters to Samuel Taylor Coleridge: "I am out of the world of readers. I hate all that do read, for they read nothing but reviews and new books. I gather myself up unto the old things." For we are all "hustled" nowadays by the daily output of half a column of new books. Those of us who would keep at all au courant with the books of to-day have not time to read the old books; and yet, like the old wine, the old books are best.

And best also are the books that each one collects for himself, especially if their purchase entails a sacrifice. How often the pleasure that a man gets out of his books varies inversely with his power of acquiring them! None knew better than Charles Lamb the triumph of bringing home a coveted prize, a joy unshared by the outside world, a private joy if there ever is one. Many who have thus collected a small library, book by book, reading each book before they bought another, will recollect the feeling of being amongst strangers when a sudden accession of books comes to them from a relation's legacy or the bequest of a friend. They set to work to make acquaintance with them, as in duty bound: but they are not of their choosing; the process is to a great extent perfunctory, and they never really catch up. For in the library as in the world a reader makes many acquaintances but few friends, and these few will be of his own choosing.

P. M. W.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. E. A. Fisher was, I consider, right in saying that the written word is not essentially a symbol of sound but rather a symbol of thought. In a derivative language such as ours, which borrows and adopts words from every tongue under the sun, I take it perfect uniformity between the pronunciation and the writing is neither possible nor desirable. Another correspondent argues that the language is the speech, not its feeble representation.

Unfortunately, however, the written language becomes enriched by the adoption of foreign-grown words, where often a change of spelling by us would render them meaningless! In nine cases out of ten, too, the written word is a better vehicle of thought than mere speech, and we are dependent for the greater part of our knowledge on the written language. Too great latitude in spelling would certainly never do, as, in my opinion, ignorance of meaning by many would frequently strike at the very root of a word's raison d'être.

F. D. T. LANGE,

February 2.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

Nordau, Max. On Art and Artists. Translated by W. F. Harvey. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 351. Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.

Coenen, Frans. Essays on Glass, China, Silver, etc., in connection with the Willet-Holthuysen Museum Collection, Amsterdam. With 32 illustrations. 10½ × 7½. Pp. 62. Werner Laurie, 6s.

[Essays published at long intervals in Onze Kunst.]

Hutton, Edward. Perugino. 6 × 4. Pp. 200. Duckworth, 2s. net.

[In the "Popular Library of Art."]

Addison, Julia de Wolf. The Art of the Dresden Gallery. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 455. Bell, 6s. net.

["A critical survey of the schools and painters as represented in the Royal Collection." Short bibliography and index.]

ETHNOLOGY

Werner, A. The Natives of British Central Africa. With 32 full-page illustrations. 9 × 5½. Pp. 303. Constable, 6s. net. [In the "Native Races of the British Empire" series.]

FICTION

Baynton, Barbara. Human Toll. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 344. Duckworth, 6s.

Marchmont, A. W. In the Cause of Freedom. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 318. Ward, Lock, 6s.

Ellis, Mrs. Havelock. Kit's Woman. A Cornish Idyll. 7½ × 5. Pp. 163. Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d. (See p. 144.)

Lysaght, Sidney Royse. Her Majesty's Rebels. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 488. Macmillan, 6s.

Macnaughton, S. The Expensive Miss du Cane. 7½ × 5. Pp. 302. Heinemann, 6s.

"Rita." The Pointing Finger. 7½ × 5. Pp. 306. Nash, 6s.

Dawe, Carlton. Her Highness's Secretary. A Romance. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 341. Nash, 6s.

Watson, E. H. Lacon. The Barony of Brendon. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 320. Brown, Langham, 6s.

Dill, Bessie. My Lady Nan. 8 × 5½. Pp. 393. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Hope, Graham. Amalia. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 316. Smith, Elder, 6s.

Summers, Dorothy. A Man's Love. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 314. Unwin, 6s.

Meade, L. T. The Girl and her Fortune. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 288. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[Lovers of the works of Mrs. Meade—though it is unlikely that they read the ACADEMY—will be enraptured on finding, opposite the title-page of this the latest expression of her genius, a portrait of the author.]

Marshall, Archibald. Exton Manor. 7½ × 5. Pp. 406. Alston Rivers, 6s.

Emerson, Willis George. The Builders. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 361. Brown Langham, 6s.

HISTORY

Indiscreet Letters from Peking. Edited by B. L. Putnam Weale. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 310. Hurst & Blackett, 7s. 6d. net.

["Being the notes of an eye-witness, which set forth in some detail, from day to day, the real story of the siege and sack of a distressed capital in 1900—the year of great tribulation."]

LITERATURE

Young, Charles Alexander. The Waverley Novels. An appreciation. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 136. MacLehose, 3s. net.

Huchon, R. Un poète réaliste anglais: George Crabbe, 1754-1832. 10 × 6½. Paris: Librairie Hachette, n.p.

MISCELLANEOUS

James, Henry. The American Scene. 8½ × 6. Pp. 465. Chapman & Hall, 12s. 6d. net.

The Golden Sayings of the Blessed Brother Giles of Assisi. Newly translated and edited, together with a sketch of his life, by the Rev. Fr. Paschal Robinson. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 141. Philadelphia: The Dolphin Press, $1.00.

Schooling, John Holt. London County Council Finance from the beginning down to March 31, 1907, made clear to ratepayers. With 57 tables and 21 diagrams. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 168. Murray, 2s. 6d. net.

Deane, Anthony. Friends and Fellow-Labourers of St. Paul. Some character-studies. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 107. Wells Gardner, 1s. 6d.

[Gamaliel; Apollos; Barnabas; Philemon; Priscilla and Aquila; Timothy.]

Sutherland, William. The Colonisation of Scotland. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 94. Rider, 1s. net.

[Articles which have appeared in the columns of the Glasgow Herald.]

Curtis, Adela. The New Mysticism. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 196. Curtis & Dawson, n.p.

[Six lectures given in Kensington and at Cobham, Surrey, in November 1906.]

Hyatt, Alfred H. The Pocket George Eliot. 5½ × 3½. Pp. 203. Chatto & Windus, 2s. net.

["Being passages chosen from the works of George Eliot."]

Dacey, Edward. The Egypt of the Future. 7½ × 5. Pp. 216. Heinemann, 3s. 6d. net.

The Public Schools Year Book 1907. 7½ × 5. Pp. 668. Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Shepherd, Frederick B. Bernardine. A dramatic poem. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 134. Clifton: Baker; London: Simpkin, Marshall, 2s. net.

Scott, Frederick George. A Hymn of Empire, and other poems. 8×5½. Pp. 55. Toronto: Briggs, n.p.

Hall, H. R. Rondeaux and Songs. 6¼×4. Pp. 31. Parker, 1s. net.

[Some of these pieces have previously appeared in the ACADEMY and some in Country Life.]

Hills, Malcolm H. The Cavaliers. A story in rhyme. 7½×5. Pp. 166. Birmingham: Cornish, 2s. 6d. net.

PSYCHOLOGY

Mitchell, W. Structure and Growth of the Mind. 9×6. Pp. 512. Macmillan, 10s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

Poems by Robert Burns. With an introduction by Neil Munro. Pp. 245. Poems by Matthew Arnold. With an introduction by Alice Meynell. Pp. 300. Essays by William Hazlitt. With an introduction by Charles Whibley. Pp. 451. Each 6×4¼. Blackie, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net each.

Poems of Herrick. Selected and edited, with an introduction, by the Rev. Canon Beeching. 7×5. Pp. 258. Jack, 2s. 6d. net. [In the "Golden Poets" series.]

Lodge, Thomas. Rosalynde. A novel. With 8 photogravures and several line illustrations by Thomas Maybank. Pp. 150. 8½×6. Pp. 150. Routledge, 3s. 6d. net. [In the "Photogravure and Colour" series.]

Dampier's Voyages. Edited by John Masefield. In 2 volumes—vol. ii. 9×6. Pp. 624. E. Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. net.

["Consisting of a New Voyage Round the World, a Supplement to the Voyage Round the World, Two Voyages to Campeachy, a Discourse of Winds, a Voyage to New Holland, and a Vindication, in answer to the Chimerical Relation of William Funnell."]

The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by Sir Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall. With many hundred illustrations and notes and introduction to each play by various writers. Vols. ix. and x. Each 9×6½. Pp. 264 and 276. Gresham Publishing Co., n.p.

[New volumes in the "Henry Irving Shakespeare." Vol. ix. contains: Othello and Hamlet; Vol. x.: Measure for Measure, King Lear, and Pericles.]

Eliot, George. Felix Holt the Radical. 8½×5½. Pp. 487. With photogravure frontispiece by Edgar Bundy. Blackwood, 3s. 6d. net.

[Addition to the new "Popular Edition" of the works of George Eliot.]

Grote, George. A History of Greece from the time of Solon to 403 B.C. Condensed and edited, with notes and appendices, by J. M. Mitchell and M. O. B. Caspari. 9×6. Pp. 812. Routledge, 5s. net.

[A summary of omissions is given in the Editors' preface. They have "embodied a great deal of valuable and, to the best of their knowledge, unpublished material from the lecture notes and private instruction of their former tutor, the Rev. E. M. Walker." A short bibliography, covering the whole of Greek history down to the Roman Conquest, has been appended.]

Macnamara, T. J. School-Room Humour. 6¼×4¼. Pp. 157. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 1s.

Albanesi, E. Maria. Simple Simon. Illustrated by Reginald Savage. 8½×5½. Pp. 114. Newnes, 6d.

Haggard, H. Rider. The Witch's Head. Illustrated by Cyrus Cuneo. 8½×6. Pp. 216. Newnes, 6d.

Schnabel, Dr. Carl. Handbook of Metallurgy. Translated by Henry Louis. Second edition. Vol. ii. 8¼×6¼. Pp. 867. Macmillan, 21s. net.

[Deals with Zinc, Cadmium, Mercury, Bismuth, Tin, Antimony, Arsenic, Nickel, Cobalt, Platinum, and Aluminium.]

THEOLOGY

Masterman, J. Howard B. "I Believe in the Holy Ghost." 6¼×4¼. Pp. 106. Wells Gardner, 2s.

["A study of the doctrine of the holy spirit in the light of modern thought."]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

Ewing, William. Arab and Druze at Home. 31 illustrations and map. 8½×5½. Pp. 180. Jack, 5s. net.

[A record of travel and intercourse with the peoples east of the Jordan.]

Mallik, M. C. Impressions of a Wanderer. 7½×5. Pp. 232. Unwin, 5s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

Religion and Experience, by J. Brierley (Clarke, 6s.), helps to confirm the good impression we had formed of this writer from reading his "Eternal Religion." It is not that the thought is, strictly speaking, original, except in its expression and illustration. The chief value of the book consists in the facts that the writer combines a truly liberal with a deeply religious spirit; that he is steeped in the thoughts of the world's highest thinkers, ancient and modern, and that he is able to place their ideas before his readers in such telling fashion that they may be "understood of the people." We do not mean to suggest that he contributes nothing which is really his own. The book abounds in suggestive sayings and illuminating touches which throw new light upon old ideas, giving them life and reality. As an instance of this may be cited his striking treatment of "A Question of Age," wherein he takes a line which, though running counter to conventional notions, gives at once an impression of truth. One of the most characteristic features of this, as of the other work, is the way in which he seems to pierce to the essence of the religious idea beneath its outward and changing expressions, and, while showing himself no slave to the past, reinterprets it in the light of the present. This writer does not shirk difficulties, but faces them, not with the easy optimism which is only too common and which only explains them away, but with a healthy, virile and practical idealism, as in the excellent chapters on "The Religion of Calamity," "Of Self-creation," and "The Farther Side."

The Blessed John Vianney, Curé D'Ars. By Joseph Vianney. Translated by C. W. W. (Duckworth, 3s. net.)—In this little volume of two hundred pages we have a well-written and interesting sketch of the life of this remarkable "soldier of the cross." The saint's early piety, his struggles and difficulties owing to imperfect education, the action of his victorious will, supported by the sense of mission, in overcoming them; his wonderful devotion, zeal and self-renunciation, and its still more wonderful fruits, are described, on the whole, with calmness and moderation. The "miraculous" element is not unduly exalted, though the saint is asserted to have had that gift of healing which is claimed by the adherents of so many present-day cults. One cannot help feeling that, if the account here given of his austerities, combined with overwhelming labours, is literally true, he must not only have possessed an iron will but have inherited an extraordinarily vigorous constitution from his peasant ancestors, in order to have been able, as he did, to live and work up to old age. And in any case the most probable theory to account for the remarkable series of hallucinations from which he is said to have suffered for many years, is that they were due to such pious excesses, rather than to the malice of the devil to which he ascribed them. It is clear, however, that the narrative is not free from exaggeration.

Life and Evolution. By F. W. Headley. (Duckworth, 8s. net.)—When it was proposed that Goldsmith should write a history of animated nature, Johnson declared that it would read like a fairy-tale. Mr. Headley's book is like Goldsmith's in that it is vastly entertaining, but whereas Goldsmith's book is notoriously incorrect, Mr. Headley's is a mass of facts placed before the reader in a pleasantly familiar style. It is indeed, in Tennyson's phrase, a series of "the fairy-tales of science," in which we are shown the slow steps by which life crept into higher forms from moneron to man, the text being largely supplemented by excellent illustrations from drawings and photographs. The value of the book lies in the strong impulse it is sure to raise in many readers to verify the statements for themselves, and thereby enlarge the circle of students of science. The author has ranged his facts admirably and the book, being written in very simple and almost non-scientific language, should be very widely read. The illustration facing p. 51 has been inserted upside down in our copy and "head" should be substituted for "leg" in the sentence "The horse, with his leg tied to his fore-feet, looked as if he were eating" (p. 116, l. 12 from top).

The Science Year Book and Diary for 1907. Edited by Major B. F. S. Baden-Powell (King, 5s. net.)—This is the third year of issue of this excellent diary which contains astronomical, physical and chemical tables, a summary of progress in science, and biographies of eminent scientists. This last should be either completed or be omitted; such names for instance, as Hartog, Shipley, I. B. J. Sollas, and E. W. MacBride, and McWeeny are not in the list.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PROBLEMS and PRIZES

For Literary Readers

SEE PAGE 6 OF THE

Westminster Gazette

EVERY SATURDAY

Offices: Tudor St., London, E.C.

READY at commencement of
PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

1907 Edition

Illustrated with 500 Armorial Engravings.

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH

A full and complete Parliamentary Guide, with particulars of all pollings at last two General and all subsequent Bye Elections; changes in personnel of the House since last appeal to Constituencies; Abridged Peerage; List of Privy Council; and Biographies of Judges of High and County Courts, Recorders, Colonial Judges, etc. etc.

490 pp. cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

Learning the Profession of Literature.

A careful study of the principles that underlie literary success, and a judicious training not only in the literary form, but in that business knowledge the literary man or woman must acquire, will help you to success as an author.

Our Success Course is written by a novelist whose name is a household word. It will save you years of fruitless striving, because it will teach you the principles essential to success. It consists of twelve practical lessons (with exercises corrected by experts), and forms a complete apprenticeship to literature. We criticise students' MSS. free, and have excellent channels for placing every description of literary work from paragraph to novel.

For full particulars write for Pamphlet to

The Literary Correspondence College,

9 Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

WHAT TO READ ?

It is always a little problem, especially in these days when there are so many new books. But you can solve it by simply getting the February BOOK MONTHLY, which is now ready, 6d. net. It gives every information about the books of to-day and to-morrow, and has "snap-shot" reviews of the best and best-selling ones. For the rest, it has fresh literary articles and is beautifully illustrated. Write for a specimen copy to the publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationer's Hall Court, London.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1815

FEBRUARY 16, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

THE Council of the College invites applications for the Post of Assistant Lecturer in the Training Departments (Women). N.F.U. qualifications desirable.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications with testimonials (which need not be printed) must be sent on or before Saturday, March 2, 1907.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Registrar.

February 13, 1907.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 12s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. of every description typewritten with promptness and accuracy at 7d. per 1000 words. Envelope addressing and duplicating circulars at lowest terms. Specimens and testimonials on application.—Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

TYPEWRITING (all branches). Notes, Reports, Lectures, Essays, Sermons, Stories, Plays, Verse, etc. Careful, accurate, prompt. 10d. 1000 words. Trials solicited.—Miss M. OWEN, 3 Nelson Street, Hertford.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Books for Sale.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE EDINBURGH ENCYCLOPÆDIA, conducted by Sir David Brewster. 18 vols, 4to, half calf, 1830, 30s.—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

PARKMAN, FRANCIS, THE WORKS OF, in 12 vols., post 8vo, cloth, published by Macmillan at £5 2s. net, offered at 50s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

DOWELL'S History of Taxation, 4 vols Down the Road, 1875
Doyle (R.) Christening Procession of Prince Taffy, coloured plates, 8vo, 1842
Doyle (R.) Tournament; or Chivalry Revived, coloured plates, oblong 4to, 1830
Dramatic Portraits, any Collection of
Drayton (M.) Poems, 1619
Poly-Olbion, 1613 or 1622
Dr. Syntax in London, 1820, complete, or any odd parts
Dr. Syntax's Tours, 3 vols, 1812-1815-1820, or any odd parts of either
Drummond (W.) Poems, 1656
Forth Feasting, 1617
Poems, 1616, 1656, 1659
Dulcken, Scenes from Pickwick (4 plates in wrapper), n.d. (1861)
Dugdale's St. Paul's Cathedral, folio, 1657
Dunstall (J.) Book of Flowers, Fruits, Birds, Beasts, etc. Four Series, or any, oblong quarto, 1661, etc.
D'Urfe (T.) Wit and Mirth; or, Pills, etc., 6 vols, 1719-20
Earle's Views in New Zealand
Eccentric Tales from the German, 1827
Roque Francaise, Les Estampes en Couleurs du xviii siecle, double set of proofs, 1885
Eden, State of the Poor, 3 vols, 4to
Edinburgh University Magazine, Jan. to April, 1871, or any
Edwin and Angelina, 1765
Egan (Pierce) Life of an Actor, 1825

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY (AND WEEKLY).

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No. 1 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

NEW VOLUME OF THE "HISTORICAL SERIES FOR BIBLE STUDENTS."

Outlines for the Study of Biblical History and Literature

FROM THE EARLIEST
TIMES TO 200 A.D.

By FRANK KNIGHT SANDERS, Ph.D., D.D., and HENRY THATCHER FOWLER, Ph.D. With Maps and Charts, crown 8vo, 6s.
* These outlines enable the student to get at the Bible itself in a most helpful way, to realise vividly the story which it relates, the supplements or develops, and to appreciate the various stages in the gradual development of the Israel which became the world's religious teacher.
[On February 18.]

THE STONES OF PARIS IN HISTORY AND LETTERS.

By BENJAMIN ELLIS MARTIN and CHARLOTTE M. MARTIN. New and Cheaper Edition. In 1 vol. With many Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

* A few copies of the two-volume edition are still to be had. Price 18s.

[On February 18.]

LETTERS TO YOUNG AND OLD.

By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, Author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden." 7s. 6d. net.

ATHENEUM.—"If every one's letters were as informative and entertaining and suggestive as Mrs. Earle's, life would be more interesting, at least as far as correspondence is concerned. Altogether it is a delightful gossiping olla podrida."

THE FRIENDS OF VOLTAIRE.

By S. G. TALLENTYRE. With Portraits, 9s. net.

TRUTH.—"All Miss Talentyne's portraits stand out clear and sharp in this graphic book which deserves an honoured and permanent place in the library."

THE FUTURE OF RUSSIA.

Translated from the German of Government-Councillor RUDOLF MARTIN by Miss HULDA FRIEDERICH. 7s. 6d. net.

STANDARD.—"Clever, well-reasoned, and full of information."

PROVINCIAL LETTERS and other Papers.

By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary." 5s. net.

TIMES.—"Delightful examples of the art of light and graceful causerie."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

FIELDING & SMOLLETT'S NOVELS

The Best Available Library Editions in the Market.

In large type, with Engraved Portraits and

ALL THE ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS

By H. K. BROWNE ("Phiz")

Large 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. each vol.

FIELDING

AMELIA. 544 pp.
JOSEPH ANDREWS. 340 pp.
TOM JONES. 2 vols., 854 pp.

JONATHAN WILD; Journey to Next World. 326 pp.

SMOLLETT

RODERICK RANDOM. 492 pp.
PEREGRINE PICKLE. 2 vols.
840 pp.
FERDINAND, COUNT
FATHOM. 428 pp.

SIR LANCELOT GREAVES.
ADVENTURES OF AN ATOM.
390 pp.
HUMPHRY CLINKER. 374 pp.

2s. Editions, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, are also published of

AMELIA, JOSEPH ANDREWS, TOM JONES,

HUMPHRY CLINKER, PEREGRINE PICKLE,

AND RODERICK RANDOM.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD., LONDON.

Macmillan and Co.'s List.

A Powerful Story of Passion and Politics.

HER MAJESTY'S REBELS

6/-

By S. R. LYSAGHT

MORNING POST.—"Altogether 'Her Majesty's Rebels' is a remarkable book, and no one on the lookout for the best in contemporary fiction can afford to miss it. It would be vain to attempt to 'place' Mr. Lysaght on the strength of it, but—we shall read it again."

OLD HAMPSHIRE VIGNETTES.

By the AUTHOR OF "MADEMOISELLE IXE" and "CECILIA DE NOËL."

Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

EPISTLE OF ST. JUDE AND THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PETER.

[Greek Text, with Introduction, Notes, and Comments.]

By JOSEPH B. MAYOR, M.A., Litt.D.

8vo, 14s. net.

New Book by Author of "The Faith of a Christian."

THE FIFTH GOSPEL.

Being the Pauline Interpretation of the Christ.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE IN ANCIENT ATHENS:

The Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day.

By Prof. T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. (Camb.)

Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities.]

TRIBUNE.—"The author has done his work excellently. . . . A most useful little book."

PART II. NOW READY.

ÆSCHYLUS IN ENGLISH VERSE.

Part II. PROMETHEUS BOUND. THE SUPPLIANT MAIDENS.

By ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Lit. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

* * Previously Published: Part I. 3s. 6d. net.

STRUCTURE AND GROWTH OF THE MIND.

By W. MITCHELL, Hughes Professor of Philosophy, University of Adelaide. 8vo, 10s. net.

* * A book on the theory of the mind, written as a text-book for University students, but a general reader will find no difficulty in reading it, if he is not too anxious to run as he reads.

STUDIES IN HUMANISM.

By F. C. S. SCHILLER, M.A., D.Sc.

8vo, 10s. net.

SEVENTH AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE METHODS OF ETHICS.

By Prof. HENRY SIDGWICK.

8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

H. FIELDING.

By AUSTIN DOBSON.

Crown 8vo. Library Edition, 2s. net. Popular Edition, 1s. 6d.; Sewed 1s [English Men of Letters.]

TOM JONES.

Two vols. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net each. Roxburgh binding, 5s. net each.

[Library of English Classics.]

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . .	155	A Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Air and Space in Literature .	167
A New Criticism of Herrick .	157	Fiction	168
Euripides the Human . . .	158	Drama:
The First Tudors	159	Mr. St. John Hankin's Comedy
"Literary History"	160	at the Stage Society . . .	169
The Literary Table	161	Fine Art:
"Measure for Measure" . . .	162	The Late James Charles . .	170
Henry Fielding	163	Forthcoming Books	170
Henry Fielding's Library . .	164	Correspondence	171
A Fielding Bibliography . . .	166	Books Received	172
The Bookshelf [.	173

This number contains an Illustrated Supplement

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Island 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It may be centuries have been somewhat overdone in Great Britain during the last few years, and that the public has become a little weary of them. We trust, however, that the two hundredth centenary of the birth of Henry Fielding will not be allowed to pass without suitable attention. Henry Fielding, who was born at Glastonbury, Somerset, on April 22, 1707, and died at Lisbon, in the forty-seventh year of his age, remains still the greatest of our English novelists. If he has a rival it is Sir Walter Scott, and Sir Walter, with characteristic modesty, ever looked upon him as a master. It has been the fashion in puritanical times to look upon Fielding as deficient in morality, but this, we think, is a mistaken view. It is the narrow-minded man who exaggerates human peccadilloes and offences. It was a deadly sin in the eye of an old parish minister of Scotland to shave on Sunday. It is a deadly sin on the part of some martinets of to-day to play a game at cards, to bet on a horse-race, or to indulge in what is called a little flutter on the Stock Exchange. But a mind raised above these trivial issues, although it may not defend offences against the manners of the time, is able to look on them with a wide and sunny toleration.

Fielding had "gone through the mill" himself. Brought up with extravagant ideas, untrained to the economy and prudence that abject poverty teaches, and of a very generous and open nature, he had been something of a spendthrift. We can fancy him in merry mood at a play or at a tavern, even at resorts of a more questionable nature. His was certainly no cloistered virtue. But he came out of those experiences imbued with a wide understanding. He could reveal the follies and even the sins of youth, though nowhere is he found to commend them. But he who takes the whole universe for his province cannot feel or even simulate the indignation of the man who concentrates his gaze upon one putrid spot.

Again, Fielding lived in the gay, clever, material eighteenth century at a time when the squires whom he knew best drank hard, and hunted hard, and swore and lived self-contained, almost brutish lives, while in town the note was one of happy, clever, unconcerned materialism. Fielding looked out on this lively, and, as some thought, wicked world with eyes that had a good deal of laughter and often of mockery in them. He appraised at their true worth the aims and ambitions of his contemporaries, but he also knew the value of a man like Mr. Allworthy, whose goodness he is never tired of praising. He himself belonged to the tribe of Cervantes and Molière and Le Sage. He was no stern moralist, and yet it will be found that the rule of right is seldom transgressed in his works. No writer is worthier of a memorial celebration.

France at this moment is much more classical than we; for Paris has on the boards of the Comédie Française and des Arts respectively the Electra of Sophocles and the Clouds of Aristophanes. (The Barcelona theatres have had an Electra which is by neither Sophocles nor Euripides, but by Perez Galdos, a political anti-Jesuit writer.) Even such a good Parnassien and old friend of Leconte de Lisle as Catulle Mendès protests against the plethora of classicism in the capital. It is only a year and a half since Greek tragedy was last on these French boards at the Nouveau. English subjects, especially Shakespeare, vary Hellenism in Paris. At the Odéon is de Vigny's Chatterton, in whose text figure such words as emburled, deslavatic, acool, vocables unknown to the Neglected English Dictionary, and the Chattertonian orthography mysterk, for mystic (Stello, p. 61); but then "in London one does not know one's Chatterton"! The Electra is translated fairly literally by M. A. Poizat, but the Clouds cannot compare (at least to a modern Greek) with Soures's edition, which "did" the provinces, and Egypt, a few years ago, to the delight of the sea-divided Hellene. Soures is as "Athenian" to-day as was Socrates, travestied by, and present at, the Clouds representation. Surely this renaissance in the metropolis of fashion and taste is an earnest of new interest in old Greek, and is especially natural, as regards tragedy, in a country which has been faithful, through good and evil report, to the Three Unities.

Two Electras ("sad Electra's poet" does not figure here, as lending himself but little to the claque!), one in Paris and one in Spain, and an Old Attic comedy in Lutetia—are facts to give us pause. But did this comedy kill Saint Socrates? and did we kill Thomas Chatterton? and starve Milton? and deny bread to Spencer (so De Vigny's Stello justly spells the begetter of The Faery Queen, p. 238)? Galdos now triumphs in the land that sent Camoëns to the hospital and Cervantes to final destitution. To our account stand Dryden's death and non-burial; S. Butler, Sydenham, Rushworth, and their dreary ends. Each country has its quota of neglected talent.

A modern French writer wrote this week that, after all, Chatterton was a feeble forger and given to mean envy. He was, also, too inartistically old-fashioned, with his "cloudes" (not of the prægrandis senex):

hiltring atteness the sunnis fefive face, and the blacke tempeste swolne and gathered up apace.

The pretended Rowley du Mouline could hardly, had he existed, have written these lines in or about 1449. And my Lord Mayor, the author of "Vathek," had done well had he, as M. le comte de Vigny makes him in his imagination, cured the Bristol boy of poetry; and Horace Walpole better, had he not refused his manuscript.

But what are our forgers, Chatterton and Macpherson, to Galileo Galilei, Blaise Pascal, G. W. Leibnitz? The Italian is accused of borrowing the telescope (perspicillum) invention from a Middelbourg spectacle-maker, with which to see his Jupiter's satellites on January 7, 1610. The Frenchman, as one of his own countrymen also has written lately, in the Revue de Paris, borrowed from Descartes the idea of quicksilver's sensibility to rarefied air. And the German-Slav philosopher even changed the dates of documents after copying Newton's Calculus discoveries. Again, Robert Estienne robbed Meigret, as the parallel quotations of Professor F. Brunot, in his lately-published book, fully and unhappily prove. If things go on at this rate, now that Moses has been shown to have assimilated the Babylonian Code, we shall soon be asking from whom the Mathematics of the Rhind papyrus (circa ix. cent. B.C.) were silently annexed.

We have protested several times in these columns against what we regard as a pernicious habit: the insertion of snippet introductions at the beginning of reprints of the classics. The writers of many—we might almost say the majority—of them are incompetent, and the result of their criticism (for they are seldom content with the statement of facts) is that the reader who is unacquainted with the work reprinted goes to it with a prejudiced and often narrow-minded opinion of its merits or defects. If these "appreciators" must soothe the cacoethes scribendi, their lucubrations should be placed at the end, not the beginning of the book. Then the reader could—possibly with profit to himself—compare his judgment with theirs. Occasionally, as in Dr. Ward's edition of Mrs. Gaskell's works, and in Canon Beeching's selection of Herrick's poems, which we notice in another column, we would not willingly have missed the introductions, but these are isolated instances and do not affect the principle involved. Three little books—"Essays by William Hazlitt," "Poems by Robert Burns," and "Poems by Matthew Arnold"—very tastefully printed and bound, and issued in Messrs. Blackie's "Red Letter Library," serve to illustrate the merits and the defects of the fashion against which we raise our voice in vain.

Of the introductions, the first is good, the second indifferent, the third bad. For Mr. Charles Whibley's sympathetic essay on Hazlitt we have nothing but praise. It is sound and scholarly, and enthusiasm never gets the better of the critical faculty. Mr. Whibley does not "gush." He shows us, in a few excellently worded sentences, Hazlitt as he was; he never attempts to intrude his own views about the work itself; knowing the man, we may love his writing or despise it. That is as it should be. Mr. Whibley, we feel, will regret, with us, that the publishers have seen fit to spoil his work by appending a multitude of notes, many of which would be regarded as an insult by a man with the intelligence of a fifth-form schoolboy. We may take as a characteristic example:

Rembrandt (1607-1669), Dutch painter, famous for his treatment of biblical subjects, etchings, portraits, and pictorial studies of old age . . .

Is it not illuminating?

Mr. Neil Munro's "introduction" to Burns is unremarkable and contains nothing that has not been better said many times before. We are grateful for the glossary. Not every one knows that "leal" means "loyal." Mrs. Meynell has been chosen to "introduce" Matthew Arnold, and this is how she sets to work:

Rare is the surprise of Matthew Arnold's poetry. But we may recognise it in that most beautiful line, at once cold and moving,

The unplumbed, salt, estranging sea;

and in the unusual depth, calm, and gravity of the tragic line in "Sohrab and Rustum"—

Soon be that day, my son, and deep that sea.

Matthew Arnold's thought is reputed to be more trivial and querulous than in truth it is . . . His poetry belongs to his youth, and even to an imitative stage of youth, which in his case must have lasted long. Much of it has the little scholarly strut of a lad conscious of an uncommon interest in the classics. We shall perhaps do his talent, his intellect, and his distinction the best justice if we read much of his verse, lofty though it is, as the work of a young man—a lad much belated—and then we admire him as a wonderful boy indeed,

We wish that Matthew Arnold could have read this.

We have received an amusing letter from a correspondent, from which the following is an extract. It ought to be added that he was good enough to send with it the bill referred to:

It is said that ignorance, by unknown twists and turns, frequently transforms itself into delightful and unconscious humour. Here are a few apt illustrations from my bookseller's bill lately received. First offence: "Tom Jones" is put down as "Fielding's Poems." Secondly, Mr. A. O. Prichard's translation of "Longinus on the Sublime" is spoken of as "1 Sublime Transaltion"; truly a sublime translation of ignorance into wit! But thirdly, the greatest offence of all, and terribly shocking to the gentle spirits of those who see "God in Everything and Everything in God," a book on Pantheism is written down as "Pantherism"—something evidently aggressively savage and certainly not consonant with the ending words of Mr. J. Allanson Picton's little book, i.e., "For we [Pantheists] have passed 'To where beyond these voices there is peace.'"

From Messrs. Sisley, who, for some reason which we are unable to fathom, label themselves "Makers of Beautiful Books," comes a volume which they are pleased to call "Ovid's Art of Love." Their claim might have been justified had as much care been bestowed upon the inside as upon the outward adornment. The binding is excellent and the endpapers of no particular demerit; the type and paper are poor, and in the copy sent to us, the sheets have been so badly folded that many pages are askew, and on some the print is down in the "gutter" on one side, leaving a vast margin on the other. The book opens up questions of the ethics of editing with which we have no space to deal. The reader should have been told definitely, for instance, that the translation of Book I. is by Dryden, that of Book II. by the Rev. Dr. Yalden, and that of Book III. by Congreve.

In his Introduction, Mr. C. W. Ryle says that "coarseness and indelicacy of expression," which too often mar seventeenth- and eighteenth-century versions of the classics, "have been carefully expunged." When we find by comparing editions—for Mr. Ryle does not indicate where his blue pencil has been at work—that this bowdlerising means not merely the toning down of a phrase and the excision of a couplet here and there, but the omission of passages of considerable length—in the episode of Pasiphaë, upwards of sixty lines—we wonder why the Makers of Beautiful Books thought it worth while to print so wicked a work as this at all. Having decided that it was worth while, they might have reflected that the author's name and the title of the poem suffice to warn off the puritanical. Those who would be shocked by what has been expunged will be equally shocked by the mangled remains. The non-classical reader who wishes to know what Ovid had to say will not thank Mr. Ryle for looking carefully after his morals, and will turn to the complete work—not very difficult to come by. Thrice happy is he who can bid meticulous editors go hang, and with his feet on the fender enjoy Ovid entire.

For, after all, "Glorious John" has given us an adaptation of the poem to the manners of his own day rather than a translation. How little care has been taken to preserve the "local colour" is shown by the insertion of such a couplet as (p. 20):

Dress not, in short, too little or too much;
And be not wholly French, nor wholly Dutch;

by the rendering of gausapa by crape (p. 40), and by the mention of Ruelles (p. 64). Here and there we have the Dryden touch, e.g. (p. 17):

With daily lies she dribs thee into cost;

and (p. 23):

Clip every word, and if by chance you speak
Too home . . .

We have noted a few misprints: dove for drove (p. 8), head for hand (p. 22), Pæan for Pæan (p. 30), their for your (p. 56, last line but three), best for bets (p. 65, last line), Danæ for Danaë (p. 67); and an is omitted before Umbrian on p. 64, line 7.

English journalism has lost one of her greatest sons in Sir William Howard Russell, who died last Sunday at the age of eighty-six. He was the first of war-correspondents in the sense that he revived what had never been a very serious profession, and brought it up to a point of excellence, which will probably never be reached again. His predecessors were few in number and never realised what power lay within the reach of the special correspondent: the best known of them were Crabbe Robinson and G. L. Gruneisen, who are remembered now as literary men and the friends of literary celebrities, rather than as war-correspondents. It is remarkable that the lead given by the Times during the Crimea was followed by almost every paper, and it was during that campaign that the artist-correspondent first appeared in the shape of Mr. William Simpson.

Many novelists have been war-correspondents, though the imagination that is indispensable to the writer of fiction is not wholly desirable in the correspondent. Russell's novel was not a success, partly because the qualities indispensable in a great journalist are not those which make a great novelist. We find, indeed, that the merit of the correspondent and of the novelist vary inversely. There were, for example, William Black, Frederick Boyle, and G. A. Henty, all of whom made their reputations on fields other than that of war, though all were at some time special correspondents. The last two accompanied the Abyssinian expedition of 1867, when the journalistic honours of the day fell to the lot of H. M. Stanley, who, with characteristic energy and enterprise, rode to the coast with the earliest news of the fall of Magdala.

The Corporation Art Gallery of Birmingham has received from a body of subscribers three tapestries designed by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, a native of Birmingham, and woven by Messrs. Morris and Co. The works, which are reproductions in method of mediæval arras tapestry, are part of the series illustrating the quest of the Holy Grail and were till recently in Compton Hall, Wolverhampton. The gift was made as a token of appreciation of the work done by the Art Gallery Committee, and especially by Mr. Whitworth Wallis, the Director, who has done much to make the Birmingham collection one of the best in the provinces.

The library of Mr. R. Kirkham Hodgson, of Ashgrove, Sevenoaks, will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge, on Wednesday the 20th inst. The collection is notable for topographical and historical books. Amongst them are Chauncey's Antiquities of Hertfordshire, 1700; Clutterbuck's Hertfordshire; Hasted's History of Kent, 4 vols., 1778-99; and Whitaker's History of Richmondshire, 2 vols., large paper, 1823. There is a fine large paper copy of the 1788 (Paris) edition of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, with beautiful plates after Cipriani, etc., and engraved by Bartolozzi and others. There is also Dibdin's Bibliotheca Spenceriana and some of his other bibliographical works, the original issue of the 1817-30 edition of Dugdale's Monasticon, a first edition of Scrope's Art of Deer-Stalking, and a second folio Shakespeare.

LITERATURE

A NEW CRITICISM OF HERRICK

Poems of Herrick. Selected, with an Introduction, by the Rev. Canon BEECHING. (Jack, 2s. 6d. net.)

IN these pages we have often protested against the habit of prefixing an appreciation to a new edition of one of the poets. The critical essay with which Canon Beeching introduces the poems of Herrick is, however, justified by its own success. He himself is a poet, and—what is more to the purpose—he belongs to the tribe of Herrick. Long before reading this preface we noticed in Canon Beeching's work evidence of the same spirit, the same artistic aim, that we find in the "Hesperides," and no one but a lifelong and intelligent admirer could have written the critical essay that we now have under consideration. It begins with a simple and unbiassed little biography in which the most interesting point is that Herrick in London was a friend and disciple of Ben Jonson. "At the Sun, the Dog, the Triple Tun," it was "we" who became "nobly wild, not mad." Herrick certainly belonged to the tribe of Ben:

When I a verse shall make,
Know I have pray'd thee,
For old religion's sake,
Saint Ben, to aid me.

And undoubtedly he liked meeting congenial spirits at inns better than the idea of becoming a country parson.

Canon Beeching takes the charitable and kindly view that Perilla, Perenna, Julia, Anthea, Electra and Bianca are but "airy nothings," creatures of the imagination. He sees no reason to doubt that the poet was perfectly sincere and truthful when he wrote:

Go I must; when I am gone
Write but this upon my stone:
Chaste I lived, without a wife,
That's the story of my life.
Strewings need none, every flower
Is in this world, bachelor.

We are glad that Canon Beeching discredits the suggestion of Mr. Gosse that Julia bore Herrick a daughter. The evidence on this point is very vague.

To turn from the man's life to his work, our critic puts his finger with great precision upon the qualities of the poetry. He gives the first place to "concreteness." Herrick cared very little for the abstract:

His loves are all substantial ladies in heavy silks; his pastures are full of fat cattle; even the dew-drops on his flowers are full-bodied.

Herrick, too, was an artist to his finger-tips. We see it from his experiments and successes. When a good thought struck him he tried it in various metres, as is shown in his two epigrams upon love:

Love is a circle and an endless sphere,
From good to good revolving here and there.

and:

Love is a circle that doth restless move
In the same sweet eternity of love.

As an example of the originality with which he used words the following is quoted:

Whenas in silks my Julia goes,
Then, then, methinks how sweetly flows
The liquefaction of her clothes.
Next, when I cast my eyes and see
That brave vibration, each way free,
O! how that glittering taketh me.

"Liquefaction," "vibration," "glittering"—how exquisitely these words are used! In such a masterpiece in miniature as the following, words are applied with an art that is delightfully delicate:

I dare not ask a kiss,
I dare not beg a smile,
Lest having that, or this,
I might grow proud the while.
No, no, the utmost share
Of my desire shall be
Only to kiss that air
That lately kissed thee.

Other peculiarities, as Canon Beeching remarks, are his Latinisms—his “candour” and “pullulate” and the extraordinary compounds he creates with the prepositions inter- and circum-. The soul is the “circummortal part” and “daisy rings” are “interplaced with ribbonings.” For diminutives he had a passion not unlike that of the present day:

One poem is called “A Ternary of Littles”; many are written in diminutive lines like Swift’s Liliputian Ode, and the poet coins at will forms like quarulet, zonulet, pipkinet, shepherdling, disposeress.

In the use of metre he was a pupil of Ben Jonson, but Canon Beeching says—and we agree with him:

It must be admitted that in the variety and success of his experiments he left Jonson far behind. It is interesting, for the sake of observing his rhythmical skill, to compare two poems that he wrote upon the immortality of his verses. The metres are not so very different, but in effect they are poles apart; the one being as brisk and lively as the spring, the other slow and meditative and melancholy.

Now is the time for mirth,
Nor cheek or tongue be dumb;
For with the flowery earth
The golden pomp is come.

The golden pomp is come;
For now each tree does wear,
Made of her pap and gum,
Rich beads of amber here.

Now reigns the rose, and now
Th’ Arabian dew besmears
My uncontrolled brow
And my retorted hairs.

Trust to good verses then;
They only will aspire
When pyramids as men
Are lost i’ th’ funeral fire.

As a contrast to this, observe the infinite skill with which the pace is slackened in the following—

Only a little more
I have to write,
Then I’ll give o’er,
And bid the world good-night.

’Tis but a flying minute
That I must stay,
Or linger in it;
And then I must away.

O Time, thou cut’st down all!
And scarce leav’st here
Memorial
Of any men that were.

Pillars let some set up,
If so they please,
Here is my hope,
And my Pyramides.

His country poems are those of an artistic observer. Such phrases as “lily-wristed morn” and “wicker arks” are as fine as the epithets of Homer:

You have beheld how they
With wicker arks did come
To kiss and bear away
The richer cowslips home.

To Nature he applies the same art that he does to the fair ladies of his imagination.

We have said enough to show how carefully and lovingly Canon Beeching has analysed and described his favourite poet. His estimate is both high and kindly and cannot but help those who wish to be discerning in their love of good verses.

EURIPIDES THE HUMAN

The Medea of Euripides. Translated into English rhyming Verse, with explanatory Notes, by GILBERT MURRAY, LL.D. (Allen, 2s. net.)

DR. MURRAY has not mentioned on his title-page a short introduction full of insight and new and original points of view; but it is not the least pleasing part of a very pleasing book. We are startled when we read that the real love of Jason’s life was his love for the ship Argo; but when we come to read the play carefully again we observe that the primeval ship had really touched the imagination of the romantic adventurer who was mystically consigned in his childhood to the wise centaur Chiron, to charter in his manhood the first of ships and fulfil the hard tasks imposed by the usurper Pelias—in which he famously succeeds, through the aid of the enchantress Medea, daring as potent, who sacrifices her brother’s life to bring her hero back to Greece, where by craft she compasses the death of Jason’s supplanter, Pelias. Her love for Jason and for her children is animal, brute-like: and this is brought out by the poet with amazing skill. She is a female Othello. Dr. Murray says that Jason “probably rather loved her.” But we see no trace of this in the play, while he boasts cynically of the wild passion with which he inspired her. His marriage with Creusa he frankly describes as a mariage de convenance, into which feeling did not enter at all. Jason accepts the hand of the princess, and, when Creon, the father of Creusa, resolves to banish Medea, he thinks there is a good deal to be said for Creon’s point of view. There begins the tragedy. Whatever may be said for the Jason of the beautiful poem of Apollonius Rhodius (and even there he pales before the heroine Medea), the Jason of the Euripidean play is a very sorry hero indeed.

The Medea, which was brought out in 432 B.C.—the first year of the Peloponnesian War—is a very great play with the defects which mar the early efforts of a great genius, which must be condemned from the region of high art, but which would have been an irreparable loss if they had been suppressed. Romeo ought not to have given his brilliant picture of the Apothecary’s shop, distracted as he was by the doubts and fears inspired by the crisis; Mercutio could never have woven the delicate fancy about Queen Mab; Medea should not have wept in the second scene with Jason, and the scene with Aegeus is out of place; but who would wish any of these scenes away? And we see how the maturer art of the Greek as well as the English poet rejected digressions, if they may be so called, however finely executed. We are altogether in accord with Dr. Murray when he writes:

For concentrated dramatic quality and sheer intensity of passion few plays ever written can vie with the Medea.

The metrification is beautiful. It is free from that tendency to resolve long syllables which makes the later plays of Euripides far less pleasing to the ear.

Dr. Murray still adheres to rhymed couplets, and certainly his success in achieving an easy flow of verse is amazing; but we should be glad to see it transferred to a more suitable arena. Let him put into verse Mr. Mackail’s selections from the Greek Anthology, which crave the art of a deft versifier, while the senarius actually loses weight by being rendered in rhyme. Though Dr. Murray should surpass even Medea in the arts of conjuring, he could not avoid omissions and interpolations in the interests of the rhyme. To go no farther than vv. 30–33, the words in italics are not in the Greek:

Only the white throat in a sudden shame
May writhe, and all alone she moans the name
Of father, and land, and home, forsook that day
For this man’s sake, who casteth her away.

Again, in v. 720 when Aegeus in the Greek says only that his whole hope of progeny is gone, in the English he declares :

'Tis this bath made mine whole
Life as a shadow, and starved out my soul.

Many cases like this could be adduced, but there are passages in which even in the shackles of rhyme the poet (for Dr. Murray is a poet) moves easily and renders faithfully, e.g., in Medea's soliloquy about her children (1028-1044):

Oh, cursèd be mine own hard heart ! 'Twas all
In vain, then, that I reared you up, so tall
And fair ; in vain I bore you, and was torn
With those long pitiless pains, when you were born.
Ah, wondrous hopes my poor heart had in you,
How you would tend me in mine age, and do
The shroud about me with your own dear hands,
When I lay cold, blessed in all the lands
That knew us. And that gentle thought is dead !
You go, and I live on, to eat the bread
Of long years, to myself most full of pain.
And never your dear eyes, never again,
Shall see your mother, far away being thrown
To other shapes of life. . . . My babes, my own,
Why gaze ye so ?—What is it that ye see ?—
And laugh with that last laughter ? . . . Woe is me,
What shall I do ?

Women, my strength is gone,
Gone like a dream, since once I looked upon
Those shining faces. . . . I can do it not.

And we must quote in justification of our view the death of Creusa (1186-1203):

The carcanet of gold
That gripped her brow was molten in a dire
And wondrous river of devouring fire.
And those fine robes, the gift thy children gave—
God's mercy !—everywhere did lap and lave
The delicate flesh ; till up she sprang, and fled,
A fiery pillar, shaking locks and head
This way and that, seeking to cast the crown
Somewhere away. But like a thing nailed down
The burning gold held fast the anadem,
And through her locks, the more she scattered them,
Came fire the fiercer, till to earth she fell,
A thing—save to her sire—scarce nameable,
And strove no more. That cheek of royal mien,
Where was it—or the place where eyes had been ?
Only from crown and temples came faint blood
Shot through with fire. The very flesh, it stood
Out from the bones, as from a wounded pine
The gum starts, where those gnawing poisons fine
Bit in the dark—a ghastly sight ! And touch
The dead we durst not. We had seen too much . . .

But the last words hardly convey the Greek, and are due only to the rhyme.

More pleasing still are the lyrical parts, where the very form of the metre seems to permit a less close adherence to the words of the text, for instance in the Nurse's appeal to the children (98-110):

Ah, children, hark ! She moves again
Her frozen heart, her sleeping wrath,
In, quick ! And never cross her path,
Nor rouse that dark eye in its pain ;
That fell sea-spirit, and the dire
Spring of a will untaught, unbowed.
Quick, now !—Methinks this weeping cloud
Hath in its heart some thunder-fire,
Slow gathering, that must flash ere long.
I know not how, for ill or well,
It turns, this uncontrollable
Tempestuous spirit, blind with wrong.

The glorification of Athens, which Dr. Murray compares with the famous speech of Pericles in Thucydides, Book ii., is also a fine piece of metrification. We give the first strophe (824-834):

The sons of Erechtheus, the olden,
Whom high gods planted of yore
In an old land of heaven upholden,
A proud land untrodden of war ;
They are hungered, and lo, their desire
With wisdom is fed as with meat :
In their skies is a shining of fire,
A joy in the fall of their feet :

And thither, with manifold dowers,
From the North, from the hills, from the morn,
The Muses did gather their powers,
That a child of the Nine should be born ;
And Harmony, sown as the flowers,
Grew gold in the acres of corn.

We will conclude with the celebrated crux beginning at v. 214. We find it difficult to reconcile with either the Greek text or Dr. Murray's Latin version of it in his Clarendon Press edition, the verses 214-226 ; but the whole passage is finely done, though in the last words there is a fierce sneer at men (due to the need for rhyme) which the Greek does not countenance :

Women of Corinth, I am come to show
My face, lest ye despise me. For I know
Some heads stand high and fail not, even at night
Alone—far less like this, in all men's sight ;
And we, who study not our wayfarings
But feel and cry—Oh we are drifting things,
And evil ! For what truth is in men's eyes,
Which search no heart, but in a flash despise
A strange face, shuddering back from one that ne'er
Hath wronged them ? . . . Sure, far-comers anywhere,
I know, must bow them and be gentle. Nay,
A Greek himself men praise not, who alway
Should seek his own will recking not . . . But I—
This thing undreamed of, sudden from on high,
Hath sapped my soul : I dazzle where I stand,
The cup of all life shattered in my hand,
Longing to die—O friends ! He, even he,
Whom to know well was all the world to me,
The man I loved, hath proved most evil.—Oh,
Of all things upon earth that bleed and grow,
A herb most bruised is woman. We must pay
Our store of gold, hoarded for that one day,
To buy us some man's love ; and lo, they bring
A master of our flesh ! There comes the sting
Of the whole shame. And then the jeopardy,
For good or ill, what shall that master be ;
Reject she cannot : and if he but stays
His suit, 'tis shame on all that woman's days.
So thrown amid new laws, new places, why,
'Tis magic she must have, or prophecy—
Home never taught her that—how best to guide
Toward peace this thing that sleepeth at her side.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE FIRST TUDORS

The History of England from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of Henry VIII., 1485-1547. By H. A. L. FISHER.
(Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.)

CO-OPERATIVE history is now the fashion. We are disposed to think that the Political History of England, of which Mr. Fisher's book is the fifth volume, is in some respects an improvement on the Cambridge method ; for while in the Cambridge work the writers in one volume do not always regard matters from a common standpoint, here we have a complete volume, covering a defined period, from one author. This is in many respects a great advantage. It would have been a misfortune if the Lives of the first two Tudors had been written by men who took opposite views of the Tudor policy. We are sorry, however, that the period covered by this volume was not extended for another eleven years. The book would then have given us a complete view of the Tudor ideas of Government, shown the length to which the Protestant party pushed the Reform under Edward and the reactionary party their policy under Mary, and from the failure of both have shown Elizabeth's true greatness in building up the via media anglicana in Church and State. It may, however, be said that the method adopted is the best to bring out the real character and ability of Henry VIII., for as soon as his hand was withdrawn his system broke down, driven first to the one extreme and then to the other.

We must confess that Mr. Fisher's portrait of Henry VII. is not satisfactory. It is strange that the Life of the English king whose history is more romantic than that of any of our sovereigns should never have been written from the king's point of view. From Mr. Fisher's opening remarks we hoped that at last Henry had found an historian who would put his case fairly before the country. For a young man of twenty-eight who had no real title to the crown, who was surrounded by men who had brought treachery to a fine art, who had no standing army, whose kingdom was over-run by armed robbers who like their masters would take any side for a gold noble, not merely to lead a successful invasion but to hold the crown against all comers and to transmit it fairly safe to his son was an achievement of some magnitude. The only historian who has grasped the position is Bacon, and it is this that even now makes his history valuable. It is the fashion to describe Henry as a tyrant, self-seeking, self-serving, self-interested, a sort of English Louis XI. as Louis used to be depicted. Modern French writers recognise that Louis was something more than this. It is to be hoped that English writers will some day do justice to the first of the Tudors.

One advantage Henry gained from his exile: the ability to look at foreign questions as inextricably mixed up with English questions. As Mr. Fisher points out, his triumph meant the enmity of Burgundy and loss of income to the Dowager Duchess; she at once began to rally the Yorkists, and this, driving Henry into the arms of France, was the beginning of that tangled web of foreign policy that forms the clue to so much of Tudor history. Another thing which Henry had learnt was not to trust his nobles. It was vital for him to be in his dominion over all persons supreme, and to do this he made a bid for the support of the bourgeois. This, as Mr. Fisher points out, accounts for Morton and Fox, Bray and Poynings becoming Henry's trusted servants. That the king required these precautions was obvious. Lambert Simnel and the Poles showed that the danger was real. We do not think that Henry's diplomatic skill receives its due. It was something for a usurper, whose throne was far from secure, to gain for his son the hand of the princess who was then the best match in Europe and with it the pledge that the aid of the first military power was at the call of the Red Rose. It is true that the marriage was a failure, but its importance was recognised by English statesmen and for the next half-century the policy it indicated was one of the courses that English statesmen had to bear in mind.

Mr. Fisher brings out well the extraordinary ideas of the first two Tudor princes on marriage. Henry's idea of marrying his daughter-in-law Catharine on Arthur's death has always been mentioned as showing that Henry's love of Catharine's dowry exceeded his love of decency, and his resignation of his claim in favour of his son Henry on condition that the dowry remained in England and that Suffolk, the most important of the Yorkish exiles, was surrendered to him, shows how little religion had to do with this celebrated marriage. If any one desire to read what Bacon calls "curious and exquisite" instruction, he should read Henry's instructions to the Envoy he sent to Valencia to inspect the Queen of Naples and see whether she would make a desirable wife. They are given in full in the facsimiles of Historical Documents published by the Ordnance Survey Office. This proposal fell through. Henry then tried to arrange a marriage with Joanna of Castile. She was mad, but it was said that the English would not object to this as it did not prevent her bearing children. With such a father, it seems hardly surprising that the son's ideas on the marriage contract were not those usually held by Englishmen. It would be waste of space to touch on the inconsistency of Henry in matrimonial affairs, except to call attention to a point which Mr. Fisher is one of the few writers to bring out: that while Anne Boleyn was found guilty of adultery, and for that among other things was executed, Henry—according to the decision of Parliament and the Universities in Catharine's case—was, from his previous connection with Anne's elder sister Mary, not married to Anne, who could not, therefore, be guilty of adultery. If it were against the divine law to marry two brothers, as Catharine did, it was equally so to live with two sisters as Henry did.

Mr. Fisher fails to do justice to Wolsey and Cromwell. Both of them are judged too much from the point of view of merely English ministers. It is probable that no two men will agree on the character of either, and the number of historians who have sufficiently studied the inner history of the time to give an opinion worth having is very few. That Wolsey was the only man capable of carrying on the foreign policy of the Tudors is clear; the point of dispute is whether he desired the papacy as the crown of his career, or the means to enable him to carry English policy to a triumphant conclusion. We believe the latter. Of Cromwell, Mr. Fisher's portrait is not flattering. Cromwell, he says:

pushed his way to fortune by a combination of courage, skill, assiduity, and a convenient absence of scruple. He was a money-lender on a large scale and even when transacting the affairs of State he continued to transact legal business and to relieve the pecuniary necessities of a wide and extending circle of clients.

This representation of the man who carried through Parliament the most wide-reaching change in our history as a low pettifogging attorney is as misleading as Froude's eulogy. We may consider Cromwell's policy mistaken and the means he adopted to carry it out objectionable, but a man who could conduct the domestic and foreign policy of the Crown in the face of the opposition of the English nobility and people and bring it to a triumphant end must have had other gifts besides being "sly, cruel, and greedy."

"LITERARY HISTORY"

Geschichte der deutschen Literatur von den Anfängen bis in die Gegenwart. Von EDUARD ENGEL. 2 vols. (Leipzig: Freytag, 12m.)

It is difficult to say much that is favourable of this latest "History of German Literature," in spite of the enormous and painstaking labour that has evidently been bestowed upon it. Professor Engel is careful to define in his preface the peculiar niche which he believes his book will fill: it is to be a book for "Nichtwissende," a book that presupposes on the part of the reader an acquaintance with only the most familiar masterpieces of German literature; it is to be a book of "facts," not opinions, a history in which the poets are to be allowed to speak for themselves, not to be judged. This sounds attractive, especially to the non-German reader, who often finds himself at a disadvantage because he does not possess sufficient knowledge to appreciate German histories of the class to which, for instance, Wilhelm Scherer's admirable work belongs. But the method Professor Engel follows can only be successful in the hands of a scholar who himself has fulness of knowledge and ripeness of judgment; who is able, silently and unostentatiously, to order and arrange the facts, and to help, as it were, the poets to say just those things about themselves which are best adapted to take the place of independent commentary and criticism. Without such qualities in the author, the method is apt to be merely a cloak to hide their absence. Professor Engel's work is an industrious compilation, not far short of one thousand two hundred pages, for which the works of previous investigators and literary historians have been ransacked with the systematic thoroughness that characterises German method in such matters. It is also, we ought to add, illustrated with a number of well-chosen and well-reproduced portraits of leading German men of letters. But the materials are thrown together with journalistic haste, and the style is, to say the least of it, rough and ready; many of the two hundred odd chapters, into which the work is divided, degenerate into mere collections of "snippets" in loose and broken paragraphs. This is not literary history; it is only the rough sketch which an author makes of the materials out of which a history may ultimately be constructed. But even had Professor Engel given himself time to convert his compilation into a genuine historical survey of German literature, we doubt whether the results would have been satisfactory; for he seems to us to be strangely deficient in the literary sense, the feeling for poetry. Even the driest of academic authorities on the subject—a race, we imagine, Dr. Engel does not love—has more insight into the nature of literary genius, is more sensitive to the finer vibrations of the German soul in poetry, than he is. The limitations he has imposed upon himself in writing only for “Nichtwissende” and avoiding personal judgments on men and books, also perhaps explain why he has thrown the centre of gravity of his book so far forward: the first volume covers the history of the literature from the earliest times to the birth of Goethe; the second volume extends from Goethe to the present day. This arrangement naturally implies disproportionate treatment and a corresponding over-emphasis on nineteenth-century literature: it is justified only by the fact that the author seems more at home with the subject of his second volume. Indeed, his book would have made a better impression had he restricted himself entirely to modern German literature. We doubt whether he has much first-hand knowledge of mediæval literature. If he has, he has failed to convince us of it, and his early chapters leave the impression of having been hastily “got up” for the occasion. Of Middle High German he seems to have only a smattering, and the glamour of “the glorious Middle Age” has never, to judge from his discussion of the “höfische Dichtung,” been felt by him at all. A writer who—to quote only one of many passages which reveal an extraordinary lack of discernment—can accuse Wolfram von Eschenbach of having “no background,” of having “nothing universally human” or even “truly German” to say, would obviously do better to leave German mediæval poetry alone.

Dr. Engel's unimaginative, matter-of-fact—the Germans would say “nüchtern”—way of looking at literature distorts his whole outlook, even in the later periods, where he is on familiar ground. He has little understanding of what we non-Germans, at least, treasure in the literature as its finest and most distinctively German elements. The delicate spirituality of German lyric poetry, be it in the Minnesänger, in Goethe, or in the poets of more recent times, does not appeal to him; he has never, it would seem, penetrated beneath the surface of that wonderland of Romanticism at the beginning of last century, the movement associated with the brothers Schlegel, Novalis, Tieck and Wackenroder. So deficient, indeed, is he in sympathy for the “Romantik” that his criticism might have been written by the champion of Berjin rationalism at the end of the eighteenth century: by Nicolai himself! The delicate psychological filigree of Friedrich Hebbel, most original and stimulating of all the dramatists of the nineteenth century, does not interest Dr. Engel, and he is without sympathy for the most interesting contemporary man of letters, Gerhart Hauptmann. In other words, for what seems to us the quintessence of the German spirit as it is expressed in literature, this book has only the cold shrug or, at best, words of indifferent praise. Even of writers like Keller and Heine, whom Professor Engel admires unconditionally, his account seems to miss the point; he fails to show us how they deserve the superlatives he scatters with a liberal hand.

It is needless to add, after what we have said, that he who looks to this work for information about literary movements in Germany, about the relationships between authors and books which form the organic life of a national literature, he who seeks to understand the fundamental ideas on which, say, the classical literature of the eighteenth century was built up, will find no guidance and no help. Facts—dry, often unenlightening and merely trivial facts—are all Dr. Engel has to offer. Perhaps the reader will turn with most interest to the last section, which is tacked on more or less independently, as “Die Gegenwart: 1885 bis heute.” There have been many such surveys of late, and Dr. Engel has felt the need of commenting on contemporary literature, and, at the same time, of making clear to the world his particular share in its development. We are inclined to think that the less freely a literary historian attempts to judge his contemporaries, the more chance his book will have of commending itself to next year's public; but for those who care for such disquisitions on the living, we can recommend the last hundred and twenty pages of this book as presenting a point of view worthy of consideration.

There are plenty of readers in Germany who like literary history of this amorphous kind, like, too, the beating of the tam-tam of patriotism and nationalism, and who are willing to overlook superficiality in an author if he insists sufficiently on the “allgemein Menschliche” and the “wahrhaft Deutsche”; but we should be sorry to invite the tiro, either in Germany or in England, to make his first acquaintance with German poetry through this work. Professor Engel is also the author of a “History of French Literature” and a “History of English Literature.” Reviewing an English translation of the latter, which appeared in 1902, the ACADEMY arrived at the following conclusion: “Dr. Engel's manner is pretentious, and his assertions are positive. But we do not discover that he has any sense of literary proportion, or any literary insight into the genius of the literature which he professes to teach.” These words seem to us equally applicable to the present work.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

From East to West. By Sir HUBERT JERNINGHAM. (Murray, 15s. net.)

A CERTAIN sadness is noticeable in Lafcadio Hearn's last writing on Japan. He felt that the simple beauty of the old order was changing and that the new order which was taking its place with amazing swiftness contained elements of vulgarity which are inevitably attendant on rapid progress, whether it be the progress of an individual or of a nation. Whatever development may be the eventual result, the actual phase of change is apparently deplorable. Sir Hubert felt this. He wanted to see the remnant of the old order of things, so he set out with his nephew and the Earl of Leitrim to visit Japan; and on his return he wrote the account of his journey, hoping partly that his observations might be of value, but chiefly (as he puts it in his attractive preface) to give himself “the pleasure of renewing a delightful excursion in the effort, however ineffective, to describe it.”

And very agreeable reading does this account of an interesting journey make. Sir Hubert writes pleasantly always, if without great literary distinction: he has observed sensibly, and all men of intelligence must be interested in the chatty record of his observations. Just as an expert writes for experts, so a sensible man writes for sensible men. His ideas do not penetrate deeply beneath the surface, and for that reason they are easily comprehended and have their own value. Sir Hubert starts off from Paris and writes his impressions of Paris, then of Marseilles, his next halting-place, and gradually makes his amiable way via Aden and Bombay until he eventually reaches Nagasaki. In Japan he naturally is anxious to visit the battlefields and Port Arthur, and he does visit them, with his note-book in his hand and smile of interest on his face. And he tells you how fast the trains under military direction went, and how slowly; he tells you how comfortable he was at different inns on the road or how uncomfortable, as the case may be; how in Manchuria his party were shown into a bare room for the night, and how the cold prevented him from sleeping very well; but how the keen morning air of the mountains quickly invigorated him and made him forget the discomfort of the night. His book reads as pleasantly as a long evening passes, after a good dinner, in listening to the exploits and adventures of a friend who has just returned from his travels. And in this case the travels have been to places which command interest, and the teller is a man of sound intelligence and wide experience.

Van Dyck. By LIONEL CUST. (Bell, 5s. net.)

THIS addition to the well-known "Great Masters" series is an abridged and revised version of the exhaustive volume on the life and work of Van Dyck published six years ago by Mr. Lionel Cust, whose erudition is now placed within the reach of a wider public. As an authoritative account of a painter whose work is richly represented in this country Mr. Cust's condensed volume should find a place in the library of every connoisseur. The illustrations are well-chosen and adequately reproduced, and though we could wish the list of paintings included those in private as well as those in public collections, the book must be pronounced in every way a worthy addition to a series remarkable for its convenience and authority.

"MEASURE FOR MEASURE"

II. i. 39. [Folio, p. 65.]

Some run from brakes of Ice.

THIS most intractable of the crucis of Shakespeare's text has resisted adequate solution for close on three hundred years. The notes of the Cambridge editors show that the "brakes" of the Folio has been perpetuated by the subsequent folios, and by Rowe, Malone, Capell, Knight, Dyce and other editors. Keightley suggested "wrecks o' vice"; Bulloch the extraordinary "pranks of Iceland" (whatever that may mean); and Thiselton considers "Ice" a misprint for "iron." Shakespeare's meaning has nothing whatever to do with "running"—quite the contrary in fact—and still less with "ice" or with "brakes," whether meaning thickets, instruments of torture, or anything of that kind.

(1) Even if the fact were not patent on the surface, Dyce has shown very clearly that the Ice of the Folio is a misprint for vice. In his note on the Comedy of Errors, II. ii. 148, quoting this passage amongst six or seven others, chiefly from Beaumont and Fletcher, he remarks that "the proneness of printers to blunder on words beginning with 'v' is very remarkable." And the preceding "f" in "of," identical as it is in pronunciation with "v," strengthens this view.

(2) The key to this corruption is to be found in the following passages of this play:

III. ii. 6. sqq.:

'Twas never merry world since of two usuries, the merriest was put down, and the worser allowed by order of law a furred gown to keep him warm, and furred with fox and lambskins too;

III. ii. 22;

Do thou but think,
What 'tis to cram a maw or clothe a back,
From such a filthy vice;

and King Lear, IV. vi. 167-169:

The usurer hangs the cozener.
Through tattered clothes small vices do appear
Robes and furr'd gowns hide all.

What Pompey meant by the "two usuries" was the two "vices" of money-lending and fornication. The stews of Southwark in Tudor times were farmed out to foreign women by the Mayors of London; and Stow refers to this practice when he says: "In the year of Christ 1546 the 37th of Henry VIII., this row of stews in Southwarke was put down by the King's commandment." Hence Shakespeare makes Pompey speak of the "merriest" vice as a "usury." The "worsen," in Pompey's view, was money-lending, which continued to flourish; and brown fox-fur was the recognised everyday dress of a usurer or money scrivener. There are many references to this in the writers of Shakespeare's time, e.g., Greene in his "Groatsworth of Wit, etc.," has "Gorinius . . . sat as formally in his fox-furd gown"; and in his "Discouery of Coosnage" and "Conny-catching" (1591-1592): "Those fox-furd Gentlemen that hyde under their gownes faced with foynes [i.e., skins of the beech-marten or polecat] more falshood than all the Conny-catchers in England . . . those miserable Usurers I meane that like Vultures pray uppon the spoyle of the poore," and Ben Jonson in his Bartholomew Fair, V. iii., has "In a scrivener's furr'd gown." The New English Dictionary refers to Vicary's "Anat." 1561: "My gowne . . . fac'd with foyne backes."

The particular "vice" of this play is to be found mentioned in at least a dozen passages, viz., II. i. 39; II. ii. 5, 29, 136; II. iv. 42, 116; III. i. 138; III. ii. 24, 106, 108, 284, 291; IV. ii. 115, etc.

(3) What did Escalus mean by his apophthegm in II. i. 38-40?

Some rise by sin, and some by virtue fall:

Some run from brakes of Ice, and answer none [sic Folio
And some condemned for a fault alone.

Exactly what Isabella meant in II. ii. 127, when she says to Lucio:

Great men may jest with saints; 'tis wit in them,
But in the less foul profanation . . .
That in the captain's but a cholerick word
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy; or what Lear says in IV. vi. 168, above quoted; or, as we say, "One man may steal a horse, while another may not look over the hedge." It is significant that the above-quoted passage from King Lear, written, it will be remembered, not long after Measure for Measure—and probably not more than a year or so after—refers to the "vice" of lust as well as to usury or money-lending; and the moralising of Escalus would be equally general in its application to the "two usuries."

(4) We are now in a position to remove the corruption of the Folio, and to supply what, it is submitted, Shakespeare actually wrote, viz.:

Some furr'd on backes of vice, and answer none;

i.e., some are furred, or, wear furred gowns, on their vicious backs, and are not called to account. In other words, they line their pockets or make their fortunes out of vice, whether of money-lending or lust. This will appear more clearly from a collocation of the corruption with the above emendation:

Some | run from brakes of Ice, | and answer none
furr'd on backes of Vice, where absolutely every letter of the Folio is repeated or accounted for with startling exactness. The misprint of the letter "r" for "c" in "backes" is one of the commonest in the Folio owing to the great similarity of those letters in point of form.

Measure for Measure first appeared in print, so far as we know, in the Folio of 1623; and the compositor's eye, if he printed from a manuscript, or his ear, if he printed from dictation, a practice then common enough, might readily fall into the error above shown. In the latter case, it must be pointed out that the word "brake," meaning a thicket of fern, etc., was not pronounced as we now pronounce it, viz., with the long a, but as if spelt "brack," and sounded exactly like its congener "bracken," which was in fact the same word. Hence the corruption of the true word backe into brake. Shakespeare's omission of the substantive verb need cause no concern, owing to the close compression of language necessary in such an apophthegmatic sentence; and besides, it is omitted in the succeeding line, "and some condemned for a fault alone."

HENRY CUNINGHAM.

THE ACADEMY

FEBRUARY 16, 1907

ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT

HENRY FIELDING

EVERY novelist looks at life from his own standpoint, whether consciously or not. He may turn away from it in disgust and become a romanticist, or life by its syren fascination may drag him down to its low places and he may become what is known as a realist. Half-way between these two extremities comes Henry Fielding. He is life's perfect story-teller. He had no message burning within him which he must deliver to the world or die; he had no wish to reform the world or inform the ignorant. He had no theories which he wanted to exemplify. He simply looked at life from the standpoint of an ordinary man and found it excellent. He differed from the ordinary man only in the tremendous exuberance of his vitality and in his ability to express himself. He relished life, and everything that came into life received a grace from his buoyant touch. He was a simple and sane man. The deadening common sense, which was creeping slowly upon his age and slowly stifling with long tentacles its spirit, could not rob him of his buoyancy. It came to him indeed, and his being assimilated it without receiving hurt. Rather, his obstreperous nature gained good from its influence, so malign to a low-strung man. Reason gave him balance and sanity, but its touch never chilled his heart.

There was nothing exalted in his outlook upon life. He accepted life as his keen eyes saw it, without passionate struggle toward an ideal. Life was as simple to him as it is to a boy who quietly takes his master's word for what is right and for what is wrong, without bothering his head over the problems of why and wherefore. And he took a boy's delight in breaking rules. "Be human and alive," he cries, and humanum est errare, he adds, without ever putting his tongue in his cheek.

And indeed such were the charms now displayed by Amelia . . . that perhaps no other beauty could have secured him from their influence; and here, to confess a truth in his favour, however the grave or rather the hypocritical part of mankind may censure it, I am firmly persuaded that to withdraw admiration from exquisite beauty, or to feel no delight in gazing at it, is as impossible as to feel no warmth from the most scorching rays of the sun. To run away is all that is in our power, and in the former case, if it must be allowed we have the power of running away, it must be allowed also that it requires the strongest resolution to execute it; for when, as Dryden says,

All paradise is opened in a face, how natural is the desire of going thither! and how difficult to quit the lovely prospect!

He has the Puritan view that all women are a temptation, but unlike the Puritan he does not repine against the divine order of things. He never tries to make the worse appear the better reason, or to twist the established ideas of right and wrong to suit his own ends or to palliate his own actions. Quite cheerfully he owns that he has done wrong, and does not ever pretend that his wrong-doing has been less pleasant for being so. The unbending morality of the time met him. Reverence forbade him to try and alter its rigid form. And since one or other at such a meeting must give way, with all the good grace of a gentleman, he did so himself, with a sort of half-reproachful smile.

Listen to the moralist advising (but always with the grace of a gentleman) his young readers, after declaring the danger of beauty and the necessity of "running away," with more than a hint of cowardice contained and intended in the word:

And yet, however difficult this may be, my young readers, it is absolutely necessary, and that immediately too . . . The admiration of a beautiful woman, though the wife of our dearest friend, may at first perhaps be innocent, but let us not flatter ourselves it will always remain so; desire is sure to succeed; and wishes, hopes, designs, with a long train of mischiefs, tread close at our heels. In affairs of this kind we may most properly apply the well-known remark of nemo repente fuit turpissimus.

It is as if you saw him with his great arm round some young friend, expounding the dictates of morality in duty bound, sincere absolutely in his belief in morality's rightness, sincere too in his hatred of any self-deception. "This is what happens, my dear boy: has happened, alas! to me," you hear him add. And you know as well as the boy would know that he would be much readier to sympathise with the disastrous effects of not running away, than with anguish that obedience to his sermon might entail. Now morality has changed: it is gradually becoming a living rather than a conventional thing. What is right and what is wrong is a matter of fierce debate, and it is gradually coming about that each individual is called upon to make his own answer. Even the laws have

THE HISTORY OF TOM JONES, A FOUNDLING.

In SIX VOLUMES.

By HENRY FIELDING, Esq;

—Mores hominum multorum vidit.—

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, over-against Catharine-street in the Strand.

MDCCLXIX.

changed. Then accepted morality was the final arbiter: only madmen questioned its authority. But to return to that typical chapter which illustrates in two pages Fielding's whole attitude towards life. He has described the temptation, he has given his kindly warning, and he proceeds to an apology for doing so (that too with the courtesy of a gentleman):

This digression may appear impertinent to some readers; we could not, however, avoid the opportunity of offering the above hints; since of all passions there is none against which we should so strongly fortify ourselves as this, which is generally called love; for no other lays before us, especially in the tumultuous days of youth, such sweet, such strong and almost irresistible temptations; none hath produced in private life such fatal and lamentable tragedies; and what is worst of all, there is none to whose poison and infatuation the best minds are so liable.

He goes on to show how other passions, such as ambition and avarice, grow to greatest force in the most evil minds, but how Love alone flourishes in the most noble—to their destruction he does not hesitate to add. Nowadays such a theme would spread into another channel: granted that the noblest minds are most liable to Love, perhaps Love is not necessarily the all-subduing tyrant of the old morality, perhaps Love is the grand impulsion, the very pulse of life. The problem now is on a higher setting, than Fielding's staunch adherence (the loyalty of a gentleman) to his Morality allowed him to realise.

And he was sincere in his adherence. Sincerity was the dominant feature of his personality, which lent grace to his exuberance, charm to his discourses and value to his work. Thackeray, in that exquisitely written essay of his upon Fielding, seems to be a little wrong in the nature of some of his strictures, in spite of the fact that he puts them forward with all the delicacy of expression of which he was consummate master. It would seem that disapproval is always wrong, even when expressed by a Thackeray, because it inevitably holds up the standard of one age in comparison with the standard of another, and the two things are never comparable.

I can't say I think Mr. Jones a virtuous character; I can't say but that I think Fielding's evident liking and admiration for Mr. Jones shows that the great humourist's moral sense was blunted by his life, and that here, in Art and Ethics, there is a great error. If it is right to have a hero whom we may admire, let us at least take care that he is admirable.

It is as though, like some Daniel Deronda, he must needs pull himself up by the coat collar. Of course any remark of Thackeray, passed upon his acknowledged master, is pleasant to know. But this remark is not criticism. He seems even to lay a condemning finger on what is really one of his beloved master's most admirable qualities. For Fielding's genius enabled him to arouse for Tom Jones something far more essential than admiration, and that is interest, keen interest and even, so strong is his magic, affection. Conscience seems to be working its clammy will with Thackeray for a moment, but only for a moment; his better nature soon asserts itself and like another Balaam his curses are turned to blessings.

What a wonderful art! What an admirable gift of nature was it by which the author of these tales was endowed and which enabled him to fix our interest, to waken our sympathy, to seize upon our credulity, so that we believe in his people—speculate gravely upon their faults and their excellencies . . .

Fielding, like most great men, had a boy's heart with a man's wisdom. The experience of years did not taint him with the lethargy of age. He remained warm and young and growing. He kept moderation and restraint and all the accompaniments of maturity for his work: he did not let them creep into his soul. He controlled their power, and as much strength is needed to do so as is needed to control the tumultuous passions of youth—strength of another kind of course it is, but a strength far worthier to possess. He lived and loved life: and it is pleasant to think that, unable to live again through the great days of joy and sorrow and struggle, he wrote. He wrote as he lived—sincerely. He wrote as he lived, hating hypocrisy and meanness, and using all his humour to condone with every other fault or foible that mortal flesh is heir to. And over all the spirits and buoyancy which breathe from all his books with the freshness of a spring morning, and which are as invigorating and as captivating and as inimitable, rests a strange calm, an arresting suavity. He expressed himself naturally without fear, without reticence, with quiet sincerity, and that expression of himself was so perfect that he is a master of English prose. The writing of this great-hearted gentleman will be read as long as the English language exists.

H. DE S.

HENRY FIELDING'S LIBRARY

THE "little parlour" ("Tom Jones," Book xiii., ch. 1) in which Henry Fielding looks up from his "History of a Foundling" to dream for a moment of posthumous renown cannot hold a large collection of books. Rather, we may fancy, it accommodates upon a single shelf some score or so of volumes. Mr. Fielding is a man of many expenses and uncertain revenue. He has not yet received even that office of Justice of the Peace for Westminster and the County of Middlesex which will later give him a scanty income and a great deal of work. If he ever owned any valuable books, it is not likely they remained in his possession long. But in the truest sense a man's library consists rather in the books which he has mastered than in those which he owns; and by this reckoning Mr. Fielding's library is a large one.

He has told us of the extent of his proficiency in the tongues:

Tuscan and French are in my head;
Latin I write, and Greek—I read.

But when and where did he read it? Where, we wonder, did he read not only Homer, Plato, Aristotle, Lucian, Theocritus, and Longinus, but also Arrian, Aeschines, Phocylides, and other lesser luminaries? "Of Greek," said Dr. Johnson, "every one gets as much as he can"; we are driven to suppose that his contemporary acted on this principle, and varied his writing for the stage by reading in the classics. Though far from endorsing (of course) Parson Adams's remark that "knowledge of men is only to be learnt from books—Plato and Seneca for that," he has yet a very great respect for learning. He refuses to believe, for instance:

that all the imagination, fire, and judgment of Pitt could have produced the orations that have made the Senate of England in these our times a rival in eloquence to Greece and Rome, if he had not been so well read in the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, as to have transferred their whole spirit into his speeches, and with their spirit their knowledge too.

He laughs at a rising school of critics who hold that any kind of learning is entirely useless to a writer:

Nature [says he] can only provide us with capacity, with the tools of our profession; learning must fit them for use, must direct them in it, and must contribute part, at least, of the materials.

The rhapsody on Homer with which Parson Adams favoured Mr. Wilson ("Joseph Andrews," Book iii, ch. 2) is too long to quote; but in the "Voyage to Lisbon" we have a final reflection on that author which is a curious illustration of Fielding's preference of reality to fiction:

I must confess I should have honoured and loved Homer more had he written a true history of his own times in humble prose, than those noble poems which have so justly collected the praise of all ages; for though I read these with more admiration and astonishment, I still read Herodotus, Thucydides and Xenophon with more amusement and more satisfaction.

It was a case, in short, of "not loving Cæsar less, but Rome more." So also was it with Aeschylus, the loved companion of Parson Adams, and with Longinus—"the excellent Longinus"—to whose precepts Fielding so often and so respectfully refers.

In Latin his tastes are equally Catholic. He is familiar with Virgil, the elder Pliny, Plautus, Terence, Juvenal, Suetonius, True THE Bertie

HISTORY
OF THE ADVENTURES
OF
JOSEPH ANDREWS,

And of his FRIEND

Mr. ABRAHAM ADAMS.

Written in Imitation of
The Manner of CERVANTES
Author of Don Quixote.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, over-against
St. Clement's Church, in the Strand.
M.DCC.XLII.

Claudian and Martial. Captain Booth poses the hackney author with a couplet from Lucan, and Booth's own mental state is illustrated by half a dozen lines from Claudian. Virgil, too, is often put under contribution, and Fielding's obvious enjoyment of quotation shows that he had read the classics for his pleasure. Of French writers he mentions incidentally Montesquieu, "the inimitable biographer of Gil Blas," Scarron, the author of the Paysan Parvenu, Voltaire and others. But his familiarity with the ancients and with continental moderns does not detract from his love of masterpieces of his own language. When Joseph Andrews (who had seen Macbeth acted) breaks out into a variant of Macduff's remonstrance:

But I must also feel it as a man,

Parson Adams assures him that there is nothing but heathenism to be learnt from plays. But Fielding, English to the core, and with a robust delight in his country's pre-eminence, calls Shakespeare "the greatest genius the world hath ever produced."

That Shakespeare [says Bath, the fire-eating colonel in "Amelia"] was a fine fellow. He was a very pretty poet indeed. Was it not Shakespeare that wrote the play about Hotspur? I never missed that play when it was acted, if I was in town.

Milton, also, Fielding admires, and Addison, and Butler, and Swift—but not Richardson! Pope he appreciates, although justly offended by the epithets bestowed on Allen. Passing to divinity, he has read (beside the Bible) the discourses of South and Barrow. The study of Barrow's sermons converts Captain Booth from deism to Christianity.

Of native historians our author mentions Clarendon and Whitelocke, while for Burnet, whose Whig opinions he shared, he had a great regard. "Amelia," we are told, "had conversed with the divinity of the great and learned Dr. Barrow, and with the histories of the excellent Bishop Burnet." (Also, Amelia read English plays and poetry.) Anson's "Voyage" is mentioned with approval, and Shaftesbury's critical works: but the name of Defoe—and this is curious—nowhere occurs! Who the "young lady of fashion" was, who wrote the romance Sophia was reading when interrupted by Miss Western, is matter for conjecture; but an attempt to discover her might (to borrow Miss Western's remark) "as the great Milton said, almost subdue one's patience." As to plays, no doubt he read all he could lay hands on, especially Shakespeare's, Otway's, Vanburgh's, Congreve's and Farquhar's. It was with one of "the excellent Farquhar's comedies" (The Constant Couple, we surmise), that Amelia tried to deaden her anxiety, while her absent husband was losing his last guinea to Captain Trent.

Such, then, was Henry Fielding's library. And what books from it shall we imagine in occupation of the narrow shelf in that little parlour? Let us hazard a conjecture. "The History of Joseph Andrews and his friend Mr. Abraham Adams," in two small volumes (a spur to fresh endeavour): "Don Quixote"; the "Iliad"; "Hudibras"; "Gulliver's Travels"; and half a score of plays.

H. C. M.

(7)

A

JOURNEY, &c.

BOOK I.

CHAP. I.

The Author dies, meets with Mercury, and is by him conducted to the Stage which sets out for the other World.

ON the first of December 1741*, I departed this Life, at my Lodgings in Cheapside. My Body had been some time dead before I was at liberty to quit it, left it should by any accident return to

B 4

Life:

* Some doubt whether this should not be rather 1641, which is a Date more agreeable to the Account given of it in the Introduction: but then there are some Passages which seem to relate to Transactions infinitely later, even within this year or two.—To say the truth, there are Difficulties attend either Conjecture; so the Reader may take which he pleases.

A FIELDING BIBLIOGRAPHY

ALL editions were published at London, except where otherwise stated.

SEPARATE PUBLICATIONS

1728. "Love in Several Masques: a comedy." (1782, German translation at Strasbourg.)
1730. "Rape Upon Rape; or, the Justice Caught in His Own Trap." (Another edition, same year, as "The Coffee-House Politicians; or, the Justice Caught in His Own Trap.")
- "The Temple Beau, a comedy."
- "The Author's Farce and the Pleasures of the Town." (1750, third edition.)
- "Tom Thumb, a Tragedy." (With an additional act in the following year; and then: 1737, 1751, 1765, 1806, 1810, 1815, 1824, 1829, 1830, 1838, 1861, 1885. And as altered by Kane O'Hara, 1811 and 1883. German translation 1899.)
1731. "The Welsh Opera." (Another edition, same year, entitled "The Grub Street Opera.")
- "The Letter Writers; or a New Way to Keep a Wife at Home." (1750. German translation, 1781.)
1732. "The Lottery, a farce." (1733, 1748. Glasgow, 1758, 1761, 1779, 1784, 1786.)
- "The Modern Husband." (2nd ed., same year. German translation, Strasbourg, 1781.)
- "The Covent Garden Tragedy." (1754, 1780?).
- "The Old Debauchees, a comedy." (2nd ed., 1746, 3rd ed., 1750, 1780.)
- "The Mock Doctor; or, the Dumb Lady Cured." A comedy done from Molière ["Médécin Malgré Lui."] (1734, 1753, 1761, 1767?, 1784, 1786, 1794, 1806 (two), 1811, 1815 (two), 1824, 1825?, 1883, in Dick's acting editions, 1893, in the Molière volume of Lubbock's Hundred Best Books.)
1733. Epilogue to "Cælia, a Play."
1734. "The Intriguing Chambermaid." From the French of Regnard, "Retour Imprévu." (1750, 1780, 1784, 1786, 1806, 1811, 1824.)
- "Don Quixote in England, a comedy," containing the song "The Roast Beef of Old England." (1777. A burletta versified from this was issued as "Squire Badger" in 1772, and another by T. A. Arne—as "The Sot" in 1775.)
1735. "An Old Man taught Wisdom; or the Virgin Unmasked," a farce. A second edition the same year with the title transposed. (1777, 1784, 1786, 1791, 1817, 1826?).
- "The Universal Gallant; or, the Different Husbands, a Comedy."
1736. "Pasquin: a Dramatic Satire on the Times. Being the Rehearsal of Two Plays, viz.: a comedy called the Election, and a tragedy call'd the Life and Death of Common Sense, etc." (Dublin, 1736. 2nd ed., 1740.)
1737. "Eurydice, a farce."
- "The Historical Register for the Year 1736, a comedy, to which is added a very merry tragedy call'd Eurydice Hiss'd or, a Word to the Wise." (1741. 3rd ed., 1744.)
- "Tumble-down Dick; or, Phaethon in the Suds."
- 1739-40. Edited "The Champion." Published in volume form 1741, 1766.
1740. "The Tryal of Colley Cibber, Comedian," a pamphlet consisting of some of F.'s papers from "The Champion."
1741. "The Vernon-iad, a satire."
- "The Crisis."
- "True Greatness," a poetical epistle addressed to Dodington, the friend of Frederick, Prince of Wales.
1742. "Miss Lucy in Town, a farce" (2nd ed. same year).
- "Letter to a Noble Lord . . . occasioned by a representation . . . of a Farce called Miss Lucy in Town."
- "The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and his Friend Mr. Abraham Adams." Two vols. (2nd ed., same year. 3rd ed., 2 v. illus. with cuts, 1743. 4th ed., 2 v. revised, etc., 1749. 5th ed., 2 v. revised and corrected, 1751. 8th ed., 1768; 9th ed., 1769; 1769 abridged; 1781 (two), 1784 and 1793 abridged; 1793, 1808, 1809, 1810, 1818, 1820?, 1825; 1832, with G. Cruikshank's illus.; 1857, with illus. by Phiz; 1876, in Bohn's Libraries; 1882, reissued 1894, in Routledge's Caxton Novels; 1904, with the Cruikshank illus. in Classic Novels; French translation: London, 1750: Amsterdam, 1775.)
- "A Full Vindication of the Dukess Dowager of Marlborough."
- "Plutus, the God of Riches, a comedy," translated from Aristophanes (with W. Young).
1743. "The Wedding Day, a comedy."
- "Miscellanies." Three vols. (including "Jonathan Wild," which formed the third vol.) 2nd ed. the same year. (1754. "The Life of Mr. Jonathan Wild." 1775, "The History of the Life of Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great. To which is added a Journey from this World to the Next." 1782, "The History of Jonathan Wild the Great," with engravings after designs by T. Stothard. 1840, "The History of the Life of Jonathan Wild the Great . . . to which is added a contemporary life of J. W. (by H. D. . . with illustrations by Phiz)." Translations—French, 1763, 1784; Dutch, 1757; German, 1790).

1747-8. Edited "The Jacobite's Journal."

1749. "The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling." Six vols. (1749, 4 v.; 1750, 4 v.; 1763-5, 4 v.; 1768, 4 v.; 1773, 4 v.; Edinburgh, 1774, 3 v.; 1780, 3 v.; 1780, 4 v.; Paris, 1780, 4 v.; Basel, 1761, 1762, 1792, an abridgment; Edinburgh, 1805, 3 v., with prints by Rowlandson. 1809, 2 v.; 1810, 3 v.; 1810, 2 v.; 1820? a cheap book summary. 1826, 1844, 1867, in Routledge's Railway Library (with memoir by G. H. Townsend). 1868, 1876, with illus. by G. Cruikshank in Bohn's Library. 1895, 1896, "edited for the use of modern readers . . . by J. E. M. Fielding." 1897, Bliss, Sands. 1900, 2 v. in Library of English Classics. 1904, 2 v. in series of Classic Novels. 1905, 2 v. in the York Library. Translations—French, 1750, 1751, 1767, 1782, 1783, 1784, 1796, 1823, 1883 (two); German, 1786, 1787, 1853; Dutch, 1862; Hungarian, 1872; Polish, 1783; Russian, 1849; Spanish, 1796).

"A Charge Delivered to the Grand Jury at the Sessions . . . held for the City and Liberty of Westminster . . . 29th June 1749."

"A True State of the Case of Bosavern Penlez, who suffered on account of the late riot in the Strand. . . ."

1751. "An Inquiry into the Causes of the late increase of Robbers . . . In which the present reigning vices are . . . exposed." (2nd ed., the same year.)

"Amelia," four vols. (1752, 4 v.; 1780, 4 v.; 1793, 3 v.; 1808, 3 v.; 1832, 2 v.; with illus. by G. Cruikshank; 1857, with illus. by Phiz; 1877, in Bohn's Library; 1905, 2 v. Translations—French, 1762, 1782. Spanish, 1795-6.)

1752. Edited "The Covent Garden Journal."

"Examples of the Interposition of Providence in the detection and punishment of murder . . . with an introduction and conclusion both written by H. F." (Dublin, 1764, 3rd ed. Bath, 1820? as "Murder True Examples," etc.)

1753. "A Proposal for making an Effectual Provision for the Poor," etc. (Dublin edition same year)

"A Clear State of the Case of Elizabeth Canning, who hath sworn that she was robbed and almost starved to death by a gang of gypsies and other villains in January last . . ." (2nd ed. the same year, and another ed. "Canning's Farthing Post etc.," 1754. The pamphlet gave rise to some replies.)

1755. "The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon." (Another edition the same year. 1785, 1810, in "Mavor's General Collection of Voyages." 1887, edited by Henry Morley in Cassell's National Library. 1892, edited by Austin Dobson for the Chiswick Press series.)

1759. "The Lover's Assistant . . . being a New Art of Love. . . . Translated . . . with notes by . . . H. F."

1778. "The Father, or the Good-natured Man, a comedy."

1783. "A Journey from this World to the Next," with engravings after designs by T. Stothard. (Translations—French, Reims, 1784; Paris, 1788.)

1790. "An Essay on Nothing," v. 4 of "The Repository."

COLLECTED WORKS

1762. Edited, with life, by A. Murphy, four vols. (1766, 2 v.; 1771, 8 v.; 1775, 12 v.; 1783, 12 v.; 1784, 10 v.; 1821, 10 v. Murphy's edition formed the basis of several of those which followed.—1806. Edited by A. Chalmers. Ten vols.—1821. With Memoir of the Author [by Sir Walter Scott]. One vol.—1840. Edited by T. Roscoe. One vol.—1871. Edited by J. P. Browne. Ten vols.—1872. Edited by D. Herbert. One vol.—1882. Edited by Leslie Stephen. Ten vols.—1893. Edited by George Saintsbury. Twelve vols. (Reissued as The "Temple" Fielding, 1901, 12 v.)—1898-9. Edited by Edmund Gosse. Twelve vols.—1905. Edited by G. H. Maynardier. Twelve vols.—Edited by Sidney Lee for Methuen's Standard Library (in progress).

BIOGRAPHIES AND CRITICISM

1751. "An Essay on the new species of Writing founded by Mr. Fielding, with a word or two upon the Modern State of Criticism."—1807. "Life of Fielding, with observations on his Character and Writings," by William Watson.—1855. "Life of Henry Fielding, with notices of his Writings his Times, and his Contemporaries," by F. Lawrence.—1883. "Fielding," by Austin Dobson (in the "English Men of Letters Series").

Magazine articles and reviews and special book chapters are too numerous to be brought within the scope of this short bibliography.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AIR AND SPACE IN LITERATURE

A THOUGHTFUL boy who was greatly puzzled by the moral behaviour of Homer's heroes, asked his father one day whether "these were all the gods the Greeks had." The father answered that he believed they had a vague idea of a great overruling Deity. It is to be feared that he invented that belief on the spot out of solicitude for his son's moral principles. The son in due time attained to a fellowship at Oxford by way of the Thirty-nine Articles, but he also arrived at a conviction that in estimating the conduct of persons in story or real life, it is necessary to take account of the "gods" of their age. For whatever the ideas of such persons might have been regarding "a great overruling Deity," it is safe to assume that they obeyed the little "gods" and prospered, or disobeyed them and came to grief. Propriety and Respectability, we may suppose, are goddesses in England. Learned inquiry might show them to be one and the same, but in any case they must never be forgotten.

In the case of Fielding it is particularly necessary that we should be clear as to what the gods of this our own day are, and to remember that they did not necessarily prevail in his. Thereafter you may walk boldly into that eighteenth-century England which he portrayed, in a proper frame of mind to enjoy and appreciate its characteristics. If Fielding's England does not please you, do not despair of the eighteenth century, but turn to Richardson's "Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded" and read the long tale of how that exemplary serving-maid preserved her chastity against the most dire and determined assaults and yielded herself to the assailant only in holy wedlock. If still (as may well happen) you remain dissatisfied, if the love-making seems wanting in rapture and passion and "soulfulness," if the men appear coarse and the women formal, then return to the twentieth century and resolutely determine to be a person of your own time. It is a good thing to be a person of your own time and to worship the prevalent gods. But it is a better thing to be able to appreciate Homer in spite of the ridiculous deities; and Fielding, who had no foreknowledge of the powers who were to come after his days. And certain it is that the men and women he created from observation of the life of his time represent more truly the real men and women of to-day than do the fantastic beings that stand for English men and English women in present-day fiction. Alter here and there in his novels an incident which changed codes of manners have now made impossible, add to the relations of the sexes more tenderness and ideality than Fielding ever allows to them, and what is left represents to-day as true and profound a presentation of the springs of human action as it was when he wrote. Why? Because his eye was ever on the truth of the matter. He set out with no predilections for heroes or heroines; he bound himself to no pattern or convention of literature; he did not make fools of the fates, or a plaything of destiny. He described men and women as he saw them, veritably as only minds like his and Chaucer's and Shakespeare's can see them, and as they will remain for many ages still in spite of motor-cars, aeroplanes, and as yet unguessed radio-activities.

Three men in especial stand out in English literature for combined keenness and spaciousness of view: Chaucer, Fielding and Scott. By spaciousness is meant the reverse of that quality which selects a man or woman for magnification, dissects his every thought, intensifies his minutest sensation, inflates his purposes, and alchemises him generally into such portentous volumes of elemental gas that the great free universe is blotted out and the reader is forced by literary art to dwell with a monster. Shakespeare has much to answer for in creating Hamlet. To believe the bulk of modern fiction we are all Hamlets now, little Hamlets perhaps, male and female Hamlets, but certainly Hamlets. What ails us—according to modern fiction—is a wailing heart-ache about something: about a woman, or a creed, or the mystery of creation. To Fielding, as to Chaucer, the heartache was a mental toothache. All around the sufferer from this or any other malady or misfortune, or even good fortune, was the great world of life, full of paths of health. Life, say Chaucer, and Scott and Fielding, is a condition of action, the world is its scene, and now the time. When Amelia's lover leaves her asleep, "tired out with so long a struggle between variety of passions," he tells us that "having drest myself with all the expedition imaginable, singing, whistling, hurrying, attempting by every method to banish thought, I mounted my horse . . . and galloped away," to the wars. The world is a constant war in which no good is to be done by lying down and lamenting. Self-analysis is the very devil. Be up and doing: your Amelia will love you all the more for it, and the world will in most cases smile on you. If it does not, down you go bravely with head erect. Such is the philosophy that Fielding has to teach.

Fielding, however, set out to teach no philosophy. He discourses frequently, and at such length as to be tedious to most readers, on any occasion that takes his fancy. To tell truth, however, in these somewhat irritating confidences from author to reader he is not often either witty or illuminating. There is, indeed, an air of mockery about them. But in his descriptions of persons and events he is unsurpassable. Only one other writer had an eye like his for effect. But Dickens, with all his marvellous faculty of observation, does not penetrate to the essential humour of life as does Fielding. "Tom Jones" is a succession of astoundingly natural pictures, drawn with the zest of one who loves life in action almost to reckless idolatry. The action of the story often carries the reader hastily over minor episodes which, more closely examined, are finished gems. Of such, for example, is the description of Mrs. Partridge's assault upon her husband. When Partridge claims that the blood on his wife's face, to which she appeals as evidence of his barbarity, is really his blood, drawn by her nails from his face, the neighbour wives merely remark that it is a pity it had not come from his heart. This is the true inconsequential humour of life. Such things cannot be invented by taking thought. They flow from the artist's delight in his work, and Fielding in this true sense was a great artist, loving life with a great love.

Fielding loved life in all its manifestations so well that we have to stretch terms to call him a moralist in the narrow sense. Probably he had no intention at any time of pointing a moral. Tom Jones's progress through the world from his unpremeditated and altogether charming confession of love, a love which consumes his vitals, for the fair Sophia, reads in the present day like a satire of love and life alike. It is, however, the truest picture of an ordinary man ever put on paper. In so far as it is meant to teach anything it teaches that a healthy mind carries in itself the antidote of follies. A world of Tom Joneses would be a pleasanter place than a world of great poets. Some might even prefer it to a world of eminent divines. For Tom was a healthy young rascal. We have acquired a number of new gods since his time, some of whom by anticipation he offended to a dreadful degree. But the human heart is much what it was, a bundle of apparent contradictions, now good, now bad, reaching the moderate degree of happiness permitted to mankind only when it is healthy. Herein lies the pre-eminent virtue of Fielding. He showed life as it really is in an astonishing variety of circumstances and conditions, demonstrating it to be not a simple but a most complex thing. And he seems to say in many a passage of poignant wit and biting irony: "By all means proceed with your plans for improving mankind, but at least comprehend what life really is. This is it."

ADAM LORIMER.

FICTION

Amalia. By GRAHAM HOPE. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

MISS HOPE has discovered in Montarvia yet another little Balkan State in trouble about its king, and after two attempts against his life inclined to tolerate the rule of Prince Karl-Friedrich. Karl-Friedrich rightly concludes that a wife ready to face assassination, and minor annoyances, would prove a valuable ally; he therefore sends his prime-minister to report upon the four daughters of the august house of Salzheim-Schlüsselberg. The story opens engagingly with the discussion of Karl-Friedrich's proffered honour by the girls and their parents. Amalia, the youngest, is chosen, submits to maternal pressure, and reluctantly sets out for the wedding at Nischigrade. Thereafter the story concerns Amalia's life in Montarvia, and her relations with Karl-Friedrich. Politics are not obtruded, the environment is picturesque, the characters clear and well drawn. The first pages arrest attention, and expectations raised are more than fulfilled; the ability, freshness, and honesty of this captivating story should commend it to all lovers of a good novel.

Living Lies. By ESTHER MILLER. (Methuen, 6s.)

WHEN people tell us that what they like is a good story they usually mean a story with nothing good about it except the situation. As long as the hero and heroine are placed in difficulties it does not matter how they got there, or why they stay there, or, if the end be cheerful, in what manner they extricate themselves. The weak point of these stories, in the opinion of readers less easily pleased, is that the men and women concerned are never for a moment shaken by the storms of sorrow, joy and terror that would ravage the most callous of us if we committed their crimes or suffered their misfortunes. To be sure, the author says they are, but we are not convinced of it. In "Living Lies" Stephen Garth lets his friend, the cousin of the girl he loves, go to penal servitude in his stead and refuses to free him although his wife and his sister know the truth. The situation is full of splendid possibilities, for the two women love both men and are torn between them. The sister cannot betray her brother nor the wife her husband. The story hardly flutters the fringe of such a tragedy; but it is told in a breezy entertaining way. The descriptions of Cornish scenery will bring pleasant pictures to any reader who knows the Delectable Duchy.

Clairice: the Story of a Crystal Heart. By NARCISSE LUCIEN DE POLEN. (Unwin, 3s. 6d.)

A PICTURESQUE tale of two hundred years ago, in England and in Spain: a romance of love, hate and jealousy with a touch of originality about it, successfully conveying the impression of other times and manners. Clairice, in whom all the strife and passion centre, is a dainty maiden of high degree who takes upon herself the burthen of a family compact, and gives her hand to Antoine of the gleaming eyes, not without regret for the tarrying of the dream-knight. He comes too late and meets with strange adventures that justify the fortune-teller's warning to "beware of the green"—of the house of Antoine. It is an attractive little story told with simple directness and considerable charm of style. The author has an eye for effect, and a pretty taste in matters of decoration and costume.

The Dust of Conflict. By HAROLD BINDLOSS. (Long, 6s.)

A STORY by Mr. Harold Bindloss is as easy to recognise as a Kidderminster carpet or a Cheshire cheese. Some years ago Mr. Bindloss thought of a stern, spare, sinewy, reticent, and grimly tenacious young Englishman, temporarily deprived by malicious fate of the inheritance—or was it the heiress, or both?—which should by right have been his, and set him struggling gamely in strange and distant lands against his adverse destiny; and we should be afraid to say how many times he has reproduced him since. Under many different names, in slightly varied circumstances, now in hot countries and now in cold, we have watched, with increasing wonder and admiration, that same young Englishman, winning through his troubles to a well-deserved success. And here he appears once more in the person of Bernard Appleby, who takes the blame of a kinman's indiscretion and the consequences of his weakness of character upon his own shoulders, and finds himself a leader of insurrectionists in Cuba with a rapidity which will be welcome to those who like Mr. Bindloss's heroes best when they are fighting fate, and least when they are in the company of the grave, beautiful and invariably imperious young ladies who capture their hearts. These valuable but somewhat stereotyped attributes are this time bestowed upon a Miss Violet Wayne (fiancée to the weak kinsman, Tony Palliser), while the grateful rôle of staunch girlfriend to the hero is sustained with spirit by a vivacious little American whose presence in the country-society scenes does something to mitigate the occasional impression that we are in the company of talking dolls. The background is, as usual, broadly and effectively painted, and the Cuban chapters make capital reading.

The Opened Shutters. By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM. (Constable, 6s.)

THE threadbare situation of the advent of an unwelcome orphaned relation—a young and beautiful girl of course—with which this book opens, does not encourage the reader to continue the story. But although she starts in so hackneyed a manner this heroine does not follow quite the usual course. It is a simple story that Miss Burnham has to tell, and is concerned with unexciting people. It could with advantage have been told in a page or two, and even these would hardly have constituted more than a sketch. It can no more be called a novel than a plate of bread and butter can be called a meal—even though the bread and butter be good of its kind.

A Man's Love. By DOROTHY SUMMERS. (Unwin, 6s.)

IT is impossible to believe that any one who has passed the age of seventeen could take this story seriously, and it is not easy to believe that any one who has passed the age of seventeen wrote it. At that early age girls inclined to perfervid sentiment might be thrilled by the woes of the saint-like Laurel, the brutality of her stupid husband, the baseness of Lilia, and the cloak and rapier villainy of the American Selden Marshall. We hold no brief against brutes and villains. We like them—on paper: they are nearly always more entertaining than saints. But we like them to hang together just for the brief hour of rapturous perusal, and we have more faith in them when the woman for whose sake they are respectively brutal and villainous is not as patently innocent as Laurel Barrington. She is the kind of heroine that allows her male acquaintances to address her as "little lady," and who is so dense that when one of them makes advances to her she thinks he is speaking of another woman and gives him warm encouragement. That kind of woman is bound to be treated cruelly until she has nearly died of brain-fever, a disease that invariably precedes complete reconciliation in such cases. We leave Laurel and her husband "lip to lip and heart to heart," and we hope that she had learnt enough to avoid Americans with sweet voices and suave manners for the rest of her unnatural life.

My Lady Nan. By BESSIE DILL. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

IT is as refreshing to turn from the pages of the modern psychological novel to this simple little romance of a past generation, as it is to spend an evening with Robin Hood after The Doctor's Dilemma. But when we have said that "My Lady Nan" is a thoroughly wholesome story, we have said everything there is to be said—except that it is "eminently suitable for the young person," and that she will probably enjoy it provided that she be young enough and not too blasée. The lovely heroine, the gallant hero, the inevitable mystification, the pump-room at Bath, are all en règle, and the dénouement is fairly obvious from the beginning. An attempt is made in the conversation to reproduce the style of the Regency, but there are many lapses of which the most flagrant is an allusion to the heroine as "no great catch."

Charles Edward. By HARRISON G. RHODES. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

CHARLES EDWARD AUSTIN is a modern young American, endowed with plenty of cash and an unfailing supply of high spirits—a combination which enables him to undertake some surprising adventures. The first of his escapades provides him with an eligible wife—eligible in the sense that she proves an ideal coadjutor in his subsequent freaks. Their pranks, which Mr. Rhodes recounts with easy gaiety and fluent humour, take many different forms. While Charles Edward advertises for an heirship, and succeeds in getting one, his wife, while feigning to elope with her own husband, ingeniously prevents the more serious elopement of another lady. One of the most diverting of the adventures is Charles Edward's experiment in publishing. He purchases the manuscripts of four different authors, and issues them simultaneously as the works of one man. The books are so widely dissimilar in character that their putative creator becomes at once the problem and the rage of that literary season. In the last episode we discover young Charles Edward, à la two, following worthily in the wake of his volatile parents. We like this best of all; it has a note of pathos to mellow its exuberant humour. The book is not one to read at a sitting: an overdose of practical joking is apt to pall.

DRAMA

MR. ST. JOHN HANKIN'S COMEDY AT THE STAGE SOCIETY

Awake my St. John! leave all meaner things
To low ambition and the pride of Kings.

So begins, with a strange prophetic touch, the famous Essay on Man. If Alexander Pope were to be reincarnated he would not write any more perfect couplets, he would write perfectly constructed plays: no doubt is left in the mind as to that after seeing Mr. Hankin's work. He has many of Pope's qualities and many of his defects. Both worship at the cold shrine of Reason, and Reason is an inconsiderate deity with an unkind trick of covering her devotees with an elegant polish which prevents them from seeing into human nature, crane their necks though they may. Reason keeps them safe and keeps them artificial. Cleverness becomes their stumbling-block. And yet you must read the Essay on Man more than once before you discover that the whole argument is based upon a fallacy; and even when the discovery is made, you are consoled amply by the dexterity of the phrasing, the happy neatness of certain remarks.

Say first of God above, or Man below
What can we reason, but from what we know?

Mr. St. John Hankin might have written this, though Alexander Pope actually did.

Laugh where we must, be candid where we can;
But vindicate the ways of God to Man,

Pope said, without a blush, in the end of the previous paragraph, though, as some one has curtly said, "you might as well go to a gin-shop for a leg of mutton as go to Pope for this," and his remark is borne out by this odd juxtaposition. For God, or Beauty, or whatever name be preferable, is just that element in life which can never be known, but can only be felt. It is that Colour, whose touch is infinite and lends

A yonder to all ends, which gives life to a work of art, and which Reason knows not. There is something divine in the mere fact of life . . . But to the play.

Geoffrey Cassilis has met a girl, as pretty as she is naughty, in an omnibus accident. He is very much his mother's only son, but he has had the gumption to make her acquaintance, the ardour to fall in love with her, and the folly to engage himself to marry her. Mrs. Cassilis is a devoted mother, a lady of wealth and position; and resolves to ask her son's fiancée and prospective mother-in-law to pay her a long visit at Deynham Abbey. The play opens with the arrival of Mrs. Borridge and her daughter Ethel. Mrs. Cassilis tells her friend Lady Marchmont (very well played by Miss Gertrude Burnett) her scheme of attack. It is to weary Geoffrey with the vulgarity of his future relations, and to weary Ethel Borridge with the boredom of country-life. She is successful, and the engagement is broken off. The situation lends itself to comedy, and Mr. Hankin has devised extraordinarily amusing moments, notably when Ethel, fiercely bored with everything and enraged at the superiority and disdain with which she is treated, sings a music-hall song with great dash to the astonished guests at a typical country-house dinner-party. Mrs. Borridge's immense vulgarity, too, in contrast to the high respectability of county families, is continually entertaining. In detail the play is excellent, and it is written with the finish which Mr. Hankin knows well how to impart to his work. But as a whole the play is disappointing—partly no doubt because the pace at which it was taken on Monday was altogether too slow, but not entirely. The character of Geoffrey Cassilis is not convincing. A boy who would follow up a chance acquaintance so effectually, even though he had been sheltered in a comfortable house in the country, would hardly give up the girl with a tear and a few priggish remarks. This was made more apparent by Miss Maudi Darrell, who took the part of Ethel Borridge. Her appearance has the peculiar exotic beauty of a Beardsley drawing: if she appealed to a boy at all, she would appeal with great force. She had none of the frank, easy-going prettiness which a boy would find pleasantly attractive. This is Miss Darrell's first appearance in comedy, and her performance showed undoubted proof that she has the makings of a comedy actress, though it showed also her uneasiness and a lack of power to express what she desired to express.

Mr. Langhorne Burton is not as well known as he should be. He played the part of the boy Geoffrey as well as it could be played. But the part is exceedingly difficult and withal thankless. The Mrs. Cassilis of Miss Evelyn Weeden (another unreal character) was not very good, though she looked the part to perfection: she was too slow, and gave to the character an intensesness which it is far too light to bear. She overplayed the woman's motherly softness, just as Miss Clare Greet overdid Mrs. Borridge's vulgarity. Her playing was loudly applauded and there was certainly much cleverness in it, but it was too heavy for the balance of the play, which from its nature is easily put wrong. Miss Florence Haydon and Mr. Sam Sothern gave the best display of acting in the small but important parts of Lady Remenham and Major Warrington.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

THE LATE JAMES CHARLES

As so often happens in the history of art, the gifts of a painter neglected in his lifetime are meeting with increasing recognition now that he is dead. For thirty years or more the work of the late Mr. James Charles has been before the public, first at the Royal Academy and latterly at the exhibitions of the New English Art Club, but though his pictures were from time to time awarded an encouraging epithet or word of praise, the real importance of the man and his work remained unknown, save to a few intimates, till the death of the painter last August. The appreciative notices which then appeared in obituary columns were followed by his representation at Burlington House this winter among the British painters recently deceased, and this public acknowledgment of his worth has been supplemented and emphasised by the opening at the Leicester Galleries this week of an exhibition of his remaining works.

From this collection, which includes a good deal of the earlier as well as the later work of the painter, it is clear that James Charles was limited neither in his choice of subject nor in his method of treatment, and those who know him only by his more recent exhibits at the New English Art Club will be impressed and perhaps a little surprised by the diversity here displayed. But if his sincerity and honesty are equally revealed by his portraits, rustic scenes, marines and landscapes, it is on the latter that the hopes of his enduring fame must be grounded. For Charles was essentially a painter of nature rather than of man, and his attitude toward nature was not one of brooding reverie like that of Mr. Foottet, whose landscapes we discussed last week, but a joyous acceptance of her actualities untroubled by metaphysical thought. In the landscapes of Charles there is no yearning interrogation of nature's mysteries, only an expression of intense joy of life, and a sense of deep satisfaction and thankfulness in the mere breathing of pure air and the vision of warm sunlight. The simple-mindedness of this mental attitude is fitly expressed by a direct, straightforward technique, which without elaborating detail seeks to set down swiftly and surely the salient characteristics of a landscape—and especially its colour and atmosphere—by means of separate touches and strokes of pure pigment. This use of broken colour, which gives so much vivacity and spontaneity to the best work of the painter, is most openly revealed in the marine studies painted at Capri, where in order to give full force to the light and colour of the water it is employed on a more extended scale than is the case with the later landscapes.

The many phases through which Charles passed before he attained this freedom of touch and subtle eye for the true hues of sunlight are indicated at the Leicester Galleries by Moonrise on the Ramparts (60), where he is seen under the spell of Corot's silvery tones; the Sussex landscape, A Well-known "Trio" in Lickfold (69), in richer golden tones more reminiscent of Diaz and Troyon; and by A Stream by the Roadside—Montreuil (19), challenging Thaulow in its vivid rendering of running water; while in the very title of his beautiful Reminiscence of Watteau at Burlington House the painter gracefully acknowledges his debt to the French seventeenth-century painter. A student and an admirer of French landscape painting from Watteau to Claude Monet, Charles throughout his development practises an art that is national and not derivative. Those landscapes which, like Early Spring in La Madeleine (18) at the Leicester Galleries and The Chaik Pit at Burlington House, may be considered his most characteristic productions, suggest that the abiding influence on his painting was Constable rather than any French master. If he took hints from the palette of Monet, he adapted that palette in his own way to record his own observations of nature, and as a pioneer of plein-air painting in England he opened up a new field which, largely owing to his influence and example, has been cultivated with a marked success by Mr. Clausen, Mr. Mark Fisher, Mr. Wilson Steer and others.

This influence on his contemporaries, which gives Charles an importance to the historian of modern art apart from the intrinsic merits of his work, is gracefully acknowledged by Mr. George Clausen in the preface he has written for the catalogue of this exhibition:

Some of us [he writes], who have gained wider recognition than was ever his, feel gratefully how much we owe to his influence and example. Perhaps—and I think it likely—the comparative neglect which was his lot, was consequent on his exclusive devotion to his main ideal—of colour and atmosphere; although, as may be seen from his fine and sensitive drawings, he was a beautiful draughtsman . . . His pictures never "made a mark" in exhibitions, and he seemed very careless whether they did or not; but he never varied his course, or allowed anything to divert him from the one aim of perfecting his work, painting, as truly as it was given him to see, the things which he felt to be beautiful . . . He was gifted with a fine sense of colour, and his main effort was always in this direction; the aim was to communicate the emotion received by giving the harmony and envelopment of a scene. Yet his work is not monotonous, the method varies with the mood or the subject; and the thing he most loved to express—the beauty of sunlight—he has painted better, I think, than any other of our time.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. FISHER UNWIN will publish on February 18 a book by Professor J. H. Gardiner on "The Bible as English Literature." Its object is to throw light on the literary form of the Bible by bringing together facts from the history of its sources and from the history of the authorised version. The author has drawn freely on the larger results of the great school of learning commonly known as the Higher Criticism.

As a protest against the cumbersome guide-book Mr. Werner Laurie is issuing a series of "Leather Booklets." The first volume, which he will publish immediately, is "The Cathedrals of England," by W. J. Roberts, to which Mr. S. James Brown contributes thirty original illustrations. Volumes on Old English Inns, Abbeys of England, Castles of England, Old London Companies, etc., are in preparation.

A new book on "Work among the Poor of London," by the Rev. Isaac Hartill, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will deal in a practical manner with the relief of the poor both in the West and East ends of London, in workhouse infirmaries and by institutions, a special chapter being devoted to the children of the poor.

Mr. Unwin will publish on February 18 a book by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald entitled "Josephine's Troubles." It is a story of the Franco-German War, and is based on incidents which Mr. Fitzgerald himself witnessed in France during that great struggle. The house at Versailles in which he lodged was the scene of its episodes; from the windows he saw the soldiers going out to or returning from the fight, and the rural crowd firing after them not balls but scowls and maledictions; while within he every day saw and talked with the chief actors.

A valuable addition to the popular series of "Guild Text Books" will be published by Messrs A. and C. Black in a few weeks under the title of "Between the Testaments." It treats of the history and literature of the period between the Old and the New Testament and is from the pen of Dr. C. M. Grant.

"Indian Pictures and Problems" is the title of Mr. Ian Malcolm's new book of travel which will be published shortly by E. Grant Richards. The author's intention is to provide for the average Englishman about to travel in India and Burma a rapid and readable survey of the conditions which he may expect to find. This idea is carried out in a series of travel sketches dealing with various aspects of Indian life. The book contains pen-portraits of the leading Maharajahs as well as essays on such subjects as Famine Administration, the North-West Frontier, and Public School Education. The second part of the book is devoted to Burma, and includes an interesting account of a viceregal tour through that province of Further India during the time that the author was attached to Lord Curzon's staff. The book will be very fully illustrated.

Mr. Arthur Machen has written his first long novel, and it will be published shortly by E. Grant Richards under the title of "The Hill of Dreams." Those experiments in the horrible, "The Great God Pan" and "The Three Impostors," which appear in Mr. Machen's collection of stories, "The House of Souls," will have prepared readers for the character and atmosphere of this book—a study of the temperament of a young literary man whose dreams lead him into strange places and bring him to a strange end.

"The Censorship of Church and its Influence upon the Production and the Distribution of Literature" is the title of a book by Mr. George Haven Putnam, which is announced by the firm of which he is the head. This book is the result of long study and original research. It covers the history of the Prohibitory and Expurgatory Indexes, and also considers the results of state censorship and of censorship by Protestants. The widest influence has been exerted by the Church of Rome, and Mr. Putnam indicates its effects on the undertakings of authors, professors, publishers, and booksellers in each one of the European states in which the regulations of the Index have come into force. The final chapter presents a summary of the conclusions reached by representative Roman Catholics in regard to the modern literary policy of their Church.

The latest author to set forth the attractions of the camera over the rifle is Mr. W. S. Thomas, whose illustrated book, "Hunting Big Game with Gun and Kodak," is on Messrs Putnam's Spring List. Mr. Thomas is an expert shot and his book shows many trophies of the old style of hunting. He appreciates, however, the sport to be got from the camera, finding that it provides more difficulties and dangers, and gives greater rewards than hunting to kill. The author describes his experiences in pursuit of big game chiefly in Canada.

In a forthcoming work on the China and Japan of to-day and to-morrow, entitled "Signs and Portents in the Far East," Mr. Everard Cotes has brought together the sum of his observations of men and things during a prolonged tour in Manchuria and the East. He examines the capabilities of the new Chinese army and the limits imposed by race characteristics upon the situation which has arisen since the Russo-Japanese War, and handles his subjects with a pleasant simplicity and pictorial directness which carry the reader with entertainment over Hapeh iron-foundries and Manchurian battlefields and leave him at the end possessed without effort of the essential features of one of the most important problems of the time. Messrs. Methuen are the publishers.

Miss Mary Dean's novel, "The Other Pawn," will be published by Messrs. Methuen on February 21. The story deals with Bath as it was when it seized upon Mr. Swinburne's imagination. An Indian widow's child plays her wilful game of life watched somewhat mysteriously by a wealthy elderly man of the world who lives in the house once occupied by Beckford, and the shade of that gitted and eccentric millionaire is not without its part in the story. The same publishers have in the press Mrs. M. E. Mann's new novel "The Memories of Ronald Love."

Messrs. Methuen announce for publication on February 21 a book entitled "The Brasses of England," by the Rev. Herbert W. Macklin, M.A., President of the Monumental Brass Society. He treats of Brasses from the historic as well as the technical point of view. His twelve chapters trace the rise and decline of the art of brass-engraving from the reign of Edward I. to the Caroline Decadence. Architectural Ornament and Foreign Workmanship occupy separate chapters, and another is devoted to the Mediæval Clergy of England, with appendices on the Religious Orders and the Universities. Numerous lists of examples are a prominent feature of the book, and every period is illustrated from tracings, rubbings, and photographs.

Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. announce for early publication a new story by S. R. Crockett entitled "Little Esson." It is, they tell us, "a story of the sorrows and smiles of which domestic comedy is made up in this modern life of ours. It is touched with the sentiment and half-whimsical humour which have characterised some of Mr. Crockett's best work."

CORRESPONDENCE

A SUGGESTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the first paragraph on p. 28 of your issue for January 12 "slaughter" and "laughter" are mentioned. I believe that the old lawter pronunciation of "laughter" solves the riddle of a misprint in Julius Cæsar, I. ii. 72—"Were I a common laughter"—which has caused some discussion.

Under "laughter," New English Dictionary gives the variant "lawter." The compositor, who set up the passage (presumably from dictation) supposed he heard the word

"lawter," and accordingly set up "laughter." Cassius is trying to prove his sincerity in praising Brutus; as Wright says, "he appeals here to what Brutus knows of his habits of speech"—he is not a common praiser. I believe that for "laughter" (lawter) we should read lauder.

EDWARD MERTON DEY.

St. Louis.

SIR WALTER RALEGH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted to make a comment on one sentence in your critic's review of my play, Sir Walter Raleigh, viz., "he has been too much fettered by attention to historical accuracy in detail."

My play condenses the events of two years into five acts, but that is not the special feature to which I wish to draw attention. For your critic has said that I have not condensed my theme.

What I observed on study of the period, and what I think must strike any student, is the natural progression of historical events in the order of dramatic development.

There is firstly in the spring of 1617 the statement of the main events of the problem, viz., the Spanish marriage and its enveloping atmosphere of anti-English diplomacy; the final release of Raleigh; James's reluctance and final consent to his departure.

Follows the complot of the plot, viz., the disaffection of his crews, his shortage of provisions and the recorded attempts of Gondomar to hinder his sailing. These events, I submit, naturally culminate in the effecting of that sailing, which is my play to the end of Act II.

Act III. shows the action at a momentary pause, because the crisis was at hand. But I think it is historically undoubted that the failure of the expedition and Raleigh's decision to return—after much heartburning—really was the turning-point of the drama of his latter years. In Act IV. it seems to me that history again shows the resolution of the elements of the tragedy into comparatively simple elements, viz., the faithfulness of Lady Raleigh and Arundel, the increasing pressure of Spain and the vacillation of James. "Which will win?" is the question asked—the answer points all one way.

The trial and execution naturally close the tragedy.

I submit that in this peculiar instance life did "happen as the exigencies of dramatic art require."

Whether my interpretation of life is or is not open to the severe castigation which your critic has administered, is another question.

H. A. A. CRUSO.

February 11.

"THE SPHINX"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Among the numerous notices of Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of Antony and Cleopatra no reference has been made, so far as I am aware, to Oscar Wilde's poem, "The Sphinx," though that mythical and mystical beast figures—too prominently, some critics hold—in the play as staged at His Majesty's. The poem, it may be remembered, was known in manuscript form to a limited circle for some time before its publication in 1894, the reason assigned by the author for the delay in its appearance being that "it would destroy domesticity in England." Certainly nothing more insolently esoteric, more likely to arouse the wrath of the Philistine had it met his view, issued even from the Bodley Head than this chef d'œuvre of Mr. Ricketts's art, which was limited to twenty-five copies, and dedicated to Marcel Schwob.

The metre of this weird poem, whose haunting cadences it is well-nigh impossible to forget, is that of "In Memoriam," though this fact is to some extent disguised by the stanzas being arranged in two long lines, in place of the four short ones of Tennyson.

The poet sitting in his study at dead of night, like Poe in "The Raven," questions a sphinx, which, "with eyes of satin rimmed with gold," "lies couching on the Chinese mat," on the "far-off things" of long ago that it has witnessed:

"O tell me were you standing by when Isis to Osiris knelt,
And did you watch the Egyptian melt her union for Antony,
And drink the jewel-drunken wine and bend her head in mimic awe
To see the huge proconsul draw the salted tunny from the brine?"

And did you mark the Cyprian kiss white Adon on his catal-falque?
 And did you follow Amenalk, the god of Heliopolis?
 And did you talk with Thoth, and did you hear the moon-horned lo weep?
 And know the painted kings who sleep beneath the wedge-shaped pyramid?"

At length, grown "weary of himself and sick of asking," he bids the "loathsome mystery" begone:

"Why are you tarrying? Get hence, I weary of your sullen ways,
 I weary of your steadfast gaze, your somnolent magnificence.

False Sphinx! False Sphinx! by reedy Styx old Charon, leaning on his oar,
 Waits for my coin: go thou before, and leave me to my Crucifix,
 Whose pallid burden, sick with pain, watches the world with wearied eyes,
 And weeps for every soul that dies, and weeps for every soul in vain."

I presume that "the Sphinx" will be reprinted in the forthcoming complete edition of Wilde's works which Messrs. Methuen promise; but though the poem may thus become more widely known, it will ever remain "caviare to the general."

H. L. N.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am at one with Professor Tyrrell in condemning and eschewing the split infinitive. At the same time it must, I think, be admitted that the force of a sentence is often weakened by its avoidance. Take, for example, the sentence at the close of the third chapter of Mr. H. G. Wells's "The Future in America": "and indeed, the large quiet of Beacon Street, in the early morning sunshine, seemed to more than justify that expectation." The strengthening of the verb could not be displaced without damage to the effect intended to be produced.

I have just been reading Mr. Thomas Hardy's early novels over again and find him a very dreadful offender in the unnecessary use of this ugly locution.

G. S. LAYARD.

ATTIC USAGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A writer in the ACADEMY for February 2, p. 120, col 2, in discussing "Attic" phrases, makes assumptions that surely should not pass unchallenged. He tells us that the occurrence of the use of like as a conjunction is regular in the conversation of most men and women, and, further, that these (his punctuation admits of no other rendering) employ the literary dialect. Next we have the implication that because on a solitary occasion a given author has split an infinitive, the correctness of his denunciation of the employment of like as a conjunction=as is open to question.

Now the evidence of a late discussion in the columns of the ACADEMY and of the language employed by most persons accustomed to consider the construction of English sentences seems to be quite the other way. Mr. C. T. Onions, in his invaluable little book, "An Advanced English Syntax," p. 66, remarks, indeed, that "the use of like as a conjunction=as, e.g., 'like I do' . . . is frequent as a loose colloquialism, but is avoided by careful speakers and writers." Were like capable of appropriate use in place of as, the saying of a ship, "She walks the water like a thing of life," might not unreasonably be interpreted as referring to a known property in common of ships and living things—that they walk the water. Again, if like may serve as a conjunction, we are at liberty to conclude from the aphorism that "March comes in like a lion and goes out like a lamb," that its originator had observed something specially characteristic in the ingress of lions and in the mode of departure of lambs. The actual meaning might, however, be otherwise adequately expressed by the statement that "March, when it comes in, is lion-like, when it departs, lamb-like." In such sentences like merely qualifies the object with which comparison is made, but not specifically its actions.

Even were it perfectly patent that all the members of a multitude had acquired a certain trick of speech, the adoption of the same might be quite indefensible. Rather one might have to say, with Coriolanus: "The tongues o' the common mouth. I do despise them, For they do prank them in authority, Against all noble sufferance."

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

February 12.

A RECORD OF SPANISH PAINTING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall take no further part in the quite unexpected controversy which Mr. and Mrs. Gallichan (instead of frankly withdrawing the inaccuracies which had been published under my name, and as an expression of my judgment, in which the authoress of "A Record" expresses her confidence) have imposed upon me. But, if Mrs. Gallichan's memory does not extend to our first meeting, in May 1902, at Avila, and at Zamora the next day, when I gave her the notes about the Cathedral of Teruel, and was told that they would be utilised in a book which she projected, I think her husband will at least not deny that, when we met in London, in July 1903, I was told distinctly that she was about to publish a book, and meant to put into it my information about that church. I am certain that I then and there asked for the opportunity of correcting a proof of that item in her book, and that I was promised a proof. I do not recollect having received the letter to which she now refers, or any notice, addressed to myself, of the publication of the volume. I believe, however, that I saw a mention of it in a newspaper. I hope that Mr. and Mrs. Gallichan will go to see the architectural wonders of Albarracin (depicted so often by the Irish artist, Mr. Gibson, of Madrid) and Teruel, and enjoy some fishing in "the white river," Turia (Old Baskish for Zuria=the white), which runs down from the former, and gives its name to the latter, city.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

February 8.

[This correspondence must now close.—ED.]

FREDERIC SHIELDS EXHIBITION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Art Gallery Committee of the Corporation propose to hold an exhibition of this artist's collected works in the City Art Gallery during the coming months of March and April, and I shall be obliged if owners of such works, who are willing to lend the same for this exhibition, will communicate with me.

The exhibition will not be a profit-bearing one, and the committee are anxious to make it as complete and as widely known as possible.

WILLIAM STANFIELD (Curator).

February 12.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

Raymond, George Lansing. The Essentials of Aesthetics in Music, Poetry, Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. 8 x 5½. Pp. 404. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

Elliot, the Rev. W. Hume. The Story of the "Cheeryble" Grants. From the Spey to the Irwell. 7½ x 5. Pp. 247. Sherratt & Hughes, 4s. net.

Macfall, Haldane. Ibsen: the Man, his Art and his Significance. Illustrated by Joseph Simpson. 7 x 5½. Pp. 327. E. Grant Richards, 5s. net.

CLASSICS

Campbell, Lewis. Paralipomena Sophoclea. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 287. Rivingtons, 6s. net.

[Supplementary notes on the text and interpretation of Sophocles]

ECONOMICS

Chorlton, J. D. The Rating of Land Values. 9½ x 6. Pp. 177. Manchester: University Press, 3s. 6d. net. [Vol v. of the "Economic Series."]]

FICTION

Birmingham, George A. Benedict Cavanagh. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 334. Arnold, 6s.

Bagot, Richard. Temptation. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 374. Methuen, 6s.

- Mann, Mary E. The Memories of Ronald Love. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 312. Methuen, 6s.
- Gates, Eleanor. The Plow-Woman. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 364. Methuen, 6s.
- Hueffer, Ford Madox. Privy Seal: his Last Venture. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 324. Alston Rivers, 6s.
- Croker, B. M. The Spanish Necklace. With 8 illustrations by F. Pegram. Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.
- Tynan, Katharine. For Maisie. A Love Story. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 312. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Blyth, James. A Hazardous Wooing. Illustrated. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 319. Ward, Lock, 6s.
- Reynolds, Mrs. Fred. The House of Rest. 8 × 5½. Pp. 325. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
- Farrer, Reginald. The Sundered Streams. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 399. Arnold, 6s.
[“The history of a memory that had no full stops.”]
- Flowerdew, Herbert. Maynard's Wives. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 416. Nash, 6s.
[“The story of a man with a conscience.”]
- Old Hampshire Vignettes*. By the Author of “Mademoiselle Ixe.” 7½ × 4½. Pp. 116. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.

LITERATURE

- Farrer, J. A. Literary Forgeries. With an Introduction by Andrew Lang. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 282. Longmans, 6s. 6d. net.
- Smith, Francis A. The Critics versus Shakespeare. A Brief for the Defendant. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 128. New York: The Knickerbocker Press, n.p.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Picton, J. Allanson. Spinoza: a Handbook to the Ethics. 8 × 5½. Pp. 264. Constable, 5s. net.
- “Civis.” The State of the Navy in 1907: a Plea for Inquiry. With an Introduction by J. St. Loe Strachey. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 173. Smith, Elder, 2s. 6d.
[Letters originally published in the Spectator.]
- Thomson, William Hanna. Brain and Personality; or the Physical Relations of the Brain to the Mind. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 320. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
- Godlee, Rickman John. The Past, Present and Future of the School for Advanced Medical Studies of University College, London. 10 × 6½. Pp. 46. Bale, 2s. 6d. net.
[“Being the introductory address at the opening of the Winter Sessions 1906.”]
- Fox-Davies, A. C. The House of Lords as a Part of the British Constitution. A Political Tract. 7½ × 5. Pp. 71. Lane, 1s. net.
- Donaldson, James. Woman; her Position and Influence in Ancient Greece and Rome, and among the early Christians. 8 × 5½. Pp. 178. Longmans, 5s. net.
[Partly reprinted from the Contemporary Review.]
- Laughlin, J. Laurence. Industrial America. With maps and diagrams. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 261. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d.
[Lectures delivered in the spring of 1906 before the Vereinigung für Staatswissenschaftliche Fortbildung, in Berlin.]
- Pierce, Franklin. The Tariff and the Trusts. 8 × 5½. Pp. 387. Macmillan, 6s. 6d. net.
- Debreff's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1907*. Illustrated with 500 Armorial Engravings. Revised by Members of Parliament, and by Judges of the United Kingdom and the Colonies, etc. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 468. Dean, 7s. 6d. net.
[Forty-first annual issue.]
- The Proofs of Life after Death*. Compiled and edited by Robert J. Thompson. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 365. Werner Laurie, 7s. 6d. net.
[“A collection of opinions as to a future life by some of the world's most eminent scientific men and thinkers.”]

PHILOSOPHY

- Schiller, F. C. S. Studies in Humanism. 9 × 5½. Pp. 492. Macmillan, 10s. net.
[About half these studies have appeared at different times in the Quarterly Review and other periodicals.]

POETRY

- Lingston, Rowe. The Coming of Spring, and other poems. 6½ × 5. Pp. 92. Long, 3s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Thomas Stanley: his Original Lyrics*, complete, in their collated readings of 1647, 1651, 1657. Edited by L. T. Guiney. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 110. Hull: Tutin, 2s. 6d. net.
[With an introduction, textual notes, a list of editions, an appendix of translations and a portrait. The first complete reprint of Stanley. The text is new in that it represents the editor's choice of readings among many variants.]
- Selected Essays of Addison*. With an introduction by Austin Dobson, and a portrait of Addison. 6 × 4. Pp. 102. The Poems of Emily Brontë. With an introduction by Arthur Symonds. 6 × 4. Pp. 70. Heinemann, 6d. net. each.
[In the “Favourite Classics.”]
- Innes-Browne, Mrs. Honour without Renown. With a frontispiece by L. D. Symington. 7½ × 5. Pp. 368. Burns & Oates, 3s. 6d.
- Cook's Handbook for Palestine and Syria*. New edition, thoroughly revised by the Rev. J. E. Hanauer and Dr. E. G. Masterman. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 417. Cook, 7s. 6d. net.
- Grote, George. A History of Greece. Part i: Legendary Greece; Part ii: Grecian History to the Reign of Peisistratus at Athens. 12 vols. Finlay, George. Greece under the Romans. Dennis, George. The Cities and Cemeteries of Etruria. 2 vols. Lockhart, J. G. The Life of Robert Burns. Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Essays and Lectures on Shakespeare and some other old Poets and Dramatists. Balzac, Honoré de. Old Goriot. Dickens, Charles. The Old Curiosity Shop. Each 7 × 4½. Dent, 1s. net per vol.
[Additions to “Everyman's Library.”]

THEOLOGY

- Dale, R. W. History of English Congregationalism. Completed and edited by A. W. W. Dale. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 787. Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. net.
- Mayor, Joseph B. The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter. 9 × 6. Pp. 239. Macmillan, 14s. net.
[Greek text, with introduction, notes and comments.]
- The Expositor*. Edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll. Seventh series. Vol. ii. 9 × 6. Pp. 572. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

- De Windt, Harry. Through Savage Europe. With 100 illustrations. 9 × 6. Pp. 300. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.
[“Being the narrative of a journey (undertaken as special correspondent of the Westminster Gazette) throughout the Balkan States and European Russia.” The portrait of the author, which faces the title-page, does not add value or interest to the narrative.]
- Switzerland: the Country and its People*. Written by Clarence Rook; painted by Effie Jardine. 9½ × 6½. Pp. 270. Chatto & Windus, 20s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

Plymouth in History. By Roger Barnicott. (The Cornubian Press, 1s.)—This is a scholarly work, worthy of its subject. In every age, the Devon mariners have been valiant in arms, intrepid in exploration, and true rulers of the deep; while, as the author says, throughout the story of our Island Home, the Civic Governors of Plymouth have ever espoused the cause of freedom and progress. Mr. Barnicott writes as a staunch son of Plymouth, and if he has not anything particularly new to add to our information about the “Three Towns,” at least he has put together in an entertaining form what he has to tell. From prehistoric times up to the thirteenth century, Plymouth was in the making, and onwards from that time, when it obtained its Charter of Incorporation, it sent representatives to Parliament and supplied ships to the King's Fleet until the accession of William and Mary, which the author has chosen as a period for determining his history. He carries on his narrative with apt allusion, well-chosen poetry, and telling anecdotes, graphically descriptive of the development of the great commercial centre of the West country. Like all the publications of the Cornubian Press “Plymouth in History”, although merely a paper-covered pamphlet, is attractively turned out.

The Most Beautiful Edition of the Classics

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in., and ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume; Postage, 3d. extra.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCEY.

BYRON'S WORKS. 3 vols.

ADDISON'S ESSAYS.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.

SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS

PEPYS' DIARY.

KEATS' POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.

BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.

OBTAINABLE FROM ALL BOOKSELLERS OR FROM

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.,

Southampton Street, Strand, LONDON, W.C.

Some : :
Press : :
Opinions

Speaker.—"One of the few really valuable of the many series now in the market."

Scotsman.—"Easy to read, convenient to carry, and pleasant to look at."

Yorkshire Post.—"They deserve an antique bookcase with glass doors."

Graphic.—"Even in this age of reprints they have never been surpassed in excellence of type or binding."

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MONOCHROME COPIES,

by the permanent Autotype Carbon Process, of PICTURES BY OLD MASTERS.

from the principal collections of note.

Numerous examples of Works by MODERN ARTISTS.

The Autotype Company's processes of permanent photographic reproduction are extensively employed by the Trustees of the British Museum, the Local Government Board, many of the learned Societies, and leading Publishers.

Copies of Coins, Seals, Medals, MSS., Drawings, Engravings, Art Objects, Microscopic Work, etc.

Enquiries are invited from those requiring book illustrations of the very highest quality. Specimens and Estimates submitted.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE.

Now ready, NEW EDITION, with upwards of 150 Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes and 23 Tint Block Illustrations. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists' Names. Post free, ONE SHILLING.

A VISIT OF INSPECTION IS INVITED TO

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74 New Oxford Street, London.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PROBLEMS and PRIZES
For Literary Readers

SEE PAGE 6 OF THE

Westminster Gazette
EVERY SATURDAY

Offices: Tudor St., London, E.C.

READY at commencement of
PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

1907 Edition

Illustrated with 500 Armorial Engravings.

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH

A full and complete Parliamentary Guide, with particulars of all pollings at last two General and all subsequent Bye Elections; changes in personnel of the House since last appeal to Constituencies; Abridged Peerage; List of Privy Council; and Biographies of Judges of High and County Courts, Recorders, Colonial Judges, etc. etc.

490 pp. cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Messrs. Constable's List

SECOND EDITION NOW READY

The New Romance by the Author of "Cardigan," "The Reckoning," etc., entitled

THE FIGHTING CHANCE

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. With Illustrations by FRED PEGRAM. Crown
8vo, 6s.

"It is an admirably written and constructed story, in which interest is aroused from the very beginning, and to which it is possible to return with agreeable anticipation. It is a long book, but not too long. Indeed, it is a pleasure in these days to take up a novel which cannot be read through at a sitting and forgotten as soon as it is laid down. A wealth of episode, of characterisation, of colour, and of wit, that make altogether a novel of exceptional interest."

DAILY MAIL:
"Deeply interesting... the cleverness, vivacity, and insight into human nature will deserve to be secure for it as great a success in England as it already enjoys in America."

ACADEMY.

READY SHORTLY.

A New Novel by the Author of "An April Princess."

Conflict

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY, Author of
"For Heart of Gold," etc. 6s.

Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn

By ELIZABETH BISLAND. 2 vols., fully illustrated, 8vo, 24s. net.

Emma Lady Hamilton

A Biography. By WALTER SICHEL.
New and Cheaper Edition, revised. With Photo-gravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Natives of British Central Africa

By A. WARNER. With 32 Full-page Illustrations. 6s. net.

Spinoza. A Handbook to the Ethics

By J. ALLANSON PICTON. Author of
"The Religion of the Universe." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Atlantic Monthly

Price 1s. net. February number, containing The Helpmate, Chaps. 5-7, by MAY
SINCLAIR, Author of "The Divine Fire."

Mr. Bernard Shaw's Books

THE COMMONSENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING

Price 2s. 6d. A Handbook for all interested in the Question of Municipal Trading.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

Paper, 1s. 6d. net; Cloth, 2s. net.

THE PHILANDERERS

Paper, 1s. 6d. net; Cloth, 2s. net. Now being played at the Court Theatre.

FULL LIST ON APPLICATION

LONDON A. CONSTABLE & CO., LTD.

THROUGH SAVAGE EUROPE,
By Harry de Windt. With 100 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. "A most attractive book, written in a vivid and engaging style, and capable of diverting even the most jaded mind."—Tribune.

LINKS IN MY LIFE ON LAND AND SEA.

By Commander J. W. Gambier, R.N.
Second Edition. 15s. net. The Morning
Leader says this is "the raciest book of memoirs published for years." "To be read by all who enjoy rollicking relations of adventure," says the Times.

STUDIES IN BIOGRAPHY.

By Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B. With Photogravure Frontispiece. 15s. net. "A crystallisation of the history of the Nineteenth Century."—Daily News.

SOCIETY IN THE COUNTRY HOUSE.

By T. H. S. Escott. Price 16s. "Mr.
Escott's book gives a very charming picture of English houses and house parties ancient and modern."—Punch.

ON ART AND ARTISTS.

By Max Nordau. With a Portrait Frontispiece. 7s. 6d. net. "Mr. Nordau has given us in this book a work highly provocative and controversial in its details, but sound in its basic theory and full of suggestive thought and criticism."—Daily News.

IN VANITY FAIR.

By Eleanor Hoyt Brainerd. Decorative
Cover. 6s. A diverting account of fashionable Parisian society. Paris and the Fine Art of Dress, Racing near Paris,
Motor Boating, etc. etc.

THE SANITARY EVOLUTION OF LONDON.

By Henry Jephson, L.C.C. Demy 8vo,
6s. net. "This book must be in the hands of all who care for the good government of London."—Daily Chronicle.

THE SACRIFICE. A Novel.

By Alphonse Courlander. 6s. "Dramatic power and a fine insight into character distinguish this moving story of a peasant girl's love."—Scotsman.

THE SHULAMITE. A Novel.

By Alice and Claude Askew. Revised Edition. 6s. Illustrated with Portraits of Lena Ashwell as Deborah Krillett and of
Mr. Mackinnell as Simeon.

MAINLY ABOUT BOOKS.

A Guide to the most notable new books.
Sent post free to any address on application to
T. Fisher Unwin, 1 Adelphi Terrace,
London.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY
MAR 4 1907
L.B.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1816

FEBRUARY 23, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Dr. W. MARTIN will on Thursday next, February 28, at three o'clock, begin a Course of Two Lectures on "Old Dutch Painting and Painters." Subscription to this Course, Half a Guinea; to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

THE Council of the College invites applications for the Post of Assistant Lecturer in the Training Departments (Women). N.F.U. qualifications desirable.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications with testimonials (which need not be printed) must be sent on or before Saturday, March 2, 1907.

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Registrar.

February 13, 1907.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. (MS. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Art

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Books for Sale.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD Secondhand Copy of Knight's "Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser." 6 vols., 4to, cloth. Published at 45s., for 15s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Secondhand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

PARKMAN, FRANCIS, THE WORKS OF, in 12 vols., post 8vo, cloth, published by Macmillan at £5 2s. net, offered at 50s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

DOWELL'S History of Taxation, 4 vols
Down the Road, 1875
Doyle (R.) Christening Procession of Prince Taffy, coloured plates, 8vo, 1842
Doyle (R.) Tournament; or Chivalry Revived coloured plates, oblong 4to, 1830
Dramatic Portraits, any Collection of
Drayton (M.) Poems, 1619
Poly-Oblion, 1613 or 1622
Dr. Syntax in London, 1820, complete, or any odd parts
Dr. Syntax's Tours, 3 vols, 1812-1815-1820, or any odd parts of either
Drummond (W.) Poems, 1656
Forth Feasting, 1617
Poems, 1616, 1656, 1659
Dulcken, Scenes from Pickwick (4 plates in wrapper), 8vo (1861)
Dugdale's St. Paul's Cathedral, folio, 1657
Dunstall (J.) Book of Flowers, Fruits, Birds, Beasts, etc. Four Series, or any, oblong quarto, 1661, etc.
D'Urvey (T.) Wit and Mirth; or, Pills, etc., 6 vols, 1719-20
Earle's Views in New Zealand
Eccentric Tales from the German, 1827
Ecole Française, Les Estampes en Couleurs du XVIIIe siècle, double set of proofs, 1885
Eden, State of the Poor, 3 vols, 4to
Edinburgh University Magazine, Jan. to April, 1871, or any
Edwin and Angelina, 1765
Egan (Pierce) Life of an Actor, 1825

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY (AND WEEKLY).

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No. 1 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S A HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

B. H. BLACKWELL'S NEW AND RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE ROMAN SYSTEM of PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION TO THE ACCESSION OF CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, by W. T. ARNOLD, M.A., formerly Scholar of University College, Oxford. New Edition, revised from the Author's Notes by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, Litt.D., with a Map. Large crown 8vo, art cloth, 6s. net.

"His grasp of facts is enormous, and he makes his facts speak. The Roman Empire yields up its message of warning and hope to the Imperialists of the present age. Taxation, Home Rule, Federation, the balance of responsibility between governors and governed—these are problems which grew in importance and intensity as time goes on; and they are brought before the reader's notice at every turn."—CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.

WESTMINSTER VERSIONS: renderings into Greek and Latin Verse, reprinted from the WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, edited by HERBERT F. FOX, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Brasenose College. Crown 8vo, limp cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"All who love letters should study in this volume differences and resemblances between modern and ancient poetic feeling."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A book to be welcomed for various reasons. It shows that such is the fascination of a graceful and scholarly art that the most accomplished of modern scholars have been tempted to take part in a competition started by an enterprising London newspaper."—ACADEMY.

A LAST RAMBLE IN THE CLASSICS, by H. E. P. PLATT, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College. Fcap. 8vo, 7 in. x 4½ in. x ½ in. 3s. 6d. net.

A companion volume to "Byways in the Classics."

"Mr. Platt is equally entertaining whether he is drawing a parallel or displaying a contrast. Superstition, snobbery, professional humbug—how little variation these unlovely traits have suffered in civilised communities that are separated by a score of centuries. . . . Three Serious Faults the book has. First, it is much too short; secondly, its shape makes it awkward to hold when one is reading in bed; last, it tempts one to take it up even at the most unsuitable moments."—TRIBUNE.

* But see dimensions above.—PUBLISHER.

SONNETS AND SHORT POEMS, by MAURICE BARING. Large crown 8vo, on Dutch hand-made paper, sewed. 2s. net.

"Mr. Maurice Baring is one of the most accomplished of the younger living poets. . . . It is his province to think seriously, and with delicacy, in verse which is always refined and thoughtful; and in images which are charming and moving. . . . Another real poet."—DAILY NEWS.

"Show a certain mastery of form, a sense of rhythm, and a refinement that is scholarly."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

DESIDERIQ. A Drama in Three Acts, by MAURICE BARING. Crown 8vo, sewed. 3s. net.

"Among modern devotees of the romantic drama, few have so graceful a touch as Mr. Maurice Baring. He writes clearly, vividly, straightforwardly."—DAILY MAIL.

"Mr. Baring writes gracefully, thoughtfully, poetically."—TRIBUNE.

OXFORD: 50 & 51 BROAD STREET; LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO. LTD.

READY at commencement of PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

1907 Edition

Illustrated with 500 Armorial Engravings.

DEBRETT'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH

A full and complete Parliamentary Guide, with particulars of all pollings at last two General and all subsequent Bye Elections; changes in personnel of the House since last appeal to Constituencies; Abridged Peerage; List of Privy Council; and Biographies of Judges of High and County Courts, Records, Colonial Judges, etc. etc.

420 pp. cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON: DEAN & SON, LTD., 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

Messrs. BELL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

THE FOREIGN DEBT OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

By T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. (Camb.), Hon. Litt.D. (Dublin), Professor of Classical Philology in the University of Melbourne.

This volume is intended to assist the ordinary student in realising the interdependence of literatures, and the special influences, both classical and mediæval, which have contributed to the formation of English literature.

NEW EDITION OF

THE EARLY DIARY OF FRANCES BURNEY

(Madame D'Arbly), 1768-1778. With a Selection from her Correspondence and from the Journals of her Sisters, Susan and Charlotte. Edited by ANNIE RAINE ELLIS. New Edition, revised. 2 vols. 3s. 6d. each. [Bohn's Standard Library.]

Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

ELECTRONS: or, the Nature and Properties of Electricity.

By Sir OLIVER LODGE, D.Sc. Lond., Hon. D.Sc. Oxon, LL.D. St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, F.R.S., Vice-President of the Institution of Electrical Engineers, and Principal of the University of Birmingham.

Demy 8vo, 1s.

HOW TO PRONOUNCE LATIN. A Few Words to Teachers and others.

By J. P. POSTGATE, Litt.D.

INDUSTRIAL COMBINATION.

By D. H. MACGREGOR, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of the Royal Economic Society. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Large post 8vo.

BEDE'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY of ENGLAND.

Revised Translation with Notes by A. M. SELLAR, late Vice-Principal and Resident Lecturer, Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. With a Map. [In the press.]

Handbooks to the Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.

Edited by G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D.

Each with Photogravure Frontispiece and many other Illustrations.

5s. net each.

NEW VOLUME.

VAN DYCK. By LIONEL CUST, M.V.O., F.S.A., Director of the National Portrait Gallery, Keeper of the Kings Pictures, and other Works of Art.

Full Prospectus of the Series on application.

The Art Galleries of Europe.

Each in 1 vol., cloth, gilt tops, with numerous Full-page Illustrations, and a Plan. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

NEW VOLUME

THE ART OF THE DRESDEN GALLERY. A Critical Survey of the Schools and Pictures as represented in the Royal Collection. By JULIA DE W. ADDISON.

Full Prospectus of the Series on application.

The York Library

Foolscap 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

BURTON'S PILGRIMAGE TO ALMADINAH AND MECCAH. Edited by Lady BURTON. With an Introduction by STANLEY LANE-POOLE. 2 vols.

CLASSIC TALES: Johnson's "Rasselas," Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," Sterne's "Sentimental Journey," Walpole's "Castle of Otranto." With an Introduction by C. N. FEARENSIDE, M.A.

MRS. GASKELL'S SYLVIA'S LOVERS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE POPES. Translated by E. FOSTER. New and Revised Edition, with considerable additions. 3 vols. [Ready shortly.]

TROLLOPE'S THE WARDEN.

TROLLOPE'S BARCHSTER TOWERS.

TROLLOPE'S DOCTOR THORNE.

TROLLOPE'S FRAMLEY PARSONAGE.

TROLLOPE'S SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON. Two vols.

TROLLOPE'S LAST CHRONICLE OF BARSET.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	179	Fiction	191
Literature:		Drama:
Revolt or Growth	181	"Adrienne Lecouvreur" at the
"Bronze-Throat Eagle-Bark" [. . .	182	New Royalty Theatre	192
America in the Making	184	Fine Art:
The Egoist	185	French Drawings of the Nine-
Eastern Italian Architecture	186	teenth Century	193
The Prince of Navigators	187	Music	193
Spirits and Small Beer	188	Forthcoming Books	194
The Library Table	188	Correspondence	195
Some Protests and an Apprecia-		Books Received	197
tion	190	The Bookshelf	198
A Literary Causerie:
Garden Memories	191

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

As we look round on the field of literature to-day it is remarkable and somewhat disappointing to find how few of those who have benefited by the Elementary Education Acts have risen to fame. There seem to have been far more who rose when schooling was more difficult to obtain. John Clare, nourished on water, porridge and potatoes, who was sent out to tend sheep and geese at the age of seven, nevertheless attained sufficient importance to be the subject of a Quarterly Review article and was a popular poet in his day. Gerald Massey began work in a silk mill at eight years of age and yet before he had reached much more than his majority was famous. Cobbett is another case in point. He tells us that he went out to scare birds at the early age of six and had to work his way point by point up the social ladder. The number of those who achieved this kind of success does not seem to increase with the facilities offered by the modern elementary school. We may be wrong, but at the moment we cannot recall a single poet of the day who has risen from the lowest rung of the ladder.

The exception perhaps to the general rule is offered by John Gregory who was born on July 14, 1831, at Bideford in Devon. At the age of eleven he was apprenticed to a shoe-maker for seven years, and he was self-educated, though his biographer, Mr. E. J. Watson, tells us that "he regarded all books as foot-notes to the book of Nature." Through the kindness of the Rev. J. M. Wilson, always a generous patron of letters, and now Canon of Worcester, he was appointed boot-repairer to Clifton College and this post he still retains. These facts ought to warrant a certain amount of attention being given to the book he has just published under the title of "My Garden and other poems." It is a very creditable little book, of which we may have something to say hereafter.

One of the most entertaining books of the week is that of Mr. P. H. Ditchfield on "The Parish Clerk," a character who has been dear to the writer of fiction since the time of Charles Dickens. Even before that he had attracted the attention of poets, as witness the celebrated epigram of John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester:

Sternhold and Hopkins had great qualms
When they translated David's Psalms,
To make the heart more glad;
But had it been poor David's fate
To hear thee sing and them translate,
By Jove, 'twould have drove him mad.

In books of this kind it is inevitable that there should be a lament over things that have passed away, and Mr. Ditchfield waxes quite eloquent over the ancient pew, especially that of the Squire. In many country places it was very comfortable, furnished with a fire that the Squire vigorously poked when he thought that the parson was becoming too long-winded. We have even seen arrangements for playing a game at whist to pass the time while the sermon was proceeding. Mr. Ditchfield very properly quotes Swift's description of one of these old pews:

A bedstead of the antique mode,
Compact of timber many a load,
Such as our ancestors did use
Was metamorphosed into pews;
Which still their ancient nature keep
By lodging folks disposed to sleep.

The Auld Brig of Ayr, which to Robert Burns more than a century ago:

seem'd as he wi' Time had warstl'd lang, is happily not going to give up the struggle, but will continue to hold out against the wintry spate, when:

Auld Ayr is just one lengthen'd, tumbling sea,

The Preservation Committee, with whose efforts sympathy has been more than once expressed in these columns, are able to assure the Town Council of Ayr that of the £10,000 required £9500 is now raised, and guarantee that the full sum will be forthcoming by the end of March. The Council has accordingly consented to hand over the Auld Brig to the Committee, by whom the needed preservative work will be undertaken. The fund for some time languished; but Lord Rosebery's stirring appeal to his countrymen to save this monument of bygone ages was not made in vain.

It is surprising that some of the best bibliographies which are being issued to-day should be produced in the University of California. The latest to come before our notice is a "Survey of Scottish Literature in the Nineteenth Century (with some reference to the Eighteenth)." The author is Mr. James Main Dixon who, we notice, is a graduate of St. Andrews University and also holds an Edinburgh degree. His bibliography is full of interest. From it we learn that there have been about nine hundred separate editions of the poems of Robert Burns, complete or selected. Scott is the next author in point of popularity. Bibliographies are given of, among other authors, James Hogg, Robert Tannahill, John Leyden, whose works would surely be worth republishing, Thomas Campbell, John Galt, the literary progenitor of J. M. Barrie, Lockhart, Motherwell, Hugh Miller, Henry Glassford Bell—of whom it is remarked that his "Memoir of Mary, Queen of Scots" has had no little effect in forming popular opinion on the subject—John Stuart Blackie, who was sinking into undeserved oblivion, John Brown, and George Gilfillan. The document will be found useful far outside the University of California.

In his suggestive article on the Eumenides in the present number of the Classical Review Professor Verrall draws attention to the fact that one of the arguments used by Apollo is identified with that offered by Boswell to his father, Lord Auchinleck, when he proposed to settle the family estate, in a certain event, upon heirs general, and not, as James desired, upon heirs male. "I," writes Boswell, "had a zealous partiality for heirs male, which I maintained by arguments which appeared to me to have considerable weight." His line of argument was that "our species is transmitted through males only, the female being all along no more than a nidus, or nurse, as Mother Earth is to plants of every sort." Lord Hailes, however, had a firm opinion contrary to his, and finally

"I was freed by Dr. Johnson from scruples of conscientious obligation, and could, therefore, gratify my father," which was wise of Boswell, notwithstanding the old law which says Mulier finis familiae.

Seneca was supposed to have given an idea of America's existence. Bacon's Essays quote the "Medea," 378-382:

venient annis sæcula seris quibus Oceanus vincula rerum laxet et ingens pateat tellus
Tethysque novos detegat orbes nec sit terris ultima Thule.

But Herr Düring, of Göttingen, now flutters the dovescotes of our secular security with his "Ueberlieferung des interpolierten Textes von Senecas Tragödien." What will the Germans leave to us? Happily Nietzsche denies actuality to his countrymen: "They are of the day before yesterday and of the day after to-morrow, not yet of to-day." At any rate, Averroes, the Spanish Musulman, if not the pagan Spaniard, helped Columbus, who "dans une lettre datée d'Haiti (Octobre 1498) nomme Avenruyz—d'après une citation de Pierre d'Ailly, comme un des auteurs qui lui ont fait deviner l'existence du Nouveau Monde."

Sir Oliver Lodge is one of the ablest and most interesting of those engaged in scientific research, and his book on "Electrons, or the Nature and Properties of Negative Electricity" (Bell) has been eagerly awaited. In due time we hope to have it reviewed by a competent hand, but the general reader may like to read the following extract from the chapter called "Conclusion":

The most exciting part of the whole is the explanation of matter in terms of electricity, the view that electricity is, after all, the fundamental substance, and that what we have been accustomed to regard as an indivisible atom of matter is built up out of it; that all atoms—atoms of all sorts of substances—are built up of the same thing. In fact the theoretical and proximate achievements of what philosophers have always sought after, viz., a unification of matter, is offering itself to physical enquiry. But it must be remembered that although this solution is strongly suggested it is not yet a completed proof.

"Bow-wow! Feel chippy? Then champ Chip-Chunks." This delightful sentence occurs in a novel called "What Might Have Been," published anonymously through Mr. Murray. As may be guessed, it is directed against the advertisements of the hour, "Chip-Chunks" being described as food "fully cooked and already quite digested." The idea of the author is original, and differs entirely from that of Mr. Wells and others who cast a prophetic eye into the future. This author deals with the present time; but it is the present time that is not the present present time. We hope this cryptic phrase will convey some meaning to our readers. Supposing that things had not happened as they did happen, history would have taken a different turn. Had Cleopatra, for instance, married her youthful poet before the appearance of Cæsar and Mark Antony on the scene the stream of history would have turned round a different bend, and when 1907 arrived it would have brought with it a time differing from that with which we are familiar. What unrivalled scope for ingenuity this suggests! Life has been likened to a game of chess. We have the records of the particular game, for instance, played by Lasker and Marshall in the match now going on, but the variation of a single move would have changed the whole of those that followed. The author of "What Might Have Been" has altered the early moves and tries to imagine the result.

Wednesday next will be the centenary of Longfellow's birth. His merits as a poet, which it is easy to exaggerate, will be widely acclaimed by admirers on both sides of the Atlantic who are said to be increasing in number every year. Whatever view we may take on that score, Longfellow's limitations in another direction are indisputable. None of his poems has been read with keener and more abiding interest, none has affected the point of view of the sentimental more surely, than "Evangeline." It purports to describe the conditions in which the French were expelled from their beloved Acadie; the woes and wrongs of the unhappy settlers after they passed under the British flag have drawn tears from many, and the school-children of the United States and Canada have been encouraged to read the tale as though it cast some valuable light on history.

As a matter of sober fact, "Evangeline" is wanting in truth alike to local colour and history. Mr. Archibald MacMechan—who has lived long in Nova Scotia, has edited and is editing the papers in the local archives, and has made a complete study of the whole subject—indicates in the Atlantic Monthly some of the points on which Longfellow went astray. The Acadians were entitled to little sympathy. They fared better under their British rulers than under France, and their gratitude took the form of disloyalty and intrigue which compelled the British Government to act in self-defence. "Evangeline" has fed the flame of controversy as to their treatment; Mr. MacMechan shows with how little reason.

THE ACADEMY of October 29, 1887, and July 1888, had a notice of Giosué Carducci, who died on the 16th inst., in his seventy-first year. A native of the Pisa province, he was anti-German with all the fervour of a good poet and a good hater. Romanticism was another red rag. A professor of the Bologna University, he was the poet pre-eminently of the "classes," and the "masses" heard of his death with none of the keen regret that affected King and both Chambers in his native country. Among his chief representative works are: his Hymn to Satan, 1863; his "Odes" 1871, done into German by Mommsen, with the "Decennalia," of the same year. His "Rime" go back to 1857 and his "Levia Gravia" to 1868, but we have his "Poesie" of 1880. A poet, he dealt with poets: Petrarch, Dante, Ariosto, with statesmen or warriors, such as Garibaldi; with Politian, Lucretius, G. Rossetti, and the "eterno femminino regale."

A French writer has been compiling an anthology of famous cats, or rather the cats of famous authors, which may serve as a companion to that quaint little volume, "L'Histoire des chiens célèbres," in whose pages our grandfathers made their first acquaintance with the French tongue. It appears that quite a number of eminent French writers have been conspicuously addicted to feline society, not to mention Tasso and Petrarch among the Italians. Solange Clésinger, the erratic daughter of George Sand, records that on a visit to Sainte-Beuve she found a cat and kittens in occupation of one corner of his room. Is there some subtle affinity between French literary greatness and grimalkin? Sir Isaac Newton and Dr. Johnson are among the few English writers whose cats have for a moment detained the pens of their biographers. And now the correspondent of a contemporary has been attributing the old story about the large and small holes cut in the door, which used to be told of Newton, to Ampère, the great electrician—and Frenchman.

Shakespeare, without being Bacon (Francis), is Roger, Earl of Rutland, according to Karl Bleibtreu, his latest biographer. We knew that the Earl (1576-1612) was a learned barrister and a soldier in Holland, besides being in Essex's plot and highly placed under James I. It is only now that our German tells us that the knowledge shown by Shakespeare of Italy, especially the north, is explained by the travels of the Earl, who really left for that country in 1596, the date of Shakespeare's supposed Italian visit. Of course he broke his journey at Verona, Mantua and Venice; later, in 1603, he was in Denmark, and called at the castle of Elsinore (Elseneur). Argal, Shakespeare-Rutland!

Meanwhile, and awaiting his next avatar, Shakespeare seems, for an ignoramus, to have had a fair vocabulary—sixteen thousand out of the three hundred and fifty thousand of the "Standard Dictionary," as against Milton's eight thousand. The average educated Englishman has at his command from three to four thousand, but practically one thousand are enough. Among Italian poets we know Dante in England, and, less well, Petrarch. Of Dante the first lines were done into English by Chaucer in 1386, and the same inspired (through the translation?) Richardson's 1719 painting of the Inferno. The author of "Drawings and Pictures in Italy" knew Italian, but it is a curious coincidence that he chose to paint from the very passage that Chaucer Englished.

A collection of twenty-seven paintings by Venetian and Florentine masters, bequeathed to the nation by the late Mr. John Samuel, has been temporarily hung on screens in the octagonal central hall of the National Gallery, where, crowded together in conflicting lights, the legacy accentuates the urgent need of extending the existing premises. The attribution of a number of Mr. Samuel's pictures will be gravely questioned, and the reputed Botticelli and Paris Bordone cannot be accepted as authentic works. There are, however, at least a dozen pictures whose unquestioned merits justify the acceptance of the collection as a whole.

Moroni's Portrait of a Man is a distinguished example of the master, slightly marred by the over-cleaning of the face, and Lorenzo Costa's portrait of Dor Bablistry Fiera of Mantua is a welcome acquisition. The Bronzino portrait, though badly scraped by restorers, retains a beautiful passage of the master's painting in the bodice, while a Luini, two splendid Venetian scenes by Guardi, two full length saints by Il Moretto, Tiepolo's Marriage of Barbarossa, and the interesting Italian Landscape by Marieschi may be mentioned among the more important of the remaining works.

The absence of uniformity in classification and in catalogues, and the need for improvement in both, was the subject of the last meeting of the Library Association. Standardisation and a co-ordination of practice are necessary. The first step towards these is the formation of an advisory board, which would give advice on all matters of classification and cataloguing, and would undertake the compilation and publication of a catalogue of the eight thousand books most suitable for a public library. Occasionally a book appears which may be classified in many different ways, and it would be a great advantage to the public to have one uniform place throughout all libraries, as well as an exact terminology (Mr. Aldred, Hackney).

There is great fear, however, that uniformity in this respect would destroy the personal equation (Mr. Kettle, Guildhall); and standardisation would stultify progress in this country as it has done in America. Except in the treatment of children the public libraries of this country are far ahead of those in America. These questions of practice will settle themselves by degrees (Mr. Brown, Islington). At the same time; it is possible that the public library might be made too scientific for the general public (Mr. Quinn). The appointment of a single expert might do much towards removing the difficulties sometimes experienced (Mr. Newcombe, Camberwell). And the compilation by the Association of a list of the best books in all subjects would also contribute to a more general uniformity (Mr. Wyndham Hulme, Patent Office). The matter was referred to the Council for consideration and report.

LITERATURE

REVOLT OR GROWTH

The Romantic Revolt. By CHARLES EDWYN VAUGHAN. (Blackwood, 5s. net.)

IN one of his early pages Mr. Vaughan makes an apology for the use of his title. He tells us that no such phrases as the Romantic Revival, or the Romantic Revolt serve as more than a rough index. It is very difficult after reading his book to agree that they do as much as that. His definition of romanticism is extremely vague. "Romantic" and "Romanticism," he tells us, "cover two completely different meanings." In a narrow sense they point to a "love of vivid colouring and strongly marked contrasts," a "craving for the unfamiliar, the marvellous, the supernatural";

In the wider and less definite sense, they may be used to signify that revolt from the purely intellectual view of man's nature, that recognition of the rights of the emotions, the instincts and the passions, that vague intimation of sympathy between man and the world around him—in one word, that sense of mystery which, with more or less clearness of utterance, inspires all that is best, all that is most characteristic, in the literature of the last half of the eighteenth century; whether, in the stricter and more familiar sense of the term, it is to be called "romantic" or no.

Even this crude attempt at definition can scarcely escape criticism. In literature vivid colouring and strong contrasts have been employed as freely by the realistic as by the romantic school; and the search for the supernatural invites another question. Supposing, for the sake of argument and without endorsing any particular view, that by the force of logic and common sense the materialistic theory of the universe came to be universally accepted, would romance be at an end? We do not think so, because its essence lies in adventure, and adventure does not depend upon a theory of the universe. The untried youth who fares forth into the world, greedy of experience and full of hope that great things will befall him, is surely a Romantic in the truest sense. Romance, in fact, must depend greatly upon imagination, and the man of science who in dream or vision sees great and unbounded possibilities in the line of research in which he is engaged, is in his own way as truly romantic as was the young knight riding forth in search of adventure. In other words, there must be some essence in Romanticism that is permanent and independent of changing conditions. In the rude days of chivalry when esteem and riches were won by the strength of a man's right hand, romance—properly enough—attached to the soldier. In our own time the struggle is as keen, but it is intellectual and invisible. The strong man of today is not necessarily he of the iron heart and the muscles of steel, but the intellectual being who forces his way to the front not by dint of physical strength but by mental energy. This statement may seem to be trite and commonplace, but its importance becomes evident when we consider how commonly the word romance is used to designate the historical novel in contrast with the study of contemporaneous society. We can make no advance in critical method until it is understood that we use words to designate the attitude of mind in external conditions only.

Again, exception must be taken to the use of the word "Revolt." The study of the individual writer shows us that nothing can bear less resemblance to rebellion than mental progress. We might take Robert Burns as a good example. He did not, like a critic of the twentieth century, sit down in his arm-chair and consider that the direction in which literature was trending was a wrong direction, but when he began to rhyme he followed the morals current in his country and in his time. He took up the folk-songs of his people, he coned the work of Robert Ferguson and Allan Ramsey and he began by a close imitation of his models. This was discipleship and not revolt. If we take Sir Walter Scott, the central figure of what is called the Romantic Movement, we find that something very similar occurred. His lameness prevented him from engaging in many of the boisterous sports of childhood, and he sought for amusements in reading old border stories and in fashioning as well as he could the life of the past until, as he tells us:

Methought that still with trump and clang
The gateway's broken arches rang;
Methought grim features, seam'd with scars,
Glared through the window's rusty bars.

This naturally led him to collect the minstrelsy of the Scottish border. When he started to write a novel it was not in order to break away from the tradition of the hour; he had read his Fielding to a purpose, and "Waverley" was professedly composed in the style of that great master. Again we find not revolt but discipleship; although if public opinion had not been prepared for the romance of "Ivanhoe" and its followers their success would not have been so immediate or so great as it was. Thus we cannot find fault with the width of the survey which Mr. Vaughan has undertaken, although at a first glance it scarcely seems natural and reasonable that poets like Cowper and Crabbe should be drawn into a study of Romanticism, or that a survey of the great political speakers of the time, even of the philosophers such as Burke, Mackintosh, Paine, Godwin and Bentham, should be necessary to an understanding of the movement.

Mr. Vaughan's justification lies in this, that all of them took a share in ripening and directing public opinion. They must have created such appetite as there was. Yet in dissecting the argument laid before us it becomes very clear that the movement was not a sweeping rush. Writers whom it is impossible with any regard to the right use of terms to call romantic, went on with their work simultaneously with the others. If we had Coleridge and Scott, we also had Crabbe trying with might and main to be real or nothing. It is doubtful whether even Blake ought to be classed among the Romantics. He was not conscious of participating in the movement. His poems and his pictures alike were the outcome of a peculiar individuality that might as easily have come into being in the fourteenth century as in the eighteenth century. There is every reason to believe that, far from consciously trying to chime in with the views of his period, he struggled to give a most realistic picture of the visions that crossed his peculiar mind. To place Wordsworth among the Romantics appears to us absurd. Mr. John Morley, in a well-known saying, has pointed out that the weakness of Wordsworth lay in his continuous expression of a creed that could not be substantiated by argument. "Nature never did betray the heart that loved her" is not true. Nature is as careful of the heart that does not love her as of any other. She is indifferent, and that a writer held what Ruskin called "the pathetic fallacy" is no proof of his being a Romantic. In his methods and in his theory Wordsworth was a Realist of the Realists. Perhaps the most absolute example of Romantic verse is that divine vision of Coleridge:

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A spacious pleasure-dome decree.

To be told that "Cowper restored to English poetry the power of expressing the religious instincts of man" is by no means a proof of his romanticism. If his religious beliefs were true he was a Realist. If they were not, his religious expression of them goes for naught.

On some future occasion we hope to treat the book in more detail. Mr. Vaughan has properly devoted a great deal of attention to the Romantic movement in Germany and in France. These three great literatures of modern days, French, German and English, must be studied in relation to one another in order to gain a true appreciation of them; but we do not believe that it is to be gained by placing upon them literary labels. In France we have had Realists and Romantics working together; the kailyard school with the cloak and rapier school were publishing their books at the same moment. It is more profitable to study the individual than the mass.

"BRONZE-THROAT EAGLE-BARK"

Aeschylus in English Verse. Part ii.—Prometheus Bound and The Suppliant Maidens. By ARTHUR S. WAY. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)

WE reviewed Mr. Way's Aeschylus, Part I., containing the Septem and Persae, and recommended his work emphatically for vigour and ease combined with faithful adherence to the meaning and the manner of the original. He has succeeded wonderfully with Homer and Euripides and now he has given us all the plays of Aeschylus except the Oresteia, which is interesting as being the only extant specimen of an ancient tragic trilogy. If only the Fayoum, or some other part of bounteous Mother-Earth, would now yield up to us the Proteus, which, as the Satyric drama, completed the tetralogy, a great accession would be made to our knowledge of the Attic stage.

We have very little certain information about the dates of the tragedies of Aeschylus, save that the Oresteia came last, about B.C. 458, three years before the death of Aeschylus at Gela in Sicily. The two plays contained in this part were probably the earliest, though attempts have been made to show that the Suppliants was brought out only a few years before the Oresteia. The arguments of Müller and Boeckh, drawn from internal evidence, are far from convincing, and an early date for the play is strongly suggested by the epic tinge in the style, the great predominance of lyric measures and the extreme simplicity of the plot.

In the volume before us Mr. Way has to deal with the least corrupt and the most corrupt of the Aeschylean dramas, with the easiest and the most difficult, with the best and the worst. For great as are the Agamemnon, the Eumenides, and the Persae, none of them approaches the sheer sublimity of the Prometheus. It walks among the stars. It soars with the sublime spirit of the indomitable Friend of Man who defies Zeus in his torture. We find ourselves in the company of demons like Kratos and Bia, monsters like the cow-headed Io, and airy spirits like the Oceanides who form the chorus. The play has fired the imagination of some of the world's greatest poets, and forms the supreme standard for the sublime in poetry. The metre is beautiful and the diction is superbly gorgeous, yet austere and chaste. The Greekless reader has now a version by which he can get nearer than ever he could before to this immortal work. We will present our readers first with the soliloquy of Prometheus after he has been pinned and clamped to the Caucasian rock by Kratos and Bia under the direction of Hephaestus. It contains the exquisite phrase which for many represents their whole knowledge of Aeschylus.

Æther divine, and breezes swift of wing,
Fountains of rivers, myriad-dimpling laugh
Of billows of the sea, All-mother Earth!—
Yea, on the sun's all-seeing orb I call:—
Look on me, what a God endures of Gods!
Behold, in what torment of outrage, behold,
I must agonise on through years untold!
For me doth the Blessed Ones' new lord frame
Such bonds of shame!
Woe's me for the anguish that is, that shall be!
Ah, where shall the dawning arise on me
Of the end of mine agony?
Yet what say I? All things that shall betide
Full well I know: no anguish unforeseen
Shall light on me. Lo, I must bear the doom
Of destiny as I may, as who doth know
That none may battle with the might of Fate. . . .
I, hunter of the fount of fire that lurked
Reed-hidden, which to mortals shone revealed
Their teacher of all arts, invention's crown,
For that transgression pay such penalty
Under the naked sky in fetters nailed,

The record, too, of the blessings which he bestowed on man is rendered in language which is almost completely literal, unshackled as it is by the trammels of rhyme :

The tale of mortals' miseries
Hear ye—how erstwhile witless as they were,
I gave them reason, dowered them with souls.
And I will tell—in no wise blaming men,
But setting forth the love my bounty proved :—
First, having eyesight, all in vain they saw,
And hearing heard not : impotent as shapes
Of dreams, their weary days through, they discerned
The several use of nought, conceived not dwellings
Brick-fashioned, sunlit, nor the wood-wright's craft,
But in earth-burrows like to tiny ants
Dwelt in the sunless lurking-ribs of caves.
Of winter certain token had they none,
None of spring flower-bestarred, nor harvest-crowned
Summer, but undiscerning, all their toil
They wrought, until the risings of the stars
I taught them, and their dubious setting-times.
Number withal, of shrewd inventions chief,
Devised I, and the letters' marshalling,
And Memory all-creating, mother of song.

We do not apologise for copious extracts. We repeat what we said about Part I. :

Mr. Way has so clearly achieved his place in the first rank of translators in verse of the ancient classical poets that in quoting specimens of his work we are rather catering for the pleasure of our readers than affording evidence of a proposition already proved.

To show how faithful he is to the original even in the lyrical portions of the drama, where he introduces rhyme, we will quote two passages. The first gives the "wild and whirling words" of Io when she is driven to further wanderings by the gadfly's sting, which is described in characteristic Aeschylean fashion as "the arrow-point forged in no furnace." The beautiful metre is taken from Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon" :

Woe's me and alas !
The convulsions again
Through my racked limbs pass,
And with madness my brain
Is fevered : the arrow-point forged in no furnace envenoms each vein.
Knocks my heart at my side
In fierce frenzied appeal ;
And mine eyes, they roll wide
Dizzy-swift as a wheel.
Wild-raving I drift before madness's blast like a storm-driven keel !

And wild and whirling
Words bursting from me,
A torrent on-hurling,
Beat impotently
On the surge of the inrolling horror, the tide of calamity's sea.

The next extract is the last appeal of Prometheus, perhaps the most sublime passage in Greek poetry :

Ha ! not in promise at last, but in deed, swayeth earth to and fro !
Thunders roll by me with crashings that burst from abysses below !
Out of a fiery furnace the flickering lightnings glow !

Whirlwinds in spires are uptossing the dust : in tumultuous array
Blasts of all winds are onleaping to grapple and pant in the fray :
Blent with the sea is the welkin, a turmoil of vapour and spray !

With such swoop upon me comes the stroke that the terrors of Zeus doth reveal.

Earth-mother's majesty ! Æther, wherethrough doth the world's light wheel !

See me, what outrage of wrong I endure !—unto you I appeal !

[The earth is rent asunder, and the rock to which Prometheus is chained descends into the chasm.]

The argument of the Supplices is very simple and it has a link with the Prometheus :

Herein is told how one of the prophecies of Prometheus came to pass. For Danaus and Ægyptus, descendants of Io, were brothers, and the fifty sons of Ægyptus were fain to wed by force the fifty daughters of Danaus. But to these that marriage seemed unholy and hateful, and they fled from Egypt across the sea to the land of Argos, whence Io, the mother of their race, had come ; and thither the sons of Ægyptus pursued them.

In translating the Supplices Mr. Way follows the revised text of Professor Tucker, formerly of Cambridge, now of Melbourne, to whose fruitful labours on the text of Aeschylus he pays a well-deserved tribute. Professor Tucker's Supplices is indeed a splendid piece of work. Two conjectures of his, λωσύνει for λίνουσιν η or θ (104) and τὸν τι for παρόντι (219) are worthy of a Bentley or a Porson—as convincing as they are brilliant. But while the Prometheus is a perfect chrysolite, only approached by the Oedipodean plays of Sophocles and the Lear of Shakespeare, the Supplices lacks interest, though it is not devoid of that dignity which seems inseparable from Aeschylus. To illustrate this we will give samples of Mr. Way's work both in the iambic and the lyrical parts of the play. Of the first a good specimen is the first speech of Danaus :

Daughters, be wary. Hither have ye won
Through trusty pilotage of your wary sire.
Now, being on land, take forethought as I bid,
And grave my words on tablets of the mind.
I see dust, voiceless herald of a host. . . .
Now, now their shrieking axle-naves I hear. . . .
I see a shielded host and flickering spears,
With war-steeds and with arched battle-cars.
Haply the rulers of the land draw nigh
Themselves to see things told of messengers.

Mr. Way's skill in the lyrical parts will be illustrated by a strophe of a choral ode (347-352) containing a very epic simile :

O son of Palaichthon, incline thine ear unto me !
Gracious, O King of Pelasgians, let thine heart be.
Behold now, a suppliant panic-struck exile, I flee
Like a heifer that wolves have chased to a precipice-height,
Where she runs to and fro, and, setting her hope in his might,
Lows to the herdman, as telling her grievous plight.

But we must add two more lyrical passages, the first containing that thoroughly characteristic Aeschylean epithet of a lonely cliff, οἰόρρων "brooding," only to be paralleled for poetic word-painting by the "myriad-dimpling smile of the waves" in the Prometheus, and "the wrinkled sea" in the Agamemnon—a beautiful expression which Tennyson has immortalised, though the critics have robbed Aeschylus of it by changing the exquisite ρυσῶς to the colourless ρυσῆς as an epithet of ἄλως :

Oh for a throne in the firmanent clear
Where to snow the cloud turneth !
Oh for the brink of a precipice sheer,
Smooth, beetling, whose lone pride none draweth near,
Whose peak no man discerneth,
Haunted of vultures—sole witness, I wis,
Of the deathward rushing
Plunge that should hurl me far down the abyss,
Or ever I light on such bridal as this—
This horror heart-crushing !

Then unto dogs if a banquet I fall,
Or to vulture and raven,
I reck not ; for death shall have saved me from all,
Shall have saved from the shame and the tears of the thrall,
My refuge, my haven !
Yea, or ever such bride-bed of horror I know,
Like a shaft from a quiver
Strike, doom, to mine heart ! Whitherward shall I go
In this land to escape the embrace of a foe ?
Who, who shall deliver ?

Our last extract will be in more cheerful vein—the blessings invoked on Argos by the Danaids, now safe under the protection of the King :

Set forward, and raise the chant of praise to the Gods ever-blessed who ward this town,
And to them which beside Erasinus abide, the Argive river of old renown.
O handmaid-train, take up the strain : be the city Pelasgian our praise's theme :
Let our lips no more in hymns adore the godhead of Nile's broad-flowing stream ;

But the rivers we sing that to this land bring their still sweet draughts that have multiplied
Her offspring, and rolled o'er her deep soft mould the joy of fertility far and wide.
Chaste Artemis stoop to behold our troop with compassion ; in wedlock-thralldom chained
By Cythera's Queen may we ne'er be seen—by them that hate us be this prize gained !

R. Y. TYRRELL.

AMERICA IN THE MAKING

The Middle Colonies; and The Colonies under the House of Hanover. By J. A. DOYLE. 2 vols. (Longmans, 14s. net each.)

In three previous volumes dealing with "The English in America" Mr. Doyle told the story of the Northern and Southern Colonies from their beginnings to the accession of the House of Hanover. He now describes in similar manner the Middle Colonies to the same date, and in a fifth volume treats the Colonies collectively down to the Conquest of Canada. He has thus exhaustively explained the development of the American settlements through the seventeenth and more than half the eighteenth century—to the eve, in fact, of their conflict with England, which ended in separation. If the way of the historian has been cleared in recent years by the publication of invaluable documents bearing on the hundred and fifty-two years which divide the founding of Jamestown from Wolfe's capture of Quebec, the number of the Colonies, their extent and their variety, make the task of presenting a definite and connected picture extremely complicated and confusing. It is almost as though in writing the history of England the historian had to take separate cognisance of each county. "The Middle Colonies" comprise New Netherlands—which became New York when it passed into English hands—New Jersey and Pennsylvania. It is in "The Colonies Under the House of Hanover" that the historian seeks to gather up the threads and carry forward a joint narrative. His work would have been simplified if there had been any sense of unity among the Colonies themselves. Differences in origin, differences in aspiration, differences in constitution and character, often left them as distant from each other as, both physically and morally, they were from the Mother Country.

Mr. Doyle's account of Colonial dissensions, which fears of French aggression or Indian outrage could not eliminate, makes it appear remarkable that they found a common policy possible even against England in 1775. It can only be that they hated not each other less but England more. In many cases their very existence was a protest against English government, and the spacious conditions and free air of the new world were not conducive to a loyalty dissociated from self-interest. The student who patiently studies Mr. Doyle's volumes will find it easy to seize the true cause of the American rebellion: it was not particularly the Stamp Act and the Tea Duty and the policy of Grenville and North and George III.—it was in the nature of things. The rupture was certain to come sooner or later, not because one side was wicked and the other intolerant but because of sheer incompatibility. The Colonies could sink their differences to become the United States of America, but they were not prepared to give way on any point to maintain connection with the country from which they sprang. We hope Mr. Doyle purposes carrying his work as far at least as the treaty of Paris of 1783. He has the qualities, judicial and literary, which eminently fit him to describe and pass judgment on this momentous chapter in British-American annals.

Interest in the Middle Colonies in the seventeenth century turns to a large extent on the doings of the Dutch and the manner in which the English insinuated themselves into possession of New Netherlands. Mr. Doyle shows why Holland was not well fitted to undertake colonial enterprises on the other side of the Atlantic and to utilise the advantage she derived from the discovery and exploration on her behalf by Hudson of the river which bears his name. It is a noteworthy fact in the history of discovery and colonisation that the initial steps have often been taken by adventurous spirits who were not natives of the benefiting country. Usselinx, the Dutch Gilbert with a difference as Mr. Doyle suggests, worked for every country except his own. Columbus was a Genoese in the service of Spain, as was John Cabot in the service of England. What an Englishman discovered for Holland was destined to become English, and the appropriation of New Netherlands gave England a continuous seaboard in America, and secured to her colonists the friendship of the Five Nations. England's pretexts for the annexation of the Dutch possessions were not as conclusive as her obvious intention to drive the Dutch out. The story is in some of its particulars a sort of seventeenth-century precursor of the nineteenth-century struggle between Dutch and British in South Africa. The English dispossessed the Dutch by methods which the Dutch themselves had adopted towards the Swedes, and the Dutch of course objected; just as they objected in South Africa to the application by England to themselves of the laws as to language, which they had rigorously enforced when they had Huguenot settlers at their mercy. Mr. Doyle's survey of Colonial history during the seventeenth century impresses him in a manner somewhat novel. He is struck by a certain lack of biographical interest; commanding figures are absent; few men stand out above their fellows and stamp their individuality on the community. No Clive or Warren Hastings is the pivot of Colonial affairs; men like Winthrop and Endicott, even Penn, are absorbed in the collective growth:

Everywhere among the Colonies the life of the community is far more interesting than the life of any men in it. There is no disparagement in this. It is rather praise to say that a community is better and stronger than its best and strongest man. For this means that the community has in its institutions, its faith and its corporate morality guarantees for its well-being of which it cannot be robbed by chance.

That is a new note in the philosophy of history and it is a condition of things likely, we agree, to mislead the historian, as it may mislead contemporary and partial chroniclers, who are apt to manufacture heroes either because they lack a sense of proportion or because they believe that communities cannot get on without great men and dominating personalities.

With the accession of George I. we reach a convenient landmark in American Colonial history. "The end of the seventeenth century was the point at which the era of formation ended and the era of fruition and repose began." Not altogether repose, because the second part is summed up in the sentence "External pressure exercised by the Mother Country, became the new factor in Colonial history, and is met in some cases by persistent and unintelligent resistance, in other cases by co-operation, occasionally strenuous, more often carefully qualified and fenced in by conditions." It was also the era of anxiety as to the efforts of France to secure what to-day we should call the Hinterland. The one thing the Colonies never thought of seriously was union; they were particularist in all their actions, and says Mr. Doyle: "No intermediate conception of a corporate American nationality ever, so far as we can judge, presented itself" to the mind of the New Englander or Virginian who was at once a citizen of his province and of the Empire. The only people to whom the idea of Colonial Union was constantly present apparently were British officials who were not Colonists:

There is hardly a single British official of any intelligence or independence of view from the Revolution of 1688 till the Conquest of Canada who does not see the necessity for some measure not it may be of complete union but of consolidation.

It was not until Union presented itself in a form "which made it the enemy, instead of the ally, of British supremacy" that it became acceptable to the Colonists. None of Mr. Doyle's chapters on the Hanover section is more illuminating than that on the literary and intellectual life of the Colonies. Almost in their earliest days they made education a first charge on their resources. A common education no doubt accounts for their real democratisation, and made the Colonial spirit incomprehensible to public men at home. Harvard and Yale enabled New England citizens to become educated men without ceasing to be New Englanders. It was failure or inability to grasp such essential characteristics that induced the mistaken action of the Home Government in later years. Mr. Doyle is not prepared to condemn Grenville and those associated with him. "More justly should we blame those who for at least two generations had never once looked the facts of Colonial administration plainly in the face."

THE EGOIST

Memories. By Major-General Sir OWEN TUDOR BURNE.
(Arnold, 15s. net.)

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR OWEN TUDOR BURNE is an egoist; which is not to say that he is self-conscious. How many times in these "memories" the first personal pronoun occurs we should not like to conjecture; but the book was written in the first instance for family reading, and it would have lost in interest by the elimination of the pronoun that lends a sense of intimacy to Sir Owen's pages. That loss would have been fatal to our enjoyment of what is, in many respects, a delightful autobiography; for it is Sir Owen Tudor Burne, rather than his memories as memories, that interests us. True, we could wish that several testimonials to his ability had been allowed to remain in his scrap-book, but the judicious reader will "skip" them and the continuity of the narrative will not be lost.

Sir Owen was born at Plymouth on April 12, 1837, and was the eleventh of nineteen children. Of his father, who left the Church of England to join the Catholic Apostolic Church, he gives some interesting recollections, and à propos of these quotes an amusing anecdote of a Scottish minister who arrived at the kirk without the manuscript of his sermon:

He could not preach without it, but it lay in his manse a mile away when the time had come for him to mount into the pulpit. Here was a poser only to be solved by giving out the 119th Psalm. . . . While the congregation were singing it, off to his manse for the sermon galloped the minister, and with equal celerity galloped back. When he returned the congregation were still at it, and he asked the clerk, with some trepidation, how they were getting on. "Oh, sir," was the answer, "they've got to the end of the 84th verse, an' they're just cheepin' like wee mice."

A prayer, supposed to have been offered up by a pious man who had become prosperous, is interesting as showing the simplicity of the unlettered:

"O Lord, enable the bank to answer all their bills, and make all my debtors good men. Give a prosperous voyage and return to the Mermaid sloop which I have insured. Thou hast said that the days of the wicked are short, and I trust thou wilt not forget thy promises, having purchased an estate in reversion of Sir J. P., a profligate young man. Lord, keep our funds from seeking; and, if it be Thy will, let there be no sinking fund."

Mr. Burne obtained a commission in 1855 from the Duke of Cambridge, passed his examination, was gazetted to the 20th Regiment (now Lancashire Fusiliers), and after a few months at Parkhurst started for the Crimea in charge of a draft of about two hundred recruits. He arrived too late to take part in any serious engagement, but soon after his return home the Mutiny broke out and he was ordered to India and after several encounters with the rebels was recommended for the V.C. He gives an interesting account of the operations, though we do not think that he does justice to Sir Colin Campbell. A year or so after the termination of the Mutiny our hero was appointed military secretary to Sir Hugh Rose, whose praises he never tires of singing. He was present at Lord Canning's first Durbar, and he gives an amusing account of the Viceroy's long and dignified address to the chiefs:

He spoke of the great Queen who had desired him to decorate them; he thanked all present for their services in the Mutiny; he particularly impressed upon the Chiefs and Princes their duty in the future of abolishing infanticide, of making roads and railways in their territories, and of moving on in the paths of virtue and civilisation, and so on—a fine address, unfortunately translated, according to custom, by the then Foreign Secretary, who was an indifferent Hindustani scholar. He bluntly said, so far as I can remember, to the horror of those who knew the language, and to the visible astonishment of the Chiefs: "Lord Sahib fermata hai, Salaam. Tum log badzat hai. Chokri mat maro. Rasta banao. Chalo. Bas. Salaam." Which meant, literally translated: "The Viceroy commands me to say, 'How d'ye do? You are a set of — rascals. Reform! Don't kill your female children. Make roads and move on. Enough! You may go.'"

We can understand Lord Canning's conviction that Hindustani was a very comprehensive language.

In 1864 our author returned to England with Sir Hugh Rose, and accompanied him as A.D.C. on his appointment as Commander of the Forces in Ireland. He was in the Emerald Isle at the time the Fenian disturbances broke out, but he does not seem to have attained a real grasp of Irish affairs. When Lord Mayo succeeded Lawrence in 1868, he accepted the office of private secretary to the new Viceroy and returned to India. Lord Mayo was a man after our hero's own heart, and he appreciates him at his true worth. He was a man of wide understanding and knowledge and grim determination, and in the few short years that elapsed before the assassin's knife put an end to a career of great promise, he fully vindicated Lord Beaconsfield's choice of him in the face of considerable opposition. Major Burne was summoned to Osborne to give an account of the murder, and, owing to the similarity of the doorways, on retiring to bed:

I got into a difficulty [he says], into the details of which I will not enter. It was something after the nature of the ghost story told by Admiral Kennedy:

"I was staying in an old country house in the Midlands some years ago. The place was, as usual, said to be haunted. A large party was staying in the house for the shooting, among them several ladies. One morning a young lady of the party came down to breakfast looking pale and agitated. On being questioned by our hostess, she said she had passed a miserable night and had received a great shock. Her story was as follows: Soon after she had retired to rest and got comfortably asleep, a ghost came into her room, and, having dragged all the clothes off her bed, silently retired, leaving her shivering with cold and fright, in which condition she remained till morning. Of course, she received the greatest sympathy from all present, coupled with indignation at the outrage. Presently in came a jovial, rubicund Major, who in answer to inquiries as to how he had slept, and if he had seen the ghost, replied: 'Oh, I slept first-rate. I was rather cold the first part of the night, but I went into the spare room and took the clothes off the bed, after which I was as warm as a toast!'"

A short time after Major Burne arrived in London (none the worse, we trust, for his experience at Osborne) he was made Political A.D.C. to the Secretary of State for India. One of his duties was to take charge of native Embassies and Chiefs visiting England. He assisted Sir Henry Rawlinson in his reception of the Shah of Persia in 1873, and reproduces extracts from the Eastern autocrat's diary, which he supplements by an account of a difficulty into which his Majesty's slothfulness brought him. The Shah had insisted on seeing a prize-fight. "You people have shown me everything under the sun except what I most want to see—a prize-fight in which plenty of blood can be drawn," he said; and an innocent prize-fight was arranged, to take place in the Buckingham Palace stables, half an hour before a reception of Archbishops and Bishops, who were to present a memorial asking for protection of the Christians in Persia:

To our dismay the Shah had had a bad night, and we could not get him down in time. In the meantime our Prelates had assembled in the ground-floor reception-room at Buckingham Palace, which led out into the grounds. The Shah said: "I don't care; I won't see the Bishops till I have seen the fight." The Equerry said: "This is maddening. There is no time now to walk down to the stables. Get the men up quietly behind the corner wall here, and we can show our Eastern Cyrus a few exchanges of fists, and get him back sharp to the reception-room for the deputation." Unluckily, the Shah, eluding our vigilance, came right into the room with a gold epauletted footman, who threw open the window-sash and ushered His Majesty out into the garden (while we were waiting for him to come, as arranged, out of a side door), followed in a trice by Lord Shaftesbury and the whole of the reverend gentlemen in their lawn sleeves. Like sheep without a shepherd, curious to know what was going on, they followed the Shah, and so in a moment found themselves more or less in a ring round the two prize-fighters.

The dénouement our readers will find in Sir Owen Burne's pages.

When Lord Lytton succeeded Lord Northbrook as Viceroy, Major Burne again went to India as Private Secretary for two years, but with this part of his career we have not space to deal.) He was present at a dinner given to Lord Roberts at the United Service Club in November 1880, when the Duke of Cambridge, as Chairman, rose to propose the health of the guest:

He spoke, as usual, very well and eloquently till he came to the capture of the Peiwar Pass in Afghanistan, which was regarded as a great feather in Roberts's cap. The Duke said: "And now I come to the Pass—the great Pass—the well-known Pass—" ("Where the — was the Pass?" he whispered to those near at hand) "the wonderful operations at the Pass—the Pass—" ("Where the — was the Pass?" whispered the Duke again, getting very hot and angry) "where our friend covered himself with glory—I mean the Pass—. What is the name of that — Pass?" at last he roared, till some one near at hand whispered "Peiwar," and we all cried with laughter, while the Duke shook himself together, became as gentle as a dove, and went on with a very good speech.

We are inclined to think that Major-General Sir Owen Tudor Burde over-estimates his own importance in the universe, but there are two classes of egoists, and our author belongs in the first. He has written a delightful volume of reminiscences which every one who has the good sense to skip the tedious parts will feel the better for reading. We have not culled all the gems from his book of memory.

EASTERN ITALIAN ARCHITECTURE

The Shores of the Adriatic: the Italian Side. By F. HAMILTON JACKSON, R.B.A. (Murray, 21s. net.)

THE author of this book is fully justified in claiming that it deals with Italian towns which are full of architectural and artistic interest and of which many are very little known even to the more enterprising English travellers. Rimini is familiar enough in name: Ravenna—celebrated by Dante, Dryden, and Byron—is at least a goal of desire to every student of Italian art and history: but how many people have heard of Terlizzi or Pomposa? How many of the thousands who pass through Brindisi give a thought to the early churches and other monuments which it contains? Of the other towns treated in this volume most are mere names to the ordinary tourist, though no one who has seen Ancona either from the seaward or from the landward side is likely to forget it. But from Brindisi up to Caorle near Venice our author leads his readers on what he calls "an architectural and archæological pilgrimage," and discovers to them an extraordinary variety of interesting things.

His descriptions of architecture are exceedingly close and careful, though at times rather too technical for the layman to follow quite clearly: and the historical matter which he gives suffers from a compression which perhaps was unavoidable. Of course the local history of each town is useful in relation to its architecture and art: but it might have been even more useful if the author had been able to give a general historical and a general artistic sketch, showing for example the rise and wane of Byzantine, of Saracenic, and of Norman influence and the way in which they shaded off, one into the other, and were merged into the Renaissance. But Mr. Hamilton Jackson deserves high praise for the amount of solid work put into his book, and the reader will find that the occasional severity of his technical description is relieved by pleasant personal anecdotes, by notes on manners and customs, and by appreciations of natural as well as architectural beauty. Above all the book abounds in admirable illustrations, mostly from the author's own pencil. The firmness, the delicacy, and the exquisite finish in detail of these drawings, their extraordinary relief and refinement, convey to the eye just what is wanted. Look, for example, at the gallery and the ambo of S. Valentino in Bitonto; the door of the cathedral at Ruvo; the panels from the west door of the cathedral at Troja; or the west end of S. Clemente in Casauria. Work of the kind could not be better done: it is not merely faithful, it is full of the beauty of the architecture which it renders.

To follow the writer at all closely in a review is impossible: it must suffice to indicate some points of dominating interest. One may remark first how soon these eastern Italian towns fell under the powerful influence of Byzantine artists. The most striking examples are, of course, to be seen at Ravenna with its world-famous mosaics. It has, indeed, been suggested that mosaic work had an independent origin in Italy, and in support of this view is cited the fact that we find at Ravenna mosaics dating from the fifth century, or one hundred and fifty years before Justinian's artists carried this form of decoration far and wide, over the east and over the west. But Mr. Hamilton Jackson quotes St. Jerome as saying that even in the fourth century the Syrians pushed their trade everywhere and carried with them Syrian arts and crafts, including mosaic and sculpture. Juvenal complains of the flood of Syrian influence in his day: but by the sixth century it had at least become a healthy and an artistic influence, so blending with the fading spirit of classic art as to produce a style of decorative architecture which possesses, as some think, a deeper and more enduring charm than any other in the world. It would be easy to show how the conquests of the Arabs in the seventh century spread Byzantine forms and ideals, first by driving monks and other artists from east to west, and next by recalling and employing the most accomplished artists in building the splendid mosques of Syria, Egypt, North Africa and Spain. And the close connection of the Byzantine and the so-called Norman style cannot be questioned by any student of the subject. One may here call attention to the magnificent examples of bronze work described by our author, such as the bronze doors at Monte Sant' Angelo and those of the cathedral at Troja, both of the eleventh century, and those of San Clemente in Casauria, dated 1191, the latest of the sort in Italy. Nothing could more clearly show the relation of the two styles, and it would be hard to exaggerate the richness and splendour of these works. The doors at Monte Sant' Angelo came direct from Constantinople.

The Saracens, however, from Byzantine beginnings soon developed a style of their own, and traces of it are common in these Italian towns, which were often raided and sometimes occupied by Saracen invaders. Thus they held Bari for eighty years ending 1004 A.D.; they were at Trani in 840; at Troja there still remains ivory work with Cufic inscriptions; Lucera was called Lucera Saracenorum; and from a document of 1301 it is clear that Saracen artists and artificers were highly valued at that period. For about five centuries, then, a strain of direct Saracen influence may be traced—an element which adds to the variety and picturesqueness of the monuments recorded in this volume. And these monuments include, not only buildings but objects of art of many kinds, jewellers' and silversmiths' work, ivories, wood-carvings, embroideries, and paintings, for all of which the author shows a just appreciation.

Taken altogether Mr. Hamilton Jackson's book is one of great merit and great charm: it opens new fields of delight to every lover of art. Such faults as it has may be lightly touched upon. First the style in places is crabbed, and a peculiarly loose use of pronouns often tends to obscurity or bad grammar. Thus:

Of the columns, which are antique, six have three rows of leaves and lions' heads at the corners to which two bodies belong, the rest being based on Corinthian. It has been beautified in the seventeenth century. (p. 35.)

In a little recess on the way to the sacristy water, which is believed to be medicinal, is stored beneath a little Romanesque statuette of an armed S. Michael standing on the dragon, which may perhaps be the remains of a pagan healing spring. (p. 186.)

The ends of the seat which runs round the apse are formed by the episcopal throne of S. Damazus which has been sawn through. (p. 286.)

The library was the largest in Italy save for that of the mother establishment at Monte Cassino, and it ruled over a wide territory. (p. 289.)

In such passages the sense is nearly lost. Moreover, the author's Latin quotations require revision: "Docta manus me fecit ad hoc ut lectio vite hic recitata ferat fructum mentes A;" "Absit quod Fredericus sit tui numeris iners," "Torre dei passi, Turrus passum," "oc opus fieri fecit;" "fontes aquarium;" "Via Emilia;" "Salve nos, Domine." Here are many blunders, which can hardly be in the originals: and though S. Pier Crisologo is correct, it is not correct to write Pier Crisologus, which should be either Petrus or Peter Chrysologus.

One more general criticism. Restraint in writing is an excellent thing: but we cannot help wishing at times that the author wrote less coldly where there is good cause for enthusiasm. Compare for instance his description of Ravenna with the stirring and brilliant description given by Dr. Hodgkin in "Italy and Her Invaders," and our meaning will be clear. Yet no one could draw as Mr. Hamilton Jackson does without feeling intensely the beauty and the historic interest of his subjects. Indeed the whole volume bears evidence of his love for the things which he writes about. He has spared neither time nor labour in his work, and has produced a valuable and delightful book.

THE PRINCE OF NAVIGATORS

Dampier's Voyages. Edited by JOHN MASEFIELD. 2 vols. (E. Grant Richards, 25s. net.)

A NEW edition of "Dampier's Voyages" appears appropriately at a moment when, after a couple of centuries of neglect, an effort is being made to raise a memorial to the great seaman whom Captain Basil Hall has called the "Prince of Navigators." Those who read the concise but very interesting Life which Mr. Masefield contributes to this new issue of the Voyages may readily learn the respect in which Dampier's work has been held by many of our greatest naval commanders, as well as "by the French, the Dutch and even the Spaniards." Byron, Cook, Broughton, Flinders, Philip Carteret and Erasmus Gower have all borne testimony to his accuracy. Nelson and Howe gave his Voyages as a text-book to their midshipmen, and Lord Exmouth "read them over several times." His professional excellence is therefore above question. That his books are full of interest the general reader may feel assured.

The birthplace of Dampier is but three miles from Yeovil, and Mr. Masefield suggests that the Latin school at which he was placed may have been in that town. Yeovil, however, could boast of no such seat of learning. There is a tradition, but no record, that he was educated at the ancient school at Bruton. As he was left fatherless at the age of ten, and the name of Dampier was then associated with Bruton, it is probable that he lived with relatives in order to avail himself of free education. Of the claim of Bruton to be called a "Latin School" let the following quaint extract from its foundation-deed bear testimony:

And the sd. maister shall not teche his scolers song nor other petite lernynge as the Crosse Rewe, Redyng of the mateyns or of the psalter or such other small things, nother redyng of Englyssh butt such as shall concerne lernynge of gramer. Ffor the foundours of the said scole intend wt: our lordes mercy oonly to have the gramer of latyn tongue so sufficiently taught that the scolers of the same profityng and provyng shall in tymes to come forever be after their capacities perflight latyn men.

There is, however, little Latinity in Dampier's style. What he learnt and what he saw were set down in a plain and simple English, free from affectation and exaggeration. He was imbued throughout with the desire to record facts that might be of use to others. Winds, currents, havens, soundings and anchorage he noted with a pilot's diligence and care. The growth of plants and the habits of animals he observed with the eye of one whom Nature intended to be a naturalist. But in his writings there is no trace of vanity or self-consciousness. After the publication of his first volume, which met with great success and ran rapidly through four editions, at the table of Samuel Pepys he met John Evelyn, who speaks of him as "a more modest man than one would imagine by the relation of the crew he had assorted with."

Dampier first went to sea in 1669 at the age of seventeen. His first volume, published in 1697, contains the narrative of his life in the West Indies with the buccaneers between 1679 and 1688, his voyage to the East Indies and return home in 1691. We have not space to follow his wanderings, but the record of a few days' buccaneering will suffice to show something of the life and the man.

On February 20, 1685, they anchored awaiting an answer from the President of Panama respecting an exchange of prisoners:

The 21st day we took another Bark laden with Hogs, Fowl, Salt Beef and Molossoes. In the afternoon we sent another letter.

This letter Mr. Masefield gives from the original manuscript:

If you refuse this last demand and thinke that the imprisonment of three or foure Englishmen is more advantageous to you than the lives of soe many of your Countrymen as are already and what else shall fall into our hands, then you may keep them and we will send you the heads of these for a beginning; and then do our Countrymen the least hurt in their lives or bodies and by the help of God wee will colour your Land Rivers and sea with Spanish blood of men, women and children the whole time that we remain in these seas, turning our former Mercy into cruelty, showing mercy nor giving quarter to any.

Wee will bring our ships near your walls that you may have the pleasure of seeing them [the Spanish prisoners] hanged at your yard armes.

Wee will make you know that wee are the Commanders of the whole South Seas, so consider what to choose for we waite your sentence of life or death with impatience, if death you shall certainly have the heads by Monday morning, etc.

This letter "wrought so powerfully" that on the next day prisoners were exchanged. On the 24th Dampier is describing the scenery and flora of Tabago, an island six leagues south of Panama:

The Land by the Sea is of a black Mold and deep; but towards the top of the Mountain it is strong and dry. The North side of this Island makes a very pleasant shew, it seems to be a Garden of Fruit inclosed with many high trees, the chiefest Fruits are Plantains and Bonano's.

There are also Coco-nut Trees close to the sea and within grow many Mammet Trees. The Mammet, identified in a note as the Mamme Apple, he describes in detail—its height of "60 or 70 foot" without knots or limbs, its head with many small limbs, its bark and colour:

The fruit is bigger than Quince, it is round, and covered with a thick Rind of a grey colour: when the Fruit is ripe, the Rind is yellow and tough; and it will then peel off like Leather; but before it is ripe it is brittle: the juice is then white and clammy; but when ripe not so. The ripe Fruit under the Rind is yellow as a Carrot, and in the middle are two large rough stones, flat, and each of them much bigger than an Almond. The Fruit smells very well, and the taste is answerable to the smell.

There must have been small leisure for these observations:

While we lay at Tabago we had like to have had a scurvy trick plaid us by a pretended Merchant from Panama, who came, as by stealth, to traffick with us privately.

He came by night "with a fireship instead of a Bark"; but they cut their cables and got off in safety, although the ship blew up quite close to them. However, at daylight next morning they were back picking up their anchors, when the approach of many canoes filled with men put them into "a new Consternation." Happily these proved to be privateers to the number of two hundred and eighty, to whom they gave "our Flower Prize to carry them." By which he means a vessel laden with flour recently captured. These were busy days, yet Dampier found time to notice many things; and as Mr. Masefield reminds his readers, "Humboldt expressly says that the illustrious savans Condamine, Juan, and Ulloa added little to his observations."

Mr. Masefield's edition is excellent. It contains a good portrait of Dampier from the picture by Thomas Murray in the National Portrait Gallery, and copious notes from manuscripts, from the writings of other mariners, and in identification of living things and places often obscured by Dampier's quaint spelling of names.

SPIRITS AND SMALL BEER

Her Majesty's Rebels. By SIDNEY ROYSE LYSAGHT. (Macmillan, 6s.)

Benedict Kavanagh. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. (Arnold, 6s.)

BACK in the days of tumult and shouting, of bitter strife and fostered crime, of no-rent manifestoes and coercion bills, Her Majesty's rebels, led by one of the greatest political leaders of the century, had Ireland in a ferment. The leader—the "uncrowned king" and hero of the Irish race—stood head and shoulders above the clamouring multitude of politicians, and, in Ireland, every man is a politician, the wandering tinker under the hedge holding his opinions no less stoutly than the Parliamentary candidate on the hustings. Wild, stormy days they were, when the hand of the predominant partner was forced by widespread lawlessness; when freedom of action and speech was an article of belief without foundation in fact; when the hope of "national" Ireland and the balance of power lay, alike, in the hands of one man—Parnell.

Taking such a time of unrest for the action of his narrative, and a "national" leader for his principal figure, in a prefatory note Mr. Lysaght calls the reader's attention to the points of resemblance between his hero and Parnell, and expresses a hope that it will be clear to every one that he has not attempted to portray the character of the great Home Ruler. Remembering the time and the man we accept Mr. Lysaght's assurance without reservation. Michael Desmond is a notable hero, compounded of giant strength and strange weakness—a man, in fact, and a man full of magnetic force to draw men and women to him, now the victim of a passion he would not stop to control, now cold, reserved, and unscrupulous. Ambitious for his country he was more ambitious for himself. Hating England yet not loving Ireland—for no man who loved her could rend her internally for a political aim—concentrating his energies on the upheaval of the State, his devotion to the goddess Fame broken strangely by interludes of spasmodic devotion to the fair sex, Desmond commands our admiration without commanding our respect or our love. He is a fine figure for a fine novel, but he is by no means the finest character in a book one of the chief merits of which is its characterisation. It is seldom that we are given a picture of the Ireland of the early eighties half so finished, so true, or so just as Mr. Lysaght's. He handles his men and women with the quiet sympathy of one who knows and understands them. To him they are living men and women and he makes them live for us. He has written with care and never in haste, concerning himself with the scenery of his stage and the development of his players, and we have to thank him for the most delightful glimpses of Irish peasants, their wit and drollery which we have had for many years. More than all, he has caught and reproduced for us the rich tones of the brogue till in fancy we hear the music of the blind fiddler-poet, and the inimitable tongue of Coneen Cal sets the imagination dancing with delight. To find fault with "Her Majesty's Rebels" is difficult and to praise it worthily is not easy; few Irish books of such good parts have come into our hands since Carleton's days, for few authors hold the balance so accurately or write so restrainedly and so simply as Mr. Lysaght, content to fill their pages with the moving figures of men, animated by the spirit of life itself.

In "Benedict Kavanagh," it need hardly be said, the atmosphere is meant to be Irish. Mr. George Birmingham's book reminds us of the study table and some sermons; and we have seldom listened to a worse sermon or read a duller book. From Ireland we expect the flash of wit—to be moved to laughter though it be through our tears. But neither the spark of wit nor the sadness of tears nor the joy of laughter is here. Mr. Birmingham has no tale to unfold. Having read his three hundred and twenty-four pages, we are entirely ignorant of the purpose for which the book was written. An attempt is made to extol the work of the Gaelic League, and the best that one of its bright ornaments can say of its aim is: "I doubt if any one at present can explain what we are doing, or why it is good." Exactly. This has always been our view. Mr. George Birmingham is fond of cheap sneers; perhaps he believes that they atone for dullness. He holds nothing sacred—not even the poverty of hard-worked women. He sneers at everybody from the Provost of Trinity down to poor Dublin landladies; his book, indeed, is full of cheap thrills, cheap enthusiasm, cheap pathos, cheap eulogy, cheap emotion. "Benedict," for instance, once listened to a Gaelic song of which he did not understand a word; by the time the third verse was reached, we are told:

eyes in his soul had been opened and he saw. He stood on high ground and there was beneath him barren land and up against it broke the salt sea. Lean beasts went to and fro picking scanty grass. Men and women, toiling endlessly, gathered meagre harvests; piled dripping wrack on stone altars to burn as sacrifice to the spirit of desolation, and the salt breath of their deity blew green smoke, pungent, sour blankets of it flat across the fields.

We do not care to waste space in discussing so dull a book as Mr. Birmingham's. He is an egoist of the worst description, and, as we have said before, he knows less of Ireland than the intelligent tourist.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Life in Ancient Athens. By T. G. TUCKER. (Macmillan, 5s. net.)

THE numerous attempts that have been made, from time to time, to present a picture of the daily life of the ancient Greek, have not been of a kind to arouse enthusiasm, or even interest. The reason has always been that they have attempted too much, with the inevitable result that they have become mere dictionaries of antiquities. In Professor Tucker's book there is no minute and dreary exposition of details. The Attic day does not drag its weary length through piles of musty manuscript, nor is the dust of excavation on our boots as we plod across a ghostly agora, peopled with unsubstantial shadows. Instead, the real Athens of Pericles rises around us, with its glittering acropolis and its squalid and unsavoury streets. Bareheaded, lightly sandalled, and with our cloak slung about our shoulders, we greet friend Pasicles, our author's typical citizen, a solid, respectable man—καλὸς κάγαθός, a fine type of manhood—and in his company we live the life of Athens as to the manner born. Whether chatting by the tables of the stout and prosperous alien banker with whom we deal, discreetly stopping our ears to the "Billingsgate" of the bread-women, dropping into the barber's to hear the latest news, or partaking of our kindly friend's hospitality, we are Athenians of Athens for the delightful hour that we spend in reading this unpretentious little book.

We have indicated that Professor Tucker takes a typical citizen as the medium of his exposition. We should rather say, two typical citizens. Pasicles is presented to us as a man of thirty or more. His childhood does not concern us. But we are present at his wedding, we are even presented to his wife, and with him we rejoice over the birth of his son Lysimachus, following with interest the child's progress from playtime to school, from school to manhood; for these are, as our author would say, "breathing Athenians." In a book so uniformly pleasant and sound as this it is difficult to indicate the best points. Perhaps the chapter on slavery and that upon Council and Assembly, may be found the most informative. Professor Tucker has been wise to confine his attention to a single century of Athenian life, and that the most brilliant (440-330 B.C.). It has given him room for broad strokes of the brush, and his sketch is vivid, certain and strong.

If we must criticise, we would cast a doubt upon the statement that the Athenians were a mixed race. We can find no evidence of an Achæan strain in their ancestry. Nor do we hold that the Greek tongue was a Homeric importation. And to speak of the Propylæa as a "triumphal arch" is surely misleading to the novice in these matters. Apart from these points, our only quarrel with Professor Tucker is the complete absence of all references. Surely a few of these might have been included for the benefit of more advanced readers than the "young person" for whom this discreet yet delightful account of Attic life was primarily designed.

Perugino. By EDWARD HUTTON. (Duckworth, 2s.)

As an introduction to the work of the master of Raphael this little monograph by Mr. Edward Hutton admirably fulfils its purpose, and will be welcomed by all who appreciated the graceful prose of the same author's "Cities of Umbria." With a modesty which might be imitated by writers less well qualified than himself Mr. Hutton declines to pose as an authority, and wisely refrains from plunging into controversial attributions in a book admittedly intended for a popular audience. Where such vexed questions cannot fairly be avoided Mr. Hutton, in the main, follows Mr. Berenson, and in explicit foot-notes puts his reader on the track of more detailed information. His own aim is to disentangle the peculiar charm of Perugino's paintings, and to expound with sympathetic insight the characteristics which endear his work to its students. How this charm is to be found in the background rather than the foreground of Perugino's work is best explained in the author's own words:

His figures, always a little aloof from life, more or less dream people, often beautiful, but always a little fantastic, a little sentimental, as we might say, become less real, less actual as he grows older; he seems continually to have repeated himself, to have been content to care little about them, but his landscapes are always full of the eagerness and peace which he has found in that world of valley and mountain and lake which surrounds his home and his birthplace: in it he seems to have found everything that might satisfy him, and to it he returns again and again as though, as indeed it was, it were something divine, something that in a world that was continually passing away remained always, in its profound and living beauty, the one thing that could never fail him, and in which he finds, as both before and after him so many poets and painters, philosophers and children, the simplest too among men and women have found, the very garments as it were of God, whose voice as of old we may hear still walking in the Garden.

The size of the book renders it practically impossible to reproduce the larger paintings of Perugino with any clearness, and the most satisfactory reproductions are those of sections and heads; but this is one of the few of the plethora of art books which will be bought not for its illustrations but for its text.

The Roman Capitol in Ancient and Modern Times. By E. RODOCANACHI. Translated from the French by FREDERICK LAWTON. (Heinemann, 4s. net.)

THE author and translator of this work are mutually unfortunate in their association. For the book, uninteresting when translated, must have been very uninteresting to the translator; written in jerky and jumbled style, it has been translated into still more jerky and jumbled English. Apart from the personal weariness induced by the attempt to read this small book on a great subject, an indelible impression is created on the reader's mind that both author and translator were weary of their work before it was half done. M. Rodocanachi has plainly spent an immense amount of laborious study on the preparation of his material. But one feels that, having collected this mass of material, he was oppressed by the magnitude of his task, and set to work without heart. The result is that, though the synoptical table of contents reads well and the arrangement of the book is good in theory, the matter consists of a disconnected series of observations, marred by useless repetition and trivial detail. The notes, which frequently occupy more than half the page, contain much that might have been incorporated in the text, and thus bear witness to hasty and impatient book-making. Whole passages of mediæval Latin are given with all their contractions, and, where recognised contractions might have been used, the words are given at length. However, in spite of these serious blemishes, the book contains a great deal of out-of-the-way information, which will repay the trouble of the seeking. The accounts of poetical coronations are interesting, and occasionally lightened by humour which we cannot help thinking is unconscious, while the notes form a valuable guide to that further study which is suggested by the very full bibliography at the end of the book.

Upon the shoulders of the translator must rest much of the responsibility for the uninviting character of the volume in its English dress; for the trail of translation is over it all; it is redolent of the dictionary, we had almost said of the fifth form. Mr. Lawton's knowledge of French must be of the respectable and laborious order which alone can produce a totally inelastic version. He renders the Gallic idiom with pathetic fidelity. Nor is his knowledge of the niceties of English over-wide. The abominable word "bass"-relief is no more English than it is French or Italian. Sentences such as "the repairs . . . which were the first that we have any certain knowledge of," and "The Conservators . . . were forced to hastily retire" assail the patient reader from time to time. It must be admitted that the task of translating the mass of ill-digested material of which the book consists cannot have been otherwise than tiresome, but the shortcomings of the translation make the work in its present form still more tiresome to read.

The Egypt of the Future. By EDWARD DICEY, C.B. (Heinemann, 3s. 6d. net.)

As Mr. Dicey was for many years the only publicist of any importance who advocated the expediency of England's assuming an avowed and permanent Protectorate over Egypt it may be imagined that his latest book, which is a sequel to his story of the Khedivate, is of a highly controversial character. It is suited for review in a political rather than a literary journal. He thinks, for example, that no honest critic can dispute the zeal, the absolute integrity, and the ability with which Lord Cromer rules Egypt, but he adds that "Egypt—under autocratic, though genuinely benevolent rule—has made enormous material progress, but her moral progress has been of a retrograde description." He would have Egyptian officials in place of English, leaving internal administration in native hands while maintaining British supremacy as a matter of vital importance to England as the mistress of India. Lord St. Aldwyn once said that England had been established as a trustee for civilisation in Egypt with the assent of other powers, and it is really to combat this view, not destructively only but with constructive proposals, that Mr. Dicey has written his book. When the Eastern question once more comes up for settlement our position in Egypt will certainly have to be decided, and for this reason Mr. Dicey's book will be read with great interest even by those who find themselves unable to agree with his conclusions.

SOME PROTESTS AND AN APPRECIATION

It is time that some one made a protest against the habit, which is apparently growing among our poets, of issuing "new" volumes of poetry which contain a large proportion of poems that have been previously published. I do not refer to poems which have appeared in newspapers and magazines. To collect these into a volume is, of course, perfectly legitimate. But, to take a definite example, here is a volume published by the Dun Emer Press at 7s. 6d. It is called "By Still Waters, Lyrical Poems Old and New"; and it is by "A. E.," and the manager of the Dun Emer Press informs us that he "has to thank Mr. John Lane for permission to reprint ten poems from 'Homeward Songs' and nine poems from the 'Earth Breath,' also Messrs. Macmillan for permission to reprint seven poems from 'The Divine Vision.'" That is to say, twenty-six poems out of thirty-two that the volume contains are old, and only six are new. I know that one has to be very careful about what one says nowadays touching the "Celtic movement," but I must say that this sort of literary re-hashing may be, and probably is, exceedingly Celtic, but that there does not appear to be much "movement" about it. Perhaps the "movement" is marking time. It must, I suppose, be allowed to behave occasionally in a Hibernian manner.

Mr. Maurice Baring is not Irish, nor is he, as far as I know, connected with any "movement," but he too has issued a volume of "Sonnets and Short Poems" (Oxford: Blackwell, 2s. net), the greater part of which, as he informs us in an author's note, have appeared before, in a volume called "The Black Prince," and elsewhere. Then why issue them again? I hasten to add that they are quite good and well worth reading more than once; but as the greater part of them have probably been already reviewed in these columns, there can be no object in my attempting to repeat the task.

The anonymously published "Songs of Lucilla" (Elkin Mathews) is a curiously uneven book. The author occasionally lapses unaccountably into slipshod diction and commonplace expression. That she is not, however, dependent on inspiration alone when she writes is proved by the artistic finish and the mastery of technique which she displays when she is at her best. The first poem in the book, a sonnet, has such fine lines and images in it as these:

Fretting the mortal garment of the mind
With passionate heat and cold perplexity, which are almost worthy of Rossetti, and the whole sonnet is what a sonnet should be: the image of a mood caught and seized and moulded into a beautiful form, written with fire in the soul and ice in the brain. Another splendid sonnet is "In Chrysalis Months." Certainly if a poet is, as I hold, to be judged ultimately by his or her best work, the author of "Songs of Lucilla" must be accorded a high place among contemporary poets. I quote two exquisite stanzas from the "Moated House":

And ever in the limpid glass
I pore, and through its faery world
I watch the phantom clouds unfurled,
In printless pageants as they pass.

And swift-winged swallows shrilling skim,
Like plaintive words, its pensive deep,
And silver dace, like dreams in sleep,
Flash through its twilight dense and dim. . . .

I should now like to make another protest, this time against translations of foreign contemporary minor poets into English verse. On our table is "Poems by Arthur Pfungst," translated from the German by E. F. L. Gauss, "first assistant librarian of the Chicago Public Library," with a preface by T. W. Rhys Davids (Kegan Paul 5s. net).

I feel it a great honour [says Mr. Rhys Davids in his preface] to have been asked to say a few words as introduction to this translation of Dr. Pfungst's beautiful verses; all the more so, indeed, as it is difficult for me to see what I have done to deserve it.

This exactly expresses what I feel myself about being asked to review Dr. Pfungst's "beautiful verses." What have I done to deserve this honour? I have—I say it with shame—little knowledge of the German language, and, I blush to relate it, I have never heard of Dr. Pfungst. I have, however, read a great many pages of Dr. Pfungst's book in the English (or should I say American?) translation, and I can lay my hand on my heart and say that if they possessed any beauty in their original language it has entirely vanished in the translation:

Let but once the hours pass
With their fleeting pain and glee;
Do not look upon the mass,
Dare with thee (sic) alone to be. . . .

Ah, it is so easy floating
On the stream that round us swells,
But 'tis hard one's life devoting
When one with his "ego" dwells.

"Which," to vary the Bab Ballads, "is ugly but I don't know what it means."

Once I would be like other people are,
Who look on medley (sic) life intoxicated.

But my brain reels, I feel that I am realising Dr. Pfungst's former aspirations in my own person. I feel as if I were looking "on medley life intoxicated." I must give up reading Dr. Pfungst before it becomes a habit.

"The Triumph of Man" by Percy Schofield (Elliot Stock) is the noisiest poem for its size I have ever read. The amount of "crashing" and "riving" and "roaring" and "groaning" and "bursting" and "thundering" which takes place in the seventy-four pages of the book must, I am sure, constitute a record which has never been equalled. To quote "The Volcanoes" on page 63:

Our roarings are grander
Than voices awakened
By scourges of lightnings
That leap from the clouds;
Our million-ton'd murmurs
Escape from crag-prisons
Wherein thro' dumb aeons
Their powers had been baffled
By granite-hewn fetters.
Our offspring, foul glories
Of lyrical lava,
Red ravell'd-wing'd lightnings,
Mad clouds and loud ashes,
Eclipse the pure day-beams
And drown the mild music
Of bird, breeze, and river,
Of fountain and ocean.
One sound in all nature—
The tramp of our travail.

Mr. Schofield is a purist, and I am sorry to say that his line "our million-ton'd murmurs" is not what I had first thought it to be. It is only "million-toned" with the "E" eliminated in the same way as it is eliminated in "Red ravell'd-wing'd lightnings." When I first read these inspired lines I thought the murmurs were "million-tonned murmurs." Is it too late to suggest this as an emendation? It seems to me to produce a more deafening effect. But perhaps I am merely trying to "paint the lily and gild refined gold." In any case the triumph of Mr. Schofield is assured. "The tramp of [his] travail" will, if it is heard, completely silence any other conceivable sounds. The only drawback is that, faute de mieux, he will probably have to blow it himself.

Concerning "His Kingly word and other original poems" by Major F. M. Wenborn, V. D. (Love and Malcomson Limited), we are informed that his Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of the book. I can only say (with heart and voice) God Save the King.

A. D.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

GARDEN MEMORIES

ABOUT February 14—St. Valentine's Day—when the chaffinch, now gaudily equipped in his sporting plumage, begins first to sing his brief sweet song, one's thoughts turn naturally to the poetry of the open air. During the hard months of winter it has been read and perhaps studied, but now that the days are lengthening the most prosaic of us begins to thrill to the coming spring. He would indeed be hardened in his mind whose feelings were not touched by the opening of the first snow-drop or daffodil. It is the purest of all sensuous poetry, yet it is curious that, in the garden, decay is more productive of good verses than living and absolute beauty. No one has ever yet written a poem of the highest water after passing to and fro through the noblest and best-ordered garden, but the mere thought expressed by Goldsmith—"Here where once a garden smiled, and still where many a garden flower grows wild"—seems to call up those old associations that are the very stuff of which poetry is made. So I was thinking when traversing the gravel-path one chilly night not long ago, when the moon was young, and I bethought me of many such places; with most tenderness perhaps, since we are all egoists more or less, of the garden where my childish feet first trod. The ploughshare now passes over it annually and the house to which it belonged has disappeared, but still here and there a lily or a crocus will come up to tell the stranger that once this was the treasured garden of a family, and to awaken in the few who remember it a thousand sad and tender reminiscences. Perhaps it is this which enables one to enter more fully into the desolation that now lies in places where once fair gardens smiled. For example there is the beautiful little garden at Bemerton near Salisbury, where often the saintly George Herbert paced to and fro, composing those ingenious verses descriptive of the fine church that stands just on the other side of the road, or celebrating the beauty of those modest virtues that he prized. Here perhaps it was that a living rose suggested the most charming of all his poems:

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright—
The bridal of the earth and sky;
The dew shall weep thy fall to-night;
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

The permanent element of the situation is the river Arun that flows past with the softest of murmurs yet with that same voice that Herbert must have listened to. Looking at it, I cannot help fancying for the moment that the river has a personality of its own, a consciousness that must be passionless. The same feeling has come to me sometimes when looking down on the Tweed from Dryborough singing the same song that it crooned to Sir Walter, that greeted the ears of the rude forayers, or that mail-clad soldiers heard when they stopped their horses, to refresh beast and man in the coolwater. Herbert's medlar tree too, old, decrepit and helped by crutches and ligatures, still makes a show of life, as if to remind us of the time when it claimed the attention of a poet, just as the dear dark little study in his house suggests the volumes he has thumbed and pored over.

I remember too the first time that I went to Somersby in Lincolnshire and saw that garden where a "happy sister came and flung a ballad to the brightening moon." In the dell, where Tennyson used to spend much of his time, the snowdrops in February came up like a white cloud as prodigally and beautifully as they did in the day of the "owd Doctor." But what a wild tangle the garden is, untended, overgrown, the lawn where Hallam and his country friends used to sit gone to waste and neglect.

"Time passes" is the solemn phrase on the sun-dial in the churchyard, and in the change and decay seen all around the rectory its message is writ plainer than any print. Indeed the vicarage garden or the rectory garden is usually the saddest of all. The incumbent generally goes to it when he is young, so that the associations of his children are bound up with it, but at his death it passes into other hands, and as the mosses of new years gather on the trunks of the trees, so the associations of new families are formed and grow old as the generations pass away.

Not very long after the death of Richard Jefferies, I remember, I visited the old garden at Coate. It was hard to picture from it the life led by him and his brothers in those days when he was unconsciously garnering the material that was to form "The Gamekeeper at Home" and "Wild Life in a Southern County." Before that, the thatch which, untended and full of holes though it was in the time of his father, formed a characteristic feature of the house, had been taken off and replaced by slates. The little half-attic room upstairs, which he made into a kind of study, had been tidied up into a model of neatness. The trees against the wall, which his father had allowed to go unpruned, were cut back and reduced to seemliness and order. The edgings whose unbridled growth was noticeable in the old days were now either rooted up or reduced to shape and form. The yellow musk still makes its appearance among the cobble-stones of the house. The small summer-house where Jefferies and his brother played at castles still carries the idly-scribbled name; the trees that his father had planted and allowed to grow in a wild desire for privacy still remain. In the case of Jefferies imagination had plenty of scope, for the family had been yeomen there from the time of Queen Elizabeth. Generation after generation had been reared in the old house. Successive children had played in the garden paths and reddened their lips with fruit gathered in the little orchard. The barred perch and pike that Jefferies described in the neighbouring brook, they, or their successors, are still to be seen. And how pleasant it is to picture this quiet fruitful English life in the days long past, when there were no stage-coaches, much less trains and motors, to destroy the quiet and seclusion of the place, when no trippers came to roam over the Downs on which still can be traced the tracks made by early Briton or ancient Roman. The place is one where the sun delights to linger and where any one who likes to dream dreams may pass his time away with a succession of beautiful and enchanting visions. Yet for suggestion he has only here and there a survival from the past; dark oblivious dust has eaten up or covered over all the rest.

With such thoughts as these did the hours pass under the half-grown moon in the dark February evening. To the outward eye the figure walking to and fro might have appeared a solitary one. Yet it was accompanied by an interesting and happy crowd of people—interesting because thought alone was the reason of their appearance, and happy because with the creatures of imagination one has at least power to blot out all that belongs to the region of despair and unhappiness.

P.

FICTION

The Memories of Ronald Love. By MARY E. MANN. (Methuen, 6s.)

MRS. MANN tells the story of a child's life some sixty years ago. She brings passionate sympathy, bitter indignation and an unforgiving attitude to the narrative of the unhappy far-off things of Ronald's childhood, and stimulates the reader to fresh interest in a rather threadbare subject. There is skill and tenderness, too, in the handling of delicate scenes, and at least one subtly drawn character in Eleanor, Ronald's unexpected friend. Before Ronald is plunged into the horrors of Mrs. Priestley's "Academy for Young Gentlemen," he recalls the first delightful days in the little cottage with his lovely laughing mother—a mother who takes life as it comes without troubling her pretty head about morals or manners—and "Doctor" who is her constant visitor. Then suddenly the tempest of "Doctor's" wrath sweeps the irresponsible Nancie into an undesired marriage, and Ronald into the genteel boarding-school about which the author has much to say. She grows eloquent over the miseries, petty tyranny, and cruel discipline of Miss Pergaman, the undermistress, a terrible Christian person, of vicious instincts. All this is in accordance with tradition, and is convincing enough; but Mrs. Mann must not ask us to believe that her Miss Pergaman possessed one single charm that could beguile Mr. Priestly or any other old gentleman, into the path of dalliance.

Human Toll. By BARBARA BAYNTON. (Duckworth, 6s.)

COURAGE and perseverance are demanded of those who would read this tale of Australian bush life to the end. The dialects of blacks, half-castes, bushmen and German settlers constantly baffle and irritate the reader: only the closest attention makes it possible to keep in touch with the drift of the story, or to understand what many of the characters say and do. The plot is ill constructed, there is no charm of style to compensate for the want of restraint in the description of ugly scenes. Boshy's love and care of Lovey, the orphan daughter of his "boss", are the only pleasant episodes in a narrative dealing with a degenerate and uncivilised class of people whose manners, language, and ideas, are invariably unattractive, and often repugnant.

The Spanish Necklace. B. M. CROKER. (Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.)

THE publishers are to be congratulated on their enterprise in giving us three hundred and forty-eight pages of fiction illustrated, neatly bound and well printed for the modest price of half a crown and we have little doubt that the book will be as popular as is the price. When we get so much for our money it is perhaps hypercritical to cavil at the quality of the tale before us. Still, we must confess to a certain weariness in toiling through chapter after chapter unlit by a flash of humour, originality or insight, where the characters appear to have walked out of a Drury Lane melodrama, and the local colour smacks of Baedeker. The plot is, however, sufficiently well worked out, there is plenty of incident, and the fortunes of the miser's daughter and the handsome Spanish marquis will no doubt be followed with zest by innumerable readers in second-class suburban railway carriages and in the servants' hall.

The Colonel of the Red Huzzars. By JOHN REED SCOTT. (E. Grant Richards, 6s.)

Two fictitious kingdoms on the Continent, an American soldier who is the descendant and image of a king of one of them, a present king who adopts him as heir as soon as he sees him, and gives him his daughter with almost hysterical willingness; a villain who is naturally annoyed by the American, since he was on his way to the throne and the heroine until the interloper arrived; a masquerade; a secret gallery; a knife; a coat of mail; a duel between the two best fencers in Europe; and so forth—the ingredients are not new. Criticism is silenced by the fact that we do not know how things are done in Valeria. The story is impossible but more readable than most, and it is well printed and illustrated, full of bright dialogue, and has for heroine the most outrageous flirt since Rosalind.

The Duchess of Pontifex Square. By G.W. APPLETON. (Long, 6s.)

THE lady thus oddly named resided in a southern suburb of London, in which district also was placed the dispensary of Dr. Perigord. The physician is called upon to attend the noble duchess, and the startling and mysterious circumstances which arise from his visit make up a tale which Mr. Appleton tells with imagination, vivacity, and not a little insight into human nature. His book is a very good example of the sensational novel, and the author may be commended for his delineations of the minor characters, particularly the various members of the family which let lodgings in Pontifex Square.

The Penniless Millionaire. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY. (Long, 6s.)

SENSATIONAL melodrama of the recognised type, written with the facility we expect in this author, from whom we hoped for something more novel in plot and characterisation and less conventional in the dénouement. "The Penniless Millionaire" is far from being the worst of Mr. Murray's books that we have read, and it will please readers who like this class of fiction.

DRAMA

"ADRIENNE LECOUVREUR" AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

MADAME JANE HADING has been paying a visit to the New Royalty Theatre this week, appearing in various parts from her repertory. None of these is more famous than that of Adrienne Lecouvreur, which she played on Monday evening. The play has a history of great interest. MM. Scribe and Legouvé wrote it specially for Rachel in 1849; but so great was her predilection for the classical drama that it was some time before she would undertake the part. Finally, however, she consented; it became a favourite in her repertory; and in it she made her last appearance on the stage. The actress was herself a death-stricken woman when she played the great death-scene of Adrienne at the end of the fifth act. This was at Charlottown on December 17, 1856. There have been two English adaptations; one—The Reigning Favourite—made by Mr. Oxenford soon after the success of the original; the other made for a famous Polish actress, Madame Modjeska. She appeared in the part at the Court Theatre in 1880, supported by an English company, amongst whom was Mr. Forbes Robertson in the part of Maurice, Comte de Saxe.

The play is old-fashioned romantic melodrama: that is to say, it is a play of situations, up to which the authors work through acts of intrigue and improbability, regardless of everything so long as the essential moment is sufficiently intense. To modern ideas the technique is elaborately cumbersome. The main issue of Adrienne Lecouvreur, setting aside the innumerable plots and counterplots, which lend piquancy to the situation, is simple enough. Maurice, Comte de Saxe, is loved by two women, the Princesse de Bouillon and the great actress, Adrienne. He rejects the Princess whom he has once loved; that was a mistake. He really loves Adrienne. The Princess discovers this and, though Adrienne has rescued her from a terrible exposure, she kills Adrienne by sending her a bouquet of poisoned flowers. The great moments, to which all else is sacrificed, are three in number: the scene in the dark room where the Princess is rescued and recognises her rescuer by the sound of her voice; the scene in the fourth act where Adrienne, thinking that Maurice has played her false, conveys insult to the Princess by her recitation of Phèdre in the Princess's own drawing-room; and the final scene in which, just as she is dying from the effects of the poisoned bouquet, she discovers that Maurice is true to her and dies in his arms. It is a part written for a great emotional actress, who must by the sheer force of her personality drive away that imp of incredulity and create the conviction that the unreal, impossible situations are both natural and possible.

And this Madame Jane Hading is still able to do. Time throws no darts at her. Her voice on Monday sounded as fresh and as haunting in its beauty as ever. She did not seem to tire. Her gestures were always expressive and finished: at the beginning of a scene they are slow, and impressive by their slowness, and gradually they become swift and impassioned. Always she holds you by the magnetism of her voice and personality. M. Arnaud played Maurice, Comte de Saxe, with magnificent spirit. He looked pre-eminently the hero; not a trace of vulgarity appeared in his performance, and vulgarity easily creeps into the portrayal of the irresistible cavalier. He was always finely distinguished. Mlle. Marcille again showed her great skill in her playing of the Princess; and M. Dutertre put the right touch of pathos and charm into the character of the old régisseur Michonet, Adrienne's staunch admirer. The whole performance went with the dash which is proper to such a play, in spite of the fact that there were one or two hitches in the stage-management. They were noticeable because hitches at these French plays occur seldom considering the number and variety produced.

H. DE S.

FINE ART

FRENCH DRAWINGS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

THE carefully selected series of drawings by modern French masters on exhibition at Messrs. Obach's galleries in New Bond Street affords a welcome opportunity to study the different methods of approaching nature employed by that famous group of landscape painters loosely classified as the Barbizon School. To frequenters of Bond Street exhibitions no works are more familiar than the pictures of these masters, but with their drawings the London public is less well acquainted; and since the individuality of a painter stands more clearly revealed in his sketches and studies than in his "finished" works, the present collection has a real educational value, emphasising those differences of outlook and technique between the Barbizon painters which are often obscured in their oil paintings. No great insight is needed to draw a distinction between the three great masters of the group, Corot the mystic, Rousseau the realist, and Millet the humanist, even in the oil paintings, but the personalities of the lesser luminaries are not so sharply defined, and a superficial resemblance in subject, colour or tone may blind the unwary student to the fundamental divergence between the art, for example, of Troyon and Jacques, of Harpignies and Daubigny.

In many respects Daubigny is the best represented of all at Messrs. Obach's, and his drawings show a width of range and catholicity of interests hardly to be inferred from his better known pictures. Few, we imagine, would at first sight identify with Daubigny the masterly Construction of the Victoria Embankment, 1866, in which the painter has anticipated Mr. Muirhead Bone's gift of snatching a beautiful design from the temporary chaos of the contractor; or the minutely drawn Interior, worthy of a little master of the Netherlands. More characteristic of the Daubigny we know in paint are The Bend of the River and Landscape with Trees, St. Denis, the last a pen-and-ink-drawing, heightened by a few touches of red chalk, and remarkable for the detailed and intensely sought-out drawing of the trees. The eight drawings by Rousseau are less sensational than the Daubignys, if no whit less instructive, and surprise by their very quietness, a quality rarely associated with this tempestuous wooer of nature. Yet how eloquent they are of the grim, determined manner in which the man went about his work, patiently surveying the battle-ground before bringing on the main engagement! Scarcely more than skirmishes with nature, these preliminary studies might be called, and if they seem to lack the passion and dramatic intensity of his more abandoned brush-work, the explanation must be that the crisis has not yet been reached. He is working up to it, either by an attack in outline, as in In Auvergne, the pictorial shorthand of which must not be regarded as a sign of haste but of purposeful economy, or by a closer engagement, as in The Oak Tree near the High Road, perhaps the most important, as it is the most characteristic, of the series, where a fragment of nature has been captured and imprisoned by the painter in his carefully and beautifully balanced design.

The exhibition of the Staats Forbes Collection has familiarised us with the drawings of Jean François Millet and two of the drawings at Obach's, Reaping and Sheep-shearing, are tolerably well known. If these impressive designs reveal the classicism which underlay the realism of Millet, his romanticism and intense feeling for the poetry of nature is equally well represented by his more exquisite, more moving, landscape study, The Copse, Evening. Of the Corots the Landscape with overhanging Tree is a beautiful variation of a favourite theme, which, though often repeated, never wearies, while the earlier View of an Italian Town has the schoolgirlish charm of the master in his most demure moments. Of the two cattle painters, Jacques is decidedly the better represented, his Shepherd and Flock on a Hill being a rhythmical composition of great tenderness, while his Fowls is a tour de force in its masterly and spontaneous interpretation of light and colour in black and white. The Troyons are far from insignificant; but the beach scenes, On the Coast and On the Dunes, are chiefly interesting as excursions into a field which was subsequently to be more fully reaped by Boudin, whose mastery of sea and sky is also foreshadowed by Isabey's On the Coast. Less famous than these, Antoine Vollon (1833-1900) deserves fully his representation here, and while his Poplars shows him treading humbly but honestly in the footsteps of Corot, in the tender interpretation of a Dutch Landscape with Windmill at twilight he leads the way for J. Maris.

If the Barbizon group preponderate in this exhibition, it is not confined to their work but includes some notable drawings by Decamps, Delacroix, Fantin, Fromentin and Herbert. The Hamlet and Polonius of Delacroix is well known by the reversed lithograph, and if not quite satisfactory as a Shakespearean illustration is, nevertheless, master's work in its tremendous power. This forcefulness of draughtsmanship, a draughtsmanship masterly but the reverse of academic, is again displayed in the wonderful pen-and-ink sketch of an Arabian Cavalier, the life and movement of the horse and the modelling of its rounded flanks being vigorously expressed by a summary and seemingly slapdash notation of lights and shadows. It is interesting and instructive to compare with this the exquisitely refined Study of a Horse by Eugène Fromentin, the peerless painter of Algeria and father of modern art criticism. Perfect in its own way as a rendering of form by delicate line, it cannot compare with the Delacroix as an interpretation of life revealed by light.

MUSIC

Musical Genius and Religion. By ROBERT TURNBULL. (Wellwood, 3s. 6d.)

The Ethics of Wagner's The Ring of the Nibelungen. By MARY E. LEWIS. (Putnam, 6s.)

THESE two short books touch on the fringe of a great subject, and one which has been a problem ever since music under the captaincy of Monteverde and his companions revolted from the rule of the Church and ceased to be "the handmaid of religion." It is perhaps characteristic of modern literature that the smaller volume of the two, that which is placed first above, attempts to deal with a wider view of the subject than does the larger volume by Mary E. Lewis. Yet it is comforting to find upon further perusal that Mr. Turnbull makes no attempt to settle in his one hundred odd duodecimo pages the true relation between music and religion; instead, he takes seven among the great composers and examines in a short essay devoted to each their attitude towards the religious aspect of one masterpiece. He chooses Bach and his "St. Matthew Passion," Handel and his "Messiah," Haydn and his "Creation," Mozart and his "Requiem," Beethoven and his "Messe Solennelle," Mendelssohn and his "Elijah," and lastly, in two chapters rather longer than the former ones, Wagner and his Music-dramas. Although these sketches are slender, and one scarcely needs to be told that they were originally a series of magazine articles, on the whole they are not insignificant. They succeed in giving a suggestive picture of the simple, unquestioning piety of Bach, of the religion of Handel bound up with a strong and perfectly genuine sense of effect, of the childlike minds of Mozart and Haydn, of the fierce strivings for truth which possessed Beethoven. Mendelssohn is shown as the perfect gentleman, using the word honestly not sarcastically, and Wagner as the conscious, perhaps self-conscious, preacher of a personally devised creed.

It is with this last, and with only a portion of his work, that the author of "The Ethics of Wagner's 'The Ring of the Nibelungen'" deals. Her method is to recount every detail of the legend from which the Trilogy is compiled and to assign to each one a definite place in an ethical system, which she conceives to have been in Wagner's mind. It is identical with the methods of those interpreters of the Bible who have for every circumstance of a parable a spiritual significance; but it has more justification as applied to Wagner's work, since the evidence of his prose writings shows that he himself worked largely on this system of literal rather than poetic or parabolic interpretation. The writer recapitulates a great deal which Wagner stated to belong to his philosophy, adds a good deal more which may be safely deduced from Wagner's written statement and the subject-matter of The Ring, and still more which he might have thought and which makes the allegory more complete. Of course there are certain difficulties to be met before the story can be made to fit perfectly to the ethical system in every detail. Such a one appears when we are told that "Fasolt and Fafnir embody respectively two evil qualities—desire and greed—but they are represented as honest, and willing to give honest service, expecting . . . a just reward." This may be true, but why are these poor giants then represented as on an infinitely lower plane than Wotan, who in the same act of the Rheingold exemplifies desire and greed coupled with flagrant dishonesty? Fortunately, it is as impossible as it would be inadvisable to open here a discussion of the truth or falsity of Wagner's ethical position in The Ring, as expounded by either himself or his sympathetic critics; we can only note that the author of this book has done her work carefully, so carefully indeed that every detail is weighed and appraised at a certain value, while in order to facilitate the analytical process the story of the drama is told in short, bald sentences, often resembling a newspaper report of a parliamentary debate or proceedings in the law courts. In short the ancient Saga is robbed of the last shreds of mystery which still hung about it, robbed of its new heritage of musical illustration, which Wagner bestowed upon it as compensation for the violence that he did to it in bringing it to the garish glitter of the footlights, robbed of all poetry and beauty, until it becomes just a string of foolish fancies which symbolise certain facts.

Casting a glance back upon the subject-matter of these two volumes, apart from their actual contents, it is impossible to pass over the fact that of the seven composers whom Mr. Turnbull cites, the attitude of the first six towards their art and religion has something in common which is opposed to that of Wagner, and which is quite independent of the fact that their religion differed from his. In Wagner we see the preacher of verbal and literal inspiration; every feature of his drama, every note of his music, ministers to his system of life, call it ethical or religious as you will. He insisted that that system interpreted by himself must be accepted as implicitly by those who would accept his art, as the Catholic Church demands conformity from her children. The earlier composers, by taking the shell of religion as commonly accepted for granted, could pass by that hard, unpliant material of ethical precept or religious dogma, which obstinately refuses to coalesce with an artistic structure, and could live in that realm of spirit of which art and religion are twin expressions. Even Beethoven, no orthodox Churchman, but an acute and revolutionary thinker, had no need to tell us by footnotes or written explanations how he accepted "Credo" and "Agnus Dei." He, with all the great artists of the world, recognised that the highest and best can only be spoken in parables; that words which for over a thousand years had been the expression of the highest aspirations of countless thousands of human beings must, in spite of all ecclesiastical appropriation of them, be well nigh universal in their application, and so a symbol with which his music could be linked without hampering it with fetters and chains. The problems of the relation of art and religion, with the battle-cries of both sides, sink into insignificance before such achievements as the "St. Matthew Passion," the Requiem of Mozart, and the Mass in D, while they leap up and are argued with strident voices over the works of Wagner and his followers, amongst whom, in this respect, must be named almost every modern composer. Who dare speak in parables to-day, but he hastens to explain himself overleaf, fearful lest he has laid himself open to misrepresentation? On every side composers insist upon a narrow and definitive interpretation of their works, enclosing the limitless language of music while they think to expand its power. Music based upon such principles cannot long outlive the age which thinks and feels alike with the composer who produced it; while that music which transcends words, or is joined only to such words as in lofty poetry or by long association with the best thoughts of men themselves, speak in parable of things which cannot be uttered, lives ever as a witness to the common aspirations of mankind, and is unshaken by changes of manner and of thought.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE first volume in Messrs. Longmans, Green, and Company's Pocket Library (R. L. Stevenson's "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde") has been so popular that other volumes will be issued shortly. This month an edition will be published in this form of Richard Jefferies's "Story of My Heart," and in March R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verse," and the text of Mr. Mackail's "Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology," will be issued. These will be followed in April by Mr. Andrew Lang's "Letters to Dead Authors." Other volumes will be added to the Pocket Library in due course.

Messrs. Duckworth's list of new books includes "Roman Art, from Augustus to Constantine," by Mrs. Arthur Strong; "Rembrandt," by Professor Baldwin Brown, and "Sir William Beechey," by W. Roberts (all in the well-known "Red" series); "The Interpretation of Nature in Earlier Greek Art," by Emanuel Löwy, translated by John Fothergill; "The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood," by Ford Madox Hueffer (in the Popular Library of Art); and "The Pilgrim's Staff," an Anthology, by Fitzroy Carrington.

The next volume of the Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry will be "Selections from Dr. Johnson's 'Rambler,'" edited, with preface and notes, by W. Hale White. It is explained that the object is not so much to give specimens of felicitous expression as to show what Johnson thought. The editor says that there is much in Johnson which is not revealed in his conversation, and that he is but partially understood by those who know him only through Boswell.

Another volume of Jowett's Essays—dissertations turning principally on his method of interpreting Scripture—with an introduction by Professor Lewis Campbell, is also about to be issued in the Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry. The essays selected include those on the interpretation of Scripture (published in "Essays and Reviews"), the abstract ideas of the New Testament, the Old Testament, and contrasts of prophecy, and the sermon on Richard Baxter is appended.

Mr. Edward Arnold expects to have ready on February 25, a noteworthy contribution to the study of Thucydides in the shape of "Thucydides Mythistoricus," by F. M. Cornford, Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Mr. Murray will publish next week a new novel by Mr. J. S. Fletcher entitled "Daniel Quayue." It is a tale of country life "charged with passion and tragedy," and "gives opportunity for some clever sketches of character."

The ecclesiastical changes of late years have brought about the gradual extinction of the Parish Clerk. The memories of his quaintness, his humour, his originality and strange manners, are fast passing away. The Rev. P. H. Ditchfield has written a book entitled "The Old Parish Clerk" (Methuen), and in it there are numerous stories concerning a race of men who did good service in their generation and had a high estimation of the dignity of their office. Descriptions of old-time services and of the eccentricities of both clergy and clerks, the biographies of worthies of the profession, and chapters on the history of the office, their guilds and miracle plays, will appeal to all lovers of old English country life, and render the book valuable as a permanent record of a phase of ecclesiastical manners which has passed away.

Mr. John Lane will publish on February 26, "Women of the Second Empire" Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III., by Frédéric Loliée, translated by Alice Ivimy. "Beautiful women are necessary to a Court," writes the author of this book in his preface. If this be so, never was a Court so well supplied with necessities as that of Napoleon III. In the drama of the Second Empire women played a prominent part, and what they lacked in native worth and morals was made up for by imposing titles, personal beauty, and gorgeous draperies. There was no monotony where these brilliant stars were collected, and a chronicler of the period has ample material at his disposal. A feature of this volume is the illustrations, of which there are no less than fifty-one.

Mr. Edward Stanford announces for early publication a new work on Australia and New Zealand, forming vol. i. of "Australasia" in Stanford's "Compendium of Geography and Travel." The volume is by Dr. J. W. Gregory, of Glasgow University, whose work in connection with our Australasian colonies is well known. It will be provided with numerous illustrations, diagrams, and maps.

"The Women Artists of Bologna," by Mrs. Lonsdale Ragg, deals with the four chief women artists of that city of famous women. The author has been able, by patient research, to utter occasionally a fresh word on the artistic productions of these ladies, but more valuable still is the light thrown on the environment in which they moved. The book will contain twenty illustrations. Messrs. Methuen are the publishers.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton announce the immediate publication of a work on Arctic exploration entitled, "Fighting the Polar Ice" by Anthony Fiala. It is the record of two years spent above the eighty-first parallel by the second Ziegler Polar Expedition, and gives (the publishers inform us) the reader a real conception of what an Arctic explorer's life means and what the conditions are which he has to overcome.

Messrs. Hurst and Blackett have in the press for issue this month a new Anglo-American and Russian romance entitled "A Rock in the Baltic," by Mr. Robert Barr. The same publishers will shortly issue a new book by Philip L. Stevenson entitled "A Gallant of Gascony," in which the romantic life of Marguerite de Valois is believed to be dealt with for the first time in a novel.

CORRESPONDENCE

HENRY FIELDING'S LIBRARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the suggestive article in your last issue on "Henry Fielding's Library," the writer says: "If he [Fielding] ever owned any valuable books it is not likely they remained in his possession long." This is no doubt in accordance with the traditional estimate of Fielding's character: but, as I discovered when editing "The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon" in 1892 for the Chiswick Press, it is not in accordance with fact. Fielding died possessed of a considerable collection of books. It numbered six hundred and fifty three lots; and was sold by auction in February 1755, "for the benefit of his wife and family," by Samuel Baker, of York Street, Covent Garden, realising three hundred and sixty-four pounds odd, or about one hundred pounds more than the public were willing to give in 1785 for the books of Johnson. I wrote an account of it in "Bibliographica," vol. i, 1895, which is reprinted in the Third Series of my "Eighteenth Century Vignettes," 1896, pp. 164-178.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

February 18.

SHELLEY AS A PROOF READER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Stephen Haswell's remedy for the passage in Shelley to which Mr. Andrew Lang has directed notice is at any rate bold. But I am not sure that he can claim to have removed all defects of syntax. How does "O love" come into the construction? His parallel for the use of "one clear star" is interesting, but not surely quite in point: Shelley must intend the "one" to emphasise the idea of "only" two lines before. This is borne out by the fact that in "Adonais" liv. a thought occurs that is very similar to that in our passage. The lines are:

That light whose smile kindles the Universe,
That Beauty in which all things work and move,
That Benediction . . . that sustaining Love . . .
now beams on me.

This parallel, and the fact that Mr. Haswell's suggestion would logically mean that all the other errata in Shelley's list ought to be read in the same reverse way (a view it is safe to say that can hardly be upheld), lead me to an alternative remedy. Mr. Haswell seems to have taken Mr. Lang's word for it that "then only can" is impossible. If we alight on the other side of the brink, and say that it is possible, there is absolutely no perplexity. That this is right is easy to show. It can be left to philologists to state the historical justification for the fact (the second person ending, I understand, ought not to be -st but -t): but Shelley's own practice is past question.

In the Dedication to this very "Revolt of Islam," stanza vii., we have:

Thou Friend . . .
How beautiful and calm and free thou wert
In thy young wisdom, when the mortal chain
Of Custom thou didst burst and rend in twain,
And walked . . .

and in Canto v. stanza xi.:

And thou, dread Nature, which to every deed
And all that lives, or is, to be hath given . . .

T. NICKLIN.

February 13.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is a real pleasure to read anything from the pen of Mr. Lang, but in this instance I am at variance with him. I refrained from writing, as I felt sure some one abler than myself would write on the subject, but as Mr. Haswell has gone much on the same lines as Mr. Lang, I venture to send you my opinion, and will be as brief as possible.

I emphatically doubt and mistrust the authenticity of the errata. I think the stanza as given by Mr. Lang and from the first edition is what Shelley wrote and intended to stand. Accepting the word "can" not only as a bad rhyme for men (Mr. Rossetti's "man" is intolerable), but as the best he could use in place of the correct "canst" (Shelley was a poet first and a grammarian afterwards), I ask, "What is there to cavil at?" and myself answer, "Nothing."

"Art as the calm," etc. (and also Art, the essence or embodiment of) "Justice, or Truth, or Joy." The word "or" being used—as all true poets would use it—in place of "and." Thus preserving the singular, which I am firmly convinced Shelley intended, we are correctly led on to that grand line:

"Guide us, as one clear star the seaman saves."

The faults of the last line are too obvious to need attention being drawn to them.

FRANK RHODES.

February 16.

INSCRIPTIONS IN OLD BISCAYAN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for July 18, 1896, No. 1263, there appeared my copy of the oldest inscription in the dialect of the Provincia (formerly Señorio) de Biscaya. It may be interesting to some readers of this review to see the second and third in date among the hitherto discovered inscriptions in the Heuskara, or Baskish, of that region of Heuskal-herria or Baskland.

On October 11, 1905, I received a letter from Don Juan Carlos de Guerra, a Bask author and antiquary of Mondragón in Guipúscoa (formerly Ipúscoa), the smallest and most north-eastern of the Spanish provinces, telling me that he had discovered a never-published inscription at Amoroto, a small village on the top of a hill in the north-east of Biscaya, five kilometres from the sea-port of Lekeitio (which derives its name from the snow-fed river Lé, which means ice. Whether Lé in the Himalayas has the same meaning I know not). It exists on the front of the house numbered 3 in the Plaza de la Constitución, which belongs to Señor Ramón Urrutibeaskoa, and bears the name of Iturraran Bekoa. I read it thus on August 11, 1906:

eguiten badoc biara
jango doc oguia
esta obra hicieron
Santiago Ytura^a beiti y su hijo Juan de Bengo Olabar^a
AÑO 1784

The six Heuskarian words mean:

If thou (man) doest the duty (i.e., thy work)
thou shalt eat the (wheaten) bread.

It is to be observed that the r in the words biara, Yturraran, and Olabarria would be doubled in the modern orthography. On the contrary, in old Castilian the rr is common where a single r would be used now.

On the same day I discovered, about a mile from the village, on the picturesque vine-clad façade of an isolated farm-house (the name of which is now uncertain, as in the course of two hours I heard it variously pronounced Ibarreta, Idarreta, Igarreta, Irarreta), an inscription which Señor de Guerra well describes as the madre of the other. It runs as follows:

obra hav eguin eban Juane Coscarraza eta Yrarretacoc egviten badoc bierra [sic] jango doc ogia
año 1754

that is to say: Juan de Coscarraza é Yrarreta made this work (construction). If thou (man) doest the duty (i.e., thy work) thou shalt eat the (wheaten) bread. The inscription favours the name Yrarreta, and it will be observed that v is twice used instead of u, and that the latter letter is, correctly, not used in ogia, the g having the Latin value, the u in gui being silent. The dueño, or master, of this house is Señor Pedro Ikarran.

Don J. C. de Guerra remarks that wheaten bread was a great luxury in Biscaya in the eighteenth century, when the peasants lived on maiz, the Baskish name of which, arto, is one of a good many of their words (for instance, okella, the green wood-pecker, ὁ κελός, or bela, bele = black, μελαν and πελιών, and perhaps πελασγοί) which resemble Greek. In writing Baskish instead of Basque I am imitating Sir Thomas Browne, of Norwich, who was interested in that language.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

THE SPHINX

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent is not quite accurate in stating that Oscar Wilde's poem, "The Sphinx," was limited to twenty-five copies. An edition of two hundred copies was issued at 42s., with twenty-five on larger paper at 105s.

Perhaps the most remarkable thing about this remarkable poem (apart from its remarkable price) is the fact that it was written when the author was still a young man. The date usually assigned to it is about 1883, but I am inclined to think that portions of it, at least, were composed as early as 1878. The lines:

Some twenty summers cast their green for Autumn's gaudy liveries, while I have hardly seen are probably strictly autobiographical, and are repeated in "Ravenna," the Newdigate Prize Poem for 1878:

one who scarce has seen
Some twenty summers cast their doublets green,
For Autumn's livery.

I have recently been collating all Wilde's poems for a bibliography, and I find nearly a dozen passages in "Ravenna," taken from sonnets and other poems published before 1878, and not one instance of lines from "Ravenna" being used in poems admittedly of later date.

STUART MASON.

February 19.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As the Split Infinitive is at present being discussed in your columns allow me to draw attention to a short article on the subject contained in No. 9 (May 1882) of The American Journal of Philology, a periodical, I suspect, not too well known in this country. The author was the late Mr. Fitzedward Hall, whose knowledge of English idioms was probably unique, and who was a valued contributor to the N.E.D. The article is headed: "On the Separation, by a word or words, of To and the Infinitive Mood." Probably the term "split infinitive" was not invented when Mr. Hall wrote. He shows that the idiom is by means modern as is commonly supposed. He traces it back "as far as to Wyclif's coadjutors and first disciples, if not to Wyclif himself"; and among the names of authors who have made use of it he gives the following (besides others): Lord Berners, Tyndale, Dr. John Donne, Dr. Henry More, Sir Thomas Browne, Pepys, Richard Bentley, Defoe, Burke, Wilkes, Samuel Foote, Charles Dibdin, Madame D'Arblay ("no writer that I know of is so fond as Madame D'Arblay of the sort of disjunction for which she is here adduced"), Dr. Johnson, Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, De Quincey, Herbert Spencer, Matthew Arnold, Ruskin, Charles Reade, Leslie Stephen.

"The preceding array of citations and references," says Mr. Hall, "might be augmented by recourse to almost any chance number of almost any first-class English journal of the last fifteen or twenty years."

I myself have never seen good reason why a law, as of the Medes and Persians, should be laid down against the use of the split infinitive. Some of these infinitives may be uncalled for, clumsy, ugly, and so on, others need not be so. If the idiom tends to greater clearness and precision—as certainly it often does—why not make use of it? Each case should surely be considered on its merits—or demerits.

C. ANNANDALE.

February 19.

"A CORNISH IDYLL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is time that a protest was made against the use of misleading titles to novels. I procured a copy of "Kit's Woman: A Cornish Idyll" to present to a young friend with a taste for literature. Fortunately, before parting with the book I saw your review and at once read the story—to find that, instead of a quiet, simple narrative, set in language chosen for its charm and beauty, this so-called idyll was merely another phase of the "sex problem," not merely unsuitable to place in a girl's hands, but to my thinking positively pernicious. It is more than likely that others, like myself, may be entirely misled by the title, "A Cornish Idyll," and buy the book on the strength of the wrong impression produced by it. Is it not strange that so many women writers of the present day cannot refrain from dipping their pens in muddy ink, when so large a public awaits the publication of unaffected and pure writing?

Outside the annual crop of "girls' books" there are hardly any novels fit to be put in our daughters' hands, simply because a certain vogue for the "sex" novel has gained a footing, and our writers, like a flock of sheep, are rushing helter-skelter, one after the other, through the gap through which the leader scrambled. Like sheep, too, they leave a good deal of their clothing and decency behind them.

W. B. T.

BIOGRAPHY FOR THE MILLION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In fairness to the author of "St. Catherine of Siena and Her Times" I should like to ask the critic who reviewed this book in the ACADEMY for January 12 why he suppressed the quotation marks in which the author has, in her book, included the passage, on page 34, beginning; "How is it that thou considerest not thy duty?"

C. E. HUTCHINSON.

February 13.

[Our critic suppresses nothing. Mr. Hutchinson does not appear to understand that the small type in which the passages were printed render inverted commas superfluous.—Ed.]

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Allow me to say I find your critic mistaken in saying that "Via Infangato" cannot be translated "Muddy street." An Italian, which I am, and I imagine your critic is not, would know that the translation is correct. I should like to say this because the review of "St. Catherine of Siena" in a late number of your paper seems to me written with less courtesy and justice than we expect of English critics.

I hope you will in justice publish this letter.

V. P.

Rome, February 11.

[We are pleased, "in justice," to print our correspondent's letter. The fact that "V. P." is an Italian does not alter our contention.—Ed.]

AS CRITIC

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your current issue you have a great deal to say about Henry Fielding, the bicentenary of whose birth will occur on April 22 next. But do you not go a little too far when you state that Fielding "remains still the greatest of our English novelists?" He may have been, and undoubtedly was, the greatest English writer of fiction of the eighteenth century, but since then Scott, Thackeray, and Dickens have lived and died, all three of whom can lay claim to be considered quite as great in their particular line as Henry Fielding, if not even greater, especially the immortal Charles Dickens, to whom Fielding cannot, in my opinion, hold the candle.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

February 18.

FIXITY OF TENURE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is another side as to fixity of tenure which might be considered before it is finally decided that an assistant-master demanding it "should be ashamed of himself." First, the assistant-master is not merely a tool in the hands of the head-master. Next, if he were, it should be shown that the head-master is a sufficiently good workman to be able to judge of the efficiency of his "tools." "A bad workman blames his tools."

So many influences enter into the appointing of a man "who is responsible for the good teaching and general welfare of his school" that it must not be assumed that he himself is invariably competent and efficient. And, certainly, owing to the complex nature of the instruction given in schools, a man may be a capable scholar in one department and entirely unenlightened in another. Perhaps (it has been known) he is even proud of this. Is he still able to judge as to the value and efficiency of the work of his colleague in the field of which he is ignorant? It may be urged that he is; that he can tell by the results, the appreciation of his pupils, the popularity of his subject, or the atmosphere of his class-room; and tradition has it that head-masters have not infrequently shared this conviction. It is not, however, one to be acted upon in a profession.

Further, it is the case that the efficiency of his subordinates is sometimes impaired through the fault of the head-master. His arrangement of the curriculum, or of the time-table, or of promotions, or of classification, or of the various tests of progress—their name is Legion and they are called Examinations—may so work together for ill that the labours of an archangel would be stultified. It is often in this part of his responsibility that the competent head-master is to seek. Then, again, the methods of appointing a man "who is responsible for the good teaching and general welfare of his school," do not invariably ensure that the one selected is in any sense competent. Yet are we to understand that it is for the highest good of the community of which he is head that he shall be able to dismiss, without question, any of the assistant-masters or all of them? and that without any demur on the part of the colleague so dismissed?

The parallel of the house of business no more holds than does that of the military discipline of the Services in connection with the Church. The head of a business house is not appointed by a body of governors none of whom has any direct or personal share in the organisation which they control. In the case of a great firm we should never experience the ludicrous incongruity of a youth fresh from college put at the head of a body of highly specialised and in many cases experienced workers, with power given him to interfere with, and control in detail, the province of each. Nor is the "fixity of tenure" claimed anything so unreasonable as the right to retain a post in spite of any degree of unfitness. On the contrary: the teaching profession, as gladly as any other, would welcome a system which promised to "fire out the fools." But as members of a profession they rightly claim to be heard in their own defence when, through caprice or the mere exercise of "new-broom" energy, there is cast upon them the slur of dismissal. When a newly appointed head-master, before assuming his office, dismisses the whole or the major part of the staff of the school, it is time to reflect that no military or naval system, no sacerdotal system, no political system is, or could be, worked thus; and that the "usher" traditions of the school-master's profession should be banished in the interest, not only of himself, but of those whom he serves.

S. CUNNINGTON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

- Ségur, Marquis de. Julie de Lespinesse. Translated [from the French. 9x6. Pp. 403. Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.
Davis, J. R. Ainsworth. Thomas H. Huxley. 7½x5. Pp. 288. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.
[In the "English Men of Science" series.]

CLASSICS

- Way, Arthur S. Æschylus in English Verse. Part ii.—Pro-metheus Bound and The Suppliant Maidens. 7½x5½. Pp. 105. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net. (See p. 182.)

DRAMA

- Nicholson, Watson. The Struggle for a Free Stage in London. 7½x5½. Pp. 475. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

FICTION

- Thurston, E. Temple. The Evolution of Katherine. 7½x5. Pp. 352. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
Rickert, Edith. The Golden Hawk. 7½x5½. Pp. 307. Arnold, 6s.
Irving, George. For this Cause. 7½x5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.
Trail, Valentine. John Paxton, Gentleman. 7½x5. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.
Harris-Burland, J. B. The Gold Worshipers. 7½x5. Pp. 312. Greening, 6s.
Koebel, W. H. The Return of Joe, and other New Zealand stories 7½x5½. Pp. 323. Francis Griffiths, 6s.
[Seventeen short stories.]
Crockett, S. R. Little Esson. Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. 8x5½. Pp. 320. Ward, Lock, 6s.
Roberts, Morley. Painted Rock. 7½x5½. Pp. 274. Nash, 6s.
["Tales and narratives of Painted Rock, South Panhandle, Texas, told by Charlie Baker, late of that city, and also of Snyder, Scurry County."]
Eldridge, G. D. The Millbank Case. 7½x5. Pp. 297. Nash, 6s.
["A mystery of to-day."]
Crommelin, May. The House of Howe. 7½x5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
Diehl, Alice M. The End of a Passion. 7½x5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
Cleeve, Lucas. Her Father's Soul. 7½x5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.
Marsh, Richard. The Romance of a Maid of Honour. 7½x5½. Pp. 317. Long, 6s.
Barnett, Edith A. A Wilderness Winner. 7½x5½. Pp. 333. Methuen, 6s.
Deane, Mary. The Other Pawn. 7½x5½. Pp. 312. Methuen, 6s.

- What Might Have Been.* The Story of a Social War. 7½×5½. Pp. 380. Murray, 6s.
- Meadows, Alice Maud. A Million of Money. 7½×5½. Pp. 365. Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.
- Askew, Alice and Claud. The Love-Stone. 7½×5½. Pp. 250. Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.
- Gleig, Charles. The Nancy Manœuvres. 7½×5. Pp. 311. Brown, Langham, 6s.
- Ramsden, Lewis. Red Cavalier. 7½×5½. Pp. 328. Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.
- Byatt, Henry. The Flight of Icarus. 7½×5½. Pp. 247. Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.
- Murray, Kate. The Blue Star. 7½×5½. Pp. 364. E. Grant Richards, 6s.

HISTORY

- Hamilton, Lieut.-General Sir Ian. A Staff Officer's Scrap-Book during the Russo-Japanese War. With illustrations, maps, and plans. In 2 volumes—vol. ii. 9×6. Pp. 387. Arnold, 18s. net.
- Rodd, Sir Rennell. The Princes of Achaia and the Chronicles of Morea: a Study of Greece in the Middle Ages. With a map. 2 vols. 9×6. Pp. 635. Arnold, 25s. net.
- Paterson, W. Romaine. The Nemesis of Nations. Studies in History: the Ancient World. 8½×6½. Pp. 348. Dent, 10s. 6d. net.
- Peck, Harry Thurstan. Twenty Years of the Republic, 1885-1905. 8½×5½. Pp. 810. Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. ["The "republic is America."]

LITERATURE

- Strowski, Fortunat. Pascal et son Temps. 7½×4½. Pp. 286. Paris: Plon-Nourrit, n.p.
- Vaughan, Charles Edwyn. The Romantic Revolt. 7½×5½. Pp. 507. Blackwood, 5s. net.
- [Vol. x. of the "Periods of European Literature," edited by Professor Saintsbury. See p. 181.]
- A Summary of the Literatures of Modern Europe (England, France, Germany, Italy, Spain) from the origins to 1400.* Compiled and arranged by Marian Edwardes. 8½×6. Pp. 532. Dent, 7s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Fay, C. R. King's College, Cambridge. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. 7×4½. Pp. 128. Dent, 2s. net.
- [In "The College Monographs."]
- McGinley, A. A. The Profit of Love. With a preface by the Rev. George Tyrrell. 8½×5½. Pp. 291. Longmans, 5s. net.
- [Studies in altruism.]
- Putnam, George Haven. The Censorship of the Church of Rome, and its Influence upon the Production and Distribution of Literature. In 2 volumes—vol. i. 9½×6½. Pp. 375. Putnam's, 10s. 6d. net.
- [“A study of the History of the Prohibitory and Expurgatory Indexes, together with some consideration of the effects of Protestant censorship and of censorship by the State.”]
- The Newspaper Press Directory and Advertiser's Guide, 1907.* Sixty-second annual issue. 11×7½. Pp. 573. Mitchell, 2s.
- [Contains particulars of every newspaper, magazine, review and periodical published in the United Kingdom, a newspaper map of the United Kingdom, the Continental, American, Indian, and Colonial papers, and a directory of the "Class Papers and Periodicals."]
- Malcolm, Ian. Indian Pictures and Problems. With 50 illustrations. 9×6. Pp. 294. E. Grant Richards, 10s. 6d. net.
- [The majority of the chapters in this volume have appeared at different times in the Daily Mail and other papers.]

MUSIC.

- Turnbull, Robert. Musical Genius and Religion. 7×4½. Pp. 125. Wellwood, 3s. 6d. net. (See p. 193.)
- Lewis, Mary E. The Ethics of Wagner's The Ring of the Nibelungen. 7½×5½. Pp. 192. Putnam's, 6s. (See p. 193.)

POETRY

- Santayana, George. A Hermit of Carmel, and other poems. 7½×5. Pp. 234. Unwin, 3s. 6d.
- C. W. Verses. 6½×4½. Pp. 49. Nutt, 1s. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Newman, John Henry Cardinal. Apologia pro Vita Sua; being a History of his Religious Opinions. 6½×4. Pp. 445. Longmans, 2s. 6d. net.
- [In the "Pocket Library."]

- Beaumarchais, Caron de. Le Barbier de Séville et Le Mariage de Figaro. 6½×4½. Pp. 230. Dent, 1s. 6d. net.
- The Dramatic Works of Richard Brinsley Sheridan.* Introduction by Joseph Knight. Pp. 494; Scott's Lives of the Novelists. Introduction by Austin Dobson. Pp. 342; Wendell Holmes's The Poet at the Breakfast Table and The Professor at the Breakfast Table. Introductions by W. Robertson Nicoll. Pp. 309 and 273; Thackeray's Pendennis. Introduction by Edmund Gosse. 2 vols. Pp. 968. Each 6½×4. Frowde, 1s. net each.

[In the World's Classics.]

- Askew, Alice and Claude. The Shulamite. Revised edition, with 2 portraits. 7½×5½. Pp. 320. Unwin, 6s.
- Zola, Emile. Drink. Done into English by S. J. Adair FitzGerald. 7×4½. Pp. 435. Greening, 1s. 6d. net.
- [In the "Lotus Library."]
- Dumas, Alexandre. The Page of the Duke of Savoy (2 vols.); and Chevalier de Maison Rouge. Each 7½×5. Pp. 512. Dent, 2s. 6d. net each.

THEOLOGY

- Thomas, J. M. Lloyd. A Free Catholic Church. 7½×5. Pp. 117. Williams & Norgate, 1s. 6d. net.
- [One hundred and seventeen pages of text, plus sixty-two pages of advertisements.]

TOPOGRAPHY

- Cunnington, May; and Warner, Stephen A. Braintree and Bocking. With an introduction by Herbert J. Cunnington. 10½×7½. Pp. 55. Fairbairns, 3s. 6d. net.
- [“A pictorial account of two Essex townships.”]

THE BOOKSHELF

From Fiji to the Cannibal Islands. By Beatrice Grimshaw. (Eveleigh Nash, 12s. 6d. net.)—Miss Beatrice Grimshaw is known to us chiefly through her novel, "Broken Away." In her new book she sticks with commendable tenacity to facts; when her adventures appear to be commonplace she is satisfied that they should be so, and she does not attempt to heighten effects by recourse to fiction. The result is a "chatty" book written in a pleasant style, giving the author's experiences in a land which few women have visited. Miss Grimshaw went on horseback, with two native attendants on foot, through some unbeaten tracks in Fiji, and, making her headquarters in a mission station, explored, as far as it was possible to do with impunity, the new Hebrides, which bear an evil reputation for cannibalism. Here, and in Fiji, she took some very interesting photographs which alone make the book a valuable record, and her story, though written with praiseworthy modesty, inspires the reader with genuine admiration of her pluck. The book would have been greatly improved by the addition of a map.

Penrose's Pictorial Annual for 1906-7. Edited by William Gamble. (Penrose, 5s.)—The twelfth issue of the Process Year-book should be assured of a welcome from those interested in colour-printing. As one turns over its pages one cannot fail to be impressed by the evidences they contain of the triumphs that are being won in this field. Viewed as an example of what can be achieved on the modern printing-machine, the book is instructive. In some of the illustrations, as for example, "A Cool Drink," the colouring is as nearly perfect as one can expect, and certainly the use of the Metzograph screen has added to the effect, blending principal colours and bringing out delicate details. As an example of three-colour work, "St. Lorenz on the Danube" is very fine; as also the pastel drawing by Lewis Baumer at p. 92. There is a faulty perspective in "S.S. Aragon," which goes far to spoil the picture. There are some fine half-tone blocks by Bramfit's process, and an excellent Head of a Woman in Chalk. A practical product, as far as time is concerned, is "The Toast," which gives the effect of pencil work very minutely. On the other hand some of the colour-work is very crude and could be much improved on the same blocks. "Doggie and I" would have been very good if the foliage had been blocked out. But here it is the limitations of the camera that tell. An unfortunate feature is that sections coming from different sources have not been trimmed alike and so give a patchwork appearance to the book. "A Vase of Langton Hall Porcelain" is a fairly good collotype. There is an interesting chapter on the Future of Colour-Photography and several able essays on blocks, their making and uses.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PROBLEMS and PRIZES For Literary Readers

SEE PAGE 6 OF THE

Westminster Gazette

EVERY SATURDAY

Offices: Tudor St., London, E.C.

NEW VOLUME OF

Dewnes' Art Library

Sir Edward Burne-Jones

(SECOND SERIES)

Containing 48 Full-Page Illustrations
With Photogravure Frontispiece of Vespertina Quies
Introduction by Arsène Alexandre

Other Volumes in this Popular Series are:

BOTTICELLI. By RICHARD DAVEY.
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. BALDRY.
CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir JAMES D. LINTON, R.I.
VELASQUEZ. By A. L. BALDRY.
GOZZOLI. By HUGH STOKES.
RAPHAEL. By EDGUMBE STALEY.
VAN DYCK. By HUGH STOKES.
G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. PANTINI.
TINTORETTO. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. ARTHUR BELL.
EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By MALCOLM BELL.
FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. KONODY.
BURNE-JONES. By MALCOLM BELL.
PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ARSÈNE ALEXANDRE.
ROSSETTI. By ERNEST RADFORD.
FRA ANGELICO. By EDGUMBE STALEY.
LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By HENRY MILES.
GIOVANNI BELLINI. By EVERARD MEYNELL.
THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. PHYTHIAN.
MICHAEL ANGELO. By Dr. G. GRONAU.
DE LA CROIX. By HENRI FRANTZ.
INGRES. By OCTAVE UZANNE.
CORREGGIO. By SELWYN BRINTON.

Quarter Vellum, 3s. 6d. net each; by post, 3s. 9d.

The National Gallery

THESE seven volumes are very similar to the popular Art Library, to which they form a companion series. They consist of 49 to 65 fine reproductions of important works, printed on superior plate paper. These are preceded by essays written by eminent authorities on the schools of painting represented. Complete catalogues of the works in the Galleries are included. Each book has a photogravure frontispiece. The bindings, in blue, gold, and warm grey, are uniform and charming.

3s. 6d. net each. by post, 3s. 10d.

THE DUTCH SCHOOL. By GUSTAVE GEFFROY.
THE FLEMISH SCHOOL. By FREDERICK WEDMORE.
THE EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.
THE LATER BRITISH SCHOOL. By R. DE LA SIZERANNE.
THE NORTH ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE CENTRAL ITALIAN SCHOOL. By Sir CHARLES HOLROYD.
THE FRENCH, GERMAN, AND SPANISH SCHOOLS. By WALTER BAYES.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

The best thing you can put into the cup for morning and evening meals. An invaluable liquid food in the form of a delicious beverage.

You can have nothing purer or more reliable than Cadbury's Cocoa. It is made amidst pure surroundings in the Garden Factory of Bournville.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1817

MARCH 2, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING, INDEXING, PROOF READING.—Lady (educated and experienced) undertakes all branches of above. Accuracy; promptitude. Highest testimonials. Terms on application.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 12s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. carefully and promptly typed, 8d. per 1000; with carbon copy, 1s. French and German translation undertaken.—Miss WORLEY, Stapleton, Culverley Road, Catford, S.E.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 5a Pall Mall East, S.W.—The 25th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN DAILY, 10-6.

Admission, 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GORREY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Obituary

FEBRUARY 21, at Park Lodge, Weston-super-Mare, HENRY GEORGE TOMKINS, late Vicar of Branscombe, sometime Rector of St. Paul's, Exeter, in his eighty-first year.

Books for Sale.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD Secondhand Copy of Knight's "Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser." 6 vols., 4to, cloth. Published at 45s., for 15s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Secondhand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

C LIMBS AND EXPLORATIONS in the CANADIAN ROCKIES, by Stutfield and Collie, with maps and illustrations, 8vo, cloth, new, published by Longmans, 1903; at 12s. 6d. net, for 5s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

EGAN (Pierce) Book of Sports, 1825
Sporting Anecdotes, 1804, 1825, or 1827
Any of his Works
Elements of Morality, 3 vols, 1791
Eliot (J.) Poems, 1658
Eliot (George) Scenes of Clerical Life, 2 vols, 1858, or either
Adam Bede, first edition, 3 vols, 1859
Romola, 3 vols, 1863
Agatha, 1869
Brother and Sister, by Marian Lewes, 1869
Elliott's History of India, 6 vols
Emerson (R. W.) Nature, Boston, 1836
Poems, 1847
Any first editions
Emma, 3 vols, 1816, or odd
Emaux de Petitot (Les), 1862
Empedocles on Etna and other Poems, by A., 1852
England's Parnassus, 1600
Englefield's Beauties Isle of Wight, large paper, folio, 1816
English Lakes, 48 coloured plates, imp. 4to, Ackermann, 1821
English Pilot, fourth book, large folio, 1761
Rothen, or Traces of Travel, 1844
Epipsychidion, Verses addressed to the Noble Lady Emilia V., 1821
Brasmas, Praise of Folie, Englished by Chaloner, sm. 4to, 1549 or 1569
Essay on the External Use of Water, 4to, 1752
Essays of Elia, 1823
Estienne (H.) Art of Devises, 4to, 1650

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.O.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

London: J. CLARKE & CO.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWBORN STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY OHRONIOLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullset Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No. 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER Proprietor.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER MARCH

- Reform of the House of Lords. By the Right Hon. the Earl of DUNRAVEN
- Universal Military Training as a Practicable Scheme. By the Right Hon. Lord HALIBURTON, G.C.B. (late Under-Secretary of State for War)
- The British Fleet and the Balance of Sea-Power. By ARCHIBALD S. HURD
- The Invasion Scare: a New View. By C. W. RADCLIFFE COOKE
- Conservative Opportunists and Imperial Democracy. By FABIAN WARE
- What shall we do with our Land? By the Lady SALTOUN
- The Birth-Rate and the Mother. By Mrs. ALFRED N. MACFADYEN
- English Oral Tradition. By the Rev. G. MONROE ROYCE
- Macbeth on the Stage. By WALTER HERRIES POLLOCK
- The New Situation in Germany. By KARL BLIND
- Women and Politics: A Reply. By EVA GORE-BOOTH
- The Dance and the Plastic Arts in Ancient Greece. By MARCELLE AZRA HINCKS
- Education, Elementary and Secondary. By the late Sir MICHAEL FOSTER, K.C.B., F.R.S.
- The Irish Policy of the Government. By L. A. ATHERLEY JONES, K.C., M.P.
- The Church of England: a Plea for Reform. By the Earl of CARDIGAN, D.S.O.
- The King's Speech. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LTD., 5 NEW STREET SQUARE

A. CONAN DOYLE'S GREAT DETECTIVE STORIES

THE ADVENTURES OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.

With 25 Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 3s. 6d. By post, 3s. 10d.

ATHENÆUM.—"For those to whom the good, breathless, detective story is dear Dr. Doyle's book will prove a veritable godsend."

THE MEMOIRS OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 3s. 6d. By post, 3s. 10d.

LIVERPOOL MERCURY.—"Should become a favourite gift-book."

THE RETURN OF SHERLOCK HOLMES

6s. The Final Adventures of the Greatest Detective of Modern Fiction. Post free, 6s. 4d.

THE HOUND OF THE BASKERVILLES.

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 6s. By post, 6s. 4d.

SPEAKER.—"A singularly ingenious and entertaining story, in which the plot is handled with a skill that does not make comparison with Wilkie Collins ridiculous."

THE SIGN OF FOUR.

An Earlier Adventure of Sherlock Holmes. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. By post, 3s. 10d.

ADVENTURES OF GERARD.

With 16 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN. 6s. By post, 6s. 4d.

THE EXPLOITS OF BRIGADIER GERARD.

With 24 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN. 3s. 6d. By post, 3s. 10d.

DAILY NEWS.—"Buoyant, vital, steeped in the stir and freshness of the open air, abounding in tragedy and gaiety. . . . It is a fascinating book and one to be read."

LONDON: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S New and Recent Volumes of Verse.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

CHILDE ROLAND, and other Poems. By ALFRED HENRY HAYNES BELL.

"The echoes of much real poetry reverberate in Mr. Bell's pages."

EVENING STANDARD.

"The book is fresh both in feeling and language. It will be read with interest by lovers of poetry."—SCOTSMAN.

In royal 16mo, half-bound in vellum, price 2s. net.

SEVEN SONNETS. By A. JOSEPH DE PERQUES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, 4s. 6d.

A STORY OF UNREST. A Drama of Dreams. By B. BURFORD RAWLINGS.

"The most noticeable thing is the excellence of the blank verse. . . . The prologue from first to last is really a fine piece of work, stately, melodious, and finely descriptive. . . . It is not often in these days that we get blank verse of this grade."

WHITEHALL REVIEW.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. net.

THE TREASURE OF THE SEA. A Book of Verse. By STANLEY GERALD DUNN.

"Mr. Dunn's work has freshness and brightness. It contains much that is sincerely felt, and well worked out into capable and rhythmical verse."—DAILY NEWS.

"There is a great deal of poetical merit, and lovers of verse will find much to delight them in Mr. Dunn's pieces."—LAYMAN.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d.

MARIA CREATRIX, and other Poems. By H. PASSMORE, M.A., Author of "Leisureable Studies," "The Things Beyond the Tomb," "The Sacred Vestments," "The Signs of Spring," etc.

"They are lyrical as well as musical, and their quaint, mediæval charm is very attractive."—CHURCHMAN.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Crown 8vo, cloth, pp. viii + 114.

CORYDON:

AN ELEGY IN MEMORY OF MATTHEW ARNOLD AND OXFORD.

By REGINALD FANSHAWE.

Price 4s. 6d. net.

ATHENÆUM.—"Both the thought and its expression have a rare freshness and individuality. There is more fundamental brain-work in Mr. Fanshawe's 224 stanzas than in a score of volumes of current minor verse. The evolution of the intellectual life of Oxford during the last sixty years is traced with knowledge and insight, and there is some felicitous literary criticism by the way."

BOOKMAN.—"The marked features of Mr. Fanshawe's Elegy in memory of Matthew Arnold are its sustained dignity and restraint. His verse is never negligent, nor does his thought flag. When enthusiasm and emotion carry thought and heart away, as in the beautiful stanzas on Athens and Florence, those on Ruskin and Swinburne, the verse is full of poetry, lucidity, colour, and sound. . . . An Elegy full of beauty, and one long pæan of the ideal."

London: HENRY FROWDE,

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY.

The Life of WALTER PATER.

By THOMAS WRIGHT,

Author of "The Life of Edward FitzGerald," "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc. etc.

Two Vols. Demy 8vo, 24s. net. With 90 Plates.

LONDON: EVERETT & CO., 42 ESSEX STREET, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	203	A Literary Causerie:
Literature :		The Development of Mr. Henry
A Study of Mechanism	205	James	214
Man's High Destiny	206	Fiction	216
Notes on Sophocles	207	Fine Art :
A Fifteenth-Century Realist	208	Alexander Borissoff	217
A Caroline Minor Poet	209	Music :
The Desert and the Sown	210	Piano Recitals	217
Selections	211	Forthcoming Books	218
The Clash of Arms	212	Correspondence	220
The Library Table	213	Books Received	222

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s. Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THERE is a feature of the Book War which deserves much closer attention than has yet been given it. It is evident that most of the parties to the struggle are very well able to take care of themselves. The Times is a powerful paper, and it is avowedly fighting for its own revenue and other interests. So the publishers also are taking those steps which they think most likely to conduce to the prosperity of the trade in which they are engaged and in which their interests are, at least for the moment, identical with those of the retail booksellers. But the question we should like to ask is, how the proposed cheapening of books is going to affect the young author? Men who have made their mark and secured their reputation may for the moment be left out of account. Perhaps the change might be for their benefit. The publishers who are issuing the old six-shilling book at half a crown have to take measures for selling much larger editions than they sell at present or it would be impossible to maintain their profits.

It is evident that the new state of affairs would cause them to be very shy of giving a start to a beginner. Many promising books written by unknown authors have not exceeded, if they have reached, a sale of one thousand copies. When the price is six shillings this is by no means an unsatisfactory state of things. Suppose the author were getting a royalty of, say, sixpence a copy, he would have twenty-five pounds, and the profits of the publishers would be much larger. But if the custom were to prevail of issuing such books at half a crown the unfortunate youngster would probably have his royalty cut down to threepence—if he got one at all—and even then the publisher would have to be sure of selling two or three thousand before venturing to take the work. Thus the arrangement would act detrimentally to the interests of the beginner in literature. Yet it is of the very greatest importance to the community that he should have a fair field and no favour. We want the career to be open to those who have talent, not to be like kissing, that goes by favour.

Another case that demands attention is that of the fastidious writer who has a public ranging between three and six thousand, who does not write for the million and of whom the million is sublimely ignorant. This class of author, by keeping up the highest traditions of letters and giving the world his best without hope of any except a very modest reward, is much more worth cherishing than the blatant popular novelist who makes his appeal entirely to the gallery, and whose works, if they are not a curse to English literature, at least add nothing to its value. An arrangement that would add to the wealth of the unscrupulous quacks of literature and be hurtful to its most disinterested practitioners and would at the same time throw cold water on the aspirations of the newcomer, is not one to be cordially welcomed.

Mr. Hugh Johnson, a composer of great taste and vigour, has rendered into Greek in the same measure the exquisite Pervigilium Veneris. It is admirably done and shows an immense vocabulary. The refrain is the only line which seems inadequate. There is a simplicity in Cras amet qui nunquam amavit, quique amavit cras amet, which is not to be found in αἰσιον φίλῃς ἐρωτι κοῦρι φίλῃς φιλῶνται.

And the refrain is everything. "The refrain itself," writes Professor Mackail in his charming Latin Literature "has its internal recurrence. . . . As it comes over and over again it seems to set the whole poem swaying to its own music. . . . The first line perpetually repeating itself through the poem like a thread of gold in the pattern or a phrase in the music."

Mr. Johnson has used a poor text. Surely in v. 15 nodos feraces is much better than notos penates, 25, 26 ruborem pudebit solvere must be corrected with Baehrens to rudorem rubebit. In 48 florum restem "a daisy chain" is far prettier than florum vestem, and it has manuscript authority. Mr. Johnson frequently has a long syllable before the final cretic. This would, we suppose, be admissible in a poem of this character, but it mars the metre.

"H. L. N." sends us the following with reference to a letter printed in our issue of February 2 :

THE FOURPENNY BOX

I intended a Note
But they made it a Letter.
This is not what I wrote !
I intended a Note,
That the gossips might quote,
But the printers knew better.
I intended a Note,
But they made it a Letter.

We need hardly add that our printers were blameless—on this occasion.

In the Obituary of the week occurs the name of the well-known novelist Archibald Clavering Gunter, the author of "Mr. Barnes of New York." We remember the publication of this book and what great expectations were aroused by it: expectations that were not quite satisfied. Mr. Gunter forgot the art of the novelist in his assiduous search for mere effect and his later works were not equal to his first success. Something of Mr. Gunter's varied life was reflected in his novels. He was not a bookworm or a writer of the closet; but he came into direct contact with life in such positions as those of civil engineer, chemist, stockbroker and mining superintendent, and perhaps in a sense this lent more actuality to this work than there would otherwise have been. But the very activity of his mind must have been something of a barrier to its thoughtfulness and so he scarcely rose above the second rank of writers.

Our contemporary, the Westminster Gazette, in a note upon this subject, adduces many curious examples of occupations followed by some of the writers living at the moment. Of Mr. Morley Roberts, for instance, we hear that he has been a navvy, and tended cattle and sheep in Australia, that he has been a sailor on many an ocean tramp and laboured in Texas sawmills, on American railways and in the back-woods of Canada, that he has been an ill-paid clerk and a penniless tramp. Mr. Jack London has an even more interesting record. The list of his occupations includes that of gold-miner, tramp, lecturer, and fish-patrol man. Mr. Frank Bullen and Mr. Bart Kennedy are others who have toiled upwards by difficult and devious paths. These men have all lived novels whatever may be the success with which they have written them.

Our readers will be interested in the following rendering of one of the most beautiful of Matthew Arnold's poems by our accomplished contributor Professor Robert Yelverton Tyrrell. For their convenience we print the English as well as the Greek verses:

REQUIESCAT

Strew on her roses, roses,
And never a spray of yew.
In silence she reposes:
Ah! would that I did too!

Her mirth the world required:
She bath'd it in smiles of glee.
But her heart was tired, tired,
And now they let her be.

Her life was turning, turning,
In mazes of heat and sound;
But for peace her soul was yearning,
And now peace laps her round.

Her cabin'd, ample Spirit,
It flutter'd and fail'd for breath
To-night it doth inherit
The vasty Hall of Death.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

[HYPEN ΕΛΕΥΘΕΡΙΗΝ

Ζηνοφίλη ρόδ' ἐμῇ, ρόδ' ἐμῇ καταχεῖτε θανούση, μηδὲ λυγρὰν μήτις σμίλακ' ἐπιστορέση· πρῆν ἐν ἡρεμίᾳ εὐδὲ μάλα νήγρετον ὕπνον—εὐδὲ—κάμ' ὕπνος ὡς ὠφελετοῖος ἔχειν.

νάμασιν εὐφροσύνης ἐτάρους ὑπέβρεξε συνόντας, οἱ δὲ ζῆντ' ἀταλὰς ὅς ἔφερον χάριτας· ἀλλὰ κόπος κραδίην, κραδίην κόπος αἰὲν ἔτειρε·
νῦν δὲ πόνους κείται πάντας ἀπειπαμένη.

στρομβηδὸν δίνευε βίος, δίνευεν ἀπείροις ἐν δαΐδων αἰγλαῖς καὶ κιθαρῶν ἐνοκαῖς· ἡσυχίης δὲ τυχεῖν λίην ἐλιλαίετο θυμός, καὶ νῦν ἡσυχίη πάντοθεν ἡμφίασεν.

ἴσπερ ἐν ἐρκταῖς ἡσπαιρεν καὶ ἐποίπνυν ἐντὸς σκήνῃ κῆρ κλησθέν δαψιλὲς εἰν ὀλίγῳ·
νῦν δὲ Ζηνοφίλη νῦν εὐρέος ἔξοχα χώρου,
Περσεφόνης μεγάλων κληρονομεῖ θαλάμῳ.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

Carducci's death, following closely on that of his brother-professor, Graziadio Ascoli, of Milan, is another loss to Italy. These, d'Ancona, and Pasquale Villari (with Arturo Graf), were, or are, among the best of the intellectual and cultured advance-guard in their country. Carducci's "barbarous odes," Ascoli's old Irish—the "antique" bard, and the patient linguist—each represents what was best of its kind. The conferring on the former of the Nobel prize the other day caused an excitement among the Latin race, similar to that of Kipling's Anglo-Indian officer, freed, and recalled to life by the Queen's toast. This prize preceded closely his, Curie's and Moissan's deaths. Carducci was president of the "Pedants," the Florentine literary club of his youth, which edited Politian, and was trammelled by Romanticism. Hence his revolt to the classical camp, to the "antique"—even as Ronsard rebelled—to an Italian muse that spoke Greek and Latin. Patriotic, anti-monarchic, anti-clerical, Irredentist, he published his "Hymns of Satan." Even in 1890 he wrote on "War" an ode that passionately condemned the Pacifists. His pupil, Gabriel d'Annunzio, is his legitimate successor, as among his masters were Horace, Petrarch, and Ronsard.

We have nothing but praise for the industry with which Miss Marion Edwardes has used her spade in the compilation of "A Summary of the Literature of Modern Europe" (Dent); but we wish that her energy had found a more profitable vent. "To the wayfarer through an unfamiliar country there is no more welcome sight than a sign-post," she remarks in an introductory note; and she goes on to explain that her work "aims at nothing beyond fulfilling the office of a sign-post to the inexperienced traveller along the roads and by-ways of literature": it is to serve "as an outline on which to base a further study of the literatures dealt with." To us it appears to fall between two stools: it is not sufficiently interesting to be read for sake of the pleasure to be gained by reading it; and it is not sufficiently exhaustive to be of value as a work of reference.

Miss Edwardes, in a book of less than five hundred and fifty pages, has attempted to cover the literatures of England, France, Germany, Italy and Spain, from the origins to 1400 A.D. As an example of her method of dealing with the works which pass under review, we may take the following:

The House of Fame. Minor poem; 1383, 1384 (Koch). Unfinished (octosyllabic rhymed couplets). The poet is carried in a vision to the Temple of Venus; and thence by an eagle to the House of Fame; description of both places. Modelled on Dante's "Commedia" (Skeat), but see Lounsbury, "Studies in Chaucer, vol. ii. 237 ff. Sources: Ovid's "Metamorphoses"; reminiscences of other writers. Printed by Caxton (undated). Ed., T. R. Lounsbury, See A. C. Garret (on source of main framework, etc.), "Studies and Notes in Phil. and Lit.," v. 151 ff. MSS., Fairfax, 16; Bodley, 638; Magd. Coll. Camb. (Pepys).

"The poet is carried in a vision to the Temple of Venus, and thence by an Eagle to the House of Fame; description of both places." Shade of Baedeker! A love of literature cannot be aroused by this sort of thing.

Mr. F. A. Newdegate, D.L., of Arbury Park, Nuneaton, is showing a proper pride in the fact that George Eliot spent many of her early years on his ancestral estate where her father, brother and nephew served as land agent. He is going to erect a monument cut from stone quarried on the "Hollows Farm." It will be a pillar nine feet high, and will be placed in Arbury Park with a suitable inscription.

We have received a letter from Mr. Burdett Coutts in which he asks us to give some attention to a letter from him that appeared in the daily press a few days ago. It was to the effect that he is engaged in writing a life of the Baroness Burdett Coutts. He is not going to pay so much attention to the public aspect of her life, which has received adequate notice in the public press for many years past, as to that of which much remains to be told and more explained. Mr. Burdett Coutts laments that there is no one remaining, no Dickens or Disraeli who combining the finest literary art with long and intimate personal knowledge, could give an adequate character-study. He will therefore concentrate his attention on the facts of her life. He tells us that the house in Stratton Street is like a record office, stocked with papers and correspondence going back more than a hundred years. None of them ever passed outside its walls. It would be a very serious task to examine all these papers and Mr. Burdett Coutts requests that all those who happen to possess letters from the Baroness to them or their forbears should communicate with him.

"What I aspired to be, and was not, comforts me," sings Browning. We hope it will comfort Mr. Paul L. Falzon, the author of a little volume entitled "Love's Re-awakening and other Poems," from which we quote the following lines:

O to be a poet !
To find a grief in every joy,
For every pain a balm,
In everything a charm :—
Such is the poet's life ! . . .
O to be a poet !
To walk among the fairy flowers,
To see their dewy tears,
(They are such lovely dears!)—
Such is the poet's life ;

for we are afraid that the aspiration is not likely to be realised.

Mr. Falzon does not confine himself to one metre. Another poem contains a pathetic appeal :

O why
Can I
Not make thee feel,
My own,
And why
Can I
Not make thee reel
On hearing
The cadencing majestic beat,
So powerful and overbearing
Of poesy's most tender tone.
With angel's own high harmony replete !
I ask thee why :—
O, tell me why !

Candidly, we would rather not.

In an introduction which is prefixed to a volume of Matthew Arnold's Essays recently added to Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library," there is a paragraph in which England's obligations to the critic are summed up :

Our actual obligations to Matthew Arnold are almost beyond expression. His very faults reformed us. The chief of his services may perhaps be stated thus, that he discovered (for the modern English) the purely intellectual importance of humility. He had none of that hot humility which is the fascination of saints and good men. But he had a cold humility which he had discovered to be a mere essential of the intelligence. To see things clearly, he said, you must "get yourself out of the way." The weakness of pride lies after all in this; that oneself is a window. It can be a coloured window, if you will; but the more thickly you lay on the colours the less of a window it will be. The two things to be done with a window are to wash it and then forget it. So the truly pious have always said the two things to do personally are to cleanse and to forget oneself.

We agree with the sentiment; it is a little odd that it should be expressed by Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

In our last week's issue we stated that the majority of the chapters in Mr. Ian Malcolm's "Indian Pictures and Problems" had appeared previous to their publication in book form. The distinguished author writes to say that, as a matter of fact, about a fourth of the book only has been printed before in different periodicals.

LITERATURE

A STUDY OF MECHANISM

Running Water. By A. E. W. MASON. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.)

THE question that arises after reading Mr. Mason's new book is, why does not the author become a great writer? Here it would seem that all the elements that go to make a novelist of the highest rank were present, and yet the novel itself belongs to the hopeless second grade of literature. Mr. A. E. W. Mason has at least the element of style. He is a clear writer whose meaning cannot possibly be mistaken; he has sympathy, tenderness, enthusiasm, love of Nature, and all these find adequate expression. What is lacking in his style is, first of all, humour; second, individuality; and, third, playfulness, with all the ease and security that it implies. There is in this volume a good deal of this kind of statement, that two and two make four. It is not inelegant, and Mr. Mason is never obscure or diffuse. He says what he has to say briefly and pointedly, but we never feel that there is a personality looking out through his eyes. It would not be an exaggeration to say that he is invariably serious and in earnest. Never for a moment does he lose sight of the object that he has in view nor does he even appear to do so. Yet it is not on that ground that the title of a great writer must be refused to him. Mr. Mason is old-fashioned in his technique. It is the legitimate object of every novelist so to impress on the reader the world of his imagination that for the time being it is more real than reality itself. Probably there are many admirers of the novelist who will claim that he succeeds in doing this. He strikes a chord of interest in the first chapter, and the reader never loses touch with it until the end of the volume. That in itself is a great achievement. It may be readily admitted that no writer can be great who is not, in the first place, interesting. Then Mr. Mason is by no means deficient in invention. His characters in the book before us are both original and arresting. He has chosen for heroine an open-air girl, not one of those vulgar tomboys who, with hot, red faces, unkempt hair and masculine clothing, try to ape the ways of the other sex, but a girl who has a fine and pure delight in Nature and the open air. Indeed without any set description Mr. Mason has been successful in producing the impression of a girl of such absolute purity that she reminds us of such exquisite natural things as a half-opened rosebud at sunrise, a newly unfolded spring flower or that unsmirched sky that with its blue fields and heavy clouds lies over mountain and moorland far away from the contamination of smoke. And the characters by whom she is surrounded are without exception drawn in vivid and sure lines. The girl's father is a scoundrel of a unique type, an old Alpine guide who though fallen from the estate of integrity still retains within himself glimmerings of this finer intelligence that lighted up his mind when he was climbing the great mountains. With him are other scoundrels who never cease to be amusing. Beyond all that, Mr. Mason has been able to bring in with much effect the scenery and atmosphere of the Alps. In reading, one feels the snow and the pure cold air, one hears the roar of glacier and avalanche, one recognises the danger of the rock and the crevasse.

Willingly and gladly we concede all these merits to the author, yet we feel convinced that few readers of discrimination would feel impelled to read this volume a second time. It lacks vraisemblance, for as we have said, Mr. Mason while still comparatively young in his craft is nevertheless an old-fashioned novelist. That is to say, he is one who poses as omniscient. He knows the thoughts which cross the mind of the youthful virgin as she is courting slumber in the privacy of her own bedroom and records the conversations of men whose lives are one continuous secret, and openly lays bare the thoughts of all his characters. Now in the early days of the craft this was permissible. One reads Sir Walter Scott and does not feel that he was doing anything unusual when he explains the attitude of mind and the secret ideas of his favourite heroines but in all arts there is, or should be, an advance. Even the novelist cannot afford to sit still. It is demanded of him in these times that he should take more care about the illusion that he wishes to produce. His is a stage, but the spectators will soon grow weary if they see him continually collecting the stage furniture and knocking up the various scenes with a hammer and nails. Moreover, Mr. Mason has not exercised his power of invention or imagination in regard to the incidents in this novel. Where a number of characters are living altogether in a village or where they are united by the same profession, their biographies become naturally intertwined and the life of one is more or less the life of all the others. But Mr. Mason's world is very wide, and he has, as it were, to force a connection between Alpine climbers and millionaires, sharpers, money-lenders, and sinners of various other sorts. In a word, the long arm of coincidence has to be used much too freely. We feel that the narrative is at times very forced, and surely it is one test of a great novel that what the older critics call the fable flows on smoothly, uninterruptedly and naturally, like some clear brook that may at one moment dash foaming over a precipice and at another meander softly through green and daisy-clad meadows.

At times Mr. Mason approaches perilously near the absolutely sensational, as becomes evident from a mere glance at the opening chapters. There is something melodramatic in the suspicion with which Mrs. Thesiger watches her daughter Cynthia in the first chapter. In the third chapter we find a dead man in the mountains and Mr. Mason is unable to resist the fifth-rate writer's love of the horrible:

It was the face of Chayne's friend John Lattery; and in a way most grotesque and horrible it bobbed and nodded at him, as though the neck was broken and the man yet lived. When Francois just below cried, "Gently, gently," it seemed that the dead man's mouth was speaking.

Chayne uttered a cry; then a deathly sickness overcame him. He dropped the rope, staggered a little way off like a drunken man and sat down upon the ice with his head between his hands.

The card-sharpping business and the bloodthirsty crimes which Mr. Strood tries to carry out are also in some measure transpontine. One would not notice them as faults in the work of a novelist from whom writing of the highest kind was not expected. But they are blemishes in Mr. Mason, who has gone on improving step by step since he wrote his first novel. We hope he has not yet sat down with clasped hands in the belief that there are no more worlds to conquer. On the contrary, his art presents to him a wide range of possibilities. Indeed we cannot think that the novel of the future will not be a great advance on the novel of the past. It must be so life-like that he who reads it must accept it as an authentic document taken from life. Some hold that no kind of narrative except the personal will be permitted and that such shiftings of scene as we see in "Running Water" will be enough to damn a novel. We leave off one chapter in the middle of the Alps and the next scene opens in the London office of a money-lender. This is not the way of biography, which is the true model for all novels. Again in the novel of the future there will, we hope, be plenty of incident and movement, but it will arise as naturally from the nature of the characters as it would do in ordinary life and it is only in a crude style of art that these incidents will be given in their stark nakedness. The fastidious public will have a right to demand that, independent of the mere events, there will be something of pathos and humour, of laughter and tears in the method of describing them.

It may appear to be unreasonable to ask from an author what he does not make any pretence of offering, but on the other hand there would be little value in criticism if it did not dwell on the ideal. No one who has given attention to the matter at all would dispute the statement that of recent years the standard of the novelist has to some extent fallen from its high estate, and one cannot wonder at this because the temptations that beset the modern composer of fiction are so strong as to be almost irresistible. The largest public that buys books seems to pay no attention whatever to beauties either of style or of construction. It is a commonplace to say that the exquisite detail in which the masters of the craft delighted is never noticed in those novels that have the greatest vogue. All that can be done, then, is to try to remind the reader of those beauties which abound in great work, and while not ignoring the gift or talent of any writer, to keep on urging him forward. Were the writing and reading of imaginative literature to be regarded only as an amusement, these remarks would still not be uncalled for, but our idea of the functions and aims of literature is a much larger one.

MAN'S HIGH DESTINY

The Kingdom of Man. By E. RAY LANKESTER. (Constable, 3s. 6d.)

It appears to have been ordained from the first that man should employ his time and talent in searching out the mysteries of the Cosmos, in piecing together the riddle of Life: letting Knowledge grow from more to more.

But, in an evil moment, he was prevailed upon to take a short cut—to find the answer without the labour of hunting for it—and, accordingly, he took a bite of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, only to be blinded as a consequence by the vision which burst upon him of the stupendousness of his task: the hopelessness of victory. Dazed and overwhelmed by such an appalling discovery, his efforts have been, through all the ages till now, diffused, and half-hearted: or devoted to fanning the flames of open rebellion. Sedition-mongers have pronounced the splendid commission given to man a mockery: and have continued to win converts by insinuating, or openly protesting, that any attempt on man's part to understand his origin and his destiny was nothing less than rank impiety; knowing well the relief to the mentally weak, or slothful, that such arguments would bring, and that the majority would deliberately shirk the duty of consulting the original mandate: "Have dominion over the earth and subdue it."

From time to time, however, prophets have arisen among us, bidding us turn again into the narrow way, and adding to their oburgations promises of rewards to come. But they have done more than this, for they have worked miracles to convince unbelievers. They have healed the sick and the halt, and conquered space and time; yet the world looks coldly on their efforts and their work. And of no people is this more true than of the people of our own country. In spite of the missionary work of the men of our own day: Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and Pasteur—to mention but a few names—we still remain, as a nation, unconverted. They made it their business in life to preach the gospel of nature-knowledge: to draw their fellow men from the worthless cult of "ancient elegance and historic wisdom."

Among those who are still with us few, perhaps, have laboured more strenuously to force home the importance of this nature-knowledge to the well-being of the community, than Dr. Ray Lankester. Thrice within the last year or two he has made this theme the subject of a special discourse: while for years past he has striven to bring home to those upon whom responsibility rests, the place that science must take in our national life, if we are to hold our own in the struggle for existence. The three discourses to which we have referred have just been revised, and issued in the form of a small and fully illustrated volume, which must be read by all who would bid the recording Angel, "Write me as one who loves his fellow men!" Nero fiddled while Rome was burning, and Professor Lankester insists, and rightly, that those who govern us to-day, and those upon whom devolves the duty of training those who shall govern us to-morrow, are engaged in exercises no less fantastic. He has conjured up for us, in the three chapters of this book, a lurid picture of our position to-day; while, at the same time, he gives us a masterly exposition of what the new learning will do for us, both as regards our private and our public affairs. The latest discoveries in astronomy, physics, chemistry, and biology are here lucidly set forth; and in such a way that even the most sceptical must feel that we have too long neglected our duty in this matter. Nowhere else can there be found so luminous a summary of the rôle played by microscopic parasitic plants and animals in causing disease in man and the creatures which he has domesticated. Of that dreadful scourge of the human race, syphilis, one of the latest to be tracked, Professor Lankester writes:

For more than thirty years, a few workers, here and there, have been searching for this parasite, and the means of suppressing this awful curse of which it is the instrument. It would have been discovered many years ago had greater value been set on the inquiries which lead to such discoveries by those who direct the public expenditure of civilised States. And now the complete suppression of this dire enemy of humanity is as plain and certain a piece of work to be accomplished as is the building of an ironclad. But it will not be for many years because of the ignorance and unbelief of those who alone can act for the community in such matters. The discovery . . . of that well nigh ultra-microscopic germ of death, seemed to me, as I gazed at its delicate shape, a thing of greater significance to mankind than the emendation of a Greek text or the determination of the exact degree of turpitude of a statesman of a bygone age.

That diseases, like the poor, are always with us, we are but too well aware. Yet but few laymen, probably, are cognisant of the part that lowly plants and animals play therein, or of the way in which we become adjusted to resist their attacks. And thus they fail to realise that man, and the creatures dependent on him, in migrating to other and distant areas, become exposed to the attacks of new diseases to which they are not adjusted; while at the same time they infect the native fauna with such diseases as they have brought with them. Thus an exchange of diseases is brought about, the migrants and the autochthonous fauna each becoming infected by parasites to which they are not adjusted, an enormous mortality resulting. That this plays a serious part in hindering the work of colonising is obvious, and, by way of illustration, Professor Lankester takes the case of the dread scourges, sleeping-sickness and malaria. Happily, by his representations, a Professorship has been established at Cambridge, and another in London, for the purpose of investigating both the harmless and the parasitic types of the lower, microscopic, animals.

But it is not merely for the purpose of combating disease that man is bidden to turn to the book of nature for instruction. Commercially and economically we have much at stake. The breeding of animals and the cultivation of our fields and fisheries would be immensely benefited by a closer study of the laws of growth and reproduction. Already this study has made great strides, but it is up-hill work at present for those engaged in it. This very question of our Fisheries is one which Professor Lankester has done more than any one else in this country to place on a scientific basis. To his efforts we owe the foundation of the Marine Biological Laboratory at Plymouth, as well as the formation of a Committee for the investigation of our North Sea Fisheries. And from these have come results of lasting scientific value.

"One of nature's insurgent sons," Professor Lankester passes a scathing indictment on our antiquated and harmful notions of education, more especially with regard to the systems applied at Oxford and Cambridge, the great centres of learning in this country, and, consequently, the mainsprings, one would imagine, of all that is wisest and best in this most responsible work. But the prospect to-day is hopeful. Science holds an honoured place in these classic shades, and the time is not far off, perhaps when she will be allowed to have a voice as to the method of teaching the "humanities." This is what the rebellious son is striving for, at any rate. When this day comes a tremendous step forward will have been taken, for the discipline of scientific research which is now confined to the students of biology and physics and chemistry, will have extended to that far greater number who, as the result of prejudices earlier instilled, affect a contempt for "stinks." But Professor Lankester rightly contends that the broad outlines, at least, of the principles of "stinks" should form a part of the education of every youth. And this is surely not too much to ask from those who demand from all who desire to enter upon a University career, an acquaintance, at least, with the ancient tongues of Greek and Latin.

Finally, the key to the position which Professor Lankester has courageously taken up is to be found in the opening paragraph of the first chapter of the book:

It has become [he says] more and more a matter of conviction to me . . . that the time has arrived when the true relation of nature to man has been so clearly ascertained that it should be more generally known than is at present the case, and that this knowledge should form, far more largely than it does at this moment, the object of human activity and endeavour—that it should be in fact, the guide of State government, the trusted basis of the development of human communities. That it is not so already, that men should still allow their energies to run in other directions, appears to some of us a thing so monstrous, so injurious to the prosperity of our fellow men, that we must do what lies within our power to draw attention to the conditions and circumstances which attend this neglect, the evils arising from it, and the benefits which must follow from its abatement.

W. P. PYCRAFT.

NOTES ON SOPHOCLES

Paralipomena Sophoclea: Supplementary Notes on the Text and Interpretation of Sophocles. By LEWIS CAMPBELL. (Rivingtons, 6s. net.)

It is very difficult to review a book such as that now before us. None but professed scholars take any interest either in the text or the meaning of passages divorced from their context, and professed scholars will generally be found to have made up their minds about these passages. They will not discuss them again unless some fresh evidence is forthcoming. An editor, especially an editor of Sophocles, must have at least two qualities to bring to bear on his work. He must be a perfect grammarian, with a thorough knowledge of the rules which govern Attic Greek of the classical period and the limits within which a great poet may modify them. He must also have an unerring sense of style and poetical insight which will prevent him from laying the heavy hand of correction on poetry because it is not prose. Jebb had both these qualities in perfection. Dr. Campbell is more largely endowed with the second than the first. The late Professor B. H. Kennedy was a perfect master of grammar, but in dealing with a poet he adheres too closely to the matter of fact. So do the German school of critics, and they lack the great advantage which Kennedy and Jebb had in being finished composers of Greek verse. As an example of that lacuna in the critical apparatus of Kennedy we would point to Oed. Rex 1464, where Oedipus begs Creon to protect his daughters, and says of them with pathetic iteration, "who never knew their table set aloof, apart from me." Kennedy will not have χωρίς and ἀνευ in the same sense, and understands the latter to mean "without special direction on my part." But would the tortured old king think of thus qualifying a pathetic utterance in a moment of deep emotion? Besides, it suggests a ludicrous picture of Oedipus telling the servants "Antigone and Ismene are not to dine with me to-day." This is a characteristic vice of the German school. Thus, according to the Teubner editor, Meckler, Sophocles must not describe Deianira as "sweetly sleeping" (Trachin. 175). No: in her agitated state her nights must have been poor, and ἡδύως must be corrected to ἐνδεώς, a prosaic word supposed to mean "poorly." The same critic changes μελαγχρὲν αἷμα to μολυνθὲν εἶμα in Ajax 919, we suppose because he doubts whether blood really becomes darker when exposed to the air; but would Tecmessa, woman though she was, have thought at such a moment of the soiled condition of the garb of Ajax? We do not think Mistress Quickly would have been guilty of such a banalité.

To advert to a few of the comments of Dr. Campbell, in Ant. 231 he accepts Seyffert's σπουδῇ βραδύς in preference to the reading of the margin of L., σχολῇ ταχύς. Now that reading would have been very unlikely to be invented by a scholiast, involving as it does an apparent contradiction in terms, but the phrase "I took my time about hurrying" harmonises well with the general vulgarity of the guard's speech. Surely this is designedly comic:

My liege, I will not say that I came breathless from speed, or that I have plied a nimble foot; for often did my thoughts make me pause and wheel round in my path, to return. My mind was holding large discourse with me: "Fool, why goest thou to thy certain doom?" "Wretch, tarrying again? And if Creon heard this from another, must not thou smart for it?" So debating, I took my time about hurrying, and thus a short road was made long. At last, however, it carried the day that I should come thither—to thee; and though my tale be nought, yet will I tell it; for I come with a good grip on one hope—that I can suffer nothing but what is my fate.

Does not this pretentious prattle strongly remind one of the first appearance of Launcelot Gobbo (Merchant of Venice, ii. 2) in the scene beginning:

Certainly my conscience will serve me to run away from this Jew my master. The fiend is at my elbow, and tempts me . . . My conscience says, "Launcelot, budge not." "Budge," says the fiend. "Budge not," says my conscience.

In Ant. 613 it is hasty to say that there is "a corruption too deep for remedy." If πῦρ πολὺς be corrected to πῦρ πολὺς in agreement with νόμος ὅδε, and the other words of the clause be marked with inverted commas, as giving the words of the law, an excellent sense emerges:

For ever will prevail this Universal Law: "no step in man's life fares aloof from Doom."

We cannot regard as successful or even plausible the attempt to defend Ant. 904-920.

It is amazing that in Ajax 1281 the editor should reject the certain and beautiful emendation of Krauss, οὐδ' οὐ μὴ βῆναι ποδί, which provides a precise answer to Agamemnon's taunt in v. 1237, and defend the corrupt οὐδὲ συμβῆναι ποδί. Agamemnon had said of Ajax that he never took his stand in any place of danger where he, Agamemnon, was not also to be found. He never said anything so absurd as that the second champion among the Greeks never faced the foe in fight. The copyist mistook οὐδ' for οὐ, then μὴ was omitted as superfluous, συμβῆναι was corrected to συμβῆναι, and οὐδὲ was read metri gratia.

In Oed. Rex 877 we do not see what is gained by ἐξώρουσεν. The wanting syllable is much better supplied by reading:

ἀπότομον ἔλμ' ὥρουσεν εἰς ἀνάγκην which is very likely a reminiscence of πῆδ' ὀρούσας in Aeschylus's Agam. 826.

In Oed. Col. can στόμα . . . ἰέντες mean "uttering the voice"? Has Dr. Campbell overlooked or deliberately neglected Professor Housman's brilliant πρίοντες? In Frag. 777 we find ὀδόντι πρίε τὸ στόμα. Cf. also Trach. 976.

On 161 the comment is "if τῶν is impossible, τό may be right." But τῶν is quite right, and is governed by μετίσταθ', ἔνε . . . φύλαξ being διὰ μέσου, a construction common in the Attic poets, though alien from English usage. It may, however, be illustrated by the story of the advocate who is reported to have said: "Yes, my lord, your lordship is quite right and I am quite wrong, as your lordship generally is." The words "and I am quite wrong" are διὰ μέσου, and do not influence the succeeding words.

The introduction of a part of μηδαμός in 278, is anticipated in Macmillan's Parnassus edition of 1897. So is πανάμερος in the sense of "all-peaceful" in Trach. 660.

It is amazing that he still rejects Jebb's brilliant emendations of Oed. Rex 1219, ὅσπερ ἰάλεμον χέων, Oed. Col. 540, ἐπωφελήσας, and Trach. 911, ἐπ' ἄλλοις.

In 1220 τοῦ θέλοντος is the genitive of ὁ θέλων, not τὸ θέλον, "more than God wills" (to give him), as in 1604 παντὸς δρώντος comes from πᾶς δρῶν not πᾶν δρῶν. In Trach. 196 τὸ ποθοῦν should be τὸ πόθουν, "what they desired."

In Phil. 1149 φύγδα . . . πηδᾶτε is much better than φυγᾶ πηδᾶτε, which could hardly mean "shyly approach." The rarity of φύγδα would cause the corruption.

We have space only for one comment on the Electra. It is a brilliant restoration of verse 220:

τὰ δὲ τοῖς δυνατοῖς
οὐκ ἐρίστὰ πλάθειν

which Jebb translates (disguising the intolerably otiose πλάθειν).

but such strife should not be pushed to a conflict with the strong (literally "so as to face them"),

The conjecture, the authorship of which we are unable to ascertain, is:

τὸ δὲ τοῖς δυνατοῖς
οὐκ ἐρίστὰ λάθει

but the maxim "we must not struggle against the strong" is forgotten.

How often has the meaning of a passage in Greek or Latin eluded us because the ancient world had not marks of quotation or other modern devices! How puzzling would be "it was and I said not but," which italics make clear; or Shakespeare's:

Letting I dare not wait upon I would,
Like the poor cat i' the adage, which is quite intelligible through the use of italics or inverted commas.

A FIFTEENTH-CENTURY REALIST

Antonio Pollaiuolo. By MAUD CRUTWELL. (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.)

OUTSIDE the work of Crowe and Cavalcaselle, little has been written until quite recently about the brothers Pollaiuolo. Mr. Berenson did much, in the more specialised study of his "Florentine Drawings," to suggest the general lines on which the comparative study of the work of Antonio and Piero should proceed, and now Miss Crutwell has followed with the first monograph that has been published in any language on Antonio. That the subject has found an exponent who is at once versed in the art of the period and a competent critic, will be known to those who have read her previous books on Verrocchio and the della Robbia.

Antonio Pollaiuolo holds a place of considerable importance in the development of Italian art. Following in the wake of Donatello, Castagno and Alessio Baldovinetti, he did much, by his "naturalistic" studies, to make the art of Michelangelo possible. As in the case of Baldovinetti, the most charming side of his realism is the faithful representation of the landscape of the Val d'Arno, which appears in many of his paintings. But of more importance to the progress of art was his particular devotion to the study of the human nude, and it is here that we find both his real genius and the nature of his limitations. His study of the human body went far deeper than the literal translation of form. To quote Miss Crutwell's words:

He was chiefly preoccupied with its movements, the movements not only of limb and joint, but the play of the muscles under the skin. . . . He played with the body as a juggler with his balls, putting it into a hundred difficult postures, with such science of its structure that they hardly seem strange, concentrating effort in the swell and tension of a muscle, and fury in the downward curve of a lip. Violent, brutal, savage—all these words may be applied to his scenes of combat, but physical force and energy have never been so superbly presented before or since. Not even Signorelli nor Michelangelo has equalled him, and who can say to what extent are due to him those magnificent achievements of the nude in action—the Inferno of Orvieto and the Last Judgment of the Sistine Chapel?

We admit that his two panels of the Labours of Hercules (Uffizi), the masterly study for Hercules and the Hydra (British Museum), and the fragments of the recently found frescoes in the Villa della Gallina, Torre del Gallo, near Florence, are convincing proofs of Antonio's skill in treating the nude in action. But an impartial consideration of his masterpiece of painting, the Pucci altar-piece in the National Gallery, should save us from an exaggeration of his real genius. In spite of the splendid success of the two archers loading their bows in the foreground (the only figures of the central group which Miss Crutwell allows to be painted by Antonio), we feel that here is still the craftsman, who had little of the power of a Signorelli or a Michelangelo to free himself from the savour of the studio in the greatness of his subject.

Though ostensibly devoted to Antonio, the monograph has, of course, much to say of his younger, and much weaker, brother Piero. How much more powerful a character was that of Antonio, may be immediately divined from the busts on their joint monument in St. Pietro in Vincoli at Rome.

Miss Crutwell's book is exceedingly thorough in the critical distinction of their work. One point in particular, which has already been published in the Miscellanea d'Arte, may still be new to many English students, i.e., the import of the recently discovered documents in relation to the Virtues of the Uffizi. In the gallery, the Prudencia is still attributed to Antonio, and the rest, with the exception of the Fortitudo by Botticelli, to Piero. It now appears that, despite the greater excellence of the Prudencia, this, too, must, at least in the greater part, be Piero's work. The cartoon by Antonio, which figures on the back of the panel, can hardly have been done except, as Miss Crutwell suggests, as a sort of object-lesson to the younger brother, possibly when the picture was already nearly finished. Botticelli, who had hitherto been regarded, in this relation, in the light of an assistant to Antonio, is now definitely shown to have been a competitor with Piero for the commission. Verrocchio is a third artist who is known to have offered a design (rejected), which Dr. Gronau has identified with a drawing attributed to Botticelli in the Uffizi (Corn. 52, No. 208).

There is one point in the criticism of Antonio's pictures where, we venture to think, Miss Crutwell offers a dangerous hypothesis, i.e., in reference to the last three canvases of the Labours of Hercules, painted for the Medici in 1460. It has been supposed that the two engravings by Robetta were engraved after the small panels of the Uffizi. There are variations, however, in the figures and in the squarer shape of the prints which render Miss Crutwell's suggestion that they were based on the lost canvases plausible. But we cannot think there is sufficient reason to regard the difference in the landscape as depending on the same cause. However "feeble and imitative" Robetta was, his adaptation of Filippino's Uffizi Adoration, and his addition of the group of angels, shows that he was capable of very graceful invention of his own, and the landscape in question is one that is entirely characteristic of Robetta, quite apart from his models.

Antonio's work lay more in the arts of the goldsmith, metal-chaser and sculptor than in painting. Among the less-known works we would mention in particular the magnificent pageant shield representing the Death of Milo, belonging to Signor Brauer, of Florence, which came from the Capel Cure sale in London in 1905. With the attribution to Antonio of another sculptor's work, the gesso relief (The Genius of Discord) in the South Kensington Museum, we feel less convinced, while at the same time we think it far nearer the mark than Miss Crutwell's former suggestion of Verrocchio, or Dr. Bode's Leonardo. Considered as a work of his Roman period, there is much to account for the added grace of figure and favour of countenance which seem to divide it from Antonio's other nudes. The absolute change of style which Pollaiuolo underwent after his removal to Rome in 1484 is shown in the monuments of Sixtus IV. and Innocent VIII. in St. Peter's, an advance scarcely paralleled in the life of any artist of the period. In the graceful figures of the Arts and Sciences on the tomb of Sixtus IV. we seem transported beyond Michelangelo, and almost anticipate the spirit of Benvenuto Cellini.

One thing we would mention in reference to the chapter on the drawings, i.e., the notice of a sketch-book of designs given by Antonio to a jeweller, Francesco del Lavacchio, which was seen by the antiquary, Dei, in the possession of the Marzimedici in 1756. It is unknown whether this book is still in existence, and it is something for the seeker after art treasures not to forget.

The illustrations are excellent, and the appendix, consisting of documents relating to the life, list of works and bibliography, makes the book of extreme value to students. The latter, however, is not so free from printer's errors as is the text.

A CAROLINE MINOR POET

Thomas Stanley: his original Lyrics. Edited by L. I. GUINEY. (Hull: Tutin, 2s. 6d. net.)

LAST September we reviewed the delightful "Anacreontea" of Thomas Stanley, then recently reprinted by Mr. A. H. Bullen. We offer a hearty welcome now to the same author's original poems, published by another good friend to lovers of English poetry and agreeable reprints, Mr. Tutin of Hull. The work of editing has been carried out by Mrs. Guiney, who has clearly brought devotion and delight to her task. She has collated the editions of 1647, 1651, and 1657, all published during the author's life-time; and out of them she has made a composite text of her own devising. That is a pity. The general reader will not trouble to turn up the variae lectiones at the end of the book; he will not know exactly what he is reading, and more than once he will be reading something which appears in no edition of Stanley at all, but is Mrs. Guiney's own. In one case ("Palinode," l. 5) the editor has misunderstood the poet's meaning, and spoils the point of his verse by an alteration which defies all three texts. It is obviously beauty, not reason or philosophy, to which are applied the lines:

That would'st within tyrannic laws
Confine the power of each free cause;

and to print would for would'st is indefensible. We could cite instances, too, where the editor has clearly made choice of an inferior reading; but since we have not set out to make a textual criticism of the edition, it will be enough to warn the reader that he must not neglect the careful list of various readings which Mrs. Guiney has provided.

Thomas Stanley is a poet whom it is well to reprint. He is not a great poet; he is not a pioneer, nor one who had any influence on the poetry of his own or succeeding times. He is merely a poet of the mode, who wrote in the fashionable manner of his time and cannot be classed equally with the Herrick, the Suckling, the Lovelace, whom he constantly suggests. But the mode of his time was such a delightful mode that we cannot have too much of it: and Stanley has an hour or two's pleasure to offer to any one who loves or envies the "mysterious trick of music," as Mrs. Guiney well calls it, which marks even the feeblest lyrics of the Caroline age. If we analyse the charm, we shall find it to consist mainly in mere words, especially with poets of the rank of Stanley. He shows, it is true, flashes of that brave scorn of love which we find in Suckling and others, and there is at least one cry for release from life which also almost tempts one to believe it genuine. But that "almost" is the furthest we can go. Stanley is not a poet who convinces you that he is in earnest. It is possible to make too much of the effect of the state of a nation's life on contemporary poetry; but it remains true that Stanley belonged to a period when national life was not running high, when men were rather tasteful than creative: and in withdrawing himself, as he did, from the strife of great parties that had broken out before the publication of his 1651 edition, he showed himself (what indeed he was) a student, a scholar—sensitive and eclectic rather than passionate and full-blooded. He sings of love, but he sings of it to pattern, with polish and refinement rather than heat; and it does not need William Fairfax's assurance to persuade us that these ladies, whom he addresses in terms which have sometimes a great appearance of warmth, are imaginary. Chariessa, Chloris, Celia, are not three women; they are not even Mrs. Stanley; they are abstractions; and when the poet gives himself a name it is Philocharis.

What, then, should tempt us to read a man whom we know to have been pretending all the while, and who has nothing great, nothing exalting, nothing moving, to offer us? The answer lies in the poetry:

Ask the empress of the night
How the hand which guides her sphere,
Constant in unconstant light,
Taught the waves her yoke to bear,
And did thus by loving force
Curb or tame the rude sea's course.

Ask the female palm how she
First did woo her husband's love;
And the magnet, ask how he
Doth th' obsequious iron move;
Waters, plants, and stones know this;
That they love; not what love is.

Be not thou less kind than these,
Or from Love exempt alone.
Let us twine like amorous trees,
And like rivers melt in one.
Or, if thou more cruel prove,
Learn of steel and stones to love.

Its very artificiality makes that a good example to choose; for, though it is far from being the best poem in the volume, no one can miss its charm. Stanley is delightfully neat, delicate and fanciful; he achieves just that deliberate spontaneity (if the paradox may be pardoned) which always in the poetry of his time approaches the epigrammatic while always avoiding the sharpness of epigram; and his verses ring with the exquisitely clear sound which was apparently as difficult to avoid then as it is difficult to obtain to-day. Let us take one more example:

Celinda, by what potent art
Or unresisted charm
Dost thou thine ear and frozen heart
Against my passion arm?

Or by what hidden influence
Of powers in one combin'd
Dost thou rob Love of either sense,
Made deaf as well as blind?

Sure thou as friends united hast
Two distant deities,
And scorn within thy heart hast plac'd,
And love within thine eyes;

Or those soft fetters of thy hair
(A bondage that disdains
All liberty) do guard thine ear
Free from all other chains.

Then my complaint how canst thou hear,
Or I this passion fly,
Since thou imprison'd hast thine ear,
And not confin'd thine eye?

Admirable and diligent translator though he was, Stanley was only a minor poet; but there is something about him that many a major poet of to-day would be glad to catch.

THE DESERT AND THE SOWN

The Desert and the Sown. By GERTRUDE LOWTHIAN BELL
(Heinemann, 16s. net.)

It is not too high praise to say that the book before us is the most charming addition to the literature of travel that has been published for many years—we had almost said, and we think we should be justified in saying, for many decades. And there is something more than charm to be found in its every page: there is fascination, a something that holds the reader spell-bound, rivets his attention, keeps his body glowing long after the pipe has gone out and the cinders have grown cold in the grate and the clock is striking the small hours that herald the dawning of day. Perhaps we can pay Miss Bell no better compliment than to record the fact that, having picked up her book in our study after dinner, we were conscious of nothing save Syria till the twittering of the sparrows reminded us that the inexorable laws of Nature must be obeyed, and we stumbled reluctantly up the stairs. On the first page of the volume you will find the explanation: "I desired to write," says the author, "not so much a book of travel as an account of the people whom I met and who accompanied me on my way," and of the world in which they lived, seen, as far as possible, through their eyes. "And since it was better that they should . . . tell their own tale, I have strung their words upon the thread of the road, relating as I heard them the stories with which shepherd and man-at-arms beguiled the hours of the march," and the talk that passed round the camp-fire in the tent of the Arab and the guest-chamber of the Druze. To the sense of intimacy thus imparted is due her success; it is impossible for any one with the least feeling for the spirit of "old unhappy far-off things" to read her book without being transported in imagination to the scene of her wanderings, to travel with her along and across and beyond the strip of herbage strown,

That just divides the desert from the sown, and to feel the enchantment of the country and its people, and above all of its associations—for history and archaeology appeal to the author no less than human nature.

Miss Bell's pen is more skilful in illustration than any camera could be. In a few vivid words she touches in a scene which no photograph could suggest, and her pen is always sure, her picture clear, with never a detail blurred. Take this description of an evening in Namrud's cave:

That evening the cave presented a scene primitive and wild enough to satisfy the most adventurous spirit. The Arabs, some ten or a dozen men clothed in red leather boots and striped cloaks soaked with rain, were sitting in the centre round a fire of scrub, in the ashes of which stood the three coffee-pots essential to desert sociability. Behind them a woman cooked rice over a brighter fire that cast a flickering light into the recesses of the cave, and showed Namrud's cattle munching chopped straw from the rock-hewn mangers. A place comparatively free from mud was cleared for me in the circle, a cup of coffee prepared, and the talk went forward while a man might smoke an Arab pipe five times. It was chiefly of the iniquities of the government. One after another of my fellow guests took up the tale: the guttural strong speech rumbled round the cave. By God and Muhammad the Prophet of God we called down such curses upon the Circassian cavalry as should make those powerful horsemen reel in their saddles. From time to time a draped head, with black elf locks matted round the cheeks under the striped kerchief, bent forward towards the glow of the ashes to pick up a hot ember for the pipe bowl, a hand was stretched out to the coffee cups, or the cooking fire flashed up under a pile of thorn, the sudden light making the flies buzz and the cows move uneasily; or this, of another, spent as the guest of the Kaimakam of Kala'at el Husn:

When dinner was over we returned to my room, a brazier full of charcoal was brought in, together with hubble-bubbles for the ladies, and we settled ourselves to an evening's talk. The old woman refused to sit on the divan, and disposed herself neatly as close as possible to the brazier, holding out her wrinkled hands over the glowing coals. She was clad in black, and her head was covered by a thick white linen cloth, which was bound closely above her brow and enveloped her chin, giving her the air of some aged prioress of a religious order. Outside the turret room the wind howled; the rain beat against the single window, and the talk turned naturally to deeds of horror, and such whispered tales of murder and death as must have startled the shadows in that dim room for many and many a century. A terrible domestic tragedy had fallen upon the Kaimakam ten days before: his son had been shot by a schoolfellow at Tripoli in some childish quarrel. The Kaimakam had been summoned by telegraph; he had ridden down the long mountain road with fear clutching at his heart, only to find the boy dead, and his sorrow had been almost more than he could bear. So said the Sitt Ferideh.

The ancient crone rocked herself over the brazier and muttered: "Murder is like the drinking of milk here! God! there is none other but Thou."

A fresh gust of wind swept round the tower, and the Christian woman took up the tale.

"This Khanum," said she, nodding her head towards the figure by the brazier, "knows also what it is to weep. Her son was but now murdered in the mountains by a robber who slew him with his knife. They found his body lying stripped by the path."

The mother bent anew over the charcoal, and the glow flushed her worn old face. "Murder is like the spilling of water!" she groaned. "Oh Merciful!"

There is not a word we could wish away, nor a detail that is not essential to the proper understanding of the whole scene. Here, as everywhere throughout the book, the characters live. Miss Bell understands them, and sympathises with them; she recognises that there are good customs and bad customs among the Arabs, but she recognises that, as old Namrud said, "The good are many":

Now when they wish to bring a blood-feud to an end [says Namrud] the two enemies come together in the tent of him who was offended. And the lord of the tent bares his sword and turns to the south and draws a circle on the floor, calling upon God. Then he takes a shred of the cloth of the tent, and a handful of ashes from the hearth and throws them in the circle, and seven times he strikes the line with his naked sword. And the offender leaps into the circle, and one of the relatives of his enemy cries aloud: "I take the murder that he did upon me!" Then there is peace. Oh Lady! the women have much power in the tribe, and the maidens are well looked on. For if a maiden says: "I would have such an one for my husband," he must marry her lest she should be put to shame. And if he has already four wives let him divorce one, and marry in her place the maiden who has chosen him. Such is the custom among the Arabs.

The author has a full knowledge of Syrian Arabic, and it enables her to give us the conversations of the natives in a way that few other travellers have done. One afternoon she was idly watching the Sherarat buying corn from Namrud:

But for my incongruous presence and the lapse of a few thousand years, they might have been the sons of Jacob come down into Egypt to bicker over the weight of the sacks with their brother Joseph. The corn was kept in a deep dry hole cut in the rock, and was drawn out like so much water in golden bucketsful. It had been stored with chaff for its better protection, and the first business was to sift it at the well-head, a labour that could not be executed without much and angry discussion. Not even the camels were silent, but joined in the argument with groans and babbings, as the Arabs loaded them with the full sacks. The Sheikhs of the Sukhur and the Sherarat sat round on stones in the drizzling mist, and sometimes they muttered, "God! God!" and sometimes they exclaimed, "He is merciful and compassionate!"

Occasionally the sifted corn was poured back among the unsifted, and a dialogue of this kind ensued:

Namrud: "Upon thee! upon thee! oh boy! may thy dwelling be destroyed! may thy days come to harm!"

Beni Sakhr: "By the face of the Prophet of God! may He be exalted!"

Sherarat (in suppressed chorus): "God and Muhammad the Prophet of God, upon Him be peace!"

A party in bare legs and a sheepskin: "Cold, cold! Wallah! rain and cold!"

Namrud: "Silence, oh brother! descend into the well and draw corn. It is warm there."

Beni Sakhr: "Praise be to God the Almighty!"

Chorus of Camels: "B-b-b-b-b-dd-G-r-r-o-o-a-a."

Camel Drivers: "Be still, accursed ones! may you slip in the mud! may the wrath of God fall on you!"

Sukhur (in unison): "God! God! by the light of His Face!"

The book is full of similar sketches. Miss Bell has a wide acquaintance with the poetry of the Pre-Islamic period, and astonished her listeners round the camp-fires by her quotations:

As I sat listening to the talk round me and looking out into the starlit night, my mind went back to the train of thought that had been the groundwork of the whole day, the theme that Gablan had started when he stopped and pointed out the traces of his former encampment, and I said:

"In the ages before the Prophet your fathers spoke as you do and in the same language, but we who do not know your ways have lost the meaning of the words they used. Now tell me what is so-and-so, and so-and-so?"

The men round the fire bent forward, and when a flame jumped up I saw their dark faces as they listened, and answered:

"By God! did they say that before the Prophet?"

"Masha'llah! we use that word still. It is the mark on the ground where the tent was pitched."

She recited a couplet of Amr ul Kais which Gablan's utterance had suggested:

"Stay! let us weep the memory of the Beloved and her resting-place in the cleft of the shifting sands 'twixt ed Dujel and Haumal."

Gablan, by the tent-pole, lifted his head and exclaimed: "Mash'llah! that is 'Antara'."

All poetry is ascribed to 'Antara by the unlettered Arab; he knows no other name in literature.

I answered: "No; 'Antara spoke otherwise. He said: 'Have the poets aforetime left ought to be added by me? or dost thou remember her house when thou lookest on the place?' And Lebid spoke best when he said: 'And what is man but a tent and the folk thereof? one day they depart and the place is left desolate.'"

Gablan made a gesture of assent.

"By God!" said he, "the plain is covered with places wherein I rested."

He had struck the note. I looked out beyond him into the night and saw the desert with his eyes, no longer empty but set thicker with human associations than any city. Every line of it took on significance, every stone was like the ghost of a hearth in which the warmth of Arab life was hardly cold, though the fire might have been extinguished this hundred years. It was a city of shadowy outlines visible one under the other, fleeting and changing, combining into new shapes elements that are as old as Time, the new indistinguishable from the old and the old from the new.

We make no apology for frequent quotation; it is impossible to convey an idea of the charm and the fascination of the book by any other means. We have space only to add that no one who loves literature should fail to read it.

SELECTIONS

The German Classics, 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, vol. i. 8s. 6d.; vol. ii. 5s. 6d.)

IN 1866 Professor Max Müller published a revised edition of his "German Classics from the Fourth to the Nineteenth Century," which had first appeared in 1858 and had long been out of print. The present volumes are the second edition of this revised version, which was adapted to Scherer's "History of German Literature" by Professor Scherer himself and by Professor Franz Lichtenstein of Breslau. Both men died before their task was completed, and other scholars had some share in the final translations and corrections. We sincerely recommend the two volumes to the student who wishes to approach a great literature step by step and with method. He will begin with the Lord's Prayer in Gothic and go on to the Wessobrunner Gebet, an alliterative prayer of the eighth or ninth century found in a Bavarian monastery. He will come in time to passages from the Rolandslied, the German version of the celebrated Chanson de Roland. Then there are three scenes from the Nibelungenlied, but if he limit himself to his selections he will never know how Brünnhilde came to be the wife of Gunther or hear the two queens wrangling in front of the Minster at Worms, or understand why Hagen compassed Siegfried's death. He will get his ideas from the Wagnerian ring, and Wagner shaped both events and characters to his own needs. But Wagner did not invent the bear with which Siegfried frightened Mime. The student will find the bear in the first selection from the epic and will see Siegfried bind the beast to his saddle, carry him home and let him loose in the kitchen :

Der Bär in die Küche
Hei ! was er Küchenknechte
Gerückt ward mancher Kessel,
Hei ! was man guter Speisen von dem Lärm gerieth ;

von dem Feuer schied !
zerzerret mancher Brand ;
in der Asche liegen fand.

The place was so full of dogs, says the poet, that every man feared to shoot in case he hit a dog instead of the bear. In the end Siegfried despatches the beast with his sword, sits down to a great meal, gets up again because he is thirsty, and is murdered by Hagen as he stoops to drink at a well. We believe that the student who reads this selection carefully will be so fascinated that he will buy the Nibelungenlied and find out for himself what led to Siegfried's death and what Queen Kriemhild did to avenge it. Our selection would have given that last grim combat in the halls of Attila, "a tumult," says Carlyle, "like the Crack of Doom: a thousand-voiced, wild-stunning hubbub," when blood flows like water and fire is quenched with blood and thirst slaked with blood. It lives in the memory beside the fight in the Hall of Ulysses.

After the Volksepos come selections from the romantic epics of the twelfth century that were popular in many tongues all over Europe: the histories of Aeneas and Dido, of Tristram and Iseult and other hapless lovers. Then we have the Minnesingers and Walther von der Vogelweide's fascinating famous poem, "Deutschland über Alles" :

Von der Elbe bis zum Rhein
Und zurück bis her an Ungerland,
Da mögen wohl die Besten sein,
Die ich irgend auf der Erden fand,
Weiss ich recht zu schauen
Schönheit, Huld und Zier,
Hilf mir Gott, so schwör ich, dass sie besser hier
Sind als andrer Länder Frauen.

There are extracts from all the well-known German prose-writers as well as from the poets, an adventure of Tyll Owlglass, for instance, portions of sermons by Martin Luther, a scene from Titus Andronicus as played by "Die Englischen Comödianten," a troop of English actors who roamed through Germany in 1585 giving Shakespeare and other English dramatists translated into German prose. In fact, from the Lord's Prayer in Gothic to scenes from "Die Ahnfrau" by Grillparzer, who died in 1872, the student plodding through these two volumes will acquaint himself with snatches from every German writer of note between the fourth and the nineteenth centuries.

Yet we are not attracted by these selections, carefully chosen and presented though they are: they remind us of the dainty packages that come by post sometimes, bringing us samples of cocoa or biscuits. In one of Anstey's Dialogues a Hyde Park Demagogue observes that he is speaking with "all 'istry vivid to his recollection," and we think that when he has worked his way through these two volumes and arrived at Grillparzer the methodical student will feel that he has all the German classics vivid to his recollection. That, of course, will be a satisfactory state of mind. But selections of this kind can only appeal to those who consider some knowledge of literature a duty, and acquire it without rapture, without hunger for more. We would say to any one who knew little German and yet had faith that German poetry, like German music, can make magic for him: put your selections on the shelf for the present. Wait a little for the Lord's Prayer in Gothic and even for passages from the mediæval epics and from the Minnesingers. Buy Heine's "Buch der Lieder," because, although no one can translate or imitate Heine, his German and his music are both easy to understand. Spend as much time on the first part of "Faust" as the dutiful student would spend on his "History of Literature" and his two volumes of selections. He will know when he hears Tannhäuser that the knight of that name belonged to the Salzburg family of Tanhusen, led an adventurous life from 1240 to 1270 and sojourned at the Bavarian and Austrian courts. You will have forgotten everything about him except his poem to the lady he has served faithfully, who will reward him if he turn the Rhine from its course, and bring her the sand from the sea, the stars from the sky and the salamander from the fire, and you will remember the poem because it has a haunting refrain :

Mir ist zu Muth,
Was sie mir thut,
Das soll mich Alles dünken gut,
Sie nahm an mir die Ehr in Hut, die reine ;
Ausser Gott alleine,
So weiss die Holde Niemand, die ich meine.

When you come to the moderns you will be at a greater disadvantage still, from the student's point of view. He will have tasted Voss, Klopstock, Herder, Winckelmann, names to you. We purposely exclude Lessing because his complete works will be on your shelves and you will know all his plays and his Laokoon and the delightful criticisms in the Hamburger Dramaturgie. As for Goethe, the student will have read no less than thirty-eight specimens of the poet's style, including a difficult passage from Dichtung und Wahrheit about contemporary German poetry. If you have read Dichtung und Wahrheit you will probably have forgotten this passage, and remember poor Friederike of Sesenheim and the beautiful daughters of the Strasburg dancing-master. It is to be hoped that you will have read Wilhelm Meister too, have made friends with Philine and know who played the Ghost in Hamlet. Many of Goethe's shorter poems you will know by heart. Nevertheless if you linger too long with Goethe the student will again outstrip you. He will have detached scenes from Die Räuber and Don Karlos vivid to his recollection, as well as an involved passage from a prose work called "Ueber Naive und Sentimentalische Dichtung." And so supple has a long course of selections made him that he will have jumped straight from the well-known story of Rübezahl and the turnips to extracts from Kant, Fichte, Schopenhauer and the two Humboldts. By the time he reaches the poets and novelists of the Romantic School his mind, according to its texture, will be in a state of complacency or of extreme impatience and confusion.

But we should like to wager that some years hence the complacent student will have thrown away his selections and forgotten the German he once knew: while you, hearing this with wonder, will take down your two neglected volumes and discover treasures there that your long attachment to a few great names will help you to understand. For we hold that it is better to serve few gods faithfully than to be content with a moment at every shrine.

THE CLASH OF ARMS

A Staff Officer's Scrap-Book during the Russo-Japanese War.
By Lieut.-General Sir IAN HAMILTON. (Arnold, 18s. net.)

A MODERN cynic has said that a "soldier officer is nowadays expected to be everything but a soldier." In that saying there may be a substratum of truth, but no one can read "A Staff Officer's Scrap-Book" without realising that if the author is a man of many parts, he is above all a soldier. Having himself played no unworthy part in scenes of battle, assaults and alarms, and being versed in the practice and theory of military strategy and tactics, he was well qualified to observe the unfolding of the stupendous drama of the war between Russia and Japan. As in the first volume of his work, powers of keen observation and the facile pen of a cultured citizen of the world are noticeable on every page, and perhaps the greatest charm of the writer lies in the fact that while the professional reader cannot fail to profit by his expert criticisms, the layman finds himself led on from episode to episode with ever-increasing interest. The horrors of war come home to our inmost being, when we read descriptions of the bloody struggle on the slopes of Manjuyama :

The mountains and the river banks and the houses re-echo to the continuous, angry, growling sound of the musketry. The most bitter fight is illuminating the slopes of the hillock, and I could see its shape outlined by innumerable little dazzling specks, showing the thousands of rounds which were being fired. Hundreds of human lives are passing away yonder where the hill-side flashes flame. I feel very much afraid and wish I had some one to hold me by the hand.

And then, when the strife was over :

I saw nothing from Manjuyama, but I saw too much upon it. When I stepped forward and viewed the western declivity my heart stood still with horror. Never have I seen such a scene. Such a mad jumble of arms and accoutrements mingled with the bodies of those who so lately bore them, arrested, cut short in the fury of their assault, and now for all their terrible menacing attitudes so very, very quiet. How silent! how ghastly! how lonely seemed the charnel house where I, a solitary European, beheld rank upon rank of brave Russians mown down by the embattled hosts of Asia.

But the shadow of the evil side of war is illumined by the splendour of deeds of heroism, and from the chaos of the desperate conflict the highest attributes of man are evolved. Cold must be the blood in the veins of the man who can read unmoved the story of the gallant Ota and his men in the hand to hand fighting which occurred in the Taling Pass. Outnumbered and driven back, Colonel Ota—holding high the regimental colour—boldly led his two companies up the face of the hill in counter attack against the positions he had lost. Immediately he was hit by four bullets, and had just strength sufficient in him to commend the Standard to the guardianship of his major, who fell almost at once, desperately wounded, but handing on the sacred emblem to the adjutant who in his turn dropped in the tracks of a Russian bullet. Last of all the Imperial ensign passed down to the hand of a private soldier who led the last stage of the assault and planted the insignia of his Regiment firmly on the corpse strewn summit.

As he did so, full in the face of the Russians, thirty or forty paces distant, they broke and fled. "Can war," asks Sir Ian Hamilton, "be altogether bad when it inspires ordinary men to actions so sublime?"

As we read the vividly written pages of the book, we are forced to recognise and appreciate the lofty devotion to duty, and the contempt for danger, displayed by all ranks of the Japanese troops. The complete absence of fear is perhaps the more astounding in that it was not the reckless, foolhardy bravery of ignorance. On the contrary, no troops have ever more fully recognised the danger of battle, no men have ever known with greater certainty that death awaited them, and knowing, no men have ever faced it with the calm, unhesitating alacrity shown by the Japanese army. Well does Sir Ian Hamilton realise the pitch to which the men of this warrior nation were attuned, when he gives us his deliberate conviction that :

the more I think, the more certain am I that it was not strategy or tactics, or armament or information, which won the battle of Liaoyang for Oyama, but that it was rather the souls of the Japanese troops, which trampled over the less developed, less awakened, less stimulated and spiritual, qualities of the Russians.

Times there were, we learn, when the fate of the issue between the impending armies hung trembling in the balance, when Kuroki had hurled his last reserves into the conflict, and when ammunition had run short; but these were the very occasions upon which the splendid qualities of our allies shone forth; no jealousy, no selfishness, no thought of self seems to have arrested for a moment the carrying through of the general plan. The unwelcome reflection is forced upon us that in these respects we have much to learn from the friendly nation in the East. Bitter as it may be to recognise the truth, we can but acknowledge that in more than one instance in the course of our own war in South Africa the loyal and unhesitating sacrifice of individual interests to the general good was conspicuous by its absence. Probably some such thought was uppermost in our author's mind when he wrote:

If I ever get safe back to England and people ask me "what are the lessons of the Manchurian War?" I ought, if I have the pluck of a mouse, to reply "To change our characters, my dear friend, in that you and I may become less jealous and egoistical, and more loyal and disinterested towards our own brother officers. This is the greatest lesson of the war."

Fiction pales before the light of truth, and it is hardly an exaggeration to say that, full though it be of brilliant and expert professional knowledge and criticism, no work of more enthralling interest could well be placed before a reader. Nor could any stronger inducement to read the book we have been considering be found, we think, than that contained in its closing lines. The author's work is over; he has left—perhaps for ever—scenes which can never be effaced from his memory, and he says:

But ere the old life quite resumes its sway, let me try, in one rapid retrospect, to realise the days and nights that are no more: My peony garden in Fenhuangchang bathed in the soft moonlight; the Heaven-reaching Pass, reverberating through all its hollows and ridges to the continued roll of musketry; the wall of mist and the writings that appeared thereon; the Swallow's Nest fort and bloody Rice Cake Hill: the heroic bayonet fight on Okasaki Yama's brow; the rapid march; the manoeuvre, the fierce attack; the stubborn defence; the red battle and the crowd of pale corpses. Again, I seem to see the advance of the invincible first Army; the dense ranks rolling, ever onwards, towards the shrieking shell and angry hiss of the rifle bullets. No drums or bugles cheer the march of the phantom army of my thoughts, but ever the rumble and roar of the cannon fills each soldier's heart with exultation as the columns draw nearer and yet nearer to the valley of the shadow of death.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by Sir HENRY IRVING and FRANK A. MARSHALL. Vols. ix. and x. (Gresham Publishing Co., 4s. 6d. net each.)

WE have commented before on the value to students of Shakespeare of this sensible and practical edition, and the two volumes now before us are well up to the standard of the others. Each contains an introduction—which includes information not easily accessible anywhere else on the stage-history of each play—the text printed in full but marked for reading or production by Sir Henry Irving, and copious notes by Shakespearean scholars of repute. There are, of course, more learned editions of Shakespeare; but we know of no other so suitable as this for the practical student, as we may term him—the actor, the reader, or the intelligent spectator who likes to compare Sir Henry Irving's ideas with Betterton's or with those of more recent and less reverent producers. It is interesting to learn, for example, that only our modern squeamishness omits the essential character of Bianca from Othello, which occurs in vol. ix. The criticism is just and broad; the notes all tend to the elucidation of the human interest of the plays. The comments on such topics as the character of Iago and the complexion of Othello are at once brief and sensible; and it is the preponderance given to such matters over details of textual criticism that constitutes the practical and human value on which we have dwelt. The illustrations will be a feature attractive to some, and the volumes are surprisingly cheap.

The East and West Indian Mirror. Being an Account of Joris van Speilbergen's Voyage Round the World (1614–1617), and the Australian Navigations of Jacob le Maire. Translated by J. A. J. DE VILLIERS. (The Hakluyt Society.)

THE two journals which form this volume were first published together in a Dutch edition of 1619, from which version this translation is made. The edition was published at Leyden, and the reason for appending the Australian navigations of Jacob le Maire to the Speilbergen journal was, no doubt, because le Maire, when his ship was taken from him at Jacatra, after his voyage across the Pacific, by order of the President of the Dutch East India Company, took passage with Admiral Speilbergen for home, but died on the way. The Admiral was the second Dutchman to circumnavigate the globe, and in the introduction to his journal an interesting letter is quoted giving an account of a previous expedition to the East Indies made by the same enterprising adventurer, on his return from which he fell in with Jacob van Heemskerck. "the man who had courageously wintered with Barendsz on the forbidding shores of Novaya Zemlya, and was subsequently to lay down his life for his country in the bay of Gibraltar." Speilbergen is shown by his journal to have been a man possessed of the most requisite talents of a great commander, a prudent navigator, careful for the welfare of his men, and steadily pursuing his duty before all else. "Seldom has there been found in the same man," says Captain Burney, "such a union of valour and circumspection." He does not appear to have been directly responsible for the ungracious and tyrannical treatment of le Maire, who, owing to the jealous action of the Dutch East India Company, died of a broken heart after gaining fame by steering his vessel through waters hitherto unknown to the civilised world. The translation is admirably done, and the copperplates mentioned in the title-page of the Leyden edition are most carefully reproduced with an additional portrait of Jacob le Maire. A useful bibliography and a full index add to the value of the work.

The Tower of London. By Canon WILLIAM BENHAM. (Seeley 7s. net.)

To appreciate the Tower of London to the full one should have a very intimate knowledge of English history: not so much the knowledge of the guide-book as a sympathetic knowledge of the men and women of the past. Canon Benham, masterly antiquary though he is, does not show himself much more than a skilful guide. He maintains at the outset that the only rival, now standing as a fortress, to the Tower is the tower at the western gate of Jerusalem, a statement which is open to dispute. The Kremlin at Moscow is a fortress in a double sense: it is, says Viazemski, "our Sanctuary and our Fortress." The question, however, is not material, for in Great Britain at any rate the Tower has no rival. Its history in full would occupy many volumes, but Canon Benham shows discrimination in his compression and omission. Colonel Hutchinson is not, so far as we can see, mentioned as one of the famous prisoners, a notable omission; and in places brevity has made the author assume an ill-judged view of history. He states, for example, that "the great but unrighteous claim of Edward III. to the crown of France" resulted in the hundred years war; whereas there were many secondary causes of quarrel between England and France, and, after all, the strong support which Philip of Valois gave to the Scots made war inevitable. The great feature of the book is its wealth of illustrations, which include four reproductions in colour from illuminated manuscripts. The frontispiece, the oldest known picture of the Tower, is from a manuscript of the poems of Charles, Duke of Orleans. In the background is London Bridge with the City behind it, in front the Traitor's Gate. The Prince, faithful to his troubadour instincts, is seated in the now demolished banquetting-hall, writing verses. He is seen again looking, like sister Anne, from the window, and again embracing the messenger who brings his ransom. Next we see him riding away a free man, and finally being rowed off in a boat (in which bow has apparently caught a crab) to his ship en route for France. The other pictures in colour are an assault on a fortress, from a manuscript of Boccaccio de Casibus Virorum et Fœminarum Illustrium; artillery of the fifteenth century from a manuscript of the Chronicles of England; and a tournament, from a manuscript of the Romance of the Sire Jehan de Saintré.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MR. HENRY JAMES

MR. HENRY JAMES is the last great writer of the New England school. His works are a reservoir in which the waters of two streams of thought, flowing from the same source in different directions, have been united and stored just when the spring that fed them was drying up. He has blended and consummated the traditions of Lowell and Longfellow and the traditions of Poe and Hawthorne, and in him there comes to an end one of the most extraordinary movements in the history of literature. It is now about three quarters of a century since a little band of New England men of letters began to astonish and delight the European world by a series of works conceived in a spirit quite unlike that which the American writer had been expected to display. They had nothing in common with Benjamin Franklin. Theirs was a movement of extreme reaction against the practical and democratic genius of their race. This genius, as De Tocqueville had remarked, made for an immense vapidity, bleakness, and monotony of life, in which fine intelligences would have no refuge from the tyranny in taste, opinions and manners exercised by the mob. Happily there then survived in the land of freedom a scantling of the English passion for independence, and this endued the best minds with a force of resilience which De Tocqueville had not divined. Some of the writers of the New England school took the line of least resistance in the direction of cosmopolitanism. The stronger souls derived their inspiration from the people, but derived it in the most perverse way. By erecting everything mean and common around them into "a precious principle of reaction"—to use a happy phrase of Mr. James—they elaborated an incomparable literature of exasperation. There was a sincerity in their wilfulness that no European school of decadents has been able to attain. Oppressed by the triviality, the commonness and the coarseness of the American spirit, they cultivated to perfection the qualities of subtlety, strangeness and exquisite morbidity. Their art was, indeed, an efflorescence upon the bloom of decay. The hard and colourless puritanism of America acquired in its dissolution a soft and delicate iridescence, and out of this the writers of the New England school formed a novel sort of romantic art of an eerie and yet charming beauty. But extraordinary as their work was in quality, in matter and construction it was slight and disconnected. It would have shone in a happy and peculiar light in a land of ancient culture, as an ornament upon the solid mass of older literature. In America, it only dazzled and misled the men of the next generation. Its defect was that it was the consummation of a movement of extreme reaction, and, as such, admitted of no development. It served only to tempt the minds of younger authors into a province of American thought in which no further achievement of high importance could be accomplished. It was useless trying to glean in a scanty field already reaped by novelists of so fine and frugal a genius as Hawthorne and Poe.

Mr. Henry James saw this. In matter of art as well as in matter of religion New England puritanism was exhausted. On the other hand, the cosmopolitanism of mind of Longfellow and Lowell did not seem to make for great creative power. But might not something original still be achieved by combining the traditions of Poe and Hawthorne with those of Lowell and Longfellow? This was the constructive idea of the earlier novels of Mr. James. For the novelist of the psychological school there was less matter of interest in American life after the Civil War than there had been before. The country was become "a huge Rappacini garden rank with each variety of the poison-plant of the money-passion." To a writer with Zola's power of depicting the wild, blind movements of an immense mob animated by a common instinct of greed, the spectacle would have been a source of ironic inspiration. To Mr. James it was a source of supreme disgust. In his case the feeling of exasperation flowered into an almost morbid delicacy of taste. As the texture of American society grew coarser and more common, so his sense of the refinements of life became by mere privation subtler and more exquisite. This made him the most fanatic of cosmopolitans, and, at the same time, the most acute and fastidious of students of the rich and complex civilisations of the older world. It was not however until he settled in England that the idiosyncrasy of his genius was fully developed. As he himself said of his earlier work, "c'est proprement écrit, but it's terribly pale." In his first attempt to escape from the contagion of the American spirit he defeated himself by going too far in the direction of vague cosmopolitanism. He opened only his senses to the charming impressions of things in Italy and France; he did not elaborate these impressions in his mind into a general criticism of life. The complexion of continental society was so completely different from the complexion of American society, and his delighted fancy played so entirely on the surface of objects that his fund of unconscious prejudices was never rudely disturbed. He remained an educated Puritan of the Bostonian type, concealing a real timidity of soul beneath an apparent amiability of taste, and finding a characteristic form of expression for his faint-hearted patriotism and sentimental romanticism in a series of idyllic pictures of the conflict between the complexity and corruption of the old world and the simplicity and wholesomeness of the new. Such was the character of his literary achievement at the age of forty-five. There can be no doubt that he would have accomplished much better work than this, if he had stayed in a state of irritation in New York and Boston until his sense of the wholesomeness of modern American puritanism had grown as quick and keen as his sense of the simplicity of modern American democracy. However, he did the next best thing, and settled in England, where neither puritanism nor democracy of the modern American sort is altogether unknown. Here, amid the general ferment of wild thought and extravagant sentiment of the early 'nineties, he was transformed from a novelist of agreeable talent into a novelist of high genius. At a leap he sprang from a place inferior to that of Trollope, to a position equal to that of Stendhal. From the simplest of writers he changed into the most subtle. He acquired at last Hawthorne's and Poe's strange insight into the dark and winding recesses of the human heart and their exquisite sense of the atmosphere and spirit of a place, and with an astonishing originality of method he applied these gifts in the delicate and realistic analysis of the finer issues of modern life. But his success occurred so late in life that he was saddened by it, and he said in a famous aside in one of his stories:

What he saw so intensely to-day, what he felt as a nail driven in, was that only now, at the very last, had he come into possession. His development had been abnormally slow, almost grotesquely gradual. He had been hindered and retarded by experience, and for long periods had only groped his way. It had taken too much of his life to produce too little of his art. The art had come, but it had come after everything else.

But now that he has deployed and tempered his strange, novel faculties in the luxuriant field of English life, he has acquired a new zest and with it a new spirit of adventuresomeness. He is become a true cosmopolitan. Having supplemented his remarkable intensity of vision with as remarkable a breadth of view, he has turned again to the less fertile and yet larger field of American life, in order to see if he can at last find there the material for the novel of manners which Hawthorne meditated but failed to undertake.

The result of Mr. James's preliminary survey is given in an exquisite panorama in silver-point, entitled "The American Scene" (Chapman and Hall, 12s. 6d. net). The book, in my opinion, deserves to rank with that of De Tocqueville. It is, of course, far subtler in composition. In it there are no broad effects: the lights and shadows are scarcely distinguishable at a distance; but, for all that, they are drawn with a touch as firm as it is delicate. In matter of art it is a work written for the delectation of the leisurely amateur of the extreme refinements of literature. The more impatient student of social history will probably regret that it was not composed in a popular form. For, in substance, it is an inquiry of high and general interest into the essential character of one of the great nations of the world in a grandly critical period of its development. If nothing had been lost in the force and insidiousness of the attack it would certainly have been better, in some respects, if the book had been put together in French fashion so that those who run could read. But much, I fear, would so have been lost. Mr. James would not be Mr. James if he did not deepen and intricate every question that he endeavoured to solve. He is but little interested in plain, material facts; it is in the subtlety with which he investigates the finer moral implications of these facts that the peculiar power of his genius resides. In appearance his work is a contexture of impressions of the superficial aspects of American life, of the architecture of the streets, the arrangement of rooms in private houses, the general atmosphere of a great hotel or of a fashionable sea-side resort. In reality it is a profound essay in the psychology of the governing class in America. "Now that you have got riches and the power that riches give," says Mr. James to the plutocracy of his native land, "what do you intend to make with them?" "More riches and more power," is the answer. "And after that?" "Nothing!" The foredoomed grope of blind wealth for the graces and amenities of civilised life, that, as Mr. James sees it, is the main plot in the tragic comedy which is being played on the immense stage of America. It is, however, the subsidiary plot in connection with the triumph of the American woman which has most deeply impressed the imagination of the curious novelist of manners as a grand subject for the exercise of his art. The American man has accepted his doom and become:

by his default, subject and plastic to his mate; his default having made, all around him, the unexampled opportunity of the woman—which she would have been an incredible fool not to pounce upon. It needs little contact with American life to perceive how she has pounced, and how, outside business, she has made it over in her image. . . . Her companion's attitude, totally destitute of high signs, does everything it can to further this feat: so that, as disposed together in the American picture, they testify, extraordinarily, to the successful rupture of a universal law. . . . The phenomenon may easily become, for a spectator, the sentence written largest in the American sky: when he is in search of the characteristic, what else so plays the part? The woman is two-thirds of the apparent life—which means that she is absolutely all of the social; and as this is nowhere else the case, the occasion is unique for seeing what such a situation may make of her. . . .

The author of "The Bostonians" was never an enthusiast in the matter of woman's rights, and the sorry spectacle of the feminisation of American society provokes his gift of satire; and he says of the American woman:

Her manner of embodying and representing her sex has fairly made of her a new human convenience, not unlike fifty of the others, of a slightly different order, the ingenious mechanical contrivances, stoves, refrigerators, sewing-machines, type-writers, cash-registers, that have done so much, in the household and the place of business, for the American name. . . . It would take long to say why her situation, under this retrospect, may affect the inner fibre of the critic himself as one of the most touching on record: he may merely note his perception that she was to have been, after all, but the sport of fate. For why, need she originally, he wonders, have embraced so confidently, so gleefully, yet so unguardedly, the terms offered to her to an end practically so perfidious? . . . It is impossible, of course, to tell: and her case, as it stands for us, at any rate, is that she showed no doubts. It is not on the American scene and in the presence of mere American phenomena that she is even yet to be observed as showing them.

Well, Henry James, you writer of tales,
Here's a subject made to your hand.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

FICTION

Templation. By RICHARD BAGOT. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. BAGOT knows his Italy as well as Mr. Marion Crawford, and, at any rate in the novel before us, makes a more full-blooded story out of it. But he has not Mr. Crawford's unfailing charm of description, nor his light and skilful hand at moulding character, nor all the wisdom which has grown out of Mr. Crawford's exhaustive and intimate study of Italian politics and social life. Mr. Bagot observes keenly, but a little hastily; he is rather sharp than wise in his judgments, and his people are drawn without the subtle shades which would make them interesting in themselves. We are not interested in Count Ugo Vitali, the provincial noble (the gentleman-farmer, as we should call him in England), a man of simple taste and bucolic habits; nor in his underbred, passionate wife, for all Mr. Bagot's skilful attempt to lend her glamour by throwing her, in a degree, under the spiritual influence of her husband's mediæval ancestress, a certain infamous Donna Giulia Vitali, whose ghost still haunts the palace. Fabrizio Vitali, Ugo's cousin, for love of whom Ugo's wife murders her husband, is the most interesting study of all; but that mainly because he is typical of a class of young Italian (whose like is not unknown in England)—the self-educated man-about-town, who on the strength of a little knowledge of Schopenhauer, Spencer and Nietzsche, has presumed to throw religion overboard and declare himself "emancipated." We have said, however, that Mr. Bagot has made a full-blooded story. Though his descriptions of the thoughts and motives of his commonplace characters are so out of proportion to their depth or subtlety as to be tedious, the tragedy itself holds the reader's attention fast, and the end is thrilling. What is more, it is convincing. We believe and feel every step in the strange and horrible tale. It is a pity that Mr. Bagot should not have written in one language (English, by preference) instead of three.

Exton Manor. By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

THE present reviewer has read one only of Mr. Marshall's previous novels—"Richard Baldock"—and in spite of a very clever piece of characterisation, it irritated him often by its stiltedness. Its successor belongs in a different class: next to "Framley Parsonage" and "Barchester Towers" and the rest of Trollope's works (in point of merit, before some of them) on the shelf that begins with Thackeray. Take away Mr. Marshall's affectations—there are few of them here—and introduce a few of Trollope's favourite expressions, and you may convince even yourself that you are reading Anthony's posthumous work. For Mr. Marshall's periods are no longer stilted: he is tiresome at times—as Trollope was tiresome—but he is tiresome only because, metaphorically, it is necessary for him, in painting a lady's portrait, to spend time and care over the knots in the lady's bootlaces. As a result, he has produced a finished picture, whose charm will outlast the painter's life. The book is a long one—it runs to some four hundred closely-packed pages—yet we think that we are justified in saying that there are four only that lack charm: four only, that is to say, in which Mr. Marshall is seen touching in the bootlaces. It moves with all the slowness of the old three-volume novel; and it moves with that slowness just because the author is not an analyst: because he sets out, not to explain the motives which induced Mr. Brown or Mr. Smith to light a pipe with a wax vesta, but to show you life itself. And life itself he shows you: a finished picture, as we have said, of a side of life the importance of which is apt, in this age of fitful fever, to be under-estimated: a picture lovingly and sympathetically executed. It will not set the critics scritch; but it will remain on our shelves, and later on, if no friend happen to perform the duty for us, we shall disperse the dust and turn its leaves again in the room that is never visited by Merely Mary Ann.

What Might Have Been. (Murray, 6s.)

"CALL no novel good till it is finished" might be adopted as the motto of the patient reviewer. Of twenty writers who begin a story well, not ten go on well, and not five both go on and end well. The book before us opens brilliantly: the conception of "collateral history" is original and full of possibilities, and the early chapters are charged with pungent humour. The description of the social amenities of flying is only equalled by that of the various members of the Socialist Cabinet, and had the anonymous author compressed the last three hundred pages of his book into a hundred or even fifty the result would have been a notable piece of work. As it is, the development of the Unity League and the progress of the Great Coal War, by means of which the League rescues the country from its socialist oppressors, is told at wearisome length and recalls the many political forecasts in the form of fiction through which we have waded during the last few years. All tedium is, however, forgotten in the exciting events of the closing chapters, and the book certainly fulfils its author's rather too evident intention of providing food for thought as to What May Be. We can only add that as we recall the good things in the early pages we also—in more senses than one—ponder over What Might Have Been.

The Golden Hawk. By EDITH RICKERT. (Arnold, 6s.)

MISS RICKERT has wandered among the hills and valleys of Provence until the hot sun and the wild mountain breezes have set her head awirling, and out of this "sweet bewilderment" she has evolved Trillon, the Golden Hawk of Avignon. We have little fault to find with her creation; he goes pranking through her pages to the tune of some old Provençal love-song, fiddle in hand and tricked out as gaily as any mediæval troubadour. He is as entertaining as his German prototype, Till Eulenspiegel, and he carries out his merry pranks with the same irresponsible gaiety. He belongs to that debonair order of beings who seldom or never reap the wild oats they have sown, leaving that to some more prosaic wife or sweetheart. The patient reaper in this case is Madaleno Borel, wild enough herself in her way until that wildness is alternately coaxed and crushed out of her by her erratic lord and master. The story centres in these two, the rest of the characters being merely so many helps or hindrances in their mad career. Miss Rickert is to be congratulated on the fact that her Hawk is always lovable, whether he be dancing with an old wife on the bridge of Avignon or rescuing his Madaleno at the eleventh hour through a convent window. She dedicates her book to Mistral, and her descriptions of the valley in which she has placed her story show a real love and appreciation of the poet's country. The only fault we have to find in her work is that it needs pruning.

The House of Rest. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

"WOULD we could wander on, in sweet companionship, we two, for evermore." The words and the sentiment of our quotation serve very well to denote the contents of Mrs. Reynolds's latest book. And the reader wanders on through page upon page of admirable "story-book" stuff to the expected end. Mrs. Reynolds, from whose opening chapters we drew rash deductions, is a "story-book" writer. The characters are not those of the men and women we meet and make friends of; the little love tangles, the heroic device, old as the hills but not half so interesting, the "story-book" English burdened by strange compound adjectives (we counted ten in one short paragraph), all are in keeping. It is a pity Mrs. Reynolds could not realise the possibilities of her charming idea and, realising, have given us a fresh and a delightful "house of rest."

Little Esson. By S. R. CROCKETT. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

MR. CROCKETT'S new story opens with a dramatic situation that gives promise of stirring times ahead. Mina Hilliard, maddened by her father's brutality, rushes into the presence of her five artist suitors and offers herself to the first man who holds up his hand. "You have,—beast and bird and creeping thing each of you after your kind. You have asked me to share your lots— Well, you can have me now! Not all of you, but one! The one who speaks first." It is not a gracious way of offering a man his heart's desire, and the most ardent lover might be pardoned a momentary hesitation. As fate will have it, it is not the man Mina loves, and hopes to wed, but Terry Fairweather who replies politely, "I shall do myself the pleasure of asking you to be my wife." Terry, however, loves his strangely won bride, and dies as speedily as decency permits leaving Mina apparently poor, though in reality a wealthy woman—a test designed by Terry for Hunter Mayne, Esson, and other unready lovers. We confess to a lukewarm interest in little Esson and his wooing of Mina; they are commonplace young people drifting to an inevitable end. The charm of the straggling story lies in the little by-plots, and in the pictures of life in Creelport; these the author can paint without effort and with the certainty of pleasing. Among the crowd of characters we greet some old acquaintances; the impecunious artists, the rough and faithful Scots servant, the gentle, absent-minded minister, and his bustling managing sister. In Mina's implacable enemy, the "Green Girl," the author gives us a clever study of wickedness and malice bordering on madness.

FINE ART

ALEXANDER BORISSOFF

ABOUT twenty years ago the Grand Duke Vladimir, when visiting the Solovetsk monastery on the shores of the White Sea, was favourably impressed by the painting of a young peasant employed by the brothers to decorate their shrines and colour their holy images. Under the patronage of the Grand Duke, the artist came to St. Petersburg and studied for ten years, first at a school of painting and afterwards at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. But the heart of Alexander Borissoff was in the far north, and so soon as he became a full student of the Academy (in 1895), he withdrew from St. Petersburg and made his first expedition to Nova Zembla. Thence he returned with a number of sketches, many of which were purchased by a Moscow collector, and three years later he made preparations for a longer visit to the arctic circle. With Imperial aid he built a small yacht at Archangel, and sailed with two scientific companions to Nova Zembla, where he built a house and remained a year and a half, making expeditions farther north and returning with difficulty after terrible privations and hazardous adventures. To these adventures there will be an opportunity to recur, since we are promised an English translation of the artist's memoirs, published by the Imperial Geographical Society of St. Petersburg, and for the present we are more immediately concerned with Borissoff the painter than with Borissoff the explorer. Nevertheless, before considering the artistic fruits of this expedition—a large collection of paintings and sketches which, having been shown in Paris, Vienna, Berlin and other Continental cities, are now on exhibition at the Grafton Galleries—it is necessary to take some account of the conditions in which these paintings were made. The extreme cold rendered it impossible for the artist to employ during the winter any media except charcoal and pastel. Even in spring his oil colours congealed, and turpentine, the only possible medium, became frozen. "I had to put on fur gloves to hold the brush," says Mr. Borissoff, "and to work with rapid, energetic strokes. There were moments when my hands were frozen, and refused service, my brush splitting with the cold. Yet I continued, having the ardent desire to fix on the canvas all those fantastic phenomena of the Far North so full of fascinating charm."

The beauty of these phenomena which few have seen, the leaden stretches of frozen marshes, the black waters of the arctic sea, the prismatic hues of iridescent icebergs, the dazzling sunshine and transparent shadows of a land clarified by its rarefied atmosphere, are feelingly recorded by Mr. Borissoff in a series of sketches whose fidelity to nature is as self-evident as their beauty; and their truthfulness gives them a high topographical value to a wider public than the devotees of art. To these last Mr. Borissoff's exhibition, apart from its geographical importance, will have a special interest as a manifestation of the advantages of plein-air painting even when practised in extremely adverse circumstances. They will find in these sketches made on the spot charms which the larger pictures, subsequently painted at St. Petersburg, do not possess, charms arising not only from the greater spontaneity and freedom of the sketches, but from the frequent presence in them of a more subtle appreciation of values and of a finer quality of pigment. The very difficulty of mixing paints in this climate helped to preserve the purity of colour in the sketches, and may thus be held at least partially to account for their greater brilliancy and lustre. Obviously an emotional rather than an intellectual painter, Mr. Borissoff works best when he is forced to go by his instinct, when he has no time to remember the rules of the schools, but, relying solely on his eye and the power of his hand, dashes on to the canvas the leading motives and principal harmonies of a beautiful aspect. When in his studio, he endeavours to paint a more highly finished picture from one of these sketches his gift of viewing the arctic world steadily and as a whole seems to fail him; from being happily suggestive and poetic he tends to become statistical and prosaic, and such studio pictures as A Cemetery (103), lent by the Czar, and The Dwelling-place of the Samoyede (233), lent by Count de Witte, seem almost commonplace beside sketches like The Coast (215), with its just notation of vivid sunlight and transparent shadows, or Ice-blocks floating in the Straits of Matochkin-Shar (33), with its vibrating loveliness of refracted light and reflected colours. In these brighter, higher-keyed aspects of nature, Mr. Borissoff interprets the sharpness of hue produced by brilliant sunlight shining through dry, pure air without allowing his actual colour to become harsh or acrid, while in more sombre sketches like Hunting Seals (24), in which the deep purple-grey waters of the arctic ocean occur, he contrives to use tints warm in themselves to convey to the spectator the idea of great cold. It is this mastery of his medium to express what is intended in the simplest and most direct way which constitutes the great artistic interest of Mr. Borissoff's exhibition, and this mastery is found more often in the scores of unpretentious sketches on the walls than in the larger pictures which, whether seen by daylight or by an ingenious system of artificial illumination, are more calculated to appeal to the mere sight-seeing public.

MUSIC

PIANO RECITALS

It may be that the number of pianists who are now to be heard in London concert-rooms is not really greater than usual, but in the dearth of other musical events they have seemed in the last week or two remarkable. Mr. Leonard Borwick has broken silence with a series of recitals, the programmes of which are made up of the great things of piano literature, such as he has always kept steadily before himself and his audiences. In addition, some transcriptions of organ works by Bach give further interest, and, being arranged by the player, naturally reflect Bach's spirit more truly than do many pianist's arrangements. Besides these we have had a striking series of recitals of works by one composer given by Mr. Gottfried Galston, which came to an end last week with one on the works of Brahms; and on Saturday Mr. Frederic Lamond gave another recital.

Mr. Galston's programme included Brahms's biggest two sets of variations; at the beginning those on a theme by Handel, op. 24, at the end both books of studies on a theme by Paganini. Between these two main pillars were placed the two rhapsodies of op. 79, Brahms's last work for piano op. 119 (four short pieces ending with the rhapsody in E flat), and some of the waltzes of op. 39. This made a representative programme, though it did not include a sonata. It excluded in fact the first phase of Brahms's piano compositions, but began at the point of his technical maturity. In the Handel variations Mr. Galston brought out with wonderful clearness the individuality of each one. The beauty of his playing lies chiefly in his use of middle qualities of piano tone. His fortissimo is often hard and unyielding, as was specially shown in the rhapsody in B minor, and his pianissimo is apt to be vague and characterless; it was so in the first intermezzo of op. 119. But in mezzo-forte and mezzo-piano passages he is rich in varieties of tone, and this stood him in good stead in both the sets of variations, but especially in the earlier one in which technical difficulties do not hold so important a place. The subtle intertwining of parts in number 2 of the set on Handel's theme, the grace of number 3, the pure melody in number 5, which develops into a two-part canon in the next, these with the many others which are expressive rather than ingenious, which involve command of tone rather than of acrobatic fingers, stood out in perfect shapeliness and beauty. The spirit of Paganini pervades the variations on his theme, and most of them demand accuracy and perfection of finger and wrist as a first qualification, rather than an intimate sense of beauty and power of expressing it. Sometimes Brahms cannot resist indulging in mystic effects of tone such as give point to numbers 11 and 12 of the first book, or breaking into lovely melody as in number 2 of the second book, but in the main the almost demoniacal cleverness of Paganini seems for the moment to have taken hold of him and we listen in wonder rather than delight.

It is always one of the difficulties of the pianist, as to some extent of the composer, to combine in a set of variations the two opposite principles of differentiation and continuity. Certain composers, for instance Schumann in his Études Symphoniques and Elgar in his "Enigma" variations, have aimed at independence in the several numbers as complete as a relationship to the parent theme will allow. Brahms, however, in many cases, and especially in the Handel variations, makes a definite point of connection between a variation and the one following it. Thus, as we saw, the melody of number 5 serves with alteration as a subject for canon in number 6; the rhythm set in number 7 continues with persistence through number 8, and many other less obvious cases could be pointed out. Variations so treated have something in common with the development which takes place in a sonata, where new aspects of the subject are arrived at by a gradual process of evolution, and are not merely placed side by side. This particular view of the Handel variations was more clearly demonstrated by Mr. Frederic Lamond, who also played them at his recital on Saturday. He has, of course, the advantage of Mr. Galston in age and experience; instead of inviting his audience to look closely at each beautiful feature as it appeared, he showed them a wide and far-reaching view. We were led from point to point, till, when the summit was reached in the splendid fugue which forms the climax, the whole view of the road we had traversed lay spread before us and its mighty plan was revealed. So played and so heard it is easy to see how the form of variations took the place of the piano sonata in Brahms's late compositions. He welcomed it in spite of its obvious disadvantage of monotonous tonality, since its other disadvantage of thematic monotony was no disqualification to him. To so fertile a mind it required a work of the length of an average sonata to develop the possibilities of a single theme. In this his mind was more akin to Bach than to Beethoven, as one could not fail to note when these variations were placed between the chromatic fantasia and the Appassionata sonata, as they were on Saturday. All three were played with the same breadth of outlook which, combined with perfection of detail, makes complete understanding, and the variations sounded no less a work than its companions.

As a composer's exercise, or as a display of his ingenuity and of the performer's skill, the form of variations has always been approved; in modern times it has been found suitable as a means of giving a thin line of continuity to a number of short pieces of separate individuality. But as the foundation for a great work of art it has not generally been held in high esteem, and few composers have regarded it with the same seriousness as did Brahms. Its difficulties must always prevent it from being popular, but that it can be thus used Brahms showed so thoroughly that there must be a future for it in this capacity. It demands of composer and of performer alike the power of using both microscope and telescope, if one may be permitted the simile; that is of subjecting the theme to the closest analysis while also taking that far-seeing view which is demanded of the composer of a sonata or a symphony. Brahms had this power in a peculiar degree; as an interpreter Mr. Lamond has it to some extent, but to few is it given.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

DETAILS are now announced of "The Student's series of historical and comparative Grammars," edited by Mr. Joseph Wright, Professor of Comparative Philology in the University of Oxford. The object of this series is to furnish students interested in historical and comparative grammar with handy volumes on the subject. The general editor has already secured the co-operation of the leading philologists in England, Germany and America, and it is confidently expected that during the present year authors will have been secured for the whole series, consisting of about twenty-five volumes. Two volumes—one dealing with phonology, morphology and inflections, and the other with syntax—will be devoted to Latin, Greek, French, German, English and Welsh. One volume will be devoted to each of the following languages and periods of languages: Sanskrit, Old Irish, Breton, Old French and Provençal, Old and Middle High German, Gothic, Old Icelandic, Old Saxon, Old English, Middle English, Old Italian dialects, Old Greek dialects, and Modern English dialects. The series will be printed at the Oxford University Press, and published by Henry Frowde. Vol. i. of the historical German grammar will be published in April; and two or three other volumes of the series will be ready by the end of 1907.

"The Library of First Principles" is the title chosen by Mr. Francis Griffiths for a new series of half-crown handbooks. As the title implies, the scope of the series is wide, embracing such subjects as lie outside the usual education, and yet are of sufficient interest to the intelligent public to create a desire for accurate yet concise and simple information. Of this series the first volume has already appeared under the title of "The Elements of Greek Worship," by Mr. S. C. Kaines Smith. Other volumes which are shortly to follow are: "English Church Architecture," by Mr. G. A. T. Middleton, A.R.I.B.A., vice-president of the Society of Architects and author of many well-known architectural works; "English Church History," by Mr. R. Ellis Roberts, B.A., author of "Faith and Freedom," and a volume on Greek Architecture by Mr. Kaines Smith. Volumes dealing with such widely diverse subjects as Precious Stones and Political Economy, International Law and Chamber Music are also foreshadowed.

Mr. Andrew Lang is editing an interesting book for Messrs. Jack entitled "Poet's Country." The contributors include Professor Churton Collins, Mr. W. J. Loftie, Mr. E. H. Coleridge, and others, and the book will deal with the various places in Britain associated with the poets, tracing their indebtedness to nature and their own immediate environment. One feature of this book, which will be issued in May, will be its fine series of reproductions from coloured drawings by Mr. F. S. Walker.

Mr. Edward Arnold's announcements of books to be published in March include Sir Charles Eliot's "Letters from the Far East," and a fourth series of Sir Herbert Maxwell's charming "Memories of the Months." Towards the end of the month a work by the Rev. Arthur Galton, vicar of Edenham and chaplain to the Earl of Ancaster, entitled "Church and State in France, 1300-1907," will appear. The author was formerly a Roman Catholic.

Mr. William Heinemann announces the following books for early publication: this week "The Country House," by John Galsworthy, the author of "The Man of Property"; on March 12 a further two volumes—"Peer Gynt," and "The Enemy of the People" and "Wild Duck"—of the complete copyright edition of Ibsen's works; and on March 15 "Countryside Chronicles," by S. L. Bensusan, with illustrations by Carton Moore-Park, and a volume entitled "Real Soldiers of Fortune," by Richard Harding Davis.

On March 12 Messrs. Smith Elder will publish "Sketches in Mafeking and East Africa," by Maj.-Gen. R. S. Baden-Powell. This book, from the lively pen and pencil of one who had he not been a brilliant soldier would have been an equally brilliant artist, is an informal record, profusely illustrated from a fertile sketch-book, of his recent journey to Southern Central Africa with the Duke of Connaught.

Early this month the same publishers will have ready a new volume by Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson. "Beside Still Waters" is an imaginary portrait, and traces, with a slender thread of biography, the evolution of a mystical and poetical type of character. There is nothing dramatic in the story, and the interest is mainly psychological. The development of the hero's mind and character is shown in the religious and artistic regions as well as on the ethical side.

On March 8 Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish a new novel by Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, entitled "Poison Island." It is a story of the year 1813 dealing with a hidden treasure. We need say no more.

Mr. Herbert M. Vaughan has written a book entitled "The Naples Riviera," which Messrs. Methuen will publish. The book describes in light vein the many places of beauty that lie upon the bays of Naples and Salerno, including the islands of Ischia and Capri. In the historical traditions—classical, mediæval, and modern—Mr. Vaughan has found many an interesting theme; nor are their literary associations neglected, for the names of Vittoria Colonna, the "Divine poetess of Ischia," of Torquato Tasso, and of Giovanni Boccaccio, that prince of story-tellers, appear in his pages. The folk-lore and superstitions of the peasants, the lives of the coral-fishers and macaroni makers, the dances, the luxuriant wild flowers, are among the varied matters of which Mr. Vaughan treats. The book will be profusely illustrated throughout by coloured reproductions of pictures by Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen.

"Stepping Westward," by "M. E. Francis," is a collection of short stories dealing with rustic life. The scene in some instances is laid in Dorset, and in others in a certain district of south-west Lancashire no less familiar to the author. "Westward" is a comprehensive term, and in this case affords scope for varying types, the characteristics of the Wessex peasant differing widely from those of his "horny-handed brother" dwelling north of the Dee. Messrs. Methuen are the publishers.

"The Truce in the East and its Aftermath," by Mr. B. L. Putnam Weale, which Messrs. Macmillan announce for early publication, forms a sequel to his previous book on "The Reshaping of the Far East." The text is divided into three parts. The first section, in nine chapters, deals exhaustively with "Japan and the New Position"; five chapters are then devoted to a statement of the position of China; and the third part describes how the interests of the Great Powers have been affected by the result of the struggle between Russia and Japan.

Strange as it may appear, no thorough and exhaustive life of Captain Cook has appeared since 1836, although much new information concerning his life and adventures has come to light since then. The "Life and Adventures of Captain Cook, R.N.," by Arthur Kitson, which Mr. John Murray has in the press, is an attempt to fill this gap, and gives a full record of his life, and his active service in the war in Canada in 1759, and of his voyages round the world.

Mr. Francis Griffiths will issue in a few days a volume of theological essays on the Person of Christ as influencing the life of the present day, to which Professors Adeney, Peake,

Allan Menzies and several other writers have contributed. The volume will appear under the title "Lux Hominum."

Mr. John Lane will publish on March 5 a "Life of Lord Chesterfield": An Account of the Ancestry, Personal Character, and Public Services of the Fourth Earl of Chesterfield, by Mr. W. H. Craig. Much has been written of Lord Chesterfield's wit, savoir faire, his peculiar system of practical ethics, his sallies into the field of literature, his theory of the "Graces," and his various questionable proclivities; but little has been said about those rarer and higher qualities which distinguished him as a valuable public servant, whose ability, zeal, energy, political foresight, incorruptibility and dexterity have placed England under an obligation to him which she is somewhat liable to forget. With a view to bringing these last-mentioned qualities into prominence, Mr. Craig has avoided dwelling on that side of the earl's character which is more generally known, save where the necessity of preserving the continuity of narrative has obliged him to do so. The volume contains numerous illustrations, including a photogravure portrait.

"Penn's Country and other Buckinghamshire Sketches" is the title of a new book by Mr. E. S. Roscoe, announced to be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. The work is accompanied by an itinerary, some interesting biographical notes and a full index. It will contain many illustrations of the locality, including photographs of buildings, a facsimile of Gray's manuscript of the "Elegy," and some portraits hitherto unpublished of celebrities of the district.

Yet another anthology! Mr. Edward Thomas has prepared for Mrs. Grant Richards an anthology of songs and ballads which will be issued shortly under the title of "The Pocket Book of Poems and Songs for the Open Air." The book is on entirely new lines; not only is it intended to serve as a country wayfarer's book, but in many cases the airs are given as well as the words. There will be love songs, drinking songs, marching songs, hunting songs, folk songs—for the greater part old songs to traditional airs.

Mr. Unwin will publish on March 4 Mr. Douglas Ford's book on "Admiral Vernon and his Times." The memoir of Admiral Vernon (the "Old Grog" of the days of George II.) will fill a gap in the biographies of naval celebrities. Vernon was a fighting man, both at sea and in Parliament, and the story of his career, in the light of great national events, should prove extremely interesting. The memoir is in the nature of a vindication, with sidelights on the Parliamentary intrigues of Sir Robert Walpole and others (in relation mainly to the Navy under the first two Georges). The author has had access to valuable family and official records, and the book is abundantly illustrated. Vernon, it will be remembered, earned his nickname by courageously abolishing the pernicious naval custom of drinking raw spirits.

Mrs. Grant Richards has ready for immediate publication, under the title of "Seeing and Hearing," a new volume of essays by Mr. G. W. E. Russell, author of "Collections and Recollections," "Social Silhouettes," etc.

Messrs. Bell will publish shortly a revised translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. It is based on the well-known version of Dr. Giles, but it has been submitted to a thorough revision by Miss A. M. Sellar, who has also added a considerable number of explanatory notes.

"An American Girl in India" is the title of a book by Shelland Bradley, author of "The Doings of Berengaria," which will shortly be published by Messrs. Bell. It gives a humorous picture of Anglo-Indian life, and describes the brilliant pageant of Lord Curzon's great Durbar from an American point of view.

Mr. John Long will publish shortly a novel entitled "The Sweets of Office," by Violet Tweedale. It is, the publisher informs us, "a merciless exposure of political insincerity." O Tempora! O Mores!

Messrs. Ward, Lock announce for early publication a new novel by the late Archibald C. Gunter, entitled "'Twixt Sword and Glove," a story of France in the seventeenth century.

As a companion series to their "Panel-Books" Messrs. Sisley's, Ltd., have in preparation for publication this month a series devoted to standard fiction, which is to be known as the "Novel-Books." The first twelve "Novel-Books" will include "Wuthering Heights," "The Black Tulip," "The Vicar of Wakefield," "Salammbô," "Christie Johnstone," "Oliver Twist," "Sapho," "A Sentimental Journey," "Silas Marner," "Tales from the Decameron," and "Cranford." The price of each volume is to be half a crown net.

CORRESPONDENCE

HENRY FIELDING'S LIBRARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me space to thank Mr. Austin Dobson for his courteous correction. Although familiar with some of his "Eighteenth Century Vignettes," I have not come across the one in which he has recorded his valuable discovery about Fielding's books. I shall certainly make acquaintance with it on the first opportunity.

Travelling, lately, through Fielding's works, I thought it might be of interest to form from his own lips (as it were) an idea of the extent of his reading. For a man whose classical training appears to have ended when he left school, his erudition is remarkable. This fact and the (to me) new one furnished by Mr. Dobson may incline us to suspect that the traditional estimate of his character is vitiated by exaggeration.

It would be interesting to know where "the little parlour" was. Tradition says "Tom Jones" was written at Twerton, near Bath. Perhaps here also Mr. Dobson may be able to give us something more satisfying than tradition?

H. C. M.

February 23.

A FIELDING BIBLIOGRAPHY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following additions to the Fielding Bibliography, which appeared in your issue for February 6, may perhaps be welcome to the readers of the ACADEMY.

The translation of "Tom Jones" into Dutch, mentioned there, is the one by M. P. Lindo, published in 1862. But I find amongst my books the second edition, dated 1768, of a Dutch translation by P. le Clercq, a distinguished scholar in his time, who did much towards making his countrymen acquainted with eighteenth-century English literature. Neither is reference made to an English edition of "Tom Jones" in three volumes, which I have in my possession. This edition was printed in Edinburgh by Martin and Wotherspoon, 1767. I am sure that the list of translations given in the Bibliography is capable of being enlarged. In Holland at least Fielding was far better known in the eighteenth century than he would appear to have been from the list. I have a Dutch translation of "Amelia" by Verwer, printed in 1758, and in Fred. Muller's valuable catalogue of Dutch popular prose writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth century I find mentioned one of "Joseph Andrews," printed in 1776. In my collection I have also copies of French translations of "Jos. Andrews" and "Jon. Wild," both published in Geneva in 1781 by Nouffer de Rodon et Compagnie. Both books are included in a "Bibliothèque des Romans Anglois," for the translation of which the Swiss publishers secured the help of an English lady, who in a "Lettre d'une Dame, Angloise à madame —, épouse de M —, maître des Comptes de Montpellier," prefixed to "Joseph Andrews," claims to have written the translation and also gives some explanations of English customs and peculiarities of the period, described by Fielding, for the better information of the French reader.

Her assistance, however, was apparently dispensed with in the following year, for the publishers then produced "La Vie de David Simple" and in 1783 "Aventures de Roderik Random," both of which were introduced to the French public as "Oeuvres de M. Fielding."

A. J. BARNOUW.

The Hague.

CHÂTEAUBRIAND IN SUFFOLK

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—To aid the research of Mr. Dick, who—ACADEMY No. 1816, page 100—asked for information herein, I may say that Wharton's "English Poetry," London. 1840 (vol. i. page clii. Dissert. iii.) says: "Monfaucon, among the manuscripts of M. Lancelot, recites an old piece, written about the year 1500, 'La vie et fais de Marc Antoine le triumvir et de sa mie Cléopatra, translaté de l'historien Plutarque pour très illustre haute et puissante dame Madame Françoise de Fouez, Dame de Châteaubriand.' I know not whether this piece was ever printed."

Wharton proceeds to say that perhaps Shakespeare had this work among his materials for "Antony and Cleopatra," lately discussed in your columns.

H. H. JOHNSON

February 23.

GRAMMATICAL PUZZLES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been much interested from time to time in your correspondence on different points of grammar, etc. I have been hoping to see some remark on sentences such as "I want it cooking" where I naturally would use "cooked"—or again "I want this boy's hair cutting—it is much too long." Sentences such as "Your hair wants cutting" are perfectly familiar to me, but I should not know how to parse the form in "ing" in the first series. I have heard it used by so many people, and if it is correct, I should be glad if one of your readers could explain it to me.

I should also like to know if there is any justification for the use of "get" in sentences like "I wanted to go to town to-day but I could not 'get'!"

PUZZLED.

February 25.

"ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA AND HER TIMES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—You do not seem quite to have understood my letter of February 13. I will, therefore, try to make my point a little plainer.

The author of "St. Catherine of Siena and Her Times" placed a certain passage, on page 34, between inverted commas. By doing so she acknowledged that the passage was a quotation.

But your critic, having selected this passage, presents it without its quotation marks, and, in that imperfect condition, uses it to substantiate the charge of plagiarism which he brings against the author. He must have known that in the book the marks of quotation were there.

To say, as you do, that the printing of the passage "in small type" rendered the author's inverted commas "superfluous," is, I think, to speak beside the mark. The passage being printed in small type, in the ACADEMY critique, merely meant that the words were not the ipsissima verba of the critic, but an extract from the book he was reviewing. But the extract, as it stands, is, I maintain, misleading; for the absence of the inverted commas conveys the impression that the author of "St. Catherine of Siena and Her Times" wished to pass off this particular paragraph as her own; whereas a glance at page 34 of her book will show that she had no such intention. It would have been more chivalrous on the critic's part had he admitted as much.

C. E. HUTCHINSON.

February 23.

[The inverted commas omitted by our reviewer form no acknowledgment that the passage was a quotation from another writer; they show only that the author is quoting the words of an old Italian who is speaking. Mr. Heywood also uses them. Their inclusion or omission does not in any way affect our criticism.—ED.]

THE ATTIC CANON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of February 2, Mr. T. Nicklin speaks of those "degenerate pedants who do not recognise that a general use stamps a phrase as Attic, however the grammarian may explain the facts." Among such phrases he instances "like" used for "as"—the split infinitive—and "very pleased." He might have added, as in equally general use, the idioms "those sort of things," "a great lot," "without" used for "unless," and the sloppy feminine abuse of such adjectives as "awful," "funny" and "nice."

Must we not discriminate—both as to the colloquialisms we are to admit as Attic, and as to the class of persons who are to establish this "general use"? Mr. Nicklin, having quoted the late Queen, suggests the ladies as our models. Shall we not find, if we look into the matter, that it is the Gamps, and Malaprops of this life, that originate these solecisms, slur over distinctions, misuse epithets, and so tend to level down the standard of English? Preciosity may be overdone perhaps by some "degenerate pedants," but are the "bas peuple" to be our leaders? We have no "Académie" to control our diction with authority, but we have the ACADEMY, which will surely, in Pater's words, "with all the jealousy of a lover of words, resist a constant tendency on the part of the majority of those who use them to efface the distinctions of language."

GERALD M. TAYLOR.

February 20.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—I am glad to see that there are other people besides myself who will not accept the dictum that the split infinitive must not be used. It has always seemed strange to me that when we borrowed so much from the classics to the general enrichment of our language, this particular usage should be barred. We study Demosthenes for polished oratory, and yet are not to imitate him in one of his most powerful and pregnant turns of speech. The "last word" is never said on any subject, and I do not think the split infinitive is as dead as some people would like to see it simply because they have committed themselves to signing its death warrant.

π.

THE "SEX" NOVEL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While mildly agreeing with W. B. T., in his protest against novels of the sex problem order I do not see why he should be afraid to give a present of "A Cornish Idyll" to his young friend, who I presume from the tenor of his letter is a maid outside a convent. Now, for his edification and instruction the following experience I relate with unbecoming sincerity. The other week a lady friend—aged twenty-one—asked me if I had read "The Story of a Heart." "By Richard Jefferies?" I queried instantly with my back quivering erect and my eyes staring into her own violet blue depths. "No, surely!" I asked of myself, can she have read "The Story of my Heart"? She had not. And she gave me the book. As in W. B. T.'s case the title was lamentably misleading. It was a book on the sex question. And she asked me how I liked it. My criticism elicited the fact that she loved books dealing with passion, and she was eager to know other authors who wrote about these things. She is now devouring George Moore, Hardy, Balzac, etc. etc., with an incommensurable "lending-library" swiftness and a glad joy that will receive its hors de combat in a gluttonous attack on Rabelais—if I have my way. And thereafter, if I still have my way, either the "Life of Madame Guyon" or the "Confessions of Rousseau" will make fastidious her animal tastes in human nature literature. Human nature I believe is the only subject worthy close scrutiny by our novelists.

With numerous call our novelists wail
The sins over-tall, the passions of hell,
That men at the Fall—wholesale and retail—
Permitted to crawl ahint on the trail.

They paint as they preach in bloodiest paint
Desires that screech, which makes the soul faint:
Though suckling the leech we make the complaint
That novelists breach the shell of the saint.

In any case it is the spirit of the age—Passion, Soul,
Psychology, and piteous Ice.

ROBERT MACGREGOR.

February 24.

THE TRIUMPH OF MAN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Instead of the heading: "Some Protests and an Appreciation" your reviewer "A.D." in yesterday's ACADEMY might have headed his reviews with the more accurate and sensational legend:

"Poets butchered to afford a Reviewer's holiday!"

Seriously, I submit that the methods used by your reviewer "A. D." are unworthy of a high-class literary journal. He designates my "Triumph of Man" as "the noisiest poem for its size" that he has "ever read," and proceeds to complain of the "amount" of "crashing and riving and roaring and groaning and bursting and thundering" which it contains, and then, to demonstrate the justice of his complaint he quotes, quite inaptly, nineteen lines from a speech of the Volcanoes! Now, as a matter of fact, the word "rive" or "riving" is not once used throughout the whole of my poem; and it may be an interesting revelation to your reviewer to be informed that the "noisy" and very expressive words to which he takes exception are peculiarly appropriate when applied to the action of volcanoes!

If, as I suspect, your reviewer disagrees with my theological or socialistic teachings why did he not say so in a straightforward manner, instead of unjustly exhibiting his own smartness at my expense and damning my book with very faint and ironical praise?

In justice to myself I trust that you will kindly publish this letter.

PERCY SCHOFIELD.

February 24.

[The description of the poem as a noisy one was solely in reference to its literary quality.—A.D.]

"ESPERANTO" OR "UNIVERSAL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—That well-advertised international language, Esperanto, has now had a good chance to prove its merits, but has not succeeded in convincing the world that it possesses all those qualities which are indispensable before it can be accepted as the best possible solution of the problem.

In some respects it is undeniably admirable. Its grammatical structure is as simple as can well be conceived, and its excellent system of terminations and inflections is certainly a marvel of ingenuity on the part of its creator, Dr. Zamenhof.

Nevertheless it is not what one instinctively feels to be the ideal. It is repulsive in appearance; its rules, though simple, have all to be learned by heart before one can even make a beginning; and, above all, the words are taken from such a variety of sources that it is quite impossible to construct a sentence without reference to the dictionary, and difficult to translate one. Moreover, these words have been chosen arbitrarily by the author, who, however, will not tolerate any alteration, but declares that they must be taken just as they are. He has also gone out of his way quite needlessly to introduce a number of new characters, necessitating heavy initial expense before the language can be printed.

Some better solution of the problem must therefore be, and indeed has been found, and that simply by the exercise of a little common sense. It must not be forgotten that Latin was a generally recognised international language, as it still is within the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church. And it would again be adopted by acclamation but for the one drawback which has already brought about its discontinuance. This is its extreme difficulty, necessitating several years' hard study before it can be spoken fluently.

If, however, Latin could be relieved of its complicated grammar, its vocabulary simplified, its anomalies abolished, and such new words added from its daughter tongues, the Romance languages, as time and experience have proved to be necessary or expedient, we should have at once that very ideal language which all of us increasingly feel the need of.

Many linguists have been working towards realising the ideal of a Neo-Latin, but the most perfect solution seems to have been set forth by Dr. Molenaar of Munich, who has published a grammar and dictionary of his proposed language "Universal," at the price of 1s. post free. His scheme is, however, only tentative, and, unlike Dr. Zamenhof, he welcomes suggestions towards its improvement.

The main advantage of Universal is that it can be read easily at first sight by any one who knows Latin, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese or French, and by any intelligent man who can only speak English. Indeed there are thirty thousand words which are common to all western languages, and it is only necessary to put these into a uniform Neo-Latin orthography to have half our new language constructed at once.

To give an idea of the language I will write the rest of this letter in that idiom: "Universal es el plus facil e el plus simpl mund-ling; es komprensibl sin stud a tut eduket European o Amerikan; hav el plus simpl e regular gramatik imaginabl; hav un vokabular pro el plus grand part komun a tut lingi oriental; es non min facile parlet ke skribet; es aprendet in pank hori; es plus brev ke ul lingi vivent o mort; es equale bon a fini szientifik, literar, e komercial.

EVACUSTUS A. PHIPSON.

DR. SCHORSTEIN AND MEDICAL EDUCATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We shall be grateful if you will spare us space to advocate simultaneously the claims of Medical Education at the London Hospital Medical College and a memorial to one of the most prominent Physicians at that College,

The colleagues and friends of the late Dr. Schorstein are anxious to perpetuate his memory by the endowment of an advanced course of lectures in Clinical Medicine which, it has long been recognised, is one of the greatest needs of the greatest needs of the Medical School. It is not intended to create by this a course to form part of the ordinary school curriculum, but rather something on the lines of the endowed lectureships at the Royal College of Physicians, such as the Goulstonian.

It is proposed that a course or courses of three or four lectures be given by a Physician to be elected by the governing body of the School. The number of lectures and the remuneration will be determined by the amount of the money raised, but we wish to make clear (1) that the election to the lectureship will be regarded as a professional distinction, (2) that due notice will be given so as to afford the lecturer ample time to prepare a discourse worthy of the subject and of the man in whose memory it is given.

Subscriptions, large or small, may be sent to the Hon. Secretaries of the Fund: Dr. Cholmeley, 11 Portland Place W.; Dr. Cecil Wall, 6 Cavendish Place, W.; or to the Manager, Barclay's Bank, 27 Cavendish Square W. They will be acknowledged on a numbered receipt form, but no list of either donors or amounts will be published as this, it is felt, would have been in accordance with Dr. Schorstein's wish.

Dr. Cecil Wall will be pleased to supply further details of the scheme on application.

SAMUEL MONTAGU STEPHEN MACKENZIE
LEWIS McIVER WILLIAM OSLER
C. H. DORRING PERCY KIDD.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

- Sir Edward Burne-Jones*. Second series. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 7$. Pp. 48. Newnes, 3s. 6d. net.
[In the "Art Library."]
Gillat, Louis. Raphael. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. 188. Paris: Librairie de l'Art ancien et moderne, 3f.50.
["Les Maitres de l'Art."]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS

- Clark, Henry Martyn. Robert Clark of the Punjab. Pioneer and Missionary Statesman. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 364. Melrose, 7s. 6d. net.
Women of the Second Empire. Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III., Compiled from Unpublished Documents by Frédéric Loliée. Translated by Alice M. Irving, with an Introduction by Richard Whiteing. $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 371. Lane, 21s. net.
[Fifty-one portraits—three in photogravure.]

CLASSICS

- Pervigilium Veneris*. Latine Incerti Auctoris. Graece Hugonis H. Johnson. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Oxonii: Blackwell, n.p.
[Paper covers.]

FICTION

- London, Jack. White Fang. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 310. Methuen, 6s.
Magnay, Sir William. The Amazing Duke. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 311. Unwin, 6s.
Jennings, E. W. Under the Pompadour. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 328. Unwin, 6s.
Colton, Arthur. The Belled Seas. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 312. Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d.
A Suffragette's Love-Letters. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 159. Chatto & Windus, 1s. net.
Tales for the Homes. By Various Authors. With 3 portraits. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 328. Chatto & Windus, 5s. net.
Urquhart, M. The Wheel. A Book of Beginnings. $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 310. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.
Burgess, W. V. Cheshire Village Stories. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 244. Sherratt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net.
[Twelve short stories.]
Galsworthy, John. The Country House. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 296. Heinemann, 6s.
Crosbie, Mary. Disciples. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 319. Methuen, 6s.
Francis, M. E. Stepping Westward. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 297. Methuen, 6s.
[Fourteen short stories.]
Griffiths, Major Arthur. Agony Terrace. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 310. White, 6s.
Hume, Fergus. The Yellow Hunchback. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 312. White, 6s.
Barrett, Frank. The Obliging Husband. From the Narration of Robin Fairfellow. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 354. Chatto & Windus, 2s. 6d. net.

LITERATURE

- The Shirburn Ballads, 1585-1616*. Edited from the MS. by Andrew Clark. $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 380. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d. net.
[The MS., the contents of which are now made public, is one of the treasures of the Earl of Macclesfield's library at Shirburn Castle, Oxfordshire. This edition exhibits the actual text of the MS. in its present order, with the minimum of change or omission. Corruptions are corrected in the footnotes. Most of these ballads are new.]
Melton, Wightman Fletcher. The Rhetoric of John Donne's Verse. 9×6 . Pp. 209. Baltimore: J. H. Furst Co., n.p.
[A dissertation submitted to the Board of University Studies of the Johns Hopkins University in conformity with the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.]
Wright, Thomas. The Life of Walter Pater. With 78 plates. 2 vols. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. 545. Everett & Co., 24s. net.
Raleigh, Walter. Samuel Johnson. 9×6 . Pp. 27. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. net.
[The Leslie Stephen Lecture, delivered in the Senate House Cambridge, February 22, 1907.]

MISCELLANEOUS

- Balfour, Jabez Spencer. My Prison Life. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 376. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
Kern, Alfred Allan. The Ancestry of Chaucer. $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 163. Baltimore: The Lord Baltimore Press, n.p.
[A dissertation submitted to the Board of University Studies of the Johns Hopkins University in conformity with the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, 1906.]
Thorne, Guy. "I Believe," and other essays. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 311. White, 6s.
Pearson, Norman. Some Problems of Existence. $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 168. Arnold, 7s. 6d. net.
Addams, Jane. Newer Ideals of Peace. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 243. Macmillan, 5s. net.
[In "The Citizen's Library of Economics, Politics, and Sociology." Parts of two chapters have been delivered in America as addresses, and two have appeared as articles in American periodicals.]

MUSIC

- Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians*. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland. In five volumes—vol. iii. $9\frac{1}{2} \times 6\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 862. Macmillan, 21s. net.

POETRY

- Rossetti, William Michael. Democratic Sonnets, 2 volumes $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. xxxiv and xxxi. Alston Rivers, 1s. net each.
[Three only of these sonnets have been published before.]
Davis, Oswald. Town Moods. $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 74. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS

- Ramsay-Laye, Elizabeth. Hearts and Diamonds, or Was it an Error? White, 6s.
["A Society Idyll of the Victorian Period."]
Dickens, Charles. The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club 2 vols. Gaskell, Mrs. Cranford and The Moorland Cottage. Brown, Dr. John. Horae Subseclivae. Introduction by Austin Dobson. Jerrold, Douglas. Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures, and other Stories and Essays. Each $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4$. Frowde, 1s. net per vol.
[In "The World's Classics."]
Ruskin, John. Modern Painters (3 vols.); The Stones of Venice (3 vols.); Lectures on Painting and Architecture; The Seven Lamps of Architecture; The Elements of Drawing; "Unto this Last": Four Lectures on the First Principles of Political Economy; The Two Paths: being Lectures on Art and its Application to Decoration and Manufacture; The Political Economy of Art (subsequently called "A Joy for Ever"); Selections from the Writings of John Ruskin. Each $6\frac{1}{2} \times 4$. Routledge, 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

- The Fifth Gospel*: being The Pauline Interpretation of The Christ. By the author of "The Faith of a Christian." $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 223. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL

- Maxwell, George. In Malay Forests. $8 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 306. Blackwood, 6s. net.
[Six of the articles included in this volume have appeared in Blackwood's and other magazines.]

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS

Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO

ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

Maurice Maeterlinck

One of his delicate and characteristic
Fantasies, entitled "PERFUMES," is published in this week's issue of

THE SATURDAY
WESTMINSTER

W. Pett Ridge. Vernon Lee

The special contributions to this number also include "DRESSED
UP," a short story by W. Pett Ridge;
an article by Vernon Lee, entitled
"GOETHE AT WEIMAR";
and the continuation of the series of articles on "SOME PRINCIPLES
OF UNIVERSITY REFORM."

Saturday Westminster

March 2

Offices: Tudor Street, London, E.C.

"Old Grog."

ADMIRAL VERNON AND THE NAVY.

A Memoir and Vindication. By DOUGLAS FORD. With 15 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. Vernon was a fighting man, both at sea and in Parliament, and the story of his career, with its sidelights and the Parliamentary intrigues against him, make this one of the most interesting of recent biographies.

THROUGH SAVAGE EUROPE

By HARRY DE WINDT. With 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. "This fine book of travel," says the OUTLOOK.

LINKS IN MY LIFE ON LAND AND SEA

By Commander J. W. Gambier, R.N. Second Edition. 15s. net. The MORNING LEADER says this is "the raciest book of memoirs published for years." "To be read by all who enjoy rollicking relations of adventure," says the TIMES.

1. Romance.
2. Drama.
3. Realism.
4. Sentiment.

1. "The Amazing Duke." By Sir William Magnay, Bart. (6s.). A stirring romance of the time of Charles II., in which the Duke of Buckingham figures prominently.
1. "Under the Pompadour." By Edward W. Jennings (6s.). Strong passion and exciting incident mark this fine romance of the days of the Marquise de Pompadour.
2. "The Shulamite." By Alice and Claude Askew (6s.). A revised edition of this dramatic story, containing portraits of Miss Lena Ashwell and Mr. McKinnel.
3. "The Sacrifice." By Alphonse Courlander (6s.). "The Bystander" says: "It is, indeed, powerful."
4. "A Man's Love." By Dorothy Summers (6s.). "A clever and well-handled intrigue of courtship and love-making."—Scotsman.

T. FISHER
UNWIN, LONDON.

EAGLE

Established
1807.

INSURANCE COMPANY

LIVES.

ANNUITIES.

HEAD OFFICE :

79 PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

CITY :

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches :

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER.

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium ; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

*Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____
months. I enclose remittance value _____*

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The March BOOK MONTHLY, which is now ready, price 6d. net, contains a letter from Mr. Bryce telling how he came to write his famous book on the American Commonwealth. It has a note from Lord Rosebery on Napoleon as a reader, and an interview with Mr. H. W. Massingham on Men of Letters and the Spirit of Literature in Parliament at the present moment. Besides, the March BOOK MONTHLY has much good literary gossip, many illustrations; and all information about the books of to-day and to-morrow. — Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1818

MARCH 9, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

LEICESTER TOWN MUSEUM AND ART GALLERY.

THE Leicester Town Council are prepared to receive applications for the position of Curator.

The Curator must devote his whole time to the duties. Salary £250 per annum. No fees or other emoluments allowed.

Applications, stating age, qualifications, and previous experience to be sent to me accompanied by not more than three recent testimonials endorsed "Curatorship," on or before the 18th March.

Canvassing is strictly prohibited.

E. V. HILEY,
Town Clerk.

Town Hall, Leicester,
February 28, 1907.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

ASSISTANT EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE (20-25), APRIL 4.

THE date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 5a Pall Mall East, S.W.—The 25th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN DAILY, 10-6.

Admission, 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Books for Sale.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD Secondhand Copy of Knight's "Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser." 6 vols., 4to, cloth. Published at 45s., for 15s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Secondhand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

CLIMBS AND EXPLORATIONS in the CANADIAN ROCKIES, by Stutfield and Collie, with maps and illustrations, 8vo, cloth, new, published by Longmans, 1903; at 12s. 6d. net, for 5s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.

Publishers' Media.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.]

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullset Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER

ESTABLISHED 1808. DAILY AND WEEKLY.

The "Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE:

47 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Hotel

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER Proprietor.

From the DE LA MORE PRESS List

The Hanover Library of Fiction

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW EDITION.

A Duet. By Sir ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE.

Sixty-Ninth Thousand, in the Press. [Ready shortly]

The Octopus

By FRANK NORRIS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [New Edition now ready.]

"A remarkable book . . . colossally vigorous."—TIMES.

"It is a brave thing, and a decisive victory over all sentimentalism. It is alive. You cannot do what you like with it; you have got to read it."—ACADEMY.

The Pit

By FRANK NORRIS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [New Edition now ready.]

"A really striking novel."—SPECTATOR.

"His [Frank Norris's] literary methods were those of Zola . . . He had a fine feeling for the bigness of things, for the grandeur of nature, and for the absorbing interest of life, bare life, with its millions of conflicting and intersecting currents."—ATHENEUM.

Up from Slavery: Being the Autobiography of Booker T. Washington.

Author of "Working with the Hands," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

[New Edition in the Press. Ready shortly.]

"One of the most remarkable autobiographies of the day."—BLACK AND WHITE.

The Smaller Classics

Size of the volumes royal 32mo.

Bound in cloth gilt at 6s. net, and in leather gilt at 1s. net. [Ready shortly.]

In Memoriam

By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON.

[Ready shortly.]

The Quiet Hour Series

32mo, 1s. each net.

Daintily bound in white leatherette with gilt lettering, and especially suitable for presents.

By ROSE PORTER.

1. In Quietness and Confidence
2. Open Windows
4. Resting in His Love
5. Looking Towards Sunrise

English Church Needlework

By MAUD R. HALL. Illustrated. Crown 4to, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d.

"This charming got-up book contains over a hundred carefully executed illustrations of altar cloths, banners, copes, etc., from some of our most interesting churches and cathedrals, thus showing excellent examples of the highest standard of modern needlework."—CHURCHWOMAN.

State Experiments in Australia and New Zealand

By the Hon. W. P. REEVES, Agent-General for New Zealand. Two volumes. With two maps. Demy 8vo, cloth. 24s. net.

Hypnotism: its History, Practice and Theory.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s. net.

The chief aim of this monograph is to draw the attention of medical men to the therapeutic value of hypnotism.

A Notable Discovery by Mr. Robert Mond.

Aramaic Papyri: Discovered at Assuan

Edited by Prof. A. H. SAYCE, with the assistance of A. E. COWLEY; and with Appendices by W. SPIEGELBERG and SEYMOUR DE RICCI. Double crown folio, in portfolio, 1 Guinea net.

Burma: A Handbook of Practical, Commercial, and Political Information.

By Sir GEORGE SCOTT, K.C.I.E., Author of "The Burman: his Life and Notions." Special Cover Design, with many Illustrations and Map, Appendices on the Shan States, and other subjects. Crown 8vo, cloth 10s. 6d. net.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd., 32 George St., Hanover Sq., London, W.

GEORGE ALLEN'S LIST.

NEW WORK BY MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

LIFE AND FLOWERS

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top 5s. net. [March 15.]

The MEDEA of EURIPIDES

Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with Preface and Explanatory Notes. By Professor GILBERT MURRAY. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. 2s. net. [Just out.]

THE "LIBRARY EDITION" OF THE Life, Letters, and Complete Works of John Ruskin.

Edited, with Additions, from the Original Manuscript by E. T. COOK and ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

Consists of about 80 different Works in 38 Volumes, Illustrated with about 2000 Plates and Woodcuts, including over 100 Drawings by Ruskin not hitherto reproduced.

Issued in Chronological Order at Intervals of about 1 vol. per month.

LIMITED ISSUE. SOLD ONLY IN SETS.

26 Volumes Now Ready, 25s. each net.

Large medium 8vo (9½ by 6½), Holliston Cloth, uncut edges.

Volume XXVII.

FORS CLAVIGERA, 1874-2-3. Letters I. to XXXVI. 790 pages, with 11 Woodcuts, 16 Plates, and 2 Facsimiles of MSS. [March 12.]

London: GEORGE ALLEN, 156 Charing Cross Rd

A. CONAN DOYLE'S

GREAT

DETECTIVE STORIES

THE ADVENTURES OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.

With 25 Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 3s. 6d. By post, 8s. 10d.

ATHENEUM.—"For those to whom the good, breathless, detective story is dear Dr. Doyle's book will prove a veritable god-send."

THE MEMOIRS OF SHERLOCK HOLMES.

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 3s. 6d. By post, 8s. 10d.

LIVERPOOL MERCURY.—"Should become a favourite gift-book."

THE RETURN OF SHERLOCK HOLMES

6s. The Final Adventures of the Greatest Detective of Modern Fiction. Post free, 8s. 4d.

THE HOUND OF THE BASKERVILLES.

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. 6s. By post, 8s. 4d.

SPEAKER.—"A singularly ingenious and entertaining story, in which the plot is handled with a skill that does not make comparison with Wilkie Collins ridiculous."

THE SIGN OF FOUR.

An Earlier Adventure of Sherlock Holmes. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. By post, 8s. 10d.

ADVENTURES OF GERARD.

With 16 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN. 6s. By post, 8s. 4d.

THE EXPLOITS OF BRIGADIER GERARD.

With 24 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN. 3s. 6d. By post, 8s. 10d.

DAILY NEWS.—"Buoyant, vital, steeped in the stir and freshness of the open air, abounding in tragedy and gaiety. . . . It is a fascinating book and one to be read."

LONDON: GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S Announcements.

The Horse: A Pictorial Guide to its Anatomy. 110 Drawings (reproduced by Photo-Lithography) by HERMANN DITTRICH, with Explanatory Notes by Prof. ELLENBERGER and Prof. BAUM. In portfolio, quarto. 30s. net.

International Law as Interpreted During the Russo-Japanese War. By F. E. SMITH, M.P., B.C.L. Formerly Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and N. W. SIBLEY, LL.M., Trin. H. Cant., Barrister-at-Law. Royal 8vo, cloth. (Second Edition, Revised and Reset.) 25s. net.

Cobden as a Citizen. A Chapter in Manchester History. Containing a facsimile of Cobden's pamphlet, "Incorporate Your Borough!" with an Introduction and a Complete Cobden Bibliography, by WILLIAM E. A. AXON. With 7 Photogravure Plates and 3 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, half parchment. 21s. net.

Soldard of the Zambesi. The Lives of François and Christina Coillard, of the Paris Missionary Society (1834-1904). By C. W. MACKINTOSH. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, a Map, and 64 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 13s. net.

A Literary History of France. By EMILE FAGUET. Member of the French Academy. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Library of Literary History. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Forty Years of Washington Society. From the Letters and Journals of Mrs. SAMUEL HARRISON SMITH (Margaret Bayard). Edited by GAILLARD HUNT. With numerous Illustrations and Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

Admiral Vernon and the Navy. A Memoir and Vindication, with Sundry Side-lights. By DOUGLAS FORD. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

Old English Sports. By F. W. HACKWOOD. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

Through Savage Europe. By HARRY DE WINDT. With 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

Hungary: Its People, Places and Politics. The Journey of the Eighty Club in 1906. With 60 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 20s. 6d.

Conway and Coolidge's Climbers' Guides. Edited by Sir WILLIAM M. CONWAY and Rev. W. A. B. COOLIDGE. Gift bound, with pocket, flap and pencil. 32mo, limp cloth. 10s. each

NEW VOLUME.

The Bernese Oberland. Vol. III. The West Wing. By H. DUBI.

Bards of the Gael and Gail: Examples of the Poetic Literature of Erin, done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael. By GEORGE SIGERSON, M.D., F.R.U.I. Second Edition, Revised and enlarged. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

The Life of an Empire. By WALTER MEAKIN, B.A., LL.B. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

Spain and Her Artists. By FREDERICK H. A. SEYMOUR. Author of "Saunterings in Spain." With 16 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

The Real Australia. By A. J. BUCHANAN. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s.

Life and To-morrow. Edited by ZOË PROCTER. Crown 8vo cloth. 6s.

The Wit of the Wild. By ERNEST INGERSOLL. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

The Bible as English Literature. By J. H. GARDINER. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

Please send for a copy of Mr. Fisher Unwin's Spring Announcement List. Post free to any address on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

Westminster Abbey and the Kings' Craftsmen

By W. R. LETHABY, Author of "Mediæval Art." With upwards of 120 Illustrations and Photogravure Frontispiece. Royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen

By F. W. MAITLAND. With Photogravure Portraits. 18s. net. [2nd Edition at Press.

The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci

By EDWARD McCURDY, M.A. 13 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net. A most important contribution to literature. It reveals Leonardo's ideas on life, nature, art, poetry, and fantasy.

Life and Evolution

By F. W. HEADLEY, F.Z.S. With upwards of 80 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

Antonio Pollaiuolo

By MAUD CRUTTWELL. With 51 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. "A book of permanent value."—TIMES.

Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes

By LINA ECKENSTEIN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. A study of a branch of folk-lore, giving new interest and value to familiar things.

Perugino

By EDWARD HUTTON. With 50 Illustrations. Leather, 2s. 6d. net; Cloth, 2s. net.

HUMAN TOLL. By Barbara Baynton

Author of "Bush Studies." 6s.

"A brooding sense of acute tragedy informs every page. The story is a closely wrought study of child-life from infancy to dawning womanhood. The book has humour and genuine humour."—ATHENÆUM.

London: DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

With Introduction by ANDREW LANG. Specially written for this edition, and Photogravure Frontispiece ...

Cloth, gilt top, net. s. d.

Leather, gilt top, net. s. d.

2 0 3 0

THE STRANGE CASE OF DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE.

with other Fables. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ...

2 0 3 0

APOLOGIA PRO VITA SUA.

By JOHN HENRY CARDINAL NEWMAN ...

2 8 3 6

THE STORY OF MY HEART.

My Autobiography. By RICHARD JEFFERIES. With a Preface by C. J. LONGMAN and Portrait ...

2 0 3 0

SELECT EPIGRAMS FROM THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

(Text only.) Edited by J. W. MACGILL. [In March.

2 0 3 0

LETTERS TO DEAD AUTHORS.

By ANDREW LANG. [In April.

2 0 3 0

VOICES POPULI.

First Series. With 20 Illustrations by J. BERNARD PARTRIDGE. [In April.

2 0 6 0

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.,
39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.,
New York, Bombay and Calcutta.

Mr. Edward Arnold's New Books

New Novels by Clever Writers.

THE GOLDEN HAWK. By Edith Rickett, Author of "The Reaper" and "Folly."

ACADEMY.—"Miss Rickett is to be congratulated on the fact that the Hawk is always lovable, whether to be dancing with an old wife on the bridge of Avignon or rescuing his Madaleno through a convent window."

THE SUNDERED STREAMS. By Reginald Farrer, Author of "The House of Shadows."

EVENING STANDARD.—"A book of strong originality and striking outline. The blending of the absolutely normal with the thrillingly mysterious makes the book what it is. For the style, it is good, with many vitriolic thumbnail portraits, such as the description of the 'modern woman, who is perfectly virtuous, except in dress, manners, and mind.'"

BENEDICT KAVANAGH. By George A. Birmingham, Author of "The Seething Pot," and "Hyacinth."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"It is a splendidly interesting book, and incidentally contains many brilliant miniature studies of, among others, leaders of Orangeism, Catholic Priests, Dublin bounders, Gaelic Leaguers, silly girls, and proselytising enthusiasts."

NOTICE.—The SECOND VOLUME of the GREAT WORK on the Russo-Japanese War by Sir IAN HAMILTON is NOW READY in Large Quantities at all Booksellers' and Libraries. The First Volume is now in its 8th Thousand.

A Staff Officer's Scrap Book

By Lieut.-General Sir IAN HAMILTON, K.C.B.

With numerous Illustrations, Sketches, and Maps. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 18s. net each.

A PICNIC PARTY IN WILDEST AFRICA. Being a Sketch of a Winter's Trip to some of the Unknown Waters of the Upper Nile By C. W. L. RULPITT. With Illustrations and Map. Demy 8vo, 25s. 6d. net.

MEMORIES. By Major-General Sir Owen Tudor Burne G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

SOME PROBLEMS OF EXISTENCE. By Norman Pearson. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SIX RADICAL THINKERS: Bentham, J. S. Mill, Cobden, CARLYLE, MAZZINI and T. H. GREEN. By JOHN MACCUNN, LL.D., Professor of Philosophy in the University of Liverpool. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE PRINCES OF ACHAIA AND THE CHRONICLES OF MOREA. A Study of Greece in the Middle Ages. By Sir RENNELL RODD, G.C.V.O., K.C.M.G., C.B., British Minister at Stockholm. With Map. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 25s. net.

THUCYDIDES MYTHISTORICUS. By F. M. Cornford, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer at Trinity College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE NEXT STREET BUT ONE. By M. Loane, Author of "The Queen's Poor." Crown 8vo, 6s.

Forthcoming Books

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE, 1800-1907. By Arthur GALTON, Vicar of Edenham, and Chaplain to the Earl of Ancaster. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

LETTERS FROM THE FAR EAST. By Sir Charles Eliot, K.C.M.G., Author of "Turkey in Europe," "The East African Protectorate," etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. Fourth Series. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart. With Photogravure Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Nearly ready.]

TIPPOO TIB. The Story of a Central African Despot. Narrated from his own Accounts by Dr. HEINRICH BRODF. With Portrait. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

AT THE WORKS. A Study of a North Country Town. By Lady BELL. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Nearly ready.]

A HUNTING CATECHISM. By Col. R. F. Meysey-Thompson, Author of "A Fishing Catechism," etc. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S New and Forthcoming Books.

On MARCH 12. With several Coloured Plates and a large number of Half Tone and Line Illustrations. Oblong 4to, 21s. net.

Sketches in Mafeking and East Africa

By Major-General R. S. S. BADEN-POWELL, C.B., F.R.C.S. Author of "The Matabele Campaign," "Sport in War," etc.

*. An Informal record, profusely illustrated from a fertile sketch-book, of his recent journey to Southern Central Africa with the Duke of Connaught.

BESIDE STILL WATERS

By A. C. BENSON,

Author of "From a College Window" etc. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [On March 12.]

THE LETTERS OF ONE

A Study in Limitations.

By CHARLES HARE PLUNKETT.

Large post 8vo, 5s. net. [On March 12.]

THE PAPERS OF A PARIAH

By the Rev. FATHER HUGH BENSON,

Author of "The Light Invisible," "Richard Raynal, Solitary," "The Religion of the Plain Man," etc.

Large post 8vo, 5s. net. [On March 15.]

LETTERS of a BETROTHED, 1804-1813, during the German War of Liberation. By the Baroness EDITH VON CRAMM. Translated by LEONARD HUXLEY. With 2 Portraits. Large post 8vo, 5s. net. [In the press.]

A VISION OF INDIA. By SIDNEY LOW. Second Edition. With 32 pages of Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

Referring to Mr. SIDNEY LOW'S book, "A VISION OF INDIA," in the course of a review of another work, the "Spectator" mentions "the exceptional grasp and the power of concealing the weightiest of problems in the lightest of narratives which distinguish Mr. Sidney Low's recent book."

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

POISON ISLAND.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH ("Q.")

Author of "Dead Man's Rock," "The Splendid Spur," "Shakespeare's Christmas and Other Stories," "Sir John Constantine," etc.

*. A story of the year 1813, dealing, in "Q's" inimitable style, with a hidden treasure."

[Just published.]

AMALIA. By GRAHAM HOPE, Author of "A Cardinal and his Conscience," "The Triumph of Count Ostermann," "The Gage of Red and White," etc.

The "Academy" says: "The ability, freshness, and honesty of this captivating story should recommend it to all lovers of a good novel."

THE ULTRAMARINES: A Story of Colonial Life. By COLONEL A. [In the press.]

THE PRINCE'S VALET. By JOHN BARNETT. [In the press.]

WINDOVER TALES FROM THE MARSH AND HEATH. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE, Author of "The White Cockade," etc. [On April 25.]

FRAULEIN SCHMIDT AND MR. AN-STRUTHER. By the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden." [On May 8.]

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

LONDON: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43 MADDOX ST., W:

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . .	229	A Period of Tragedies . . .	247
The White Pavilions . . .	231	The Library Table . . .	248
Literature :		The Essentials of Aesthetics . . .	249
The Shirburn Ballads . . .	232	A Literary Causerie :
An Unnecessary Blake . . .	232	With Double Tongues . . .	250
Facit Indignatio Versus . . .	233	Fiction	251
Literary Forgeries . . .	234	Drama :
The Eye Witness . . .	235	"Hedda Gabler" at the Court
Modes et Robes . . .	245	Theatre	252
Anglo-Saxon Origins . . .	246	Correspondence	254

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

Now that the ex-Viceroy of India is a candidate for the Chancellorship of Oxford University it is interesting to recall his own undergraduate days when, among other things, he was a poet. Most men write poetry at a University. They cannot help themselves, for who is there who would not be inspired by the sight of venerable buildings with ancient traditions of the very best? Veritable monuments to literature! Lord Curzon contributed three poems to a slender publication, entitled, "Waifs and Strays: A Terminal Magazine of Oxford Poetry. Vol. i. 1879-80." Two of the poems are just what any young man of twenty would be expected to write, but in "Clairvoyance" a good idea is well expressed.

A few verses may be quoted without doing any damage to Lord Curzon's chances in the forthcoming election.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

The Autumn sun was dying,
Glowed with its light the scene,
The crimson sky, and the sable earth.
And the flood of gold between.

But she thought not of the sunset,
To its pomp her eyes were dim—
His country's call had drawn his sword:
She thought alone of him.

In the distant Asian passes
The banner of England blew,
Beneath its folds she saw him fight:
Fighting he saw her too.

The golden flood was darkened,
A shadow before her came:
Within the room the warrior stood,
Outside the great red flame.

A cry broke on the stillness:
"Great God!"—she reeled and fell—
And the sun dropped down, and the sky grew black
With the gloom of a death-like spell.

In the distant Asian passes
A pale corpse faced the sky.
One life the less, one death the more—
Strange spirit-tragedy!

It is, indeed, strange how fate changes, or should we say disguises, the temperament of a man. In this old volume of Oxford poetry may be found several poems by the late Sir Clinton Dawkins, who earned fame as the financial adviser to the Egyptian Government and later as the English representative of Mr. John Pierpont Morgan. All his contributions are avowedly sentimental, notably the best, which bears the inscription: In Memory of Hermann Schultz, died at Palermo, 1875, aged 23. His Great aim was to interpret the Divina Commedia into music. Death took him when he had just finished the "Inferno." The most industrious of these young poets was "R. R." (Rendell Rodd), while M. K. Macmillan and Herbert Bentley Freeman also figure prominently in the book. "G. L. G.," "B. H.," and "W." disguise the personalities of Lord Curzon's contemporaries. Perhaps old Oxford men will recognise them.

The Net Book Conference held under the auspices of the Library Association recently took place at Hanover Square. The Library Association wished to remain on good terms with the publishers, booksellers, and authors. Special interest attaches to the report of the annual meeting of the American Publishers' Association, particularly to clause four, which allows the booksellers in the United States to give a discount on net books to public libraries in that country. Mr. Tedder, Athenæum, was in the chair. The problem is to lay out the money entrusted to public library authorities in the best possible way. The books purchased by public libraries are those which the users of these institutions would not buy for themselves. There is no comparison between the buyers of single books and public libraries, who buy several copies, according to Mr. Topley, Croydon.

There is no other trade in which large purchasers do not receive favourable consideration. Last year the Manchester Public Libraries spent over three thousand pounds in books. There were no bad debts to be risked and every facility was given to the booksellers. The libraries and the Association sustain and promote the production of the better class of books, and the purchases of the more than six hundred public libraries of the country go a long way to covering the initial cost. In the circumstances, publishers should receive a deputation, argues Mr. Abbott, Manchester. Cardiff has determined to do something to co-operate with other libraries to get fair treatment. It is a mistake to attack the public library on the ground that it has no "right." Professor Jevons described it as a great co-operative effort on the part of the community. And there are more books bought by private purchasers through the influence of the public library than from any other source, says Mr. Ballinger, Cardiff.

Since the net book system was introduced, the discount on other books to public libraries had increased to 40 per cent. There may be certain districts in which the establishment of a public library stimulates the sale of books, but there are others in which it breaks down the book trade. If there is no exception made in the sale of net books no one can object, according to Mr. Kea, President of the Associated Booksellers. Libraries have a certain sum of money, and cannot spend more than that amount. Therefore the publishers do not suffer, and the booksellers do not gain, says Mr. Plummer, Manchester.

The Publishers' Association has appointed a sub-committee to consider the question. And the Library Association Committee was considerably increased, with the object of giving effect to the following resolutions which were passed with only seven dissentients: (1) that this conference, representing various public and other non-commercial libraries of the country is of opinion that the present system of net book supply presses unfairly upon these institutions which exist for the public benefit, and urges upon the Publishers' Association the desirability of allowing special terms to this class of buyer: (2) That a committee of this conference be appointed to bring the foregoing resolution before the Publishers' Association: (3) That in the event of the reply of the Publishers' Association being unsatisfactory the Committee is instructed to prepare and submit some scheme of co-operation amongst Public Libraries.

A number of interesting additions to the Tate Gallery have been grouped together in Room X., where the late C. W. Furse's unfinished equestrian portrait of Lord Roberts has also recently been hung. The Keeper and Trustees have to be congratulated on their purchase of The Music Lesson, a beautiful example of the gifted but neglected Frank Potter (1845-87); and also on their acceptance of a septette of water-colours by the late H. B. Brabazon, which illustrate the development of that master's art from the careful and precise drawing of the early Tivoli, through his De Wint period, to his final magic of suggestive colour-touches as The Pink Palace. Mr. Will Rothenstein's impressive Jews Mourning in the Synagogue, a portrait study by Professor Legros, and an oil painting of The Thames from a Wharf near Waterloo Bridge, are other recent acquisitions of importance.

Some very fine books will fall to the hammer on Friday, March 15, and following day at Messrs. Sotheby's. The books which are the properties of several persons include illuminated and other manuscripts, autograph letters, First Editions, Books of Hours (illuminated of course), productions of the Early English Press, many publications of the Kelmscott, Dover and Caradoc Presses and autograph manuscripts of Robert Burns.

One of the Burns manuscripts is that of "Scots wha hae" and it is accompanied by a letter from the poet asking help in securing a post in the District of Galloway. Other poems and a letter sent to Alex. Frazer-Tyler, afterwards Lord Woodhouselee are amongst those for sale and comprise the lines on Capt. Grose and "The Humble Petition of Bonar Water to the Duke of Athole."

Among the Lamb rarities are First Editions of the Adventures of Ulysses, the Tales from Shakespeare, Satan in Search of a Wife, and John Woodvil. There is a First Edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, a Second and Fourth Folio Shakespeare, and First Editions of a score of Shelley's works including that exceedingly rare one of Queen Mab (1812) complete with the title and dedication to Harriet . . .

An unusual feature of the sale is a large collection of newspapers published during the Civil Wars and the Commonwealth. All of these are very rare and some are very curious; for instance, "The Scottish Dove, sent out and returning, bringing Intelligence from their Army," etc., 1643-4, and "The Weekly Discovery of the Mystery of Iniquity in the Rise of the Rebellion of 1641."

An important item will be the sale of an unusually large collection of the very rare placards issued by the Convention Nationale during 1792-3-4-5. Five collections of these bulletins only are known to exist, and this is the largest collection ever offered for sale. The number of placards is one thousand four hundred and sixty-two.

A notable gathering of things rare and curious in the sale is an extensive collection of portraits, views and cuttings relating to Marylebone Gardens, 1659 to 1778, another extra-illustrated book on Vauxhall Gardens and an enormously extended copy of Henry Morley's Memoirs of Bartholomew Fair, containing portraits and views galore. Martin Frobisher's "True Reports of his Voyages into the West and North-West Regions, etc.," are sure to excite great interest and bring high prices, as they seldom occur for sale.

An Italian correspondent writes to us as follows: The impression created by Carducci's death throughout Italy is very great, and the depth of feeling evoked very genuine. He had, it is true, ceased for over two years to write or take any part in public matters, but the fact that the great poet was still in their midst was a pride and a satisfaction to the citizens of Bologna. The anecdotes now appearing about him are many, and of many sorts. Most of them relate to his pupils, though some too of his private life are characteristic and peculiar. Among them is the following: His wife was one day receiving a visitor in the room next to the room in which Carducci sat writing. The ladies talked below their breath so as in no wise to disturb the poet. After a short while the door was opened and a boot was hurled into the room. The anxious wife seized the boot to see if the missile was sent as a hint, or really stood in need of some repair or some other attention. There was no boot-lace, that was all! And she understood that her husband thinking that she was alone had laid his wants before her in this unceremonious way. That Giosuè Carducci did not enrich himself by his writings is very evident from the statements which his publisher, Signor Sannicelli of Bologna has published, showing that during a period of well-nigh forty years he only received the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand francs, or in English money four thousand eight hundred pounds. When we reflect that that included the works which made Carducci's fame during his lifetime and will make his name immortal after death, we cannot say that the profession of letters—in Italy at all events—is an overpaid one.

Japanese art and religion occupy Comte d'Alviella, who attended the fourth centenary of Aberdeen University last year, and R. Petrucci, both of Brussels. Shin-tō, as against Buddhism, is due to superposed layers, Aino, Chinese and Buddhist. Surpassing Naturism, it is less idolatrous than fetishist (with the mitama, or "spirit" of the gods of heaven). The vacuum of this open-air creed was filled, morally and metaphysically, by devotion to Amida-Buddha, a pale reflex of the proscribed, but woman-affected, "True Sect," the soul of religious Japan, especially at Kioto. We Occidentals, knowing little of calligraphy, can hardly understand "the first" "word" of Japano-Chinese painting. In its mural form, this dates from the tenth century B.C. Strikingly different to the Western is the Eastern accentuation of secondary elements, e.g., in face-portrayal and in mystic serenity of expression.

Swinburne's four Bruno sonnets, printed in the Bibelot, Portland, Maine, with a re-impression of Walter Pater's "Giordano," are seasonable, now that the anti-clerical Giordano Bruno demonstration has missed fire so markedly. The second centenary of Carlo Goldoni, on the other hand, was enthusiastically celebrated. First fired by Machiavelli's Mandragora, Goldoni took his special province to be "i gelosi, i golosi, i prodighi, gli avari, i pigri, gli spavaldi, i ciarlioni, i bugiardi, i vanesi, le mille faccie degli umani peccati."

In the Cornhill Magazine for March there are some quizzical verses on the bicycle by "F. S." From the following lines we should judge that his touring has been taken in the direction of many literary shrines.

We've tried East Anglian drift-roads, explored the Pilgrim's Way,
Crossed tidal sands at Holy Isle, and stuck in Oxford clay;
We've learnt the depth of Devon lanes, the height of Yorkshire dales,
And traced the chain of castled towns, the border-line of Wales.

Tolstoi's minimising of Shakespeare, εἰ ποτ' ἐνν' γέ, is only a recrudescence, after all. The British Magazine of 1761-1763 dubs Hamlet's soliloquy aegri somnia. The writer has not apparently heard of the reading "pitch," for "pith," nor suspected "a sea of troubles," which may, or may not, be a say (a saie, assey, asseye) and mean the "assay" of ii. ii. 71. Over a hundred years ago (1805), Seymour called the whole play "clouded by impurities," "... and the principal . . . person of the story, in morals, action and behaviour" . . . "irregular and censurable." He finds in "Hamlet" much contaminatis. Lamartine wrote against Shakespeare, but his English wife would not let him publish.

The loves of men of letters occupy M. Emile Faquet, of the French Academy: Chateaubriand and the occitanisme, Lamartine and Elvire, Guizot and Madame Zéven, Sainte-Beuve and Madame Victor Hugo, Alfred de Musset and George Sand, "que l'on appelle les Amants de Venise parce qu'ils ont été amants un peu partout, excepté à Venise." Even Voltaire and Pimpette are not forgotten.

Byron has been marked by the Germans for their own: "his connection with Heine," "his influence on young Heine," "J. H. Frere's influence on Lord Byron" are a few of the latest works published in Berlin, Berne, Vienna and Leipzig on George Gordon. The French are entering the lists against Mr. Churton Collins's "Robert Greene." The Birmingham editor is found to be inconsistent, and to have treated foreign research in cavalierly British fashion.

"George Brummell et George IV.," par Roger Boutet de Mouvel, is a companion volume to Sir E. Sullivan's life of the Irish beau. Here we have all the staging, the "monocle impitoyable," the "faiseur," the "anglomane élégant." Barbez d'Aureville foisted dandyism into literature, but it is lost to Paris for the moment: "s'il reste encore des dandys, ils sont à Montmartre, dans les brasseries." Fine clothes and insolence, favour in the eyes of the then Prince of Wales, and grotesqueness, made George Bryan Brummell the idol of British society, "que était et est encore la société la plus snob du monde." So M. Marcel Boulenger. He adds: "Chateaubriand connut à Londres ces goudjats du bel air." Among them was the Comte d'Orsay (his waistcoat, admired by Lady Blessington, is now in the market!), Lord Seymour (milord Arsouille) was another, who taught them also the use of the club, of racing, of grooms, and of English tailors. Barbez's book appeared in 1845, with its "juria toute française." B. d'Aureville was at once clerical and anti-clerical. Later come Baudelaire, Parnassiens, décadents, possibly, even, Paul Bourget and Maurice Barrès. The author of "Salomé," recherché somptueux et raffiné, . . . cet esthéticien fashionable was another, and the Prince of Sagan. But these were already far away from the Brummell ideal, and on the boulevard, as elsewhere, in life and in letters, the Dandies are no more.

Messrs. Alston Rivers in their foreword to "the contemporary poets" series which they are bringing out express the opinion of the editor and publishers of this series "that while to-day there exists a large body of excellent poets and a fairly considerable body of intelligent readers of poetry, there has not of late years been any serious attempt to bring the one into contact with the other." This is surely a rather surprising theory, in view of the enormous mass of verse chiefly bad or indifferent, which is poured out year after year. The publication of a volume of verse and the offering of it for sale seem to us to constitute the only legitimate means of endeavouring to "bring it into contact with" "the fairly considerable body of intelligent readers" that Messrs. Alston Rivers refer to. Any more strenuous or serious efforts to bring about the desired contact would undoubtedly add a new terror to life. The first volume of the series is a collection of sonnets by Mr. William Michael Rossetti, concerning which one can only reflect sadly, that Nature is not wont to make her poets two at a time.

THE WHITE PAVILIONS

With snow-white blossoms starred,

With a snow-white cloud above,

The White Pavilions guard

Souls pure as the woodland dove.

All day in the face of Death

On the still wind's whispering breath

The silver bugles of Faith

Sound, and the trumpets of Love.

Angel and angel wait,

With trembling white wings stirred,

To speed from the silver gate

At their lightest sign or word.

They are neither checked nor chidden,

No joy from their eyes is hidden,

No gift to their hands forbidden,

No wish of their hearts unheard.

These are the women who stayed

Pure in a world of mire,

Wife and mother and maid

Filling their God's desire;

Whose faith to the weaker and sadder

Made all life brighter and gladder,

Till hope was a rose-hung ladder

And love was a golden lyre.

These are the women who held

White hands to us through the mist

When we railed at Fate and rebelled,

Or, tempted, failed to resist;

And these when life's sad ships started

Gave faith to the lovers parted

And hope to the broken-hearted,

With their own brave lips un-kissed.

And, taking their youth and beauty,

They laid them, untouched of shame,

On the lighted altar of Duty

That burns with a changeless flame,

And leaned from their own white places

With cheer for the pale young faces

Where Sin has furrowed her traces

And Sorrow has carved her name.

To these has the great God given

In the White Pavilions a throne

And the love of the hosts of Heaven,

For sake of an earth-love shown

To the fainting hearts they nourished

And the broken faiths they cherished

When all hopes human had perished

And all faiths mortal had flown.

WILL H. OGILVIE.

LITERATURE

THE SHIRBURN BALLADS

The Shirburn Ballads. Edited from the Manuscript by ANDREW CLARK. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d. net.)

"I LOVE a ballad but even too well" if it be a traditional folk-song made for the people by the people in old times, but it must be confessed that I dislike ballads made for the people by the hangers-on of the cheap press in the days of "Eliza and our James." The Roxburghe ballads are entirely of this doggerel sort, and in "The Roxburghe Ballads" are published versions of many, if not most, of the dismal ditties edited by Mr. Clark from the Shirburn manuscript. The ditties are dismal, dull, long-winded, drawing sets of rhyme, often of a snuffling morality. The interest which they possess is in antiquarian touches of old manners and customs, or is so far historical as to indicate the mood in which the ballad-making drudge expected the populace to take some recent event. But this kind of ballad is nothing less than poetical. We need but look down the list of titles of a collection of ballads like Child's or "The Border Minstrelsy" to be reminded of poetry which can never wax old, as in "The Three Ravens," "The Lyke Wake Dirge," "The Queen of Elfan's Nourice," "Sir Patrick Spens," "Clerk Saunders," "The Wife of Usher's Well," "Kinmont Willie," and dozens of other old favourites. The Shirburn ballads have none of these merits; we must take them mainly as historical evidence of the taste of the populace at the end of the sixteenth century. Can the purchasers of these ballads have appreciated the plays of the Elizabethan dramatists? To "the groundlings" did Shakespeare, Marlowe and the rest offer the noblest poetry, and the wonder is that the groundlings would decline on the dull whining ballads.

The ballads admirably and even enthusiastically edited by Mr. Clark are all from a manuscript in the library of the Earl of Macclesfield, at Shirburn Castle. Many pieces, Mr. Shirburn thinks, were written by one hand in 1600-1603. These are of the lighter sort, as far as lightness can be predicated of any of the collection. Even when the metre is not without the Elizabethan quality the ballads are remorselessly long; "Phillida flouts me" endlessly. "The coarser pieces" are not gay, and, considering the times, not marvellously coarse. Apparently the transcriber, as he entered the vale of years, devoted himself to copying out lugubriously moral and religious ballads, such as a Puritan may, or may not, have deemed edifying. Why the transcriber transcribed is a mystery. "It is plain that the ballads are copied from printed exemplars;" nothing can be more plain, as the printed exemplars exist. Then why did the person who copied so sedulously not buy printed exemplars, which, in his time, were as cheap as possible? There is no reply to this question. The copyist must have been a very dull man of unlimited leisure. "All of the ballads are eloquent as to the baseness of popular taste in Shakespeare's time," and a man of to-day might as reasonably occupy himself in copying out articles from half-penny newspapers as a man of Elizabeth's time devote himself to transcribing half-penny ballads, broad-sides in black letter, at twenty-three for ten-pence.

In a later age, during the Restoration and after it, people of curious taste collected the ballads as they might now collect postage stamps. When fresh they had served their purchasers as weekly newspapers, and old weekly newspapers, in the long run, have historical value. Thus a benefactor sends me the Weekly Journal for 1715, wherein we read how twenty thousand English volunteers mustered near Penrith, and then went home, while some four thousand Jacobites treated the country as they pleased. The ballads are not so good as a weekly journal, but they utter their laments over a recent battle, or the hanging of a highwayman, or a murder, or the execution of Queen Elizabeth's Earl of Essex, whom we must not regard as a wicked man, like Father Campion, S.J. The ballads also tell fictitious tales of a woeful kind, and, above all, they relentlessly preach, and explain scripture, and improve all occasions. In the Shirburn manuscript the pieces range from 1585 to 1616. Some of the poems went on being reprinted till the Revolution of 1688, which indicates that there was no improvement of taste among the purchasers.

Famous collectors were Mr. Pepys, and our Oxford antiquary, Anthony Wood. Pepys's collection (thirteen hundred and seventy-six pieces) is at Magdalene College, Cambridge; Wood's, greatly plundered (two hundred and seventy-nine pieces), is in the Bodleian. Harley (Swift's Earl of Oxford) had two thick volumes (British Museum) and the Shirburn manuscript makes it plain that Harley somehow acquired much of what was taken from the treasures of Anthony Wood. Bagford probably also helped himself from Wood's hoard of ballads, and, much later, the Duke of Roxburghe (after whom the Roxburghe Club is named), fell heir to more of the loot of old Anthony. The Rev. W. Ebsworth was the great modern authority in this kind of ballad, and reprinted large quantities for the Ballad Society. The Robin Hood ballads are missing in the Shirburn manuscript, but Child prints thirty-seven of this kind, and thirty-seven are quite enough.

If to lovers of poetical ballads the pieces in the Shirburn manuscript are not grateful, Mr. Shirburn's notes, bringing out points in manners and customs, are very welcome, so are the coarse woodcuts which he reproduces, for these at least illustrate costume. In No. ix, a preaching ballad, Sunday is said to be profaned by amusements; and Mr. Shirburn, from the records of Maldon, shows that between 1574 and 1590 Puritanism began to flourish among the magistrates, who were denounced by a former magistrate as "a set of precisians and Brownists." As early as 1563 there had been complaints of Stool Ball (a rudimentary kind of cricket), played on Sunday. People who absented themselves from church were fined. A ballad tells of the resurrection of three buried corpses at Holdt in Germany, on September 20, 1616. The corpses spoke, and one proclaimed a general resurrection, but he was disappointed. The others preached through a stanza or two and then went back to bed. There are twenty stanzas to the tune of "The Lady's Fall." Another ballad tells us of a young man wrongfully hanged and miraculously preserved alive, like Michael Hamilton of Shotts, a gentleman of the Scots Archer Guards in France in 1429. But Michael richly deserved a hanging, which makes the miracle more remarkable.

The truth of this straung accident
Men need not farre to looke.
For 'tis confirmed by good men's hands,
And printed in a booke.

Mr. Shirburn appropriately cites that of Autolycus, "Five justice's hands at it, and witnesses." The ballad on the arrival of James I. in England is rather clever in giving his parentage. His father was called the Lord Darlye.

And after married to Scottish Marye,
By whose most sweet and happy bed
Oure sorrowes nowe are quight stroke dead;
For to Lord Darlye she did bring
Olde Brittan's hope, and James our king.

To sing of "the sweet and happy bed" of Mary and Darnley is to be loyal indeed. The notes of Mr. Shirburn are so learned and interesting that we must admire them in spite of the poetry which they illustrate.

ANDREW LANG.

AN UNNECESSARY BLAKE

The Real Blake. By EDWIN J. ELLIS. (Chatto & Windus, 12s. net.)

MR. ELLIS has earned the gratitude of all students of Blake by the long and patient labours which he has devoted to the study of Blake's wonderful Myth, and his success in the interpretation of it. Besides the elaborate work in three volumes which he published in conjunction with Mr. Yeats in 1893, he has just brought out a convenient edition of the poems and Prophetic Books, the latter being made accessible for the first time in a complete form and in ordinary type. It is true, his treatment of the text has met with severe criticism. Care, scrupulousness and accuracy in details are not his strong points. But we are not concerned at the moment with his work as an editor, but as a biographer. Do we need a new biography of Blake? Gilchrist's work, in spite of the rather tiresome style, with its would-be Carlylese, is of fascinating interest, and already something of a classic. Confronted with a new biography, we naturally set up a high standard. There is a great deal that is interesting and valuable in Mr. Ellis's book; but it is not well composed, the writing is slovenly, and it has other serious faults which will assuredly prevent it from superseding Gilchrist, in spite of a much completer understanding of Blake's mind and ideas.

The title, at the outset, arms criticism. It suggests that the picture we have in our minds of Blake is an imaginary one. Such titles have hitherto been used by writers who take valets' views of heroes. Mr. Ellis is far from doing that, and his choice was unfortunate. His preface does not reassure us. It contains a passage of arms with Mr. Sampson, whom Mr. Ellis calls a pedant for printing Blake's poems as he wrote them (his own view being that the text should be "corrected"), and some very ungracious remarks about Mr. A. G. B. Russell, who is as devoted a student of Blake as himself. But what chiefly gives one pause is the statement that Blake's "Last Judgment" is the most beautiful, poetic, and decorative picture that the world contains! "In this picture and in the 'Job' he takes a supreme place among the world's artists." It is just this kind of wild exaggeration, too frequent in Blake's admirers, that has provoked so much opposition to Blake's real claims.

From this arrogant preface we pass to the biography. Readers will naturally want to know what new material Mr. Ellis presents them with, not already in Gilchrist. He prints in full for the first time "The Island in the Moon," Blake's squib upon the literary folk he met at the Mathews's house; but this is hardly a gain, as it is sorry stuff. All Blake's comments on Lavater are given, instead of the selection printed by Gilchrist. But of course the main difference between the two lives is Mr. Ellis's greater insistence on the mystical side of Blake. Here his superior knowledge gives him a great advantage, though as this knowledge is only imparted by the way and in no connected form it is not put to as much use as it might have been. The chief blot on the book, however, is its untrustworthiness, which arises from Mr. Ellis's peculiar methods. These we will now illustrate. Of Blake's wife he writes:

As the only daughter of a substantial tradesman, and as a pretty brunette, tall, graceful, attractive, she had not lived to be five-and-twenty without being courted over and over again, and learning how to hold her own against the elbow-pinching, waist-gripping, lip-snatching gallantries of the robust seedsmen in her father's nursery garden.

The sole facts here are in the first two lines, the rest is pure conjecture, and the real truth may have been totally different. This passage, a small but typical specimen of Mr. Ellis's biographical ways, occurs in a chapter entitled "Mary." Every one knows Blake's beautiful poem of this name. This poem Mr. Ellis treats as a record of real experience, and builds up on it a most circumstantial story, filled with intimate details, and containing a minute account of the changes of feeling in Blake and in his wife during their early married days. He describes, among other things, how Mrs. Blake, then on her way to become a mother, fell down in a swoon; and makes this the explanation of the fact that the two never had a child. Where has Mr. Ellis found all this? He talks vaguely of other sources of evidence besides the poems, but produces nothing. As to "Mary," it is quite likely that the germ of that poem may have come from an actual experience in the Mathews's drawing-room; but even of that we cannot be certain, still less can we make sure of the poem's corresponding in detail with real facts. In any case it is difficult not to suspect that a great deal of this chapter, given as authenticated history, is due to Mr. Ellis's imagination. One is the more inclined to doubt Mr. Ellis after investigating some later chapters of his book, which deal with the Felpham episode and Hayley's friendship. Mr. Ellis asserts that Blake originally wrote his "Milton" in twelve books, but reduced it to two, destroying the rest because his feelings towards Hayley had suddenly changed from resentment to gratitude. The implication is that in these books Hayley had been treated as a "spiritual enemy." With an offensive reference to Rossetti's recovery of his poems from his wife's grave, Mr. Ellis glorifies Blake for this sacrifice of ten whole books. Now what is the evidence on which Mr. Ellis relies for this suppression? He says:

Gilchrist also quietly describes Milton as a poem in two books. Perhaps he never saw the title-page of the copy now in the British Museum where Blake has engraved in Arabic numerals the number twelve—"12 books." The numerals are half an inch in height, and cannot be mistaken.

Any one who after reading this has the curiosity to look up this particular copy of Milton will receive a surprise. The title-page referred to is an engraved design of a nude figure seen against wreathing volumes of vapour, on which is the title, Milton, a Poem in 2 Books. The 2 is in the middle of a round dark space, enclosed by wreaths of white cloud. It is exactly one-quarter of an inch in height. By the exercise of sufficient perversity of ingenuity it is possible to see in a stroke among the enclosing lines of decoration the figure 1; much as people who have "picked up" an old picture will always manage to detect among the painter's brushmarks the letters of some celebrated signature. Now if Mr. Ellis had hazarded as a suggestion the possibility that Blake originally wrote 12 and then carefully concealed the first figure among the lines of decoration, no one could have objected, though few might have been persuaded to adopt a hypothesis equally incapable of proof or disproof: but that he should assert that the title-page, as it stands, reads 12 in numerals that "cannot be mistaken," and then proceed to make this false assertion the basis of an elaborate story, quietly told as if it were all proved and known, is absolutely unparadonable.

FACIT INDIGNATIO VERSUS

Temple Greek and Latin Classics. The Satires of Juvenal, With Introduction and Notes. By A. F. COLE, B.A. (Dent, 2s. 6d.)

THIS is a very puerile and worthless edition of the "Satires of Juvenal." It does not contain the newly discovered pieces; but we find no fault with the edition for this. They are foul and dull. Moreover, the gross satires, the second and ninth are omitted, and so the newly found would not come within its scope. But the editor does not seem to have heard of the find. In the same way, we observe that Buecheler's certain restoration, mulio consul, has somehow found its way into the text in viii. 148: but there is no allusion to it in the notes, which are rich in such comments as "Aeacus: one of the judges of the underworld," "The son of Peleus is Achilles," "Quiritem: a Roman citizen," "The bankers kept their money and did their business in the Forum." Sometimes notes of this kind are not only superfluous, but actually misleading. A boy who requires to be told that Achilles was the son of Peleus and that Hecuba was the wife of Priam, on reading (xiii. 111) "Catullus wrote farces," will ascribe these works to the famous poet of Verona. The obscure mimographer who wrote farces which are not now extant is quite out of his ken. A note

"Byron wrote Our Boys" or "Tom Cringle's Log is by Scott": would have a like misleading influence on very junior students of English literature: and the mention of a comedy by Plato would call for a warning note.

The introduction is short and barren. One of the few judgments to which the Editor commits himself is, in our opinion, entirely wrong:

For Juvenal's moral and religious views the Satires themselves must speak. . . . But it is at least possible to take a consistent stand upon the belief that Juvenal was a man of intense enthusiasm and love of good, blighted in early life by the horror of reality, and turned to bitterness by that discovery; that he never lacked the gifts of insight, appreciation and expression; and that with old age his view of life became more happy.

No: he certainly did not lack the gift of expression. Probably there never was in any age or clime such a master of scathing invective, of brilliant rhetoric, of vivid portraiture. But we cannot find "intense enthusiasm and love of good" in the poet who steps out of his way to exercise his amazing powers of expression in pruriently presenting to the mind pictures which have no merit but their salaciousness. One hesitates to take a view opposed to that of so eminent a scholar as Professor J. E. Mayor; but we are unable to school ourselves into a frame of mind in which we can accept his conclusion that "from the first page to the last breathes one spirit of homely manhood" and that "his standard is that of the Gospels and St. Paul." If we could imagine the Apostle asking a friend to dine, we cannot think he would have gone on to say, "banish all business cares and domestic troubles: do not vex yourself by thinking of the infidelities of your wife," described (xi. 86-89) in language which gloats over the details of the woman's audacious intrigue. In the same way he cannot tell how Deucalion and Pyrrha repopled the world by casting stones into the void, without reminding us that the girls were exposed in their nudity to the gaze of the boys. Surely passages like these betray a desire to suggest impure thoughts rather than to show up vice in its native ugliness; and the list of such passages could be largely increased. Remarks about defects incidental to youth are out of place in the case of one who did not publish his satires till he was an old man.

When we meet an allusion interesting as bearing on manners under the Roman Empire of the Juvenalian age, we find that Mr. Cole gives a very uncertain sound. One remembers Gérôme's picture in which "thumbs down" is represented as the gesture which condemned the defeated gladiator to death; and à bas, "down with," and such expressions encourage the error. Here is Mr. Cole's note on iii. 36:

Verso pollice vulgi
Quemlibet occidunt populariter;

The spectators of a gladiatorial combat expressed by the turning of their thumbs their desire that the conquered gladiator should be spared or killed; whether it was the upward or downward gesture that signified death is uncertain.

But it is not uncertain, as Mr. Cole would have discovered if he had consulted Prof. Mayor's edition on the passage, or any good commentary on Hor. Epp. i. 1, 18, 66. Prof. Mayor quotes Plin. xxviii. § 25, pollices cum faveamus premere etiam proverbio iubemur. "Thumbs down," therefore means, "spare him," "put back your sword into its scabbard." This was presso pollice; the signal for death was verso pollice, "thumbs up" which meant "rip him up." Prof. Mayor quotes Prudentius c. Symmachum ii. 1096:

pectusque iacentis
Virgo modesta iubet converso pollice rumpi.

On iii. 199:

iam poscit aquam iam frivola transfert
Ucalegon.

we have the note:

Virgil Aen. ii. 311, 312 says

Ucalegon.
Juvenal uses the name to denote a neighbour.

Neith Virgil nor Juvenal ascribes any such impossible nification to Ucalegon, which means "Mr. Careless" (ὁὐκ ἀλέγων), a person who takes no precautions against the risk of conflagration so rife in ancient Rome.

Opposite the Latin text is printed the well-known version of Gifford, published more than a hundred years ago. To the boy who requires to be told that Numa was one of the Kings of Rome, the English rendering will not be of much use as a crib, being far from literal. To adults its excellences and defects are well known, its vigour and its diffuseness. These qualities are observed in iii. 54-57, where three lines and a half expand into six in the English:

But let not all the wealth which Tagus pours
In Ocean's lap, not all his glittering stores,
Be deem'd a bribe sufficient to requite
The loss of peace by day, of sleep by night.
O take not, take not what thy soul rejects
Nor sell the faith which he who buys suspects;

and in iii. 74-78, where we have six lines for four and a half:

A Protean tribe one knows not what to call,
Which shifts to every form and shines in all;
Grammarian, painter, augur, rhetorician,
Rope-dancer, conjurer, fidler and physician,
All trades his own your hunger Greekling counts,
And bid him mount the sky—the sky he mounts!

The rendering,

— Bid him go to hell, to hell he'll go,

though attractive at first sight, is not to be endured.

Diffuseness goes too far when the English lines are twice as many, as in

Iampridem Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes
Long since the stream that wanton Syria laves
Has disembogued its filth in Tiber's waves.

or even more than twice as many, sixteen words for four, as in

Quibusdam
Somnum rixa facit.
There are who murder as an opiate take,
And only when no brawls await them wake.

The best feature in the book is an excellent reproduction from Valpy's edition of 1831 of a bust in which the saeva indignatio of the great satirist is vividly portrayed.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

LITERARY FORGERIES

Literary Forgeries. By J. A. FARRER. With an Introduction by ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, 6s. 6d. net.)

MR. FARRER has written an excellent book on a most interesting subject. His literary forgers have the double merit of intelligence and enterprise. They regard scholarship as a kind of adventure, in which they may not only prove their knowledge but get the better of their fellows. Their achievements, therefore, have nothing of the dullness, which clings about most learning, and we read of their manipulation of classical texts with a thrill of excitement. Fortunate in their purpose, they are fortunate also in their adversaries. Scholars are by nature too often both vain and irritable. Proud of their knowledge, which, being human, must perforce rest upon an unstable foundation, they resent, with an inapposite violence, the slightest opposition, and their very quarrelsomeness gives the forger his best chance.

It is Mr. Farrer's worst fault that he has included some ingenious persons in his book, who are grievously out of place. Forgery is far too strong a word, for instance, to apply to Chatterton. It suggests an evil intent, a criminal design which was altogether alien from the skillful inventor of Rowley's ballads. Mystification was Chatterton's purpose. He had no desire to rob anybody or even to deceive anybody to his hurt. Torn by a conflict between modesty and ambition, he pined for the praise, which he feared his youth and inexperience could not win of themselves, and therefore he ascribed to another the works which he feared might be over-looked or despised, if he claimed them for his own. We may pity him for his lack of judgment. We cannot condemn him for rascality. As Mr. Farrer points out Chatterton did no more than Walpole himself thought fit to do when he published "The Castle of Otranto." He tried to call attention to himself by an assumed air of mystery, and had he been, like Walpole, a man of the world, he would have turned his trick to his advantage. In Mr. Farrer's words "there is no evidence to justify the black colours in which Chatterton's general character has by some writers been painted." We can easily understand Walpole's anger. That was inspired by the wounded vanity of the connoisseur. Walpole wished the world to believe that his taste and judgment were alike impeccable, and he fell into the trap which Chatterton's skilful hand had laid for him. He had appeared ridiculous in the public eye, and he took the revenge that is obvious for all but the great. To put the matter briefly, Chatterton deserves no place in Mr. Farrer's book. He was a youth of genius, who resorted to a venial trick to call the world's attention to him. Unhappily for his reputation the world has ever since been so deeply interested in his mystification that it has over-looked his very real merits, and the best service that can be done his memory is to take him out of the rogues' gallery and set him in the company of poets.

Some of the others hold their place among the forgers without dispute. Psalmanazar, for instance, not only forged a language; he forged himself. His whole life was a forgery from beginning to end. Nor can it be said that his motive was excusable. Money was his object and an easy life, and so well did he keep his secret that to this day his true name is unknown. With a stubbornness which does him infinite credit, he resisted the curiosity of his friends. That he was of French extraction is possible, and in after years with characteristic uncertainty he placed his birthplace somewhere between Rome and Avignon. But it was of Formosa that he chose to announce himself a native, and it is as the Formosan that he has come down the ages.

A Scotch chaplain, one William Innes, brought him to London and set him on the high road to fraud and fortune. His success was immediate and triumphant. He translated the Church of England service into Formosan for the benefit of the Bishop of London. He discoursed in Latin to Archbishop Tillotson. Greatly daring, he met and routed, in appearance at any rate, a Jesuit missionary, who had no difficulty in exposing his pretensions. After a sojourn at Oxford, he carried the imposture on again in London and enjoyed five or six years of homaged prosperity. Then suspicions began to be whispered. He was denounced as a forger; he was ridiculed in the newspapers; and he was not strong enough to fight a losing battle. He had no other resource than to write for the booksellers. He compiled; he translated; he did all the sad ill-paid jobs that keep the hack from starvation; and he cultivated a piety of demeanour which Johnson, who was wont to sit with him in an ale house, applauded with all sincerity. But he lacked candour to the end, and the autobiography, which he might have made a masterpiece of self-revelation, is as cunning and spiritless a performance as you will meet in the annals of literature.

A much more interesting forger, to our mind, is Vrain-Lucas, the Frenchman who bewitched a distinguished mathematician, M. Michel Chasles. A strange blend of knavery and patriotism, of cleverness and stupidity, Vrain-Lucas is secure from all competitors. He was neither a scholar nor a man of letters. He lacked the profound knowledge of Simonides and young Ireland's sense of literature. He was merely a French clerk from the provinces, and he deceived his learned dupe by a trick, whose transparency is ridiculous. With no more instruction than a self-taught man might pick up in a cabinet généalogique, he set about forging the correspondence of all the great ones of the earth. No distance of time or place frightened him. Among the men and women whose letters he sold to M. Chasles, were Sappho, Cleopatra, Mary Magdalene, Julius Cæsar, St. Luke, Lazarus, Vercingetorix, Montaigne, Rabelais, Pascal, and Newton. They all wrote in French—that is the peculiar glory of Vrain-Lucas. A faulty spelling suggested that the French was old, but French it was, and M. Chasles saw no absurdity in the fact that Sappho sends greeting, "à son très aimé Phaon," and that Lazarus signs himself "Lazare le ressuscité." Vrain-Lucas, of course, had neither Greek nor Latin. French was the single language that he knew, and he compelled the heroes of all time to compose in that tongue. And M. Chasles, at any rate, was content to pay six thousand pounds for this amazing collection of letters, all written in French upon paper, the watermark of which was a fleur-de-lis.

Had not M. Chasles's vanity got the better of his discretion, the fraud might never have been discovered. But Vrain-Lucas, in the course of his career, had forged some letters which proved that it was Pascal, not Newton, who discovered the laws of gravity. Here was a theory dear to the Chauvinism of France. Not to believe in Pascal, Chasles, and Vrain-Lucas seemed a clear mark of treachery, and for a while the learned men of France were divided into two fiercely hostile camps. But Vrain-Lucas's impertinence, though it deceived M. Chasles, could not long deceive the genuinely learned, and at last the imposition was made plain to all the world. Vrain-Lucas, still boasting himself a patriot, was punished by two years' imprisonment, and his poor dupe, together with the rash patriots who had espoused the cause of Pascal, were presently forgotten in the excitement of the Franco-German War.

Vrain-Lucas's master quality was a simple courage that feared nothing and doubted nothing. Simonides was made of better stuff. As his supremacy is unchallenged to-day, so he is likely to remain without a rival unto the end of time. One of the greatest scholars of his time, he found it impossible to set about his researches in an honest spirit. His biographer tells us that he had two foreheads, one of which rose above the other, and these foreheads symbolise his dual nature. The lower was doubtless the seat of intellect, the upper the lair of cunning and rascality. He deceived Dindorf and he mystified Bradshaw. He collected manuscripts and he rung the changes on false and true with so splendid an ingenuity that nobody who ever made a purchase of him felt secure. And then, when the world of scholars looked askance upon him, he took a sublime vengeance by asserting that the Codex Sinaiticus, discovered by Tischendorf, was written by his own hand. It is not likely that the vexed question of this codex will ever be settled to the satisfaction of every one, and Simonides left the scholars of Europe still confused. And his career persuades us that forgery is a matter of temperament. Here was a man of the profoundest erudition, who by his researches might have enlightened the world, and the love of chicanery was too strong for him. In all respects, he is the most distinguished in Mr. Farrer's gallery of rogues, and when you have read his exploits, his very grandeur saves you from taking any but a favourable view of his achievements.

THE EYE-WITNESS

Indiscreet Letters from Peking. Edited by B. L. PUTNAM WEALE. (Hurst & Blackett, 7s. 6d. net.)

TRUTH is generally indiscreet and always interesting. These letters bear the hall-mark of truth and raise the wish that it had not been necessary to edit them as ruthlessly as they are said to have been edited. Truth, however, is too dangerous a card in the game of diplomacy to be lightly played. There is enough truth in the book to startle "One eye-witness," to quote a quotation from Mr. Putnam Weale's foreword, "however dull and prejudiced is worth a wilderness of sentimental historians." And Mr. Putnam Weale is not at all dull, and appears to be singularly lacking in prejudice—in national prejudice, that is to say; praise and blame are given to the members of each of the Eleven Legations exactly as it seems good to the author without any regard to nationality. He is, as those who remember his "Manchu and Muscovite" will witness, possessed of knowledge, and of a style sufficiently vivid and picturesque to enable him to impart with force and clearness the opinions that result from his knowledge. Indeed these letters of his make a book of remarkable interest. For not only do they throw light on the history of a particular event, an event which can only find a parallel in the Indian Mutiny, but they give a fearless, minute account of that most desperate of all things—a siege under the conditions of modern warfare. "These pages may show something about which little has been written—the psychology of the siege. The siege is still the rudest test in the world. It is well to know it." And after reading the book it is hard to tell which is the more horrible, the privations of a siege, or the licence of a punishing army, aflame with lust for revenge and for loot. Both phases of war are unspeakable. We agree with Mr. Putnam Weale that it is well to know it. We assume that the author and the editor are differentiated upon the title-page for the sake of literary artifice—that the initial discretion may form a contrast to the valorous indiscretion of the actual letters.

The letters cover a period of six months. Just before the middle of May 1900 the first mutterings of the storm were heard. On June 20 the storm broke in all its fury and the siege began. On August 13 the guns of the relieving army were heard, and the besiegers made one last frantic effort to annihilate the besieged. On August 14 the silence of death surrounded the Legations until the relieving armies marched into the ruins. On the 16th the sack began in mad earnest and wild disorder was dominant until November, when everything that could be taken had been taken, and all the scores of the citizens against the Boxers had been wiped out. Then order slowly came once more into being. During those six months of summer and early autumn hells of many nations had been let loose on Peking, and Peking was in ruin.

The first letter is dated May 12, when uneasiness began to be felt owing to disturbances in Shantung. All warnings, however, seem to have been systematically ignored by those in authority and upon those in authority the indiscreet letter-writer pours his indignation for their blindness. He is enraged at the way they continue writing their despatches and attending to their trivial everyday business and little diplomatic affairs, and he would seem to be somewhat unfair, and for this reason: he is writing after the event: that is to say after the impossible had happened. As a literary artifice the form of letters could not be improved upon: it is an admirable manner of making his point of view forcible and lending actuality to the terrible tale which he is about to unfold. But it must not be forgotten that it is a literary artifice, and as a criticism of the actions of others must be taken with great caution. It is not as a criticism of particular men that the book has value, or indeed that it is meant to be read. They are confessedly indiscreet letters, not a judicious history: no man is fit to write that who has been under fire for two months owing to a lack of foresight on the part of others. But the account of an intelligent man who has been through such an ordeal is invaluable to the future historian—especially when he writes with absolute frankness. The personal element can be accounted for by the historian and gives a touch which makes the whole series of events living to the ordinary reader; for he soon discovers that the author is a man of action and has the man of action's natural antipathy to the man of inaction. Mr. Putnam Weale is not just in his estimate of man: there is only one type of man he can understand. For the man who is paralysed in a terrific emergency, owing to age or temperament, he has nothing but contempt: though that man may be of the utmost use in less extraordinary times. That is seen most conspicuously in his account of the first council meeting of the Eleven Legations after the storm had actually broken. He has been abusing them freely without prejudice for their bewilderment and their hankering after their habitual little jealousies, and holds up for admiration the Kaiser's Minister to the Court of Peking. The Baron von K— rose, after the meeting had been in progress for some time, and announced that he had a previous appointment with the Tsung-li Yamen, and that in spite of the ultimatum, in spite of a possible state of war, he intended to keep his appointment. He said he should be pleased to convey any message with which the Council might be pleased to entrust him, after he had finished his own private business. He went. Here is the graphic story of what happened:

The German Minister turned into his Legation and after a time he reappeared in his green and red official chair with the dragoman in a similar conveyance. There were only two Chinese outriders with them, as von K— had refused to take any of his guards. I remember von K— was smoking and leaning his arms on the front bar of his sedan, for all the world as if he were going on a picnic. . . . We wondered how long he would take to come back. We soon knew! How terrible that was! For not more than fifteen minutes passed before, crashing their Manchu riding-sticks terror-stricken on to their ponies' hides, the two outriders appeared alone in a mad gallop and nearly rode us down. Through the barricades they passed, yelling desperately . . . but there was nothing to be learnt about von K—. A shot had passed through his chair and he had never moved again, whilst other shots struck all round. . . . The tragedy was so simple, but so crushing, that we all stood dazed. Our one man of character and decision was dead—lost beyond recall!

His action was brave, and its bravery is extolled, as such bravery should be. But no hint is breathed that there was an element of extreme stupidity in it, as undoubtedly there was. The man who can negotiate complicated affairs in which the vague interests of countries are at stake, is not necessarily the man who is of any use when the question is pinned down quite simply to one of life and death—limited to an area of a few hundred square yards on which thousands of Chinamen are keeping an incessant fire. The two situations demand different types of men. To that the indiscreet letter-writer is blind.

The passage quoted illustrates this; and it illustrates also the vivid style of which he is master, and which gives the book its value. It shows a man exceptionally keen-eyed and fearless in his statements as in his actions. His observation is rarely at fault: his judgment often is. And his frankness lends colour to the one, and takes venom from the other: for it allows you to know the man who is writing.

With the murder of the German minister the siege began in all its fury: and for two months the members of the Eleven Legations were crowded into a small defensible area with missionaries of all denominations and innumerable converts. Gradually some sort of system of defence arranged itself; and for two months with only a few hours' cessation the garrison of civilians for the most part were under incessant fire. Guns were brought quite near, and hundreds of Chinese riflemen kept up continual sharp-shooting from the roofs of surrounding houses. And always in the minds of the defenders was a complete uncertainty as to the possibility of ultimate relief and the absolute certainty of atrocious torture for themselves and the women and the children if capture preceded death. One young lieutenant discovered that the Boxers went into the mines they were digging under the walls armed only with shovel and pick. So one night he went to the opening of a tunnel alone, and called on the Boxers to come out; they came out one by one, and as they came out he bayoneted them until his arms were too tired. Thirteen he killed as they crawled out on their hands and knees: three remained, and he drove them in as captives, and less tired arms cut off their heads and hurled the

THE ACADEMY

MARCH 9, 1907

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

MASTERS & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS

GREAT CHURCHMEN SERIES. Edited by the Very Rev. VERNON STALEY, Provost of the Cathedral Church of S. Andrew, Inverness. These Monographs will be in Crown 8vo form, illustrated, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each, and the first two volumes will be ready almost immediately.

RICHARD HOOKER. By the Very Rev. VERNON STALEY.

ARCHBISHOP LAUD. By the Rev. CANON MACKINTOSH.

THE SERVANT OF THE LORD. By RICHENDA BUXTON (The Hon. Mrs. R. TALBOT), with Preface by Rev. CANON SCOTT HOLLAND. 12mo. Cloth, gilt, 2s. 6d.

"This beautiful little book, tender and strong, should prove a welcome gift-book to many a weary woman."—LITERARY WORLD.

THE PLANTS OF THE BIBLE. Their Ancient and Mediæval History properly described. By Rev. Prof. G. HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., etc. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. Cloth, gilt, 6s. net.

"A concise and useful volume by a high authority."—TIMES.

Sermons by Basil Wilberforce, D.D., Archdeacon of Westminster.

"FOLLOWING ON TO KNOW." In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, with Portrait, 3s. 6d.

"If we had more such preachers there would be fewer empty churches and less religious indifference in London."—FALL MALL GAZETTE.

"SPEAKING GOOD OF HIS NAME." In crown 8vo, gilt lettered, with Pictures of the Cloister Service, 3s. 6d.

"Eloquent, original, suggestive, daring, often picturesque, and always fresh, clear and powerful."—GREAT THOUGHTS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION

TEN YEARS IN A PORTSMOUTH SLUM. By FATHER DOLLING. 7th Edition. With Portrait and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d.

"It is the record of a work very remarkable in all its aspects written with all modesty."—CHURCH TIMES.

78 NEW BOND STREET

"Very clever and very fascinating."—MORNING LEADER.

The Barony of Brendon

By E. H. LACON WATSON

"It is always a pleasure to read a story from the clever pen of Mr. Lacon Watson . . . 'The Barony of Brendon' cannot but add to his already considerable reputation."—DAILY MAIL.

New and Forthcoming Books

6s. each

THE NANCY MANŒUVRES

By CHARLES GLEIG, Author of "Bunter's Cruise."

"The fascinating Nancy as the representative of the 'Daily Scum' on board a man-of-war at naval manœuvres creates wholesale devastation in the hearts of the impressionable British navy. The book is excellent light comedy."—DAILY GRAPHIC.

THE BUILDERS

By W. G. EMERSON

"There is no story of the West like it. There are no dull patches in it." BOSTON GLOBE.

ONE OR TWO

By THEO DOUGLAS

SHORTLY

Fortune's Fool

The Feast of Bacchus

By FRED WYNNE

By ERNEST G. HENHAM

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., LTD.

Macmillan and Co.'s List.

READY MARCH 25.

Mr. Putnam Weale's New Book THE TRUCE IN THE EAST: AND ITS AFTERMATH.

Being a Sequel to "The Re-Shaping of the Far East."
With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Volume III. of the New Edition.

GROVE'S DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Edited by J. A. FULLER MAITLAND, M.A.

In 5 vols., 8vo. Volume III., M—P; 21s. net.

Previously published: Vol. I., A—E; Vol. II., F—L. 21s. net each.

SPECTATOR.—"A deeply interesting study of Irish character and politics."

OUTLOOK.—"Mr. Lysaght's Ireland and Irish are admirably done, presented with force and humour."

HER MAJESTY'S REBELS. By S. R. LYSAGHT. 6s.

ACADEMY.—"We have to thank him for the most delightful glimpses of Irish peasants, their wit and drollery which we have had for many years."

MORNING POST.—"Will probably make the author the most discussed novelist of the year."

OLD HAMPSHIRE VIGNETTES.

By the AUTHOR OF "MADEMOISELLE IXE" and "CECILIA DE NOEL." Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LIFE IN ANCIENT ATHENS:

The Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day.

By Prof. T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D.

Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities.]

Volume III. Now Ready.

A HISTORY of the INQUISITION of SPAIN.

By HENRY CHARLES LEA, LL.D. In 4 vols. Vol. III., 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. . Previously published, Vols. I. and II., 10s. 6d. net each.

STUDIES IN HUMANISM.

By F. C. S. SCHILLER, M.A., D.Sc. 8vo, 10s. net.

SEVENTH AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE METHODS OF ETHICS.

By Prof. HENRY SIDGWICK. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Eighth Edition Just Published.

MANUAL OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

By the late Rt. Hon. HENRY FAWCETT, M.P., D.C.L., F.R.S.
Eighth Edition. Crown 8vo, 12s.

MENDELISM.

By R. C. PUNNETT, Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge.
Second Edition, Enlarged, 16mo, 2s. net.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO.'S

First List of Announcements, Spring 1907.

THE KINGDOM OF MAN. By E. RAY LANKESTER, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., etc. With about 60 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LITERARY RAMBLES IN FRANCE. By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE TRAVELS OF THE KING. Charles II. in Germany and Flanders, 1654-1660. By EVA SCOTT, Author of "The King in Exile," "Rupert, Prince Palatine," etc. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 15s. net.

A CONSIDERATION OF THE STATE OF IRELAND IN THE XIXth CENTURY. By G. LOCKER LAMPSON. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

RUSSIA AND REFORM. By BERNARD PARES. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book gives the chief things which Englishmen ought to know if they wish to form an intelligent judgment of Russian affairs.

FACTORS IN MODERN HISTORY: and their Application to the Problems around us. Ten Studies, mainly in the life and growth of the 16th and 17th Centuries. By A. F. POLLARD, M.A., F.R.Hist.S., Professor of Constitutional History at University College, London. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

CONTEMPORARY FRANCE. By GABRIEL HANOTAUX. Translated from the French. In four volumes. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 15s. net each volume. Vol. III., 1874-7.

Vol. I., 1870-3. Vol. II., 1873-4.

THE ENGLISH PEASANTRY AND THE ENCLOSURE OF COMMON FIELDS. By GILBERT SLATER, M.A. With an Introduction by EARL CARRINGTON. Demy 8vo. Illustrated.

THE LABOUR MOVEMENT IN AUSTRALASIA. A Study in Social Democracy. By VICTOR S. CLARK, Ph.D. Cr. 8vo, 6s. net.

A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Selected and arranged by KATE M. WARREN, Lecturer in English Language and Literature at Westfield College (University of London), and Deputy Assistant Lecturer in the same at Bedford College for Women (University of London), with an Introduction by Rev. STOFFORD BROOKE, M.A. Demy 8vo, 1000 pp., 7s. 6d. net; also in six parts, cloth, 1s. net each.

EUROPEAN ANIMALS: their Geological History and Geographical Distribution. By Dr. SCHARFF, B.Sc., Ph.D., F.L.S. Large crown 8vo. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

THE BIRD: its Form and Function by C. WILLIAM BEEBE. Curator of Ornithology of the New York Zoological Park. Author of "Two Bird Lovers in Mexico." With over 370 Illustrations, chiefly photographed from life by the Author. Small 4to. 14s. net.

NIMROD'S WIFE. By GRACE GALLATIN SETON. Author of "A Woman Tenderfoot." With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo.

THE GODDESS OF REASON. By MARY JOHNSTON, Author of "By Order of the Company," "The Old Dominion," etc. A drama of the French Revolution, in Five Acts. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt.

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS. By G. BERNARD SHAW. Containing as well a Word on the Dramatic Opinions and Essays of G. Bernard Shaw by JAMES HUNEKER. Two vols. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE STRUGGLE FOR A FREE STAGE IN LONDON. By WATSON NICHOLSON. Extra crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE VIRGIL POCKET BOOK (Vergilii Musa Consolatrix). Arranged by S. E. WIMBOLT, with an Introduction by ARTHUR SIDGWICK. 16mo, leather, 2s. 6d. net.

SPINOZA: a Handbook to the Ethics. By J. ALLANSON PICTON, Author of "The Religion of the Universe," etc. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A HANDBOOK OF EGYPTIAN RELIGION. By Professor ERMAN. Translated from the German by A. S. GRIFFITHS. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE HEBREW LITERATURE OF WISDOM. By JOHN F. GENUNG. Crown 8vo, cloth. 8s. 6d. net.

THE ATONEMENT IN LITERATURE AND LIFE. By CHARLES A. WINDMORE. Author of "The Teachings of Dante." Cr. 8vo, 6s. net.

EMMA LADY HAMILTON. A Biography. Compiled from New and Original Documents; with an Appendix of Notes and Letters. By WALTER SIMEL. Popular Edition, revised, with Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

LEAVES FROM THE GOLDEN LEGEND. Chosen by H. D. MADGE, LL.M. With Illustrations by C. M. WATTS. New Edition. 16mo, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON CITY CHURCHES. By A. E. DANIELL. With numerous Illustrations by LEONARD MARTIN and from Photographs; also a Map showing the position of the Churches. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ANCIENT EGYPT. By PERCY E. NEWBERRY and JOHN GARSTANG. New Edition. With Numerous Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

RELIGIONS: ANCIENT AND MODERN. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net per volume.

New Volumes.

THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT ROME. By CYRIL BAILEY, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford.

SHINTO: The Ancient Religion of Japan. By W. G. ASTON, C.M.G., Author of "History of Japanese Literature."

MRS. C. S. PEEL'S COOK BOOKS. 1s. net each.

New Volumes.

FISH AND HOW TO COOK IT.

DISHES MADE WITHOUT MEAT.

THE NATIVE RACES of the BRITISH EMPIRE. Edited by NORTHCOTE W. THOMAS. A Series of Illustrated Ethnographical Handbooks intended to convey accurate information in a popular and readable form. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 6s. net each.

NATIVES OF BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA. By A. WERNER. With 32 Full-page Illustrations.

NATIVES OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA. By C. H. HILL-TOUT. With 32 Full-page Illustrations.

NATIVES OF NORTHERN INDIA. By W. CROOKE, B.A. With 32 Full-page Illustrations.

NATIVES OF AUSTRALIA. By NORTHCOTE W. THOMAS. With 32 Full-page Illustrations.

O'GORMAN'S MOTOR POCKET BOOK: an Elementary Instruction Book on Motor Cars and their handling. By MERVYN O'GORMAN, M.Just.E.E., M.Inst.Mech.E. 1907 Edition. Enlarged to 725 pp. With 301 Illustrations. Full leather, 7s. 6d. net.

6s. NOVELS.

NEW CHRONICLES OF REBECCA. By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN, Author of "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm." Illustrated by F. C. YOHN.

THE FIGHTING CHANCE. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS, Author of "The Reckoning," "Cardigan," etc. Illustrated by FRED PEGHAM. [Third Edition.]

THE GOOD COMRADE. By UNA L. SILBERRAD, Author of "Curayl," "The Success of Mark Wyngate," etc.

CONFLICT. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY, Author of "The Heart o' Gold," etc.

DR. PONS. By PAUL GWYNNE, Author of "Marta."

THE THREE COMRADES. By GUSTAV FRENSEN, Author of "Holyland."

REED ANTHONY, COWMAN. By ANDY ADAMS, Author of "The Log of a Cowboy."

BACHELOR BETTY. By WINIFRED JAMES.

THE WIDDA MAN. By T. KINGSTON CLARKE.

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

MARCH 9, 1907

MR. GEORGE ALLEN

Literature

Life and Flowers. A New Volume of Twelve Essays. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by A. Teixeira De Mattosnet 5/0

Miscellaneous

Library Edition of Ruskin: Vol. xxvii., Fors Clavigera, 1871-2-3, Letters 1 to 36. Vol. xxviii., Fors Clavigera, 1874-6, Letters 37 to 72. Vol. xxix., Fors Clavigera, 1877-83, Letters 73-96. Vol. xxx., St. George's Guild and the Ruskin Museums. Vol. xxxi., Bibliotheca Pastorum, The Economist of Xenophon, Rock Honeycomb, and the Elements of Prosody (with additional MSS.): a Knight's Faith, Laws of Plato (fragmentary MS.), etc.

Poetry

The Medea of Euripides, Translated into English Rhyming Verse, with Preface and Explanatory Notes, by Professor Gilbert Murraynet 2/0
The Shore of Dreams and other Verses. By Evelyn Threlfallnet 3/6
The Last Blackbird and other Lines. By Ralph Hodgsonnet 3/6

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD

Fiction

The Sundered Streams. By Reginald Farrer 6/0
Benedict Kavanagh. By George A. Birmingham 6/0
The Golden Hawk. By Edith Rickert 6/0

Miscellaneous

Letters from the Far East. By Sir Charles Eliot, K.C.M.G.net 8/6
Church and State in France, 1800-1907. By Arthur Galtonnet 12/6
Tippoo Tib. The Story of his Career in Central Africa. Narrated from his accounts by Dr. Heinrich Brode, and translated by H. Havelocknet 10/6
Memories of the Months. Fourth Series. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., F.R.S. 7/6
A Hunting Catechism. By Colonel R. F. Meysey-Thompsonnet 3/6
At the Works. A Study of a North Country Town. By Lady Bell 6/0

MESSRS. G. BELL & Co.

The Plutus of Aristophanes, with The Menachmæi of Plautus. By Benjamin Bickley Rogers, M.A. 8/6
The Itinerary of John Leland. Edited by Lucy Toulmin Smith. Vol. i.net 15/0
The Age of Justinian and Theodora. By W. G. Holmes. Vol. ii.net 9/0
Gregorovius' "Roman Journal." Translated by Mrs. G. W. Hamilton
Daily Thoughts from Horace. Collected and arranged by F. H. Watkins, I.S.O.
Recollections of Hampstead. By G. W. Potter. 6/0
An American Girl in India. By Shelland Bradley 3/6
Swift's Prose Works. Vol. xi. Edited by Mr. Temple Scott. Gray's Letters. Edited by the Rev. D. C. Tovey. Vol. iii. 3/6
Gilbart's History, Principles and Practice of Banking. Two Volumes. 10/0
The York Library. New volumes. Cloth, 2s. net. Leather, net 3/0
Coleridge's Lectures on Shakespeare.
Hooper's Waterloo: the Downfall of the First Napoleon.
Ranke's History of the Popes. Translated by E. Foster. New and revised edition. In three vols.
Goethe's Autobiography. In two vols. With an Introduction by Karl Bruel, Litt.D.
Bell's Cathedral Serieseach net 1/6
Bangor. By P. B. Ironside Bax.
Llandaff. By E. C. Morgan Wilmott.
Romsey Abbey. By the Rev. T. Perkins.
Dante. By M. L. Egerton Castle.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SON

Fiction

The Daft Days. By Neil Munro 6/0
The Mystics. By Katherine Cecil Thurston 3/6
The Longest Journey. By E. M. Forster 6/0

Miscellaneous

Recollections and Impressions. By E. M. Sellarnet 10/6
Forest Entomology. By A. T. Gillanders, F.E.S. Ill. 6/0
In Malay Forests. By George Maxwellnet 6/0

Sport

Ballooning as a Sport. By Major B. Baden-Powell. Ill. net 3/6
History of the Royal and Ancient Golf Club, St. Andrews. By H. S. C. Everard. Ill.net 21/0

Topography and Travel

In the Footsteps of Marco Polo: Being the Account of a Journey Overland from Simla to Peking. By Major Clarence Dalrymple Brucenet 21/0
The Globular Jottings of Griselda. By E. Douglas Hume net 10/0

MESSRS. BROWN, LANGHAM & CO.

Fiction

Fortune's Fool. By Dr. F. Wynne 6/0
One or Two. By Theo Douglas 6/0
The Feast of Bacchus. By Ernest G. Henham 6/0

Miscellaneous

"Hindustan under Free Lances." By H. G. Keene, C.I.E.net 12/6

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL

Fiction

The Fighters. By Lady Violet Greville 6/0
Towing-Path Bess. By Richard Pryce 6/0
The Child of Promise. By Nettà Syrett 6/0

Miscellaneous

To-morrow in the East. By Douglas Story 6/0
Hypnotism and Spiritism. By Dr. Guiseppe Lapponi. Translated by Mrs. Philip Gibbsnet 5/0
The New Theology. By the Rev. R. J. Campbell 6/0
From Naboth's Vineyard. By Lieut.-General Sir William F. Butler, K.C.B.net 5/0

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co.

Fiction

New Chronicles of Rebecca. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Ill.—Conflict. By Constance Smedley—The Helpmate. By May Sinclair—The Good Comrade. By Una L. Silberrad—Dr. Pons. By Paul Gwynne—The Widda Man. By T. Kingston Clarkeeach 6/0
Nimrod's Wife. By Mrs. Ernest Thompson Seton. Ill. ..

Literature

Literary Rambles in France. By N. Betham-Edwards. Ill. net 12/6

Miscellaneous

The Royal Tour in India, 1905-06. By Stanley Reed. Ill.net 15/0
The English Peasantry and the Enclosure of Common Fields. By Gilbert Slater, M.A. Ill.
London Parks and Gardens. By the Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil. Ill.

Science

The Bird. Its Form and Function. By C. William Beebe. Ill.net 14/0
The Kingdom of Man. By E. Ray Lankester, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., etc. Ill.net 3/6
European Animals: their Geological History and Geographical Distribution. By Dr. Scharff, B.Sc., Ph.D., F.L.S. Ill.net 7/6

Technical Works

Electric Railway Engineering. By H. F. Marshall, and H. M. Hobart. Ill.net 42/0
Cranes. By Anton Bottcher. Ill.net 42/0
Design of Irrigation Works. By William Bligh, M.Inst.C.E.net 21/0
Precision Grinding. By H. Darbyshire. Ill.net 6/0
Universal Dictionary of Mechanical Drawing. By George H. Followsnet 4/0

Railroad Curve Tables for the Field Engineer. By R. S. Henderson.....	net 4/0
Searchlights. By F. Nerz. Ill.	net 7/6
Agglutinants and Adhesives. By H. C. Standage.....	net 6/0
Irrigation. Its Principles and Practice as a Branch of Engineering. By Sir Hanbury Brown, K.C.M.G., M.Inst.C.E.	net 16/0
Experimental and Theoretical Applications of Thermodynamics to Chemistry. By Professor Walter Nernst.....	net 5/0
The Elastic Arch. With Reference to the Reinforced Concrete Arch. By Burton R. Lefflernet	4/0
Machine Design. By Charles H. Benjamin.....	net 8/0
A Text-Book of Hydraulics. Including an Outline of the Theory of Turbines. By L. M. Hoskinsnet	10/6
Fuel, Water and Gas Analysis. By J. B. Kershaw. Ill. net	8/0

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co.

Art

The History of Modern Painting. By Professor Richard Muther. Ill.....	net 63/0
A Guide to the Paintings in the Florentine Galleries. By Maud Cruttwell. Ill.	net 3/6
Notable Pictures in Rome. By Edith Harwood. Ill.....net	4/6

Drama

St. Agnes and other Dramas. By E. G. Harrisnet	2/0
--	-----

Miscellaneous

Nature's Own Gardens. By Maud U. Clarke. Ill.net	21/0
The Historic Thames. By Hilaire Belloc, M.P. Ill.net	21/0
The Nemesis of Nations. By W. Romaine Paterson, M.A. First Series, The Ancient Worldnet	10/6
Plato's Republic. A new translation by A. D. Lindsay, M.A.net	7/6
A Summary of the Literatures of Modern Europe. Compiled and arranged by Marian Edwardes.....net	7/6
The Disciple of a Saint. By Vida D. Scuddernet	4/6
The London Police Courts. By H. P. R. Gamon. With introduction by Canon Barnett
Rothiemurchus. By the Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D.....net	3/6
Mediæval Town Series. New volume. Oxford. By Cecil Headlam. Illustrated by Herbert Railtonnet	4/6

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH & Co.

Art

Roman Art, from Augustus to Constantine. By Mrs. Arthur Strong (Eugenie Sellars). 120 illustrationsnet	8/6
Rembrandt. By Prof. Baldwin Brown. 40 illustrations. net	7/6
Sir William Beechey. By W. Roberts. 50 illustrations net	7/6
Pollaiuolo. By Maud Cruttwell. 50 illustrationsnet	7/6
The Interpretation of Nature in Earlier Greek Art. By Emanuel Lowy. Translated by John Fothergill. 30 illustrationsnet	5/0
In the "Popular Library of Art." Perugino. By Edward Hutton—The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. By Ford Madox HuefferCloth, 2s. net each, leather, net	2/6

Fiction

Human Toll. By Barbara Baynton.....	6/0
Sweet Rogues. By Owen Rhoscomyl. Author of "Old Fireproof".....	6/0

Poetry

The Dawn in Britain. An Epic poem. By Ch. M. Doughty. Vols v. and vi., completing the work. 2 vols.....net	9/0
--	-----

Miscellaneous

Sweated Industries. By Clementina Black.net	3/6
A Text Book of Plant Diseases. By George Massee. 96 illustrations. New edition (the third).....net	5/0
The Pilgrim's Staff. An Anthology, by Fitzroy Carrington. Uniform with "The King's Lyrics."net	2/6

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON

Fiction

Running Water. By A. E. W. Mason.....	6/0
The Trampled Cross. By Joseph Hockingnet	3/6
Rising Fortunes. By John Oxenhamnet	6/0
The Man of the World. By Antonio Fogazzaro.....	6/0
Nearly Five Million. By W. Pett Ridge.....	5/0
The Great Plot. By William le Queuxnet	6/0
A Shepherd of the Stars. By Frances Campbellnet	6/0
For Maisie. By Katharine Tynannet	6/0
The Girl and Her Fortune. By L. T. Meadenet	6/0
The Mystery. By Stewart White and S. H. Adamsnet	6/0

Miscellaneous

A Short History of Mediæval Peoples. By Robinson Souttar, [M.A., D.C.L.].....	12/0
---	------

The Nature and Origin of Life in the Light of New Knowledge. By Professor Felix le Dantecnet	6/0
Crockett and Grey Galloway. By S. R. Crockett.....	5/0
Brain and Personality, or the Physical Relations of the Brain to the Mind. By Wm. H. Thomson, M.D., LL.D. net	6/0
The Book of Crafts and Character. By Walter Raymond	6/0
Fighting the Polar Ice. By Anthony Fialanet	16/0
By Italian Seas. By Ernest C. Piexottonet	10/6
Through Persia in a Motor Car. By Claude Anet.....net	20/0
The Pass. By Stewart Edward White.....	6/0
Flowers and Plants for Designers and Schools. By Ed. F. Strange and Henry Irvingnet	10/6
Twenty Years of the American Republic. By Professor H. T. Peck, LL.D.net	12/0
Industrial America. By Professor J. Laurence Laughlin, Ph.D.net	7/6
Dutch and Flemish Furniture. By Esther Singleton ..net	42/0

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT

Fiction

Short Cruises. By W. W. Jacobsnet	3/6
The Flying Cloud. By Morley Robertsnet	6/0
A Rock in the Baltic. By Robert Barrnet	6/0

Miscellaneous

The Secrets of the Vatican. By Douglas Sladen. Ill.	21/0
Prjevalsky's Horse. Translated by Capt. M. H. Hayes and Edited by Professor Ewart, Edinburghnet	5/0
The Horse: its Selection and Purchase. By F. T. Barton, M.R.C.V.S.net	7/6

MESSRS. T. C. & E. C. JACK

Literature

Poets' Country. Edited by Andrew Lang. Assisted by Prof. Churton Collins, W. G. Loftie, F.S.A., E. H. Coleridge, and others. Illustrated by F. S. Walkernet	21/0
---	------

Travel

Arab and Druze at Home. By William Ewing, M.A. Ill. net	5/0
---	-----

MR. JOHN LANE

Biography

The Fanshawe Memoirs. Written by Lady Fanshawe. Edited by H. C. Fanshawe.....net	16/0
Letters and Journals of Samuel Gridley Howe. Edited by his daughter, Laura E. Richardsnet	16/0
Life of Lord Chesterfield. By W. H. Craig, M.A.net	12/6

History

The Fall of Napoleon. By Oscar Browningnet	12/6
Napoleon's Conquest of Prussia, 1806. By F. Loraine Petre.....net	12/6
Napoleon's Campaign in Poland, 1806-1807. By F. Loraine Petrenet	12/6
Ralph Heathcote. Letters of a Diplomatist during the Time of Napoleon, giving an Account of the Dispute between the Emperor and the Elector of Hesse. By Countess Günther Gröbennet	12/6

Fiction

The Mauleverer Murders: a Detective Story. By A. C. Fox-Davies—The Wingless Victory. By N. P. Willcocks —The Strongest Plume. By Hugh de Selincourt—The Lonesome Trail. By John G. Neihardteach	6/0
For the Week-end. A Novel. By Handasydenet	6/0

Miscellaneous

Women of the Second Empire. Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III. By Frederic Loliée. Translated by Alice Ivimy. Ill.net	21/0
The Alhambra of Granada. By Albert F. Calvert.net	42/0
A Complete Bibliography of Fencing and Duelling, as Practised by all European Nations from the Middle Ages to the Present Day. By Carl A. Thimm.....net	31/6
The Book of Job. By Francis Couttsnet	5/0

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

Education

The Teaching of Mathematics in the Elementary and the Secondary School. By J. W. A. Young, Ph.D.net	6/0
--	-----

Fiction

Miss Badsworth, M.F.H.: a Novel. By Eyre Hussey. Ill. net	2/6
---	-----

Miscellaneous

- India and Imperial Preference, with Statistical Tables. By Sir Roper Lethbridge net 2/6
The Stone Implements of South Africa. By J. P. Johnson. Ill. 7/6
"Our Sister Beatrice": being a Memoir of Beatrice Julian Allen. By her sister, Grace Grier net 3/6
Commercial Law. By Alfred Nixon and Robert W. Holland 5/0
The Natal Rebellion of 1906. By Walter Bosman. With an introduction by Colonel McKenzie.
Nature Round the House: a Simple Natural History for Small Students. By Patten Wilson. Ill.
His Grace the Steward and the Trial of Peers. By L. W. Vernon Harcourt.

Theology

- Sin. By the Rev. H. V. S. Eck, M.A. 5/0
The Gospel According to St. Paul. By William Porcher Du Bose, M.A., S.T.D.
The Testimony of the Four Gospels concerning Jesus Christ. By the Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A.
History of the Society of Jesus in North America: Colonial and Federal. By Thomas Hughes, of the same Society. Vol. i.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.

Biography

- The Exeter Episcopate of Archbishop Temple, 1869-1885, By E. G. Sandford, M.A., Archdeacon of Exeter.... net 5/0

Fiction

- John Glynn. A Story of Social Work. By Arthur Paterson..... 6/0

History

- A History of the Inquisition of Spain. By Henry Charles Lea, LL.D. In 4 vols. Vol. iii. net 10/6

Medical

- A System of Medicine. By many Writers. Edited by T. Clifford Allbutt, M.D., and Humphry Davy Rolleston, M.D. Second edition. Vol. ii. Part II. Tropical Diseases and Animal Parasites..... net 25/0

Music

- Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. New Edition. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland, M.A., F.S.A. Vol. iii., M.—P. net 21/0

Science

- Experimental Zoology. By Professor Thomas Hunt Morgan net 12/0

Theology and Philosophy

- The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter. Greek Text, with Introduction, Notes and Comments. By Joseph B. Mayor, M.A., Litt.D. net 14/0
The Religious Conception of the World. An Essay in Constructive Philosophy. By Professor Arthur Kenyon Rogers, Ph.D. net 6/6

MESSRS. MASTERS & CO. LTD.

- The Ascents of the Soul. By the Rev. Dr. A. G. Mortimer
The Recollections and Letters of the Rev. W. H. E. McKnight. By Miss E. J. Thorren.
The Day Book of Short Readings. Vol. ii. By the author of "Preparatio" net 6/0
Masters' Great Churchmen Series. The Life of Richard Hooker. By the Very Rev. Vernon Staley. The Life of Archbishop Laud. By Canon W. L. Mackintosh. each 3/6

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS

Biography

- The Life of Sir Tobie Matthew, Knight, Bacon's Alter Ego. By his kinsman, Arnold Harris Matthew, de jure Earl of Llandaff, of Thomastown, co. Tipperary, and A. Calthrop. With numerous portraits from scarce prints. net 12/0
Whistler: Notes and Footnotes, and other Memoranda. With numerous Illustrations, some from unpublished drawings. By A. E. Gallatin net 10/6

New Editions

- The Island Race. By Henry Newbolt net 3/6
The Wind Among the Reeds. By W. B. Yeats..... net 3/6

Poetry

- Stray Sonnets. By Lilian Street. Vigo Cabinet Series.
Poems. By George C. Cope.
Verses to a Child. By Mabel Trustram. With Illustrations by Edith Calvert

MESSRS. METHUEN

Art

- Dante and his Italy. By Canon Lonsdale Ragg. Ill. net 12/6

Education

- The Complete School Chemistry. By F. M. Oldham, B.A. 4/6
Higher English. By F. J. Rahtz, M.A., B.Sc. 3/6
An Organic Chemistry for Schools and Technical Institutes. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc., F.C.S. 2/6
Engineering Workshop Practice. By C. C. Allen 2/0
The First Book of Kings. Edited by A. E. Rubie, D.D. ... 2/0
A Practical Chemistry Note-Book for Matriculation and Army Candidates. By S. E. Brown, M.A., B.Sc. net 1/6
A School History of Lancashire. By W. E. Rhodes..... 1/6

Fiction

- The Long Road. By John Oxenham 6/0
Living Lies. By Esther Miller..... 6/0
Behold the Days Come. By the Hon. and Rev. James Adderley..... 3/6
The Magician. By W. S. Maugham 6/0
Casting of Nets. By Richard Bagot 6/0
Odd Lengths. By W. B. Maxwell 6/0
A Human Trinity. By Ronald Macdonald 6/0
Stepping Westward. By M. E. Francis 6/0
The Enchanted Garden. By Maud Stepney Rawson 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Glass. By Edward Dillon. Ill. net 25/0
An Introduction to the History of Modern Europe. By Archibald Weir, M.A. 6/0
Falkland and his Times. By J. A. R. Marriott. Ill. net 7/6

Travel and Topography

- A Book of the Pyrenees. By S. Baring-Gould. Ill. 6/0
The Naples Riviera. By Herbert M. Vaughan. Ill. 6/0
Florence and Northern Tuscany. By Edward Hutton. Ill. 6/0

MR. ALEXANDER MORING

- The Octopus. By Frank Norris..... 6/0
The Pit. By Frank Norris..... 6/0
Up from Slavery. Being the Autobiography of Booker T. Washington net 6/0
The Quiet Hour Series. By Rose Porter: In Quietness and Confidence—Open Windows—Resting on His Love—Looking towards Sunrise each net 1/0
English Church Needlework. By Maud R. Hall. Ill. 10/6
State Experiments in Australia and New Zealand. By the Hon. W. P. Reeves, Agent-General for New Zealand. In two volumes net 24/0
Hypnotism: Its History, Practice and Theory. By J. Milne Bramwell, M.B., C.M. net 18/0
Aramaic Papyri discovered at Assuan. Edited by Professor A. H. Sayce, with the assistance of A. E. Cowley, and with Appendices by W. Spiegelberg and Seymour de Ricci net 21/0
Burma: A Handbook of Practical, Commercial and Political Information. By Sir George Scott, K.C., I.E. net 10/6

MR. JOHN MURRAY

Biography

- The Life and Letters of Sir James Graham, 1792-1861. Edited by C. S. Parker, Ill. 24/0
Life and Works of Vittorio Carpaccio. By the late Professor Gustaf Ludwig and Professor Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by R. H. Hobart Cust net 52/6

Education

- Murray's English Literature Series. By E. W. Edmunds, M.A., B.Sc., and F. Spooner, B.A.—The Story of English Literature. In 3 vols. each 3/6

Fiction

- The Imperfect Gift. By Phyllis Bottome 6/0
Her Son. By Horace A. Vachell 6/0
Daniel Quayne. By J. S. Fletcher 6/0

History

- An Introductory History of England. Second Volume. From the Beginning of the Reign of Henry VIII. to 1660. By C. R. L. Fletcher 5/0
Certain Excavations and their bearing on Early History. By Ronald M. Burrows net 2/6
Selected Speeches and Despatches relating to Canadian Constitutional History. Edited by H. E. Egerton, M.A., and W. L. Grant, M.A. With maps.

Miscellaneous

- Pillow Lace. By Mrs. Constantin C. Mincoff. Ill. 6/0
 What Might Have Been, or England under a Socialistic Régime. By an anonymous writer net 2/6
 London County Council Finance. By John Holt Schooling net
 Plagues and Pleasures of an old Bengali. By Lieut.-Colonel Cunningham. Ill. 4 ..

Readings in English Literature

- Junior Course. 3 volumes each 2/6
 Intermediate Course. 3 volumes " 2/6
 Senior Course. 3 volumes " 3/0
 Murray's School Arithmetic. By A. J. Pressland, M.A. ... 2/6
 A Primer of Psychology. By Laura Brackenbury, M.A. ... 1/0
 Le Français parlé et écrit. By A. Stallworthy, M.A. 3/6
 Notes on the Teaching of Elementary Chemistry. By J. B. Russell, B.Sc.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE

- Library of Historical and Standard Literature.
 Grote: History of Greece. Edited by J. M. Mitchell, M.A., and O. Caspari, M.A. net 5/0
 Macaulay: History of England. Edited by T. F. Henderson net 5/0
Library of Early Novelists:
 Breton: Novels. Edited by Oliphant Smeaton net 5/0
 Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea net 6/0
 Defoe: Moll Flanders and Roxana net 6/0
 Dekker: Novels. Edited by Oliphant Smeaton net 6/0
 Early English Prose Romances. Edited by W. J. Thoms net 6/0
 Greene: Novels. Edited by Oliphant Smeaton.
 Lewis: The Monk.
 Lily: Euphues.
 Sidney: Arcadia.
Wayfaring Books.
 The Garden Anthology. By Rose Gardner net 2/6
 The Pocket Plato. By S. C. Woodhouse, M.A. net 2/6
 The Pocket Ruskin. By Rose Gardner net 2/6
The English Library.
 Curios from a Word-Collector's Cabinet. By Dr. A. Smythe Palmer 2/6
 History in Fiction. By E. A. Baker, M.A. 2/6
 How to Read English Literature. Ser. ii.; Dryden to Meredith. By Laurie Magnus, M.A. 2/6
New Universal Library.
 Arnold: Essays in Criticism.
 Berkeley: Principles of Human Knowledge.
 Brontë: Jane Eyre.
 Carlyle: Past and Present.
 Cowley: Essays.
 Dante: Inferno. Translated by Longfellow.
 — Purgatorio. Translated by the same.
 — Paradiso. Translated by the same.
 Friswell (J. Hain): The Gentle Life.
 Hazlitt: Liber Amoris.
 Helps (Sir A.): Friends in Council.
 — Companions of My Solitude.
 Hobbes: Leviathan.
 Homer: Iliad. Translated by Lord Derby.
 Hugh (V.): Last Days of a Condemned.
 Lucretius. Translated by H. A. J. Munro.
 Macaulay: History of England. 5 vols.
 — Constitutional and other Essays.
 — Literary Essays.
 — Lays of Ancient Rome.
 Manning: Household of Sir T. More.
 Selden: Table Talk.
 Smith (Sir T.): Smaller History of Rome.
 — Smaller History of Greece.
 Spectator (The). Edited by G. A. Aitken. Vols. iv.-vi. (end).
 Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianae.

Miniature Reference Library

- Amateur House-Carpentry.
 Dictionary of the Bible. By A. M. Haymsen.
 Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Terms. By Prof. Frank Bower.
 Dictionary of English Synonyms. By J. A. Farquharson.
 Dictionary of Mythology. By S. C. Woodhouse, M.A.
 Dictionary of Technical and Scientific Terms. By F. E. Ross.
 Galleries and Museums of Europe. By Howard Hensman.
 Gazetteer of the World. By J. and T. Baylee.
 Glossary to Shakespeare. By J. A. Farquharson.
 Italian-English and English-Italian Dictionary. By F. H. T. Gray, M.A.
 My Jest Book. By Mark Lemon, late Editor of Punch.
 Phrases and Proverbial Sayings.
 Spanish-English and English-Spanish Dictionary. By H. Warner Allen, M.A. (Oxon.).
 When and Where of Famous Men and Women: a Dictionary of Dates and Places of their Births and Deaths.

- Who Did That? : a Dictionary of Inventions, Discoveries, etc. By J. C. R. Curtis.
 Who's Who in Fiction? A Dictionary of Literary Allusions, being Noted Names in Novels, Romances, Tales, Plays, and Poetry. By H. Swan.
 Who Wrote That (Foreign Authors)? By E. Latham and Muriel Curle.
 Who Wrote That (Classical Authors)? By William Swan Sonnenschein each net 1/0
Muses Library:
 Beddoes. Edited by Ramsay Colles—Campion. Edited by Percival Vivian—Lyall (Sir Alfred): Poems (Verses written in India, etc.)—Suckling: Poetical Works. Edited by A. Hamilton Thompson each, cloth, net 1/0; lambskin, net 2/0
Golden Anthologies:
 Poems of Life and Death; Poems of Patriotism; Poems of Romance. Edited by G. K. A. Bell, B.A., Ch. Ch., Oxford—Poems of Marriage. Edited by Percival Vivian each, cloth, net 1/0; lambskin net 2/0
Useful Library:
 Holdsworth's Agriculture Holdings Acts and Ground Game Act. Edited by J. F. Waley, M.A., Barrister-at-Law
 Holdsworth's Law of Master and Servant. Edited by J. R. McIlraith, including the Servants Compensation Act, 1907

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co.

Fiction

- Poison Island. By A. T. Quiller-Couch—Windover Tales from the Marsh and Heath. By Halliwell Sutcliffe—The Ultramarines: a Story of Colonial Life. By Colonel A.—The Prince's Valet. By John Barnett.—Fräulein Schmidt and Mr. Anstruther. By the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden" each 6/0

Literature

- Beside Still Waters. By A. C. Benson net 7/6
 The Papers of a Pariah. By the Rev. Father Hugh Benson net 5/0
 The Letters of One. By Charles Hare Piunkett net 5/0

Miscellaneous

- Letters of a Betrothed, 1804-1813, during the German War of Liberation. By the Baroness Edith Von Cramm. Translated by Leonard Huxley net 5/0
 Lonewood Corner. By John Halsham net 5/0
 The State of the Navy in 1907: a Plea for Inquiry. By "Civis." 2/6
 Animal Life. By F. W. Gamble, M.Sc. Ill.
 Sketches in Making and East Africa. By Maj.-Gen. R. S. S. Baden-Powell net 21/0

New Editions

- The Essays, Literary and Critical, of Sir Leslie Stephen, with Introductory Essays by the Right Hon. James Bryce and Herbert Paul. in 10 volumes, per set, net 60/0
 The Stones of Paris in History and Letters. By Benjamin Ellis Martin and Charlotte M. Martin net 7/6

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN

Fiction

- The Four Philanthropists. By Edgar Jepson 6/0
 In the First Watch. By James Dalziel 6/0
 Herridge of Reality Swamp. By William Hay 6/0
 The Red Sphinx. By Edward U. Valentine and Harper. 6/0
 Josephine's Troubles. By Percy Fitzgerald 5/0

History

- Chile. By G. F. Scott-Elliot. With an introduction by Major Martin Hume 10/6
 The Bulgarian Exarchate. By Richard von Mach 3/6
 Bonaparte in Egypt and the Egyptians of To-day. By Hadji A. Browne 10/6

Miscellaneous

- Shakespeare Studies in Six Plays. By the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning net 16/0
 American Railway Organisation and Working. Edited by Ernest R. Dewsnap net 9/0
 The Sanitary Evolution of London. By Henry Jephson, L.C.C. net 6/0
 Life and To-morrow. Edited by Zoë Procter 6/0
 Bards of the Gael and Gall. By George Sigerson, M.D., F.R.U.I. net 6/0
 Old German Love Songs. By F. C. Nicholson, M.A. 6/0
 The Case for Women's Suffrage. By J. Keir Hardie, Miss Margaret McMillan, Mrs. Fawcett, Miss Gore Booth, and others. Edited by Brougham Villiers. Cloth, net 3/6 and 1 net 2/6

1s. THE UNIVERSAL RUSKIN 1s.

In 15 vols., cloth, full gilt back. Pocket size, 6½ by 4 in. On Superfine Paper, 1s. net; royal-blue leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net.

What services this edition renders to the student and book-lover of to-day as compared with the services of the editions till recently current?

£8 8s.

FOR

5s.

£5:15:6

FOR

3s.

21s. for 1s.

Modern Painters, 5 vols., 314 Illustrations and One Coloured Plate. The price of this work till 1882 (when the Autograph Edition, which the Author called "The Final Edition," and Messrs. Wise & Smart in their Bibliography of Ruskin describe as "practically a reprint of the previous edition," was current) was £8 8s.; the U.R. edition contains every word of this edition, as well as every one of its illustrations, for 5s. net. It is, without doubt, the cheapest book ever published in the history of the book trade.

Stones of Venice, 3 vols., 166 Illustrations and 7 Coloured Plates. The price of this work till 1885 was £5 15s. 6d.; the U.R. Edition contains precisely the same text and precisely the same illustrations for 3s. net.

Seven Lamps of Architecture. With 14 Plates. The price till 1879 was £1 1s.; the U.R. is identical in text and plates at 1s. net.

Lectures on Architecture and Painting. With 23 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 7s. 6d. net.

Elements of Drawing. With 48 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Political Economy of Art (A Joy for Ever).

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Unto this Last.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net (without the 2 Plates).

Two Paths. With 2 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Selections from Ruskin's Writings.

The price in 1904 was 6s. net.

The U. R. Edition of each of these works contains identically the same text and illustrations (with exception of TWO PATHS, in which two more Plates are contained) at 1s.

net each.

In addition to the above INDEXES have been provided for the first time to Seven Lamps, Lectures on Architecture, Elements of Drawing, Political Economy of Art, Unto this Last, and Two Paths. The books may now be inspected at every booksellers in the Three Kingdoms.

To be followed by Editions of the Author's other books as their copyrights expire.

DEFINITIVE LIBRARY EDITIONS AT 2s. 6d. NET. THE LONDON LIBRARY.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE AND SONS LIMITED realising that the time has at length arrived when a sufficiently large public can be relied upon to warrant the publication of LIBRARY EDITIONS OF BRITISH CLASSICS IN DEFINITIVE FORM AT 2s. 6d. net, have inaugurated a New Series of Books which provides:

- (1) Complete Texts of Important Classics, elaborately edited by the Leading Scholars of to-day, and equipped with full Apparatus (Indexes, Genealogical Tables, Diagrams, etc.)
- (2) The perfection of Print and Paper, i.e., a very legible and beautiful type, printed on superfine ivory-finish paper. Size, 7½ by 5 inches, handsome for the shelf and convenient to hold.
- (3) Buckram binding, gilt lettered, ornamented with only the monogram of the Series on the side, with a gilt top, and dark surface end-papers.
- (4) Uniformity of External Appearance.
- (5) Each volume illustrated by an Etched or Photogravure Portrait.
- (6) Price 2s. 6d. net, irrespective of length.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE OF COLONEL HUTCHINSON. By his Widow, LUCY. Edited by C. H. FIRTH, Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY. Edited, with Appendices and a Continuation of the Life, by SIDNEY LEE.

LIFE OF SHELLEY. By T. J. HOGG. With an Introduction by Prof. EDWARD DOWDEN.

LIFE OF GOETHE. By G. H. LEWES.

MEMOIRS OF WILLIAM CAVENDISH, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE and Margaret his Wife. Edited by Prof. C. H. FIRTH.

THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE, and other Essays. By BENJAMIN JOWETT. With an Essay on Jowett, by Sir LESLIE STEPHEN.

LETTERS OF LITERARY MEN: FROM SIR THOMAS MORE TO SHERIDAN. With a Running Commentary. Edited by F. A. MUMBY.

LETTERS OF LITERARY MEN: NINETEENTH CENTURY. With a Running Commentary. Edited by F. A. MUMBY.

BEOWULF. Translated and Edited, with Notes by WENTWORTH HUYSHÉ. With many Illustrations in the Text, and therefore printed throughout on Art Paper.

A New Series. WAYFARING BOOKS.

Fcap. 8vo, limp cloth extra, gilt top, coloured Picture End-Papers. 2s. 6d. net.

THE WAYFARER. By CLAUDE B. BENSON. [Ready.]

THE VOICE OF THE MOUNTAINS. By E. A. BAKER, M.A., and F. E. ROSS. [Ready.]

THE VOICE OF THE SEA. By INGRAM SWALE. [March.]

THE SIMPLE LIFE. By E. A. BAKER, M.A. [In Prep.]

PRAYERS FROM THE POETS. By CECIL HEADLAM, M.A., and LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A. [Ready.]

THE GARDEN ANTHOLOGY. By ROSE GARDNER. [Ready.]

THE POCKET PLATO. By S. C. WOODHOUSE, M.A. [March.]

THE POCKET RUSKIN. By ROSE GARDNER. [In Prep.]

THE GOLDEN ANTHOLOGIES

Edited by G. K. A. BELL, B.A., Ch. Ch., Oxford. 1s. net cloth; 2s. net lambskin.

POEMS OF LIFE AND DEATH.

POEMS OF PATRIOTISM.

POEMS OF ROMANCE.

POEMS OF MARRIAGE. Edited by PERCIVAL VIVIAN.

A NEW LIST OF ROUTLEDGE'S NEW SERIES.

Containing up-to-date Lists of the contents of the following VERY CHEAP NEW SERIES, will be posted to every Applicant.

THE LONDON LIBRARY. 2s. 6d. net. First 8 vols.

THE NEW UNIVERSAL LIBRARY. Cloth, 1s. net; leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net. 140 vols.

THE MUSES' LIBRARY. Same prices. 45 vols.

GOLDEN ANTHOLOGIES. Cloth, 1s. net; lambskin, 2s. net. 7 vols.

POETS AND POETRY OF NINETEENTH CENTURY. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. 6d. net. 12 vols.

WAYFARING BOOKS. 2s. 6d. net. 6 vols.

LIBRARY OF HISTORICAL LITERATURE. 6s. net. 21 vols.

STANDARD REFERENCE LIBRARY. 7s. 6d. net. 3 vols.

PHOTOGRAVURE AND COLOUR SERIES. 3s. 6d. net. 19 vols.

GENTLEMAN'S LIBRARY. 5s. 47 vols.

LIBRARY OF EARLY NOVELISTS. 6s. net. 13 vols.

MINIATURE REFERENCE LIBRARY. 1s. net. 41 vols.

THE ENGLISH LIBRARY. 2s. 6d. 14 vols.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY RECITERS. 1s. 9 vols.

BOOKS OF HUMOUR. 1s. 38 vols.

BROADWAY BOOKLETS. 6d.; lambskin, 1s. 6d. net. 48 vols.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd., Broadway House, Ludgate Hill, London

FIVE NEW SPRING BOOKSWomen of the Second Empire

Being Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III.

By FREDERIC LOLIEE. With an Introduction by Richard Whiteing and 63 full-page Illustrations, 3 in Photogravure. Demy 8vo, price 21s. net.

Life of Lord Chesterfield

An Account of the Ancestry, Personal Character, and Public Services of the Fourth Earl of Chesterfield. By W. H. CRAIG, M.A. Numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

READY WEDNESDAY NEXT.

Ornithological and Other Oddities

By FRANK FINN, B.A. (Oxon), F.Z.S., late Deputy Superintendent of the Indian Museum, Calcutta. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Napoleon's Campaign in Poland, 1806-1807

A Military History of Napoleon's First War with Russia, verified from unpublished official documents. By F. LORAINÉ PETRE. 16 full-page Illustrations, Maps, Plans, etc. New Edition, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A Queen of Indiscretions

The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. By G. P. CLERICI. Translated from the Italian by FREDERIC CHAPMAN, with an Introduction by the Translator and numerous Illustrations reproduced from contemporary Portraits and Prints. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"The volume, scholarly and well-informed . . . forms one long and absorbingly interesting chapter of the chronique scandaleuse of Court life . . . reads like a romance, except that no romancer would care or dare to pack his pages so closely with startling effects and fantastic scenes."A NOVEL LIST

Mr. JOHN LANE will publish shortly

The Wingless Victory
The Wingless Victory

A New Novel by M. P. WILLCOCKS, Author of "Widdicombe." Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Boy's Marriage
A Boy's Marriage

By HUGH DE SÉLINCOURT. Price 6s.

EVENING STANDARD.—"The book is likely to attract a great deal of attention. It is exceedingly realistic. A daring but sincere book."

The Beloved Vagabond
The Beloved Vagabond

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE, Author of "The Morals of Marcus Ordeyne." Price 6s.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"With 'The Beloved Vagabond' Mr. Locke has triumphed; he has given us something entirely fresh and original, coloured with his own personality—a personality that has a very prominent position in the ranks of modern novelists."

The Dangerville Inheritance
The Dangerville Inheritance

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES. A thrilling detective story. Price 6s.

MORNING POST.—"The Dangerville Inheritance" is Mr. John Lane's find for the season, and a very good find it is too."

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO ST., W.OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS*The Oxford Treasury of English Literature

By G. E. HADOW and W. H. HADOW. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. I. *Old English to Jacobean.*Vol. II. *Growth of the Drama.The Shirburn Ballads, 1585-86

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by ANDREW CLARK. Demy 8vo, cloth, with 40 Illustrations from Black-Letter Copies, 10s. 6d. net.

DAILY MAIL.—"This valuable collection of rough poems full of interest for the student of Elizabethan manners has been edited by Mr. Andrew Clark with close care and skill and handsomely produced by the Clarendon Press."

Samuel Johnson

The Leslie Stephen Lecture delivered in the Senate House, Cambridge, February 22, by WALTER RALEIGH. 8vo, 1s. net.

EVENING STANDARD.—"Admirable both in matter and expression. We have rarely met with a juster or more concise bit of Johnsonian appreciation."

Australasia

By J. D. ROGERS. Vol. VI. of the Historical Geography of British Colonies, by C. P. LUCAS, C.B. [IMMEDIATELY.]

The Cults of the Greek States

By LEWIS RICHARD FARNELL, M.A. 8vo, cloth, Vols. I and II. with 61 Plates and over 100 Illustrations, 32s. net; Vols. III and IV. with 86 Plates, 32s. net.

The Theory of Good and Evil

A Treatise on Moral Philosophy. By H. RASHDALL. 8vo, 2 vols., 14s. net. [IMMEDIATELY.]

The Principles of German Civil Law

By ERNEST J. SCHUSTER, LL.D. Munich. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

The Government of India

Being a Digest of the Statute Law relating thereto, with Historical Introduction and Illustrative Documents. By Sir COURTENAY ILBERT. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

A Short Account of the Land Revenue and its Administration in British India

With a Sketch of the Land Tenures. By B. H. BADEN-POWELL, C.I.E., F.R.S.E., M.R.A.S. Revised by T. W. HOLDERNESS, C.S.I. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, with a Map, 5s.

Catalogue of the Coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta

Including the Cabinet of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. Volume II., Part I., The Sultans of Delhi; Part II., Contemporary Dynasties in India. By H. NELSON WRIGHT. [SHORTLY.]

Surgical Instruments in Greek and Roman Times

By JOHN STEWART MILNE. 8vo.

[SHORTLY.]

A Catalogue of the Herbarium of Dillenius

By G. CLARIDGE DRUCE, with the assistance of Professor VINES.

[SHORTLY.]

Oxford Classical Texts*Asconius*, by A. C. CLARK; Hyperides, by F. G. KENYON;Plato, Vol. V. and last Volume, by J. BURNET.

[SHORTLY.]

Keats' Complete Poetical Works

With 6 Portraits. Edited by H. BUXTON FORMAN. Crown 8vo, large type, from 3s. 6d.; on Oxford India Paper, from 5s.

Oxford Poets' Series.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

heads far over into the Chinese barricades with taunts and shouts of derision.

Such things must be in a siege. You realise that in reading these letters in a way that no grave historian could make you realise it. And after the relief at length came, quiet, peace-loving men went mad: two months under fire amid such privations had shattered their nerves, and their madness took the form of thirst for revenge, and a gloating over the details of the killing of the Boxers, their enemies.

Such things Mr. Putnam Weale recounts, and it is well that they should be recounted. Though his style is vivid he lays no undue emphasis on horrors for their own sake. He writes with that kind of restraint which is convincing, and which goes to make these letters one of the most remarkable documents we have ever read—these notes, as he calls them, of an eye-witness, which set forth in some detail from day to day the real story of the siege and sack of a distressed capital in 1900.

MODES ET ROBES

English Costume. Painted and Described by DION CLAYTON CALTHROP. Vol. i., Early English; vol. ii., Middle Ages; vol. iii., Tudor and Stuart; and vol. iv., Georgian. (Black, 7s. 6d. net. each.)

Historic Dress, 1607 to 1800. By ELISABETH McCLELLAN. Illustrated by SOPHIE B. STEEL. (Lane, 42s.)

Costume: Fanciful, Historical, and Theatrical. Compiled by Mrs. ARIA. Illustrated by PERCY ANDERSON. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.)

Chats on Costume. By G. WOOLLISCROFT RHEAD, R.E. Illustrated (Unwin, 5s. net.)

It is scarcely necessary to insist upon the importance of a study of clothes. To the historian, the novelist, the painter, and the actor, a correct conception of the dress and habits of our ancestors is indispensable, and even the costumier in catering for his clients will find in attention to the subject new springs of useful information and fresh ideas for design. Carlyle, in the character of Diogenes Teufels-dröckh, affirms that "society is founded upon cloth"; and we have ample authority for believing that civilisation is largely a matter of costume. The late Lord Salisbury pointed out that the subject is well worthy of the attention of the statesman, and possibly he had at the moment in his eye the flamboyant necktie of the Socialist, or the unusual, if artistic, headgear affected by some of his political opponents. It is reported that on a bitterly cold day in December last Mark Twain appeared in Washington in a cream-coloured suit of summer flannel, and when asked why he adopted this costume, he said: "This is a uniform. It is the uniform of the American Association of Purity and Perfection. If nobody else will wear colours that cheer me up, I shall wear them myself." And he went on to suggest that man's clothing is bad in colour, and generally uncomfortable, having a depressing effect on those who wear it as well as on the spectators. "I would go back," he said, "to the middle ages for the gorgeous, glorious, gaudy costumes of that time. Then we could wear colours. Back to the days before buttons were invented, when they laced their clothing up, and it took a little time to do it; back to the days of tights and helmet—though I admit that it might be uncomfortable for a bald-headed man to wear a tightly screwed-on helmet with a bee or a fly imprisoned in it." Mr. Clemens was bound to have his joke, but he would be the first to admit that to be frivolous on the subject of clothes argues not only want of knowledge, but lack of common sense. History is, so to speak, environed with vesture, and in every age the dress of man denotes something which must be revealed if his motives and actions are to be thoroughly understood. It is odd that in these circumstances there should be comparatively few books on costume which appeal to the public. Nor can it be said of those now before us that they form notable exceptions to this rule. Each in its way is admirable; there is system, scholarship, and sympathy, but something palls, and satiety speedily succeeds satisfaction.

The most important, as it is the most sumptuous, of these four books is that which deals with historic dress in America. The two ladies who have collaborated in the production of this work have furnished an invaluable reference book on their special section of the subject. The illustrations are all that can be desired, although we could have wished that Miss Steel had been more explicit in defining the sources from which she has drawn inspiration. It is not a little irritating to be put off with the vague information "from an old print," or "from a contemporary portrait." But this is a minor blemish, and we are introduced by the author to many quaint and curious customs of the early settlers. Here is a description of "The Posey Dance," a form of entertainment popular in Florida in the early part of the eighteenth century:

The ladies of a household arrange in a room of their dwelling an harbour decked with garlands of flowers and lighted with many candles. This is understood by the gentlemen as an invitation to drop in and admire the decorations. Meanwhile the lady who has prepared it selects a partner from among her visitors and hands him a bouquet of flowers. The gentleman who receives this posey becomes for the nonce the king of the ball, and leads out the fair donor as queen of the dance. The others take partners, and the ball thus inaugurated may continue several successive evenings. Should the lady's choice fall upon an unwilling swain, which seldom happened, he could be excused by paying the expenses of the entertainment.

And here is an advertisement from the Pennsylvania Gazette in 1773, throwing a light upon another aspect of colonial life:

Ran away from the subscriber, an English servant girl named Christina Ball, but calls herself Caty for shortness, about twenty years of age, brown skinned, black eyes, and hair lately cut short, a little stoup-shouldered. Her clothes are very ordinary, a brown cloth petticoat, other coarse shifts and a striped calico short gown; any other clothes uncertain. Whosoever takes her up, and confines her in any gaol within twenty miles of this city shall have twenty shillings reward, and three pounds if taken up at any distance further, paid by Henry Neill.

The chapter on uniforms in America, 1775-1800, is more complete than anything of the kind we have seen before, and the glossary of the nomenclature of dress, while it is hardly so full as that to be found in the "Cyclopædia of Costume," is curious and useful.

Mr. Calthrop tells us that he has been at considerable pains to trace the influence of one garment upon its successor, to reduce the wardrobe for each reign down to its simplest cuts and folds, so that the reader may follow quite easily the passage of the coat from its birth to its ripe age, and by this means may know not only the clothes of one time, but the reasons for those garments. We confess to a preference for his pictures, which, it seems to us, are a valuable addition to English history, whereas his notes, for all his system, are at times irritatingly scrappy, and at others provokingly trivial. Here is a specimen of his style:

As the fig-leaf identifies Adam, so may the chaperon twisted into a cockscomb mark Richard II. As the curled and scented hair of Alcibiades occurs to our mind, so shall Beau Nash manage his clouded cane. Elizabeth shall be helped to the memory by her Piccadilly ruff; square Henry VIII. by his broad-toed shoes and his little flat cap; Anne Boleyn by her black satin nightdress; James be called up as padded trucks; Maximilian as puffs and slashes; D'Orsay by the curve of his hat; Tennyson as a dingy brigand; Gladstone as a collar; and even more recent examples, as the Whistlerian lock and the Burns blue suit.

The coloured illustrations will appeal to everybody, but the little sketches in the letterpress will be invaluable to the costumier and the stage manager if not to many tailors and milliners as well. Scattered throughout the four volumes are also a series of word-pictures, of which mention must be made, and of which a good specimen is the following:

I have said that Brummell was the inventor of modern dress: it is true. He was the beau who raised the level of dress from the slovenly, 'dirty linen, the greasy hair, the filthy neck-cloth, the crumbled collar, to a position, ever since held by Englishmen, of quiet, unobtrusive cleanliness, decent linen, an abhorrence of striking forms of dress. He made clean linen and washing daily a part of English life. See him seated before his dressing-glass, a mahogany-framed sliding cheval glass with brass arms on either sides for candles. By his side is George IV., recovering from his drunken bout of last night. The Beau's glass reflects his clean-complexioned face, his grey eyes, his light brown hair, and sandy whiskers. A servant produces a shirt with a 12-inch collar fixed to it, assists the Beau into it, arranges it, and stands aside. The collar nearly hides the Beau's face. Now, with his hand protected with a discarded shirt, he folds his collar down to the required height. Now he takes his white stocks and folds it carefully round the collar; the stock is a foot high and slightly starched. A supreme moment of artistic decision, and the stock and collar take their perfect creases. In an hour or so he will be ready to partake of a light meal with the royal gentleman. He will stand up and survey himself in his morning dress, his regular, quiet suit. A blue coat, light breeches fitting the leg well, a light waistcoat of some other colour, never a startling contrast, Hessian boots or top-boots, and buckskins. There was nothing very peculiar about his clothes except, as Lord Byron said, "an exquisite propriety." His evening dress was a blue coat, white waistcoat, black trousers buttoned at the ankle—these were of his own invention, and one may say it was the wearing of them that made trousers more popular than knee-breeches—striped silk stockings, and a white stock.

From this picture any tailor of ordinary ability could make the clothes, and any actor with that assistance should make up the part.

Mrs. Aria provides quite a different kind of book, more commonplace, perhaps more widely useful. She explains the origin of this volume as arising out of a discussion with Mr. Percy Anderson, who supplies the illustrations, upon an easy method of solving a problem in fancy dress:

We agreed then that we were both most keenly interested in dress, regarding it as one of the fine and essential arts; and we decided that we would try to preach its best doctrines and traditions to the world at large, while we did not ignore the fact that many more worthy had previously enriched literature with the same object. . . . A few practical details and suggestions are included in the hope that they may obviate some difficulties of those who fret their hour on the stage or at the fancy-dress ball, while, for the benefit of the next generation, I have devoted a small space to personal reminiscences of theatrical heroes and heroines, and to some facts of theatrical dress, as it has been expressed in classic and popular dramas produced by the leading actors and actresses of our time.

Those who are in search of a fancy dress will find here some remarkable costumes, and some that are pretty if less remarkable, while in other ways Mrs. Aria has fairly carried out the promise of her introductory note.

We have left to the last the most felicitously conceived and successfully accomplished of the batch. Mr. Rhead is a pleasant writer, and his facts, quotations, and verses are judiciously selected. His view of the uses of clothes, or costume, though not altogether those of an older writer on the same subject, still serve their purpose as a text for a most readable book. The older author, to whom we have referred, in speaking of the dress of women, attributes the alterations in fashion to an incitement to desire, and the many changes, he maintains, proceed from unskilful attempts to allure instead of being, as many suppose, the effect of mere caprice and wantonness of fancy. This is an aspect of the subject which is not treated in Chats on Costume, but Herrick may have had it in his mind when he wrote:

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness;
A lawn about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distraction;
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher;
A cuff neglected, and thereby
Ribbons to flow confusedly;
A winning wave, deserving note
In the tempestuous petticoat,
A careless shoe-string, in whose tie
I see a wild civility;
Do more bewitch me, than when art
Is too precise in every part.

ANGLO-SAXON ORIGINS

Origin of the Anglo-Saxon Race. By T. W. SHORE. (Elliot Stock, 9s. net.)

DURING the past century the efforts of many conscientious investigators have done much to elucidate the obscurities of Anglo-Saxon law and custom, more particularly with regard to tenure of land and methods of agriculture, and the framework of Anglo-Saxon society under the later Heptarchic kings and the successors of Alfred has been made as clear as we can reasonably expect for the present. It is otherwise with the ethnological study of the origins of the race and the early history of the various Heptarchic kingdoms. In the volume before us Mr. Shore has made an attempt to solve the first of these questions.

The task which he had set himself was a very difficult one and the variety of knowledge required to construct a synthesis of the evidence at our disposal is rarely to be found in any single scholar, but in this connection it is particularly to be regretted that the author had not paid sufficient attention to the ethnology of Northern Germany, which obviously has an important bearing upon the problem of the settlement. We are led to this conclusion by the identification of the Jutes with the Goths and of the Vandals with the Wends, which would hardly be advanced by one conversant with the researches of recent years.

Apart from this deficiency the chief point we find to criticise in the book is its failure to produce a distinct theory of the settlement as a whole. We cannot but think that some consistent explanation will eventually be derived from the consideration of written records both here and on the continent. There is much to criticise in Nennius and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, but such criticism need not be merely destructive. After all, these works are of considerable antiquity and the traditions which they record are at least worthy of careful attention. There are also Anglo-Saxon traditions, apparently quite trustworthy, which relate to a period anterior to the invasion, and these Mr. Shore appears to have neglected. We cannot help thinking that his theory of independent group-settlements is an inadequate explanation of so great a transference of population as must have taken place at the invasion. This theory is one to which the student of place-names and local antiquities is very naturally inclined to lend his support. Without some check such as is furnished by native tradition, there is no unity to inform the mass of detail.

What we expect from the title "Origin of the Anglo-Saxon Race," is a theory of the racial or tribal composition of the followers of Hengest and Aelle, of the men who settled the other Heptarchic kingdoms. These were presumably the decisive element in the later national type or types. The author treats the subject first tribally and then locally, but he does not bridge the gap between the name on the continent and the name in England. His distrust of the chronicles and his exclusive employment of the topographical method prevent him from formulating any comprehensive generalisation. Hence when he has found evidence for the presence of a continental tribe in England, he has not explained whether it arrived in Roman times, in which case its representatives would have been exterminated or absorbed by the fierce conquerors, or with the Anglo-Saxons in their invasions, or after the formation of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom, in which case a few arrivals could hardly have had any dominating influence.

A very large part of the book is devoted to the collection of place-names. This is a peculiarly difficult subject, in which even a skilful philologist may easily be led astray. We regret to have to say that Mr. Shore does not seem to have possessed the knowledge necessary for dealing with such evidence in a satisfactory manner. It may be that persons from many northern nations besides the Angles and Saxons took part in the invasion, but the evidence adduced to prove this, particularly in the case of the Slavs, can hardly be accepted. Again the place-names ending in -ing and suffixes compounded with -ing, sometimes, no doubt, admit of the explanation he has given, namely, that of a settlement by kindreds; but not always.

To turn to the remainder of Mr. Shore's data, he seems to us to have laid too much stress upon conclusions derived from craniological evidence. The scientific study of craniology is still in the embryo stage; even the principle of classification is not yet settled. Indeed the speculations of professors of this science seem to produce results diametrically opposite, even in the great question of the origin of the Aryan race. Nor do arguments derived from pigmentation appear to us to carry much weight, if the influence of intermarriage and climate be taken into account. Apart from the curt references of ancient observers, we must remember that the statistics are of the present day, that the conclusions apply to times of remote antiquity, and that we can hardly expect to find support from scientists or historians in an attempt to determine the racial attributes of the Anglo-Saxons from the German census of Slesvig and Holstein.

The devotion and industry of which the work shows evident traces must not be allowed to pass unnoticed, especially at a time when so little attention is given to the early history of our nation. We hope that in spite of the defects we have noticed it may succeed in stimulating interest in this neglected subject. There is still a vast amount of information to be obtained from nomenclature, from survivals of primitive custom and from antiquities, which may throw light upon the conditions in which our ancestors lived. Such investigations would be greatly facilitated by a co-ordination of labour amongst students working on different lines. We cannot but think that in some such organised distribution of work the zeal of Mr. Shore would have been productive of more valuable results in the furtherance of the study which he had at heart.

A PERIOD OF TRAGEDIES

The History of England from the Accession of Richard II. to the Death of Richard III., 1377-1485. By C. OMAN. (Longmans, 7s. 6d., net.)

THE twelve-volume "Political History of England," which Messrs. Longmans are issuing under the joint editorship of Dr. William Hunt and Mr. R. Lane Poole is making steady progress towards completion. In point of period Dr. Hunt's vol. x (1760-1801) still remains far in the van, but the other volumes are falling in behind it and the appearance of Professor Oman's vol. iv. (1377-1485) completes the continuous narrative from the earliest times down to the close of the Middle Ages. Richard II. succeeded to a less noble England than that into which his father the Black Prince had been born, and in the volume before us we watch for the first time in English History, and with little respite, a gradual hardening and corruption of the national heart. But if Professor Oman's period constitutes the "Bold Bad Period" par excellence of English history it is absorbingly interesting none the less. To the student and to the humanist alike, the reign of Richard II. must always prove attractive, while for the general reader the story of the fifteenth century has the charm of familiarity, since by some law of compensation the whole epoch, so bare in the matter of contemporary record, is completely covered by the Shakespearean "Histories." Moreover the constitutional aspect of the period is comparatively simple and well defined. The broad causes which led to the Lancastrian attempt to govern in close alliance with a still uncouth and immature parliament, the factors which made a difficult success attainable for a while, the nature of those forces of disintegration which, if they failed to undermine it, buried the whole fabric for a while amid the ruins of a self-destroyed nobility, all these are recognised by those who care for English history. But the true understanding of the whole Lancastrian "Experiment" is immeasurably fortified by what this particular period has hitherto lacked, a full, true and particular account of it, starting as far back as the year of grace 1377. It is exceedingly interesting to watch Professor Oman at work upon this big canvas. Some of the ground he has of course already covered. His account of Warwick the King-Maker was as vivid and picturesque as a sketch, as his recent monograph on the Great Rebellion of 1381 is admirable as a careful piece of reconstructive architectural drawing. The present work draws largely upon the qualities of the other two. It would be hard to find anything much better, in point of easy and effective narrative, than the hundred and fifty pages devoted to the reign of Richard II. Untrammelled by too much detail, but supported by all the sources of information examined in a full appendix and pointed everywhere by illustrative facts, they show at the outset against the background of a tumultuous and discontented population the whole system of government thrown out of gear—a headstrong boy-king with great potentialities for good and evil, a wavering council, a parliament eager to follow up advantages won through the exigencies of the last reign, but lacking in initiative and ever dependent in a crisis upon leaders from the ranks of a baronage whose increasing selfishness and faithlessness is becoming everywhere more apparent. It is easy to foreshadow the evils of the times of the Roses in some of the events of Richard's reign. To read the account of the malignant triumph of the Lords Appellant; to watch the judicial murder of such inoffensive men as Sir Simon Burley, or the tortures inflicted on the informing friar John Latimer by six noble knights in 1384; to see Sir Richard Stafford run through the body without explanation or warning by the ruffianly John Holland in the camp at Newcastle in 1385, or Molyneux Constable of Chester murdered in cold blood by Sir Thomas Mortimer after his surrender at Radcot Bridge in 1388; finally (to take a wider instance of the moral trend) to pass in review the cynical hypocrisies of Bishop Despenser's Flemish "Crusade," so uncompromisingly lashed in Wycliffe's "Cruciata"—all this is to be present at a grim skeleton rehearsal of the more thickly crowded horrors of the days of Henry VI., horrors that could have been turned to account by none but that most fortunate and unscrupulous of Princes, Edward IV.

As to Richard II. himself it has long been realised that any solution of the puzzles of his reign must largely depend upon the interpretation of his personal character. We have never seen a more suggestive account of it than the one before us. Admiration yields to an indignant pity, pity and indignation to a kind of astonished condemnation and regret as we watch the gallant young hero of Mile End and Smithfield, the imperious young man who could live down his early mistakes, circumvent his foes, and build up golden opinions for a few years, suddenly throwing everything to the winds in a long-cherished scheme of revenge, and in the hour of his triumph proudly vaunting himself a terror to cobblers even while he refrained from steeping himself in the blood of the Lamii. It was his wilful alienation of all classes that sealed Richard's fate, and very much to the point is Mr. Oman's summary of those strongly contrasting qualities which enabled Henry of Lancaster not only to receive the crown from an acquiescent nation but to hand it safely, after fourteen years of self-restraint, to his son.

It was not through any betrayal of his father's compact with parliament that Henry V. sowed the seeds of the ruin of his dynasty. But nemesis overshadowed his race from the moment that he lay dying of the sheer fatigues and ills of ruthless campaigning and left his crown to the baby grandson of his wretched enemy Charles VI., a child doomed to inherit his grandfather's madness. Mr. Oman has little leisure or need elaborately to stage the long succession of supervening tragedies. Their cumulative effect is appalling. The white figure of the Maid of Orleans stands out for all time against the fiendish treachery of her own countrymen on the one hand and the unutterable savagery of her country's enemies on the other. And there are the miserable French factions dishonouring the better cause, and Talbot the gallant and Bedford of the pitiless heart and many more, scheming, fighting, dying for the worse one. After the loss of France any one can conjure up for himself scene after scene of disaster at home. To whatever favourite theory we may lean in accounting for the Wars of the Roses (there is an excellent summary of contributory causes on p. 353) the main result was such a thinning out of a lawless aristocracy as to permit of that Tudor autocracy under cover of which the nation itself grew strong and self-reliant.

We have been at little pains in reading this volume, even had such a thankless task been easy, to detect Professor Oman slipping over minutiae in any of the controversial rallying-points of his long journey. We leave his book convinced of its very great historical, and we might add literary value. In the latter stages he seems sometimes to grow almost too well accustomed to the sinister features of the century he is traversing. But no one who has read the opening chapter of his "Warwick" would seriously accuse him of a want of sensibility. The whole catastrophe of the magnates of the fifteenth century is epitomised in the life and death of King Richard III. Professor Oman is scrupulously fair in summing up the evidence for and against him, and makes all due allowance for Tudor hostility. But it may be noticed that he does not favour the astonishing theory that it was really Henry VII. who murdered the little Princes, put forward some time ago by Sir Clements Markham and worked out in a recent volume which has actually moved a contemporary to speak of Richard of Gloucester as "Our Royal Dreyfus."

THE LIBRARY TABLE

The Year's Art, 1907. (Hutchinson, 3s. 6d.)

LAST year we had occasion to comment on the numerous inaccuracies and errors contained in this annual, and it is satisfactory to find in the 1907 edition a proof that our words, if unacknowledged, have not been unheeded. Particularly is the editor to be congratulated on the alteration in his calendar of memorabilia for January 23, though we think he might have made a better selection from the choice we lay before him. Hoppner or Manet have greater claims to be commemorated than G. Doré. The directory of artists shows signs of careful revision, and no longer includes the names of painters long deceased, while the list of foreign dealers has been slightly increased. We note with satisfaction the inclusion of Messrs. Durand-Ruel of Paris, this year, and suggest that for the next edition a place might be found for Mr. Heinemann, of Munich. This concession would go some way towards making amends, however tardily, for the total neglect in the review of the past year of Mr. Heinemann's interesting exhibition of modern German pictures at the Grafton Galleries. Considering the generous hospitality and patronage shown to British artists in Germany, the exhibition of modern German Art at Knightsbridge might have been treated more seriously and with greater courtesy. The editor wastes a good deal of space in talking about the "proud moment" when the Velasquez Venus was hung in the National Gallery. His rhapsodies are out of place in view of the lengthy references to this picture in the 1906 edition, and we cannot agree with the editor that "no excuse need be made" for the unnecessary and uninspiring "appreciation" of the new Turners at the Tate Gallery. In a reference-book of this class facts and not fancies are wanted, and the editor is not called upon to display his powers as a writer of impassioned prose or the inexhaustible wealth of his adjectives. A list of the Turners added to the Tate, with brief descriptions and a note of their discovery, would have been sufficient.

Turning from sins of commission to those of omission, we must express our surprise at the inadequacy of the list of "Bequests and gifts to Art during 1906." Why is no mention made of Boudin's Between the Piers, Trouville, presented to the National Gallery through the National Art-Collections Fund by the French Impressionist Fund? Why is there no mention of Mr. Muirhead Bone's drawing of The Great Gantry, Charing Cross, presented by a body of subscribers to the British Museum Print Room? Why is there no chronicle of the gift of Mr. Strang's portrait of Mr. Newbolt to the Tate Gallery, and of the hanging in same museum of Fred Walker's design for Wilkie Collins's "Woman in White"? And was it not foolish to write that Mr. Strang was "elected to an Associateship in recognition of his independent gifts as a painter and etcher," when it is perfectly well known that after his election two paintings by Mr. Strang were rejected by the Academy?

The editor of "The Year's Art" particularly prides himself on his treatment of commercial art events, but his favourite section, entitled, "The Art Sales of 1906," cannot be so authoritative and exhaustive as he imagines it to be while attention is confined to the London sale-rooms. Painters would appreciate some information about the sending-in times for the Paris salons, and this might be given without interfering with the reports from provincial art centres which the editor patriotically declares he will "certainly never delete." But if there is still room for improvement, "The Year's Art" has nevertheless been improved, and a welcome contribution to the current issue is a chapter on "Applied Art in 1906," by Mr. E. F. Strange, who has much that is useful and stimulating to say, though, strangely enough he does not allude to the fact that the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society has been disbanded.

Before Port Arthur in a Destroyer. The Personal Diary of a Japanese Naval Officer. Translated from the Spanish edition by Captain R. GRANT. (Murray, 9s. net.)

To the remarkable books dealing with the naval side of the late war by M. Politovsky and Captain Semenoff we have now to add another ascribed to a Japanese naval officer, and purporting to be his diary during the blockade of Port Arthur. But although the narrative is sufficiently stirring and realistic, while it bears evidence in parts of being the work of a naval officer, there is, unfortunately, good reason for doubting its authenticity as an actual record of personal achievement and experience. Captain Grant describes it as a translation from a Spanish edition, which appeared under the title—"Port Arthur: Diario de Operaciones de Hesibo Tikovara, comandante del torpedero 'Osiva' de la Marina Japonesa," explaining that as he had no knowledge of the Japanese language, he cannot say how far the Spanish book is an accurate version of the original work. Apparently he was unaware of the fact that a large part of the work had previously appeared in Germany, although there the name of the officer whose journal is supposed to be reproduced is given as Nirutaka, and not Tikovara. If we may hazard a guess, it is that the second part, after the rescue of the hero by the Sadzanami, is by another hand, and by a writer not so intimately acquainted with naval life. Taking it all round, it is a capital story, which, if it does not add anything to our knowledge of the operations, will appeal to all who like a brisk relation of adventure. The following quotation is a good example of the style of the author: he is describing the first attack on the Russian Fleet outside Port Arthur:

At the exact moment when the torpedo man was preparing to press the levers, the crew of the Czarevitch discovered us with their searchlights. There were cries of fear, hasty words of command, and two seconds afterwards the firing began. The first shots came very near my boat. Some fell over, others short, some to the right and some to the left; all screamed and whistled in the air and then plunged into the water. My torpedo had accomplished its mission; a violent commotion in the sea, a loud explosion and high column of water, convinced me that the attack had been successful. Immediately afterwards I thought that the last moment of my life had come. The hail of projectiles on my boat never stopped for an instant. The deck was riddled. They were probably aiming at the bridge, and consequently at me and my pilot; but they missed their aim.

His boat, though badly hit, with a six-inch shell in the bows, and another in the conning tower, lived through the fight, and managed to rejoin her consorts. This sort of thing, it will be noticed, might easily be put together by a clever writer with the help of the information which appeared in the newspapers. The work appears to be adequately translated, and there are some excellent illustrations, well reproduced.

THE ESSENTIALS OF ÆSTHETICS

PROFESSOR RAYMOND gives, as the exact etymological meaning of the word "Aesthetic," "fitted to be perceived." One might reasonably expect that a book dealing with æsthetics should be, at any rate in outward form, "fitted to be read." "The Essentials of Æsthetics" (Murray) is of a convenient size and shape to hold in the hand— $8\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2} \times 1\frac{1}{4}$ inches—but it weighs exactly two pounds.

Fortunately, however, the dismal conclusion which might be drawn from the material weight of the volume is not borne out by the character of its contents, which are generally interesting if not profound. The object of the book is to make clear in what sense æsthetic art, when possessed of the finest and highest qualities, from its first conception in the mind to its last constructive touch in the product, is a result of a man's imagination giving audible or visible embodiment to his thoughts or emotions by representing them in a form traceable to material or human nature, which form attracts him on account of its beauty, and is selected and elaborated by him into an artistic product in accordance with the imaginative exercise of comparison or of association, modified, when necessary, so as to meet the requirements of factors which can be compared or associated in only a partial degree.

As may be judged from the above quotation the book owes little to charm of style; but then, whether consciously or unconsciously, Professor Raymond seems to deny that there is an "art" of prose. On page 29 he says:

In this art (of poetry) besides the beauty which is due to phraseology, as manifested in the choice and sequence of words, and in various developments of assonance, alliteration, rhythm and rhyme, everybody acknowledges that there is also a beauty dependent upon the thought, the proof of which is that this beauty is frequently as great in prose as in poetry.

If this passage means anything at all it means that the beauty of prose depends entirely on the thought expressed in it. The statement is all the more surprising because Professor Raymond proves over and over again that he has an exceptionally keen ear for the technical beauties of poetry.

To criticise in detail a book which sets out to deal with the fundamental laws underlying the arts of music, poetry, painting, sculpture and architecture, would require a space at least equal to that of the volume under consideration, and we must content ourselves with a discussion of general principles. Professor Raymond's comparative failure to "make clear" the general principles of æsthetics seems to us the result of his leaving out from all his considerations of art-forms the question of "material."

Although this question of material—not of "subject" but of the actual substance in which the artist's impression of that subject is conveyed, in other words, the medium—applies equally to all the arts, it is more obviously important in the arts of sculpture and architecture. According to Professor Raymond the same æsthetic rules governing form apply equally to a statue of bronze or of marble; to a building whether it be of brick or stone. But surely if the form of a statue, or of a building, is not conditioned from its first conception in the mind of the artist by an intense recognition of the material in which it is to be carried out, it will be a bad statue or a bad building. There is a passage in Mr. Stephen Phillips's Herod which goes to the root of the matter, but unfortunately we cannot quote it from memory. It amounts to this, that the artist must from the moment of conception think—feel, perhaps is a better word—in terms of brick, or stone, or bronze, or marble, or oil-pigment, or pastel, or violins, or flutes as the case may be. It is not enough to feel in terms of architecture, or sculpture, or painting, or poetry, or music; you must go deeper. You cannot arbitrarily design a work of art and execute it indifferently in whatever material comes handiest. Even in poetry this is true. A conception "felt" in French verse cannot, for example, be rendered perfectly in English verse of the same form; because the form of the verse is partly conditioned by the essential nature of its contents, by the actual character of the words employed.

The importance of this question of material cannot be exaggerated. Professor Raymond's apparent failure to recognise it is, we suspect, at the root of his dissatisfaction with "modern" art. Perhaps the distinguishing characteristic of the art of the present day, in all its branches, is a deeper recognition, based if you come to think of it on humility, of the essential character of materials. Is it fantastic to point out that this recognition of the importance of the medium has developed simultaneously with a closer inquiry into the intimate constitution of matter? It is surely more than a coincidence that while artists are insisting more and more on the right of every material to be treated according to its genius, men of science are patiently establishing the truth that no matter can truthfully be called "dead."

Is it not possible that we have been perhaps a little hasty in dividing the visible world into "organic" and "inorganic" forms and materials? Emerson said that in order to draw a tree perfectly a man must first have "been a tree" and Professor Raymond admits that the artistic representation of a man or a tree must recognise the man's or tree's organic life. Is it not equally true that in order to use bronze or marble or oil-paint or any other medium artistically a man must feel in his blood their essential characters? A work of art being not an imitation but a representation of an object, it follows that it must take into account not only the life of the object but the life of the material in which that object is represented.

The relation between art and morals, touched upon by Professor Raymond, may be after all a close one. Nothing is common or unclean but by violation of its temperament and perhaps in this, rather than in choice of "subject" lies the secret of the old quarrel, revived in this book, which has been waged round the dictum "Art for Art's sake." A work of art, says Professor Raymond, must be beautiful, and he agrees with the philosophers of all time in affirming that the Beautiful is finally identical with the Good. But does that really settle the question? What is Good? Perhaps not the worst definition is: that which is in perfect relation to the Whole. To be in perfect relation to the whole a thing must fulfil the laws of its being, and if materials are so treated by the artist that in expressing his thought or emotion, that is, in fulfilling himself, they also are fulfilling the laws of their being the result is likely to be not far from beautiful. The real immorality, the final treachery in art, is violation of the medium.

The chief defect of Professor Raymond's book, then, is that it treats of artistic "form" as a consideration independent of the material in which that form is expressed. But there are minor points on which his theories seem to be at fault. Thus, in speaking of poetry, although he admits that "clean-cut, concrete visualisation can be conjured in the imagination even by a description of something which, in itself, is not clean-cut or concrete," he attaches far too much importance to the use of concrete images in poetry. The relation of visual images to the words that evoke them remains a mystery, but it is quite certain that the old lady who spoke of "that blessed word, Mesopotamia," was not talking nonsense. To use Professor Raymond's own system of arrangement, he puts poetry too near painting and too far from music.

But, as we said at the beginning of this article, the book is interesting and full of suggestion. Probably the most satisfactory chapter is that in which the author points out that proportion in the arts of sight is the analogue not of harmony but of rhythm in the arts of sound. Some of his detached observations are admirable, as when he says that the real difference between sentiment and sentimentality is that the latter is always selfish. On the other hand his statement, in comparing Beethoven and Mozart, that "not a few to-day consider Beethoven the greater genius of the two" positively startles you by its inadequacy.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

WITH DOUBLE TONGUES

Not long ago a correspondent of the ACADEMY disliked the word "Causerie," probably on account of its foreign extraction, but suggested no substitute for it, English or otherwise. Perhaps, indeed, none exists. The nearest equivalent that occurs to me is "chat," a word with nothing to recommend it except the negative merit of being rather less detestable than its derived adjective. Then quite lately in looking over Coleridge's version of "Wallenstein," I came upon the lines:

Who send onwards
Kisses and welcomings upon the air,
Which they make breezy with affectionate gestures and this unreasonably wordy paraphrase of "die in die Lüfte grüssen" incited me to an unsuccessful quest for any single English word, or even fairly brief combination of words, whereby to render that particular sense of grüssen.

This naturally leads to reflections upon various gaps "all-thing unbecoming" in our dictionaries, and thence to the arguments for and against filling them with whatever can best be found ready-made in some other language, or building them up of materials drawn from our own. People who would over rigidly follow the latter course might with advantage consider the uncouth shapes into which German purists of the eighteenth century twisted Goethe's "schlechtesten Stoff." As for those who incline to the opposite extreme, their warning is to be read on all the bookstalls, in queer French, mainly, after the school of popular fiction.

So wide a subject, however, could not find accommodation in a causerie; hardly even in a conversazione, that other more spacious sounding foreign loan, which might have been effected nearer home and in fewer syllables. For throughout north-western Ireland just that form of entertainment, the beguiler of many a long winter's evening, is commonly known as a céilie (céilir), which rhymes with "daily," and has a hard c. In England the Gaelic origin of the word would no doubt neither commend nor condemn it; but this is far from being the case in its native land, where between Gaelic Leaguers and their adversaries a literal strife of tongues has for some time past raged with a vehemence which almost rivals that of last century's famous Two-year-old and Three-year-old faction fights, and which loses nothing in sound and fury by the desuetude of blackthorns and shillelaghs. It may be said that at present doubtfully the battle stands, inasmuch as the extent to which the Gaelic will prevail remains, and while the contest goes on must remain undecided. Within limits that is. Nobody seriously supposes either that the English language can ever be superseded in Ireland by any other, or yet that the wildest romancing about the Gaelic will in the end hinder those who really wish to revive and use it as well. Still there is room for speculation on the subject.

So far the Gaelic may certainly be considered fortunate on the whole in its allies, who with a Baconian, if not a Machiavellian craftiness have stirred up and enlisted on its side the most potent spirit of revolt. By judicious utterance at Education Boards' meetings, and, in official capacities, on various other public occasions, they have fanned with an inspiring sense that he is "agin the Government" the ardour of full many an elementary scholar, whose aspirations might else speedily be quenched among the crooked eclipses which fight against the beginner's glory in his course of O'Growney's Grammar. The skill of this strategy becomes the more apparent when we reflect how largely it lay in the power of these enthusiasts for the language to have adopted a contrary line of action, and to have trampled out the first sparks by, for instance, making Gaelic compulsory at all examinations, penalising English in national schools, and so forth. Some fanatical opponents of the ancient tongue have in fact clamoured for measures of the kind. But as a rule its enemies propose and practise nothing more detrimental than the production of trivial inconveniences by an ostentatious airing of Gaelic in and out of season, as on envelopes and sign-posts, a habit much on a par, as regards good sense and good manners, with the propensity for whispering and giggling in company for which school-girls used to be chidden. And lest the ardour of the conflict should wane, a host of non-combatant sympathisers cheer it on with cries of pas trop de zèle—μηδὲν ἄγαν—nā bác leir—cui bono? exhortations which seldom fail to rekindle the flagging energy.

This, albeit a digression from the subject of how best to solve the problem of the missing word, does not really lead us very far out of the track, for it is consequent enough to consider the prospect of a nation becoming double-tongued from just that point of view. Apart that is, of course, from the views of those who apprehend that their bi-lingual compatriots will somehow turn into neighbours little less noxious than the snaky tribe which their patron saint sent slithering down Croagh Patrick's steep; and of those also who regard a man without Gaelic as considerably below the level of the beasts of the field. We may indeed safely assume that neither of these opinions is anything more than a "false flower of rhetoric," culled for a temporary badge.

Although English and Welsh do certainly appear to have remained singularly unaffected by one another, it seems likely beforehand that between two languages thus in simultaneous use there should be a frequent interchange of words and phrases. This has, of course, in times past actually taken place in Anglo-Irish, but more perhaps with respect to idiom than to vocabulary. For though a comparatively small number of the peasant folk may in real life talk quite so like the literal translation from the Gaelic which Lady Gregory employs with such grace in her writings, traces of its influence are strong and clear in the speech even of people who know few single words. And the same influence has emigrated—too often—across channel and ocean.

In future, however, given any general revival of Gaelic-speaking throughout Ireland, we may expect to see transactions of this kind occur more commonly between its two languages, and no doubt to their mutual benefit. It is happily to such things as sordid money matters alone that Polonius's anti-lending maxims apply. A language, like true love, in this differs from gold and clay.

That to divide is not to take away.

* A better word than "mutual" is among the desiderata of the English language; meanwhile, however, it may serve, seeing that William Blake has used it in his "Gates of Paradise."

On the contrary, rather, the more it gives away the more it has. Since by transplantation a word does but grow "double-lived in regions new," with added power and prestige. The great richness of Gaelic should make it a valuable source of the fresh acquisitions with which every living language must needs from time to time be replenished. It will itself perhaps find its account chiefly in the modification of those dialects, which a broad intervening belt of only English speakers have caused to spring up in the north, south and west, until Gaels of Ulster, Munster and Connaught can with difficulty, and at best but imperfectly understand one another. So widely does not merely pronunciation but meaning differ from district to district. Take for example the word garaun, which in one quarter signifies simply a horse, and in another a screw. It is easy to imagine the complications which might arise from this at a show or a fair.

All languages, it is true, are subject to inconsistencies of the sort. I remember how an Austrian friend of mine once embarrassed herself and shocked some Prussian acquaintances by remarking of their bashful little boy: "Der arme Junge ist ja sehr blöde," intending to express her belief that the child was very shy, but conveying to them the opinion that he was very imbecile. Still in a country of such moderate dimensions as Ireland, which is small enough to rank with the most renowned nations of the world, if size were all, it cannot be inevitable that dialects should harden into absolute unintelligibility. When a language overspreads huge areas, as the German does, that process can scarcely be arrested, and the tendency to it seems an argument against the possibility of any universal language, however carefully manufactured. Such a one after a few generations' use by Chinese, let us say, and Peruvians, would develop peculiarities calling for the services of an interpreter. Hence we need probably fear the advent of Volapük or Esperanto as little as the barbarous invasion of that phonetic spelling, which would doom us to read for evermore an endless "Jeames's Diary," with all the funny part—such as it was—left out.

But this is another deviation, which must be finally checked, for that way prophecy lies, George Eliot's "most gratuitous form of folly."

JANE BARLOW.

FICTION

The Country House. By JOHN GALSWORTHY. (Heinemann, 6s.)

A NEW novel by Mr. John Galsworthy has become an event, to which many look forward with interest, since the "Man of Property" appeared in the spring of last year, and since his play The Silver Box was produced at the Court Theatre in the autumn. His work has many qualities of greatness: but is not yet great. It is belittled by a taint of personal bitterness, and bitterness blunts the fine edge of irony. The silken scarf defied the strength of Richard, but fell in two pieces before the deft quickness of Saladin. It is clumsy to hit too hard: and that Mr. Galsworthy is inclined to do, regardless of the weapon he has chosen.

The fine old English gentleman is the object of his present attack—the class which has lived in wealth for generations on its own land and is called the backbone of old England (or answers to some such phrase). Their tradition is a kind of terrible octopus which closes its tentacles round the humanity of those within its reach, and takes away the life-blood. Horace Pendyce is a typical rich squire in a hunting country: his wife was a Totteridge, whose ancestors had always possessed places in the country. Their son George is the young sportsman, who kills birds with precision, hunts, but cannot think. Across his horizon comes a fascinating married woman, with whom George falls sullenly in love, and who soon tires of George's sullen passion, though with dogged persistence he defies the whole family for her sake. There is Paramor, the wise lawyer who is the woman's guardian, and the idealist cousin Gregory, who loves her with the idealist's blindness, and the husband who is a drunken scoundrel. The monotony of country life, from which he is unable by his nature to escape, drives him to drink.

Mrs. Pendyce is by far the most interesting character in the book. She has not had her human instincts strangled by the tentacles of the great slow least of tradition. She can sympathise with what she imagines to be her son's feelings, though she has never known love: and she quietly leaves her husband to go to her son, when her husband meets his refusal to give up the woman by a determination to disinherit him. Her maternal instinct takes her to London but quite fails to make her able to be of any use to her son. She does not understand him at all. And here sentiment seems to play a trick on Mr. Galsworthy, for he is unfair to George, stupid and coarse though George is. Mrs. Pendyce is refined and gentle, but neither quality is an excuse for her lack of power to understand her son, her willingness to remain among her roses and gently lament her son's distance, when she might with a little more vitality have taken practical steps to lessen that distance. Mr. Galsworthy does not show that the position arises just as much from the mother's past apathy as from the son's heartlessness. He falsifies the balance in favour of the mother, chiefly because she is gentle and loves her flowers. It is a good reason, but not a sufficient one. This slight tendency to bitterness and to sentimentality is the one blemish in an extraordinarily well-written, well-observed piece of work.

The Other Pann. By MARY DEANE. (Methuen, 6s.)

THIS is what some people call a nice book for family reading. It would be unfair to call it a chronicle of small beer: unfair to the beer we mean. The villain to be sure is a bold bad man who bites his lips and twists his moustache at a concert because a young married woman to whom he has lost his heart is smiling at another man. But after behaving in this shocking manner the heroine breaks off her engagement to him and he remains decorously in the background. The married woman just mentions that he wished to elope with her but we are certain that the grandfather who receives her confidence will never let it go further. We have found throughout the story that the scenes are scrappy, the dialogue tedious and the characters wooden. But we repeat that it is a nice book for family reading because we are convinced that wit, life and drama are not necessary, are not even greatly desired in a novel of this kind. There is a public that wants a babbling, harmless, sentimental story, with a slight love interest, pretty Christian names and some ball-room scenes where the boys and girls concerned settle their affairs of the heart circumspectly. Here in addition to these things there is a background of Bath society in the mid-Victorian age. We did not know that women wore tea-gowns in those days and we are positive that the shrinking Helena would rather have died than cross London in a hansom without a male escort.

Cheshire Village Stories. By W. V. BURGESS. (Sherratt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE slight tales run on the usual lines of village chronicles, poaching, ghosts, murder and sentiment. They are told by a fussy, good-natured "everybody's friend," who contrives to have a hand in all that happens. His style is a little pompous and florid, he does not always find the right word; but he is a cheerful writer, and his rustic characters say shrewd and sometimes amusing things. The best poaching story is "A Poacher's Wooing," in which Roger Clutton springs out of the wood into a passing milk cart, the pursuing game-keeper sitting for an exciting mile or so upon the lid of the milk can unconscious that the man he seeks is hidden within. There are several pretty, simple romances, and a particularly gruesome ghost story of a "Grey Lady" with a red patch upon her forehead.

The Flight of Icarus. By HENRY BYATT. (Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.)

HAD the author of "Lothair" set himself to chronicle the visions of that unbalanced prophetic of the desert, Lady Hester Stanhope, we might have met with the fulfilment of what Mr. Byatt has attempted in this book; but Disraeli with his rich Eastern imagery has departed from our midst, Lady Hester has gone, we hope, to the realisation of her dreams, and the "Flight of Icarus" is a long and dreary mass of verbiage instead of a scintillating extravaganza. Mr. Byatt has based his rhapsody upon the vague records of one, Shabbathai Zebi ben Mordacai, a seventeenth-century prophet claiming to be the Messiah of the Jews, who is said to have worked many miracles and to have had a large following. He substitutes the twentieth for the seventeenth century, gives his hero a mansion in Park Lane as a suitable setting for his short but dazzling career, and the beautiful, morganatic wife of a European potentate to play Delilah to his Samson. The lady is also, incidentally, the direct descendant of Marie Stuart and Bothwell and only consents to undertake the task on condition that she is proclaimed Regent of England, Scotland, and Wales. She alone dares to cope with this apparently immortal ruler of the Jews; this being with the "beautiful face" and "towering stature," whose chin, "albeit hidden by the unshorn hirsute, curved with a fine sweep from the strong throat." The devoted lady succeeds in unmasking this impostor; but she does so at the cost of her life's happiness.

DRAMA

"HEDDA GABLER" AT THE COURT THEATRE

"HEDDA GABLER" is a play that appeals almost entirely to the imagination. To the unimaginative the play must be meaningless—merely the sordid story of an unpleasant woman who, having everything to make her comfortable, was, nevertheless, discontented, and committed suicide. An unpleasant woman? Far worse than that: spiteful, malicious, deceitful, jealous; a woman who could urge a man on to his ruin, as Hedda urged Eilert Lövborg, a woman who could deceive a good-hearted fellow like her husband Tesman, who could make fun of a dear old lady and torture a sweet young woman whose heart's secret she has forced out of her. Certainly her one act of grace was to take her own worthless life. All that is true enough. And you can hear a man a degree wiser add with confidence: such a woman deserves no pity—she causes her own misery. That, too, is true. She deserves pity as little she would have desired it, and she did cause her own misery. Therein lies the tragedy. And it is a great tragedy.

Who and what is this Hedda Gabler, about whom such things can be said, and with whom we are compelled to sympathise? Why does her fate prove so indescribably moving as it does? Because Ibsen, like all great artists, is symbolic, because he takes a discontented woman and puts her in comfortable surroundings among amiable contented persons, he takes the most dreadfully commonplace material—and shows the struggle of all forms of life against the slow monotony of existence. Her tragedy is that she is alive among people dead of contentment; she is a vital creature being suffocated by her environment. She has heard the syren voice of content and has obeyed its call against her nature, and she pays the terrible penalty until at last she triumphs over life and gains freedom—and the unutterable pathos of it is that resolution has come to her too late; that the only way of freedom open to her is a kind of cowardice, the outcome of that taint in her which has caused all her misery. Nevertheless she is so great and so vital that we gradually come to hate quite unjustly those worthy, stupid people who torment her with their goodness and stupidity. Ibsen is never unjust. He remains almost intolerably true. And always he suggests, and suggests, and suggests until the meaning becomes haunting in its pervading intensity. You cannot pin down the man or his work with any little label, discoverable or discovered. His nature was manifold and many-sided, but before all else he was a poet. The tragedy of Hedda Gabler must be felt and felt intensely by every man who, with the help of his imagination, sees or has seen not only others but himself in the making, for the making of a man is nothing else than the play of circumstance upon character. Every man conscious of life in any way must feel her tragedy, but no one more deeply than he who has high thoughts, the impulse to express them and the power to observe the result—the gap between what he imagined and what he has expressed.

It is a pleasure to see Mrs. Patrick Campbell in a part worthy of her beauty and her genius. Her performance was superb. It was chiefly remarkable for its extreme subtlety, and a restraint which was far more effective than any emphasis could have been. Especially was her restraint noticeable at the famous end of the third act. Quietly and deliberately she burned the manuscript with a kind of fine daring. Any compunction makes the deed horrible and mean; and an element of meanness in Hedda spoils the greatness of the tragedy. Certainly contortions of regret would have been more theatrically effective: one would have shuddered and applauded and forgotten. Her significant dignity is unforgettable. The rendering is in touch with the hauntingly suggestive conception of Hedda. She lifts the part beyond all sordid littleness, so that you realise that you are in the presence of a great nature baffled and finally overthrown. She shows Hedda oppressed with the life around her and within her, so that all her vitality is forced down into herself and, unable to find any outlet, festers and is turned to selfishness and to malignity. And always her power makes her great. Mrs. Campbell too brought out Hedda's craving for beauty and for the impossible. Nothing could have been more poignant in its effect than the way she uttered Hedda's vision of the "vine leaves in his hair." It is not often that an actress is called upon to express power and bitter irony and perception of beauty in one character—a great nature in tragic disharmony with itself and its surroundings—and still less often that an actress is able to express them with the finish and dignity that Mrs. Patrick Campbell commanded in her interpretation of Hedda Gabler. Her voice seems to have gained fresh beauty, her movements fresh grace, and her art greater delicacy and power.

The production as a whole was good: but not so good as it ought to have been. The first act was taken too slowly, a fault which is too common in the productions of the Court Theatre. Much, that ought to have gone with ease and quickness, dragged. There seemed no reason for this but hesitation and nervousness on the part of the actors, which more frequent rehearsals would have taken away. The excellence of the acting drew attention to this slowness, the one defect of an admirable production. Mr. James Hearn played Judge Brack, the rather sinister man of the world, with great skill. He was exactly the requisite foil to the stupid, hesitating, kind-hearted George Tesman, whom Mr. Trevor Lowe played competently, but without distinction. Miss Evelyn Weeden was charmingly pathetic as Mrs. Elvsted, and Miss Measor was attractive as the dear old aunt Julia. Both these actresses should prove useful members of the Court company, when they have gained experience and finish. Mr. Laurence Irving was a little too mannered as Eilert Lövborg: there was much that was good in his performance, but it lacked complete conviction for that reason.

H. DE S.

Houses and Gardens

By M. H. BAILLIE SCOTT

Over 200 Illustrations in Black and White and 17 in Colours

*Art Linen, Medium 4to, 31/6 net ;
post free, 32/-*

Mr. Baillie Scott advances principles of house planning which should be studied by all who, dissatisfied with the modern suburban villa, wish to obtain a house or cottage which shall be a real home, adapted to meet the actual needs of the daily life of its occupants

Golf Faults Illustrated

By G. W. BELDAM and J. H. TAYLOR

5/- net; post free, 5/4

DAILY CHRONICLE.—“We would commend this book before any other that we know.”

SCOTSMAN.—“Will be widely appreciated by players who aspire to improve their game.”

Etchings of W. Strang A.R.A.

Containing 48 Illustrations, several of which are tastefully mounted

4/6 net; post free, 4/10

What Foods Feed Us

By EUSTACE MILES, M.A.

A Popular Volume on a much discussed subject

1/- net; post free, 1/2

The Citizen Rifleman

By E. J. D. NEWITT

The Official Handbook of the Miniature
Rifle Clubs Association

2/- net; post free, 2/3

GEORGE NEWNES, Limited

Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST

Detailed Prospectuses of the Works mentioned below will be sent post free on application

Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

BEDE'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND

Revised Translation with Notes by A. M. SELLAR, late Vice-Principal and Resident Lecturer, Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. With a map.

Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

ELECTRONS: or, The Nature and Properties of Negative Electricity

By Sir OLIVER LODGE, D.Sc. (Lond.), Hon. D.Sc. (Oxon.), LL.D. (St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen), F.R.S., Vice-President of the Institution of Electrical Engineers, and Principal of the University of Birmingham.
“An admirable exposition of a subject in great need of general explanation, our nearness to which makes clear exposition very difficult.”—ATHENÆUM.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

THE FOREIGN DEBT OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

By T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. (Dublin), Professor of Classical Philology in the University of Melbourne.

“He shows what our authors have gained from the classical and modern literatures; and while we do not agree with all his observations, we recognise a scholarly mind and a generally sound judgment. His pages are as readable as they are educative, and we can only wish that more books of the kind had the same high qualities.”—EVENING STANDARD.

New Volume of Mr. ROGERS' ARISTOPHANES.

Fcap. 4to, 8s. 6d.

THE PLUTUS OF ARISTOPHANES, with the Menæchmei of Plautus. The Greek Text Revised, and a Metrical Translation on opposite pages, together with Introduction and Commentary. By BENJAMIN BICKLEY ROGERS, M.A. Or, separately: PLUTUS, 7s. 6d. MENÆCHMEI, 1s. 6d. [April]

Crown 8vo, 9s. net.

THE AGE OF JUSTINIAN AND THEODORA

A History of the Sixth Century, A.D. By WILLIAM GORDON HOLMES
Vol. II. [Ready April]

Small 4to, with Portrait, 15s. net.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND

Newly edited from the MSS. by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. Vol. I. (containing Parts I.—III.). [April]
“It is proposed to complete this edition in four volumes, of which ‘The Itinerary in Wales,’ already published, will form the second part of vol. II.

With numerous Illustrations, crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES OF BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES

BANGOR CATHEDRAL. By P. B. IRONSIDE BAX. [April]

LLANDAFF CATHEDRAL. By E. C. MORGAN WILMOTT, [April]

ROMSEY ABBEY. By Rev. T. PERKINS, M.A. [May]

Complete List on application.

A NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVEL

AN AMERICAN GIRL IN INDIA

By SHELLAND BRADLEY, Author of “The Doings of Berengaria.”

BOHN'S LIBRARIES

NEW VOLUMES

THE EARLY DIARY OF FRANCES BURNEY (MADAME D'ARBLAY), 1768-1778

With a Selection from her Correspondence and from the Journals of her Sisters, Susan and Charlotte Burney. Edited by ANNIE RAINE ELLIS. New Edition, revised. 2 vols., 3s. 6d. each. [Now published.]
“Mrs. Ellis has done the editing admirably, and she must have brought infinite care and patience to an extremely laborious task.”—TIMES.

THE PROSE WORKS OF JONATHAN SWIFT

Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by the Rt. Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P. In twelve volumes, with numerous portraits and facsimiles. 5s. each. Vols. I.—X. [Now Ready.]
Vol. XI. Literary Essays. [Ready April.]

MINIATURE SERIES OF GREAT WRITERS

Pott 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 1s. net; or, in limp leather, with photogravure frontispiece, 2s.

NEW VOLUME

DANTE By M. L. EGERTON CASTLE. [Ready March 13.]

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, Portugal St., Kingsway, W.C.

CORRESPONDENCE

FIELDING'S "LITTLE PARLOUR"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—“I write better anywhere than at home,” Thackeray told Elwin, “and I write less at home than anywhere.” What was true of Thackeray, was no doubt true of Thackeray's predecessor. “Tom Jones,” as we know, had “employed some thousands of hours in the composing” (Bk. xi., ch. i.); and was probably on the stocks from 1743 until its publication February 28, 1749. It must have been written intermittently in many places including taverns and coffee-houses. Where the particular “little Parlour” of Bk. xiii. (when two-thirds of the author's task were accomplished) was situated, can only be the purest conjecture. The term does not suggest much accommodation; rather what auctioneers describe as a “small reception-room”—and possibly the only one. It may therefore be fairly assumed that it was not at Radway Grange in Warwickshire (Mr. Miller's); at Hagley in Worcestershire (Lyttelton's); at Prior Park or Widcombe House, Bath (Ralph Allen's and Mr. Bennet's); nor can it have been at Milbourne House, Barnes, or Milford Hill, Salisbury—all of which places, rightly or wrongly, have been connected with the composition of Fielding's masterpiece—for these were all mansions or fairly sized buildings. It does not look like chambers in the Temple, or offices in Bow Street, or the sanctum of James Leake, the Bath bookseller. It may, of course, have been in the house at Twerton-on-Avon, sometime known as “Fielding Lodge;” or it may have been one of the two rooms Fielding occupied in Back Lane, Twickenham, from his second marriage (November 1747), until he went to Bow Street (December 1748?). At Twickenham he was certainly employed on “Tom Jones,” for which Andrew Millar paid him in June of the latter year. But the most likely spot of all for a “little Parlour” is his sister Sarah's cottage in Church Lane, Widcombe, Bath, then standing alone in the lane as “Yew Cottage” (Peach's “Historic Houses in Bath,” 1884, ii. 33 n.); but now enlarged and re-named “Widcombe Lodge.” That Fielding and his sister lived here, must be held to be confirmed by the fact that in June last the Bathonians placed a commemorative tablet on the house to that effect.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

March 4.

THE RESIDENCE OF HENRY FIELDING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Re Fielding. “H.C.M.” in writing you in your issue of March 2 states that “tradition says that ‘Tom Jones’ was written at Twerton,” near Bath.

Might I venture to state that there is something more reliable than tradition to support the belief, for Collinson in his “History of Somerset,” published nearly one hundred and twenty years ago, says: “The first house on the right hand at entering this village (Twerton) from Bath was the residence of that celebrated novelist Henry Fielding, while he wrote his ‘Tom Jones.’”

STANLEY HUTTON.

March 3.

INSCRIPTIONS IN MEDIAEVAL LATIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been called to a very kindly and appreciative review of my book “The Shores of the Adriatic” in your journal, in which the reviewer has taken exception to the Latin of certain inscriptions which I have given. I gather that he has not seen the monuments upon which they are inscribed and therefore that he proceeds purely on inference. It is well known that Mediaeval Latin is not impeccable judged by classical standards, and I should like to assure him (and those members of the public who may have read the review) that these objectional sentences have been carefully transcribed from the monuments either by myself or by Schulz, who published many of them in his splendid work upon the monuments of Southern Italy.

F. HAMILTON JACKSON.

March 2.

MADAME HADING'S ART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It was with pleasure that I read in last week's issue of the ACADEMY the account of Adrienne Lecouvreur, as played by Madame Jane Hading and her company at the New Royalty Theatre. The play, judged by your critic, is a good sensational melodrama, and has no claim whatever to the name of tragedy. And yet Madame Jane Hading can make the character she personates real and tragical, I myself have the proof that a great actor can work wonders with a mediocre play. Once I heard Madame Hading and her company present Le Maître des Forges, a play commonplace and sentimental to read, but transformed for me ever since by the power of a great actress, who actually moved one to the verge of tears for the made-up woes of Madame Dorblay and her husband. I have once heard it stated that some great actors shine most brightly in the melodramatic and sentimental play. If this statement be true it surely must arouse surprise. Does it not seem more natural that in proportion as an actor is great, so should his or her powers be shown to the best advantage in a great play? It would interest me greatly to have a thoughtful opinion on this subject.

D. H. A.

February 28.

SHAKESPEAREANA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—

Cymbeline, Act i. sc. vi. 34

Hath nature given them eyes,

... which can distinguish 'twixt

The fiery orbs above and the twinn'd stones
Upon the number'd beach, etc.

The text here is evidently faulty. Shakespeare would certainly not have written “the twinn'd stones,” nor “the number'd beach.” What may we reasonably conjecture that he did write?

1. Elsewhere in his works we meet with the phrase “dumb stone”; our frequent use of the expression “as blind as a stone” may be our warrant for saying that he would not have hesitated to use “blind” as an epithet of stones, if it had suited his purpose. “The blind stones” would be a capital antithesis to “the orbs above”—the eyes of heaven—the bright pebbles of the sky.

2. For what word has number'd been in all probability set down by mistake? I suspect that the first letter n was miswritten for an h, and that the original word was “humid,” which is frequently mispronounced by the vulgar “humud,” and was perhaps misspelt “humer'd”; mistakes such as these are constantly occurring in the Folios; thus “the humid beach” would be antithetical to “the fiery orbs”—water to fire. With these emendations the passage would be as fit and fine as I believe that Shakespeare made it.

PHILIP PERRING.

March 3.

“PERVIGILIUM” AND “REQUIESCAT”

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Laudatus a laudato viro, I beg to thank you and him sincerely. The Pervigilium text is so corrupt that I chose the best I knew, Professor Mackail's—with a minimum of infidelity. Cras serit, for cras erit, is “off my own bat.” Though reading ruborem, I translated Baehren's puorem, in 25. Too conservative to change penates into fera es (15), I find modos, there, supported, in a sort, by nodo, in 26. The “daisy chain” is too pretty (48), like Jebb's Englishing of αἰνῶρεν πέδος by “flushed cheek”: the manuscript vestem is, for me, a Punic pun on the supposedly Semitic root of “Hybla” “a cord.” Over half the Latin poem breaks the crotic rule. The Requiescat Greek maiden I have long known on the Eblana banks. Dr. Tyrrell does well to be proud of her. His refrain assonance is perfect. Hypercriticism might ask line 6 to shed one of its relatives, possibly; but before Zenophile's beauty Momus himself were dumb. Again thanking for your kindly notes on me.

H. H. JOHNSON.

March 3.

IDENTIFIED

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have discovered the author of the brilliant conjecture in the Electra of Sophocles mentioned in the review of Campbell's Paralipomena Sophoclea in the ACADEMY of March 2. It is Dr. Starkie, the editor of the Vespae of Aristophanes, formerly a Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, now Resident Commissioner of National Education, Ireland.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

March 2.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Incorporated A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

THE CORPORATION IS PREPARED TO ACT AS
Executors of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

For full Prospectus apply to the Secretary.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

The CLERGY LIST for 1907

Thoroughly Revised and Corrected to the Latest Date

Price 12s. 6d.

Now Ready. 65th Year of Publication

The TIMES says:—"Kelly's 'Clergy List' is a very useful book of ecclesiastical reference."

The STANDARD says:—"Great care has been taken to secure accuracy. The volume is thoroughly sound at all points."

The CHURCH TIMES says:—"The 'Clergy List' must entail an enormous amount of patient labour, and is, from our own experience of many years' use, generally accurate and to be recommended."

The DAILY NEWS says:—"This invaluable clerical directory continues to grow year by year. The volume is indispensable to those who require accurate and close-at-hand information respecting the Church of England, either at home or abroad."

London: KELLY'S DIRECTORIES, Ltd., 182-184 High Holborn.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Maurice Maeterlinck

One of his delicate and characteristic
Fantasies, entitled "PERFUMES," is published in last week's issue of

THE SATURDAY
WESTMINSTER

W. Pett Ridge. Vernon Lee

The special contributions to this number also include "DRESSED
UP," a short story by W. Pett Ridge;
an article by Vernon Lee, entitled
"GOETHE AT WEIMAR";
and the continuation of the series of articles on "SOME PRINCIPLES
OF UNIVERSITY REFORM."

Saturday Westminster

March 2

Offices: Tudor Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

EAGLE

Insurance Company

Established 1807

LIVES

ANNUITIES

Head Office

79 Pall Mall
London, S.W.

City

41 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Branches

Eagle Insurance Buildings in BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, MANCHESTER

The Surplus disclosed at the Valuation (1902) produced an average Cash Bonus of 30 per cent. of the premiums paid during the Quinquennium; being a return of one-and-a-half Premiums.

The Company's Debenture Policies, with Guaranteed Benefits, afford an attractive form of Insurance in the Non-Participating Class, at very moderate rates.

Apply for XXth Century Prospectus, showing Simple and Liberal Conditions

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1819

MARCH 16, 1907

PRICE THREEPENCE

Appointments Vacant

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

ASSISTANT EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE (20-25), APRIL 4.

THE date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

Education

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

AN Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 (on June 1), will be held on June 5, 6, 7. Further information can be obtained from the Rev. the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., gd. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed. Duplicating from 3s. 6d. per 100 copies.—M. L. L., 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham, S.W.

MS. TYPED with care, 8d. per 1000 words. Circulars duplicated from 2s. 6d. per 100 (testimonials).—Mrs. JACKSON, 55 Rosebery Square Buildings, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1000; all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate, duplicating a speciality; shorthand. Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 5a Pall Mall East, S.W.—The 25th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN DAILY, 10-6. Admission, 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

OLD BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S Exhibition of Landscapes and Portraits by Early Masters of the British School is now open.—SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

SIGNORINA CIMINO, D.S.R.A. of Florence (Pianoforte and Italian), Member of Polytechnic Teaching Staff, is open to receive or visit pupils.—"Coloma," West Croydon.

Books for Sale.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

ANDREA MANTEGNA, by Paul Kristeller. English Edition by S. A. Strong, M.A., 26 plates and 162 text illustrations, 4to, buckram extra. Publisher, Longmans, 1901, at 70s. net, offered for 22s. 6d.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

GOOD Secondhand Copy of Knight's "Business Encyclopedia and Legal Adviser." 6 vols., 4to, cloth. Published at 45s., for 15s.—W. E. GOULDEN, Secondhand Bookseller, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

CLIMBS AND EXPLORATIONS in the CANADIAN ROCKIES, by Stutfield and Collie, with maps and illustrations, 8vo, cloth, new. published by Longmans, 1903; at 12s. 6d. net, for 5s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

EUPHRANOR, a Dialogue on Youth, 8vo, Pickering, 1851
Evans (J.) Ancient Stone Implements, 1872
Evelina, 3 vols, 1778, or vol 3
Evelina, or Female Life in London, 1821 or 1822
Experienced Angler, 1668
Experiments and Observations on Electricity, London, 1751
Ditto, part 2, London, 1753
Exquisites (The), a Farce, 1839, with 4 plates, private circulation, 8vo. £20 offered
Eyton (R. W.) Antiquities of Shropshire, 12 vols, 8vo, 1854-60
Fagan's Engraving in England, 3 vols, large folio, 1893
Faithorne (W.) The Art of Graving and Etching, 8vo, 1662
Falconry in the British Isles, 1873
Fancy (The), or True Sportsman's Guide, 2 vols, 1826
Fashionable Bores, etc., by Peter Quiz, oblong 4to, 1824
Faulkner, a Tragedy, by W. Godwin, 1807
Faulkner's History of Chelsea, roy. 8vo, 1810
History of Fulham, roy. 8vo or 4to, 1813
History of Kensington, 4to, 1820, or any of his Histories
Faustus, his Life, Death, etc., 1825
Felix on the Bat (Cricket), 4to, 1845
Ferguson (Sir J.) Tree and Serpent Worship, 1868
Fielding (H.) Works, 12 vols, 12mo, 1824
Amelia, 4 vols, 1, 2, 3, uncut, 1752
Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, 1859
Second Edition, 1868
Third Edition, 1879
Flaubert (G.) Herodias, triple set plates, 8vo, 1892
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Ready March 15.

Price One Shilling.

The Preparatory Schools Review

FOR MARCH. CONTENTS WILL INCLUDE

THE ENTRY OF NAVAL CADETS. By Professor EWING, LL.D., F.R.S., Director of Naval Education.

THE TEACHING OF FRENCH. By L. M. MORIARTY, M.A., Assistant Master at Harrow.

Also Entrance Scholarship Calendar for 1907, and List of Public Schools which use or are adopting the Reformed Pronunciation of Latin.

Oxford: ALDEN & CO., Ltd., Bocardo Press.
London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., Ltd.

Sales by Auction

SALE OF RARE BOOKS

The Library formed by the late Wm. Roots, Esq., M.D., F.S.A., of Kingston-on-Thames, sold by Order of W. H. Roots, Esq., on changing residences.

MESSRS. HODGSON & CO. will SELL by AUCTION, at their Rooms, 115 Chancery Lane, W.C., on Wednesday, March 20, at One o'clock, the above LIBRARY, comprising a unique and interesting Set of Ten Volumes relating to Napoleon and Wellington, extra-illustrated by the insertion of several hundred Coloured Plates of Military Costume, Portraits, Engravings, etc.—extra-illustrated copies of Churchill's Life of Nelson, 4to, Cattermole's Great Civil War, and Clarendon's Rebellion, 7 vols.—the Strawberry Hill copy of Aubrey's History of Surrey, with additional engravings inserted, 5 vols.—a fine extra-illustrated copy of Brayley's History of Surrey, extended to 11 vols., 4to, with numerous Original Water-colour Drawings by J. and E. Hassell and others, as well as a profusion of old Coloured Engravings, Topographical Prints, and Portraits—Books with Coloured Plates by Rowlandson and Leech and a few Sporting Books.

To be viewed, and Catalogues had.

RARE AND VALUABLE BOOKS, MANUSCRIPTS, AND BOOKBINDINGS.

MESSRS. HODGSON & CO., will SELL by AUCTION, at their Rooms, 115 Chancery Lane, W.C., on Wednesday, March 20, and following day, RARE and VALUABLE BOOKS, including De Bry's Voyages, the Original Latin Edition, Parts I. to IX., 1590-1617—Hakluyt's Volumes, 3 vols. in 2, 1598-1600—a fine Copy of Purchas's Pilgrimes, 5 vols., 1625-26, and other rare Americana—Books bearing the Autographs of Ben Jonson, Hobbes, Locke, and Pope—Milton's Paradise Regained, First Edition, entirely uncut, 1671—Manuscripts on Vellum, including a beautifully illuminated Fifteenth-Century Horæ—a printed Horæ on Vellum, with the woodcuts illuminated, G. Hardouyn, 1520—interesting Specimens of Book-bindings—a Sketch-book containing Original Drawings by W. M. Thackeray, and the Original Drawing by H. K. Browne for the Trial Scene in Pickwick—First Edition of Ruskin's Poems, 1850, in the original boards—a Large-paper Copy of the Military Costume of Europe, 2 vols., old morocco, Goddard and Booth, 1812-21, and other Books of Costume, the PROPERTY OF A LADY; Ackermann's Oxford and Cambridge Universities and the Public Schools, 5 vols.—a fine copy of Chamberlaine's Imitations of Holbein, old morocco—a splendid set of Gould's Works, including the Birds of Asia, 7 vols., Great Britain, 5 vols., Humming Birds, 6 vols., Birds of New Guinea, 5 vols., etc., 28 vols., full morocco extra, and other Ornithological Works by Hewitson, Bree, Yarrell, Stevenson, etc.—Editions de Luxe of Dickens, Balzac, Matthew Arnold, and others—also Standard Historical Works and Books in General Literature, the Property of G. W. Smalley, Esq.

To be viewed, and Catalogue had.

1s. THE UNIVERSAL RUSKIN 1s.

In 15 vols., cloth, full gilt back. Pocket size, 6½ by 4 in. On Superfine Paper, 1s. net; royal-blue leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net.

What services this edition renders to the student and book-lover of to-day as compared with the services of the editions till recently current!

£8 8s.

FOR

5s.

£5:15:6

FOR

3s.

21s. for 1s.

Modern Painters, 5 vols., 314 Illustrations and One Coloured Plate. The price of this work till 1882 (when the Autograph Edition, which the Author called "The Final Edition," and Messrs. Wise & Smart in their Bibliography of Ruskin describe as "practically a reprint of the previous edition," was current) was £8 8s.; the U.R. edition contains every word of this edition, as well as every one of its illustrations, for 5s. net. It is, without doubt, the cheapest book ever published in the history of the book trade.

Stones of Venice, 3 vols., 166 Illustrations and 7 Coloured Plates. The price of this work till 1885 was £5 15s. 6d.; the U.R. Edition contains precisely the same text and precisely the same illustrations for 3s. net.

Seven Lamps of Architecture. With 14 Plates. The price till 1879 was £1 1s.; the U.R. is identical in text and plates at 1s. net.

Lectures on Architecture and Painting. With 23 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 7s. 6d. net.

Elements of Drawing. With 48 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Political Economy of Art (A Joy for Ever).

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Unto this Last.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net (without the 2 Plates).

Two Paths. With 2 Illustrations.

The price in 1904 was 5s. net.

Selections from Ruskin's Writings.

The price in 1904 was 6s. net.

The U.R.
Edition of each of these works contains identically the same text and illustrations (with exception of TWO PATHS, in which two more Plates are contained) at 1s.

net each.

In addition to the above ORIGINAL INDEXES have been provided for Seven Lamps, Lectures on Architecture, Elements of Drawing, Political Economy of Art, Unto this Last, and Two Paths. The books may now be inspected at every booksellers in the Three Kingdoms.

To be followed by Editions of the Author's other books as their copyrights expire.

DEFINITIVE LIBRARY EDITIONS AT 2s. 6d. NET. THE LONDON LIBRARY.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE AND SONS LIMITED realising that the time has at length arrived when a sufficiently large public can be relied upon to warrant the publication of LIBRARY EDITIONS OF BRITISH CLASSICS IN DEFINITIVE FORM AT 2s. 6d. net, have inaugurated a New Series of Books which provides:

- (1) Complete Texts of Important Classics, elaborately edited by the Leading Scholars of to-day, and equipped with full Apparatus (Indexes, Genealogical Tables, Diagrams, etc.)
- (2) The perfection of Print and Paper, i.e., a very legible and beautiful type, printed on superfine ivory-finish paper. Size, 7½ by 5 inches, handsome for the shelf and convenient to hold.
- (3) Buckram binding, gilt lettered, ornamented with only the monogram of the Series on the side, with a gilt top, and dark surface end-papers.
- (4) Uniformity of External Appearance.
- (5) Each volume illustrated by an Etched or Photogravure Portrait.
- (6) Price 2s. 6d. net, Irrespective of length.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE OF COLONEL HUTCHINSON. By his Widow, LUCY. Edited by C. H. FIRTH, Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY. Edited, with Appendices and a Continuation of the Life, by SIDNEY LEE.

LIFE OF SHELLEY. By T. J. HOGG. With an Introduction by Prof. EDWARD DOWDEN.

LIFE OF GOETHE. By G. H. LEWES.

MEMOIRS OF WILLIAM CAVENDISH, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE and Margaret his Wife. Edited by Prof. C. H. FIRTH.

THE INTERPRETATION OF SCRIPTURE, and other Essays. By BENJAMIN JOWETT. With an Essay on Jowett, by Sir LESLIE STEPHEN.

LETTERS OF LITERARY MEN: FROM SIR THOMAS MORE TO SHERIDAN. With a Running Commentary. Edited by F. A. MUMBY.

LETTERS OF LITERARY MEN: NINETEENTH CENTURY. With a Running Commentary. Edited by F. A. MUMBY.

BEOWULF. Translated and Edited, with Notes by WENTWORTH HUYSHE. With many Illustrations in the Text, and therefore printed throughout on Art Paper.

A New Series. WAYFARING BOOKS.

Fcap, 8vo, limp cloth extra, gilt top, coloured Picture End-Papers. 2s. 6d. net.

THE WAYFARER. By CLAUDE E. BENSON.

[Ready.]

THE VOICE OF THE MOUNTAINS. By E. A. BAKER, M.A., and F. E. ROSS.

[Ready.]

THE VOICE OF THE SEA. By INGRAM SWALE.

[March.]

THE SIMPLE LIFE. By E. A. BAKER, M.A.

[In Prep.]

PRAYERS FROM THE POETS. By CECIL HEADLAM, M.A., and LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A.

[Ready.]

THE GARDEN ANTHOLOGY. By ROSE GARDNER.

[Ready.]

THE POCKET PLATO. By S. C. WOODHOUSE, M.A.

[March.]

THE POCKET RUSKIN. By ROSE GARDNER.

[In Prep.]

THE GOLDEN ANTHOLOGIES

Edited by G. K. A. BELL, B.A., Ch. Ch., Oxford.
1s. net cloth; 2s. net lambskin.

POEMS OF LIFE AND DEATH.

POEMS OF PATRIOTISM.

POEMS OF ROMANCE.

POEMS OF MARRIAGE. Edited by PERCIVAL VIVIAN.

A NEW LIST OF ROUTLEDGE'S NEW SERIES.

Containing up-to-date Lists of the contents of the following VERY CHEAP NEW SERIES, will be posted to every Applicant.

THE LONDON LIBRARY. 2s. 6d. net. First 8 vols.

THE NEW UNIVERSAL LIBRARY. Cloth, 1s. net; leather, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net. 140 vols.

THE MUSES' LIBRARY. Same prices. 45 vols.

GOLDEN ANTHOLOGIES. Cloth, 1s. net; lambskin, 2s. net. 7 vols.

POETS AND POETRY OF NINETEENTH CENTURY. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. 6d. net. 12 vols.

WAYFARING BOOKS. 2s. 6d. net. 6 vols.

LIBRARY OF HISTORICAL LITERATURE. 6s. net. 11 vols.

STANDARD REFERENCE LIBRARY. 7s. 6d. net. 3 vols.

PHOTOGRAPHURE AND COLOUR SERIES. 3s. 6d. net. 19 vols.

GENTLEMAN'S LIBRARY. 5s. 47 vols.

LIBRARY OF EARLY NOVELISTS. 6s. net. 13 vols.

MINIATURE REFERENCE LIBRARY. 1s. net. 41 vols.

THE ENGLISH LIBRARY. 2s. 6d. 14 vols.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY RECITERS. 1s. 9 vols.

BOOKS OF HUMOUR. 1s. 38 vols.

BROADWAY BOOKLETS. 6d.; lambskin, 1s. 6d. net. 48 vols.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd., Broadway House, Ludgate Hill, London.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	259	The Jaded Intellectuals	270
Literature :		Inspired Journalism	271
A Critic of her Sex	261	A Literary Causerie :
A Pagan Saint	262	The Mystery of the Cheap
Angels and Bats	263	Classics	271
Cuneiform Inscriptions	265	Fiction	272
Famous Women	265	Drama :
Modern Mysticism and Modern		Mr. Vachell's Comedy at the Thought	266	Playhouse	274
More of the Dawn	267	Forthcoming Books	275
British Central Africa	268	Correspondence	275
The Library Table	269	Books Received	277
In the Forest	269	The Bookshelf	278

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s. Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

Readers who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested to communicate with the Manager, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE season of Lent continues to exercise a great deal of influence over the publications of the moment. We have had during the past week a considerable number of devotional and theological books such as Mr. Louis Elbé's "Future Life," Mr. Ion Keith Murray's "Unto a Perfect Man," Mr. J. P. Knight's "Epistle to the Colossians" and such small books of the hour as "The Living Christ, Readings for the Great Forty Days," "The Message of the Cross" and so forth. The number of small volumes seems to increase year by year as though side by side with the growth of worldliness there is also a growth of the number of those who choose this early part of spring for special devotion to the spiritual life. Even those who have long since ceased to hold with the ancient ways cannot regret this, as "man does not live by bread alone" and it is ill for a nation when it ceases to attend to the needs of the spirit.

Next week Mr. George W. E. Russell through Mr. Grant Richards will publish another volume of his observations. It would not be fair to anticipate its interest, and yet we cannot refrain from printing one little story to give a taste of what is coming. It is inspired by the want of reticence in regard to health distinctive of the modern mind.

"Ice!" exclaimed a pretty girl at dessert, "good gracious, no! so bad for indy"—and her companion, who had not travelled with the times, learned with amazement that "indy" was the pet name for indigestion. "How bitterly cold!" said a plump matron at an open-air luncheon; "just the thing to give one appendicitis." "Oh!" said her neighbour, surveying the company, "we are quite safe there. I shouldn't think we had an appendix between us."

Mr. A. C. Benson is making good progress with the "Letters of Queen Victoria," which no doubt will be the most important publication of the autumn season. It is expected that it will be out early in October. Queen Victoria was equally interesting as a woman and as a sovereign. Her very early marriage, the devotion to her of Lord Melbourne and other Prime Ministers, the sadness as well as pleasure connected with her children, and her long widowhood, render her life a kind of prose epic of womanhood. As a queen she was associated with the greatest advance in civilisation that the world has witnessed, and her reign was one of the longest and happiest and most peaceful in the annals of English history.

At Sotheby's during this last week very great interest was taken in the seven days dispersal of Sir Wilfred Lawson's engravings which according to the Daily Telegraph had been valued at £4000. But by the end of the third day the total had far exceeded that sum. It was only to be expected that the rage for colour-prints and mezzotints should be followed by a sudden boom in the hitherto neglected line-engravings; and if the art-dealing market continues in its present healthy state, we shall probably hear that enormous prices have been paid for groups of wax fruit and flowers, glass paper weights with pictorial representations of the sea-side, and all the early Victorian bric-a-brac at which it is now the fashion to sneer: Delightful though the art of reproductive engraving may be, and particularly for the fortunate possessors of great collections, it is a matter of some regret that neither collectors nor dealers are able to differentiate between the æsthetic value of say Valentine Green, McARDell, and S. W. Reynolds and the really great artists such as Rembrandt, Whistler, Blake, Calvert and others for whom the graver and the needle were instruments in the expression of original genius; the reproductive engravers when all is said and done were merely predecessors of the photographer and when they allowed their own individuality to assert itself they ceased to be faithful interpreters of the great artists of whom they were merely the unfaithful or faithful servants.

Humour has its own atmosphere, and it is an accepted axiom that the best jokes can only be appreciated by the few. This is one of the chief causes of the failure of the so-called humorous weeklies. They cannot print the witticisms which rely on local colour and a knowledge of the circumstances in which they were conceived because they would be foreign to most of their readers. These remarks are inspired by an examination of "The Club Lyre," a four-page journal produced by half a dozen Press Club wags during the campaign preceding the recent election of a new committee. "It is our proud boast," said the editors, "that no public or private utility can be discovered in the publication of this journal. We fill no long-felt want. We have no new theories to discuss, no crank views to push." The editors, not content with this confession, accentuated their defiance of Fleet Street convention by demanding sixpence a copy! Of course, no one outside the club could possibly understand any of the references or "jokes," and if the majority of the latter are very weak, the authors can find consolation in the fact that the whole paper was "written up" in less than an hour.

The dinner of the Stage Society held last Sunday evening at the Criterion Restaurant, like all the functions of this club, was admirably managed. None of the speeches were too long, and they were all to the point. Particularly interesting was that of Mr. Frederick Wheelen, who, in the regrettable absence of Sir John Gorst, occupied the chair. According to his description the reception given to dramatic works in Berlin presents a sad contrast to the state of affairs in London. For Berlin accords to alien drama the same enthusiasm which it gives to the works of native genius; and at the present moment Germany can boast of dramatists greater than their French contemporaries. The intellectuals of Berlin seem to have reached the æsthetic Nirvana of which Whistler dreamed. With true imperialism they are ready to accept the art of every country on its own merits, and they are now about to test our actors by inviting Mr. Beerbohm Tree to the city which welcomed Watteau and Voltaire.

It was frankly a little dismal after listening to Mr. Frederick Wheelen's most interesting statistics and Mr. Tree's eloquent and pointed allegories to hear Mr. J. T. Grein, "the only begetter" of the forthcoming visit, complimenting the English on the possession of their dramatic critics and on dramatists of very doubtful authenticity. It is very much to be regretted that Mr. J. T. Grein, who was one of the pioneers of drama in England, should have fallen away from his ideal of fifteen years ago. The recent criticisms of Hedda Gabler (even Mr. Grein's was no exception) recall the delicious stupidities of seventeen years ago. Indeed English dramatic critics, with a few honourable exceptions are as hopelessly behind the age and out of date as the happily deceased Clement Scott. They are ignorant, they are futile. They judge a play by the effect it produces on the upper circle on the first night. The public, to do it justice, never pays the slightest attention to anything they may say: in one notorious instance the object of their obloquy has become a European classic. Surely Mr. Grein could manage to retain a well-deserved popularity in London along with his undeniable dramatic perceptions. To have omitted the name of Mr. Granville Barker places him out of court in both senses of the word.

At Terry's Theatre on Saturday, the 23rd instant, the Literary Theatre Society will give a public matinée performance of The Persians, by Æschylus, in a prose translation, preceded by a one-act experiment in verse—A Miracle, by Mr. Granville Barker. The scenery and costumes for both pieces are being designed by Mr. C. S. Ricketts. This is the first opportunity that the public will have of appreciating Mr. Ricketts's gift for stage-pictures, such as won commendation on the occasion of the private performance of Salomé last summer.

Perhaps the most extraordinary instance of a man becoming his own publisher occurred about fifteen years ago when a Norfolk labourer produced a small volume or pamphlet of "original poems." He had never been to school and his vocabulary could not have contained more than a couple of hundred words, while a perusal of his verse—intensely serious—gave one the impression that Thomas Thompson, the author, was either a humourist of the first water or an eccentric of the lowest intelligence. He paid no attention whatever to grammar, and the result was an exhibition of the primitive ideas of the elementary mind which the most skilful writer of "dialect studies" could not have equalled. Mr. Thompson sold his pamphlet at sixpence and reaped a greater monetary reward than the majority of those contemporaries of his who "scribbled verse" for the weekly reviews.

On the Suffragette question every one imbued, as Horace says, with Greek letters can glibly quote Aristophanes's Ecclesiazousæ or the Femmes Savantes. But the true inwardness of the Feminist movement in France from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century is little known and less cited. The last third of the seventeenth century re-stated, in as firm and clear tones as any modern, the new philosophy that was no respecter of sexes. Poulain de Barre would educate women, but did not forget the men, "comme étant de même espèce!" ("De l'Education des Dames," 1679, advertisement.) A true Cartesian, de Barre considers feminism as a result of the fall of prejudice. Unfortunately, according to him even woman herself does not know her worth; she engages in frivolities, "jetée dans la bagatelle." Bold as Plato, undaunted by the avalanche of possible Homeric laughter, de Barre would restore to women their robbed and vested rights. His Cartesianism made even the Jesuit abbé, Morvan de Bellegarde, a little later—in 1702—pen his feminist "lettres curieuses," which influenced Feijoo, another priest, author of the "Théâtre Critique" (1742).

Not many of our daily and evening papers resisted the temptation to apply the phrase "La ville lumière" to Paris in connection with the strike of the electrical workers, whereby that city was recently plunged into darkness. The Paris correspondent of the Daily Mail was able to add a note of what almost amounts to tragedy to his account of the occurrence. It appears that in consequence of the failure of the electric power supply, none of the French papers were able to appear. The Paris edition of the Daily Mail was, needless to say, a glorious exception. It came out rather before its usual time if anything. Consequently the inhabitants of the afflicted city had to choose between reading the Daily Mail or not reading a paper at all. Accordingly they read the Daily Mail (those of them who understood English) seated in cafés whose only illumination was afforded by candles stuck in empty bottles. We must turn to Dante's "Inferno" to find a parallel to the gloomy picture evoked by the recital of these facts.

The Paris correspondent of the Tribune is evidently possessed of a keen sense of humour. Referring to the same incident (the strike) he writes: "One of the comic features of the situation was the plight of an old lady living in the Sentier district. She had just taken the lift to the flat when the current was cut off and she was left suspended between the third and fourth floors. Firemen had to be sent for to extricate her." One wonders whether, supposing that the Paris correspondent of the Tribune had been in the place of the old lady in question, the comic aspect of the case would have struck him as forcibly as it did. Truly "humour is in the eye of the beholder."

From the Luxembourg Museum, to which it was presented by public subscription, Manet's famous painting Olympie has been transferred to the Louvre, where it has been hung as a pendant to the Odalisque of Ingres in the Salle des Etats, consecrated to deceased French masters of the last century. By this momentous step the great Impressionist, whose works have excited so much controversy during the last fifty years, has received the final and highest honour official France can pay. Without drawing upon the Caillebotte collection of impressionist paintings, the Louvre will shortly possess another masterpiece by Manet, whose equally famous Déjeuner sur l'Herbe is included in the Moreau-Nelaton collection recently bequeathed to the French Government, and temporarily housed in the Musée des Arts Décoratifs, next door to the Louvre.

Two flower-pieces by Manet are also found in this valuable collection, while other impressionist painters richly represented are Claude Monet, Camille Pissarro, the Anglo-French painter Sisley, and Berthe Morisot, Manet's sister-in-law. Other notable works in the bequest are: Fantin-Latour's colossal portrait-group, Homage to Delacroix; the smaller version of Delacroix's Entrée des Croisés à Constantinople; a magnificent series of Corots, including the painter's portrait of himself; Decamps's Jésus sur le lac de Génézareth, and other important paintings; Le Rêve, and La Foi, l'Espérance et la Charité by Puvis de Chavannes; and Intimité and L'Enfant à la Soupière by Carrière. To these paintings must be added a collection, no less remarkable, of drawings by Ingres, Millet, Rousseau, Courbet, Boudin, Cazin, Constantin Guys, and many others.

A large and important new work by Rodin, entitled "l'Ombre," an over life-size figure of a man, will be added to the International Society's Exhibition at the New Gallery, Regent Street, next week. A few days ago the famous bust of M. Guillaume was also added to the Exhibition, in lieu of a work which was, unfortunately, broken to pieces while being packed for transport from Paris to London.

The library of the late Mr. George Gray, Clerk of the Peace for Glasgow and Town Clerk of Rutherglen, will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby on Wednesday, the 20th, and following day. Mr. Gray was an old and well-known book-collector in Glasgow and his library was one of those described in Mason's "Public and Private Libraries of Glasgow," published in 1885. Mr. Gray's collection is strong in Scotch books. Rare editions of Scottish authors abound. Of Burns, there is a perfect copy of the first edition, Kilmarnock, 1786, another copy slightly imperfect, the second edition published at Edinburgh, in the following year, and the third edition published at London in the same year, 1787. There is also the very rare first Dublin edition, 1787, and an uncut copy in the original boards of the poems ascribed to Robert Burns, Glasgow, 1801. Several letters and songs in the autograph of Burns are also in the sale.

Mr. Gray long made a hobby of chap-books, and his large collection numbering over a thousand separate pieces will be offered in one lot at a reserve price, or otherwise in lots as catalogued. Other notable books are several of Sir William Fraser's Scottish Family Histories, several rare and curious editions of Dougal Graham's Account of the Rebellion of 1745-6 (in verse), a collection of Portraits of Mary Queen of Scots, the first edition of Archbishop Laud's Prayer Book for Scotland, printed at Edinburgh in 1637, and a Fourth Folio Shakespeare.

An important sale of rare books and manuscripts will take place at Messrs. Hodgson's Rooms in Chancery Lane, on Wednesday and Thursday next. The first day's sale includes the library of the late Dr. Roots, F.S.A., of Kingston-on-Thames, formed by him during the early part of the last century. Among other interesting items may be mentioned a unique set of ten volumes relating to Napoleon, extra-illustrated by the insertion of several hundred portraits and coloured plates of military costume; the Strawberry Hill copy of the rare History of Surrey by John Aubrey, with additional engravings, and a very fine copy of Brayley's History of Surrey, profusely extra-illustrated with original water-colour drawings by J. and E. Hassell, and other artists, old coloured prints and portraits and engravings. The same day's sale comprises many rare books, including such scarce Americana as the original editions of the Collections of Voyages by De Bry, Purchas and Hakluyt, a few early manuscripts on vellum: a printed Horæ by Hardouyn, Paris, 1520, with the woodcuts illuminated; specimens of old English and foreign bindings and books bearing the autographs of Ben Jonson, Hobbes, and Pope. An item of more general interest, perhaps, is the original drawing by "Phiz" of the famous Trial Scene in the Pickwick Papers, a facsimile of which is given in the catalogue. The second day's sale contains many fine books with coloured plates, including a large paper copy of the Military Costumes of Europe in two volumes, Ackerman's Histories of Oxford and Cambridge Universities and the Public Schools; the original edition of Chamberlaine's Imitations of Holbein and a splendid set of Gould's Ornithological Works, twenty-nine volumes bound in morocco extra. Other lots of note are an entirely uncut copy of the first edition of Milton's Paradise Regained, the original edition of "The Germ," in which Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel" was first printed, and the very scarce privately printed edition of John Ruskin's Poems, 1850.

A grand historical Pageant is to take place at St. Albans, Hertfordshire, on July 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20, at 3 o'clock each afternoon, when episodes representative of the history of St. Albans are to be given by about one thousand six hundred performers. Mr. C. H. Ashdown, F.R.G.S., of St. Albans, is the author of the "book" of the Pageant, and music for the choruses has been specially composed by Mr. W. H. Bell, Professor R.A.M. Mr. Herbert Jarman, reader and stage manager to Mr. Lewis Waller, of the Lyric Theatre, and Mr. Philip Carr, are acting jointly as Masters of the Pageant. The President of the Grand Committee is the Earl of Verulam.

LITERATURE

A CRITIC OF HER SEX

Personal Opinions Publicly Expressed. By "RITA." (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

WE cannot help regretting that the clever and vivacious lady who writes under the name of "Rita" should be so continually girding at her own sex. After all there is nothing to be proud of in being either a man or a woman, since the individual has no choice in the matter, but has to take whatever sex is thrust upon him or her: And even the relationship of the sexes is continually being modified and re-adjusted by the action of forces much more powerful than those of individual criticism. It is difficult also for the writer who wishes to shoot folly as it flies, to distinguish between those sins that belong to our common nature and those that can be attributed solely to one sex. The smart woman, for example, who is the first to feel the chastising whip of "Rita" has her counterpart in the smart man, and which is the worse of the two it would take more than genius to determine. The society butterfly "who openly declared that when she saw her first wrinkle or her first grey hair she would take a dose of poison immediately," is not without her counterpart in the other sex. Moreover, "Rita," to put the truth plainly, writes a great deal of nonsense about certain subjects. On page 108 occurs the following statement:

Anyone who has been "behind the scenes" of journalistic life knows that the mainstay of a newspaper or a magazine is its advertisement columns. An editor who receives a large and certain income from a firm of publishers takes good care that the books issued by that firm are tenderly handled by his reviewing staff. Criticism in a literary sense is rendered impossible, and the public and the author both suffer—the one because it buys trash, and the other because encouraged to write it.

The present writer has reviewed books for longer than he cares to remember and for a considerable number of newspapers, some of them well-established and rich, others living always in the region of impecuniosity. Never in the experience of some twenty years has he been asked by any editor whatever to modify his opinions with a view of pleasing the publisher or obtaining advertisements. Probably "Rita" has heard of some such practices as she describes in journals of doubtful respectability, but it is too bad to make a sweeping statement that would take in all newspapers. It is true she admits that in some two or three journals an attempt at impartial criticism is made, but it is only to return to the tune with which she set out.

Instructions often accompany a cartload of volumes: "So-and-so's best book has a big boom. Review of same lines." "This firm advertises largely with us: praise generally." "B. & Co. say this is over subscribed, day of publication. Say it will be the talk of all London before long." And so on. The new author, or the author who is slowly coming to the front, are left severely alone. Their reviewing falls to the slack season. It is no uncommon thing for a book to pass into two or three editions, and be reviewed months afterwards as in its first!

From time immemorial the critic has had to suffer a great deal of abuse at the hands of authors, particularly of novelists. The other side of the question is not very frequently considered. Works of fiction are poured out in an unending stream from the beginning of the year to the end of it. Out of those who write these novels not one in a hundred—we might even say not one in a thousand—is fitted by Nature to undertake work of the kind. The consequence is that a novel of the highest mark does not appear once in three or four years, and of the annual crop there is not a tenth worth the trouble of reviewing. Yet it is amazing how the compilers of the silliest trash take themselves so seriously, and seem to think that a critic ought to give up his days and nights to the study of their works. As a matter of fact, the only criticism which is of use to a journal is that which does not concern itself in the slightest degree with pronouncing judgments on this or that individual. Praising a book or slating a book is nothing. What the critic can do usefully is to work out the principles which are embodied or adumbrated in the work before him, and in this it is all the better if he forgets the individual author. In literary matters "Rita" appears to us to be fighting against the light. We are also sorry that she should have included in this book of essays such a very rude and inhospitable chapter as that which is called "The Amazing American." It consists of a violent and unmannerly attack upon the Americans delivered without inspiration and without wit. Here, for instance, is a passage typical of many others, that if addressed to a private individual could only be met with an action for libel. A nation cannot answer calumny in that way, but those who know the American men and the American women will promptly condemn such writing as this.

To business an American brings little or no honourable feeling. He is impatient of steady and honest methods. He would sooner make one dollar by a trick, than earn a hundred by fair dealing. These are the very words spoken to me by a recently returned English friend who had spent fifteen years of "business" life in New York.

Nor do we think that the Americans are likely to take "Rita" as an authorised exponent of English opinion.

After all, however, the gist of this book is to be found in "Rita's" comments on her sex. Perhaps the most favourable point for beginning an examination of these ideas will be found in the chapter headed "Recreation." Games belong to youth. Our authoress as always goes to extremes. The following description of the sporting girl of to-day only holds true of a very small proportion of those who are engaged in outdoor pastimes:

With her slang terms, her mannish dress, her avowed taste for cigarettes and "big drinks," her brusque, rough, overbearing manners, her perpetual "chaff," or her perpetual silly laughter, she is at once an annoyance and an object-lesson. A lesson in what to avoid, not in what to admire.

The girl who plays hockey or golf does not necessarily indulge in "big drinks" and smoke cigarettes. It is followed by a tirade against shooting women, but surely the number of these is very small in proportion to those who can scarcely tell the stock from the barrel of a gun. It would be just as logical to inveigh against women soldiers because here and there a woman disguised or otherwise has chosen to follow a soldier's life. Her talk of latch-keys and flats and the freedom of college life is open to the same objection. Women as a body are still bound by the chains of convention, but there never was a time when here and there an individual would not break down the barriers. If we consider what women did in the early Victorian days and what they do to-day, the comparison certainly would not be in favour of our grandmothers. The old idea that sex was predominant and that marriage itself can be described in a well-known passage from Preciosa, "it means to spin, to bear children and to weep, my daughter," was no very high ideal. If "Rita" will take up the pages of Punch and compare the women which were pictured by Leach and those that have appeared during the present century she will have to confess that the woman of to-day is, at any rate, as far as can be judged from appearances, the nobler animal of the two. What she has lost spiritually "Rita" may know, but we confess that we do not know. All is to the good, in our opinion, in the life of a man or a woman that tends to sink the idea of sex. When a girl passes an examination she is for the moment sexless; when she plays hockey or golf with all her might she is for the moment sexless; that is to say, the notion that her chief business on earth is to attract men is extinguished by her devotion to some other idea. But to keep her largely within the house, to make her concentrate her mind on dress and domesticity, is to develop that state of affairs which is described as being over-sexed. Plenty of fresh air, plenty of exercise, and plenty of interest in games and occupations into which sex does not enter, will never hinder a woman from being fit to be a mother. On the contrary, this experience will come to her in a healthy and natural manner, not in the morbidness, fever, and exaggerated feeling produced on those whose life has mostly been spent within four walls. The view that "Rita" puts forth may be needed for the purpose of moderation, but the truth here, as ever, lies between two extremes.

At any given point in the world's history, whatever general progress is being made, it will be found that some individuals are pushing on in front of the others and some are lagging behind. Any one whose eyes were concentrated either on the rear or on the van would give a distorted version of the procession. It requires a great deal of judgment to look past the accidents of the situation and ascertain clearly what is taking place in the centre of the movement. "Rita" perhaps finds it easier to obtain an effect by dwelling on the more sensational aspect. It is the penalty sobriety has to pay that its conclusions are not received with the attention given to the extremist.

A PAGAN SAINT

The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. Translated by JOHN JACKSON. With an Introduction by CHARLES BIGG. (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE Meditations of Marcus Aurelius are not read for their style, which is almost painful to students of classical Greek. It teems with Latinisms, like ἀρον for tolle in the sense of "remove, abstract from," as in ἀρον τὸ βέβλαμμαι ἡται ἡ βλάβη, "get rid of the sense of injury, and the injury itself is gone." Nor can it be said that there is any solid source of consolation in the Meditations, except, perhaps, for those who find comfort in the arid husks of Christian Science. Unfit as Stoicism is to furnish the private citizen with a philosophical system or a practical religion, it is eminently unsuited for a great ruler. The doctrine of the Stoics, still preached by the Society of Jesus, that the prime and sole duty of every man who comes into the world is the saving of his own soul, if propagated and promoted by the potentates of the earth, would bring about a state of things in which Earth should stand at gaze, like Joshua's moon in Ajalon.

Marcus Aurelius, in whose person, according to Gibbon virtue was for once enthroned, grew up a studious and refined boy in an atmosphere of study and culture. When obliged to attend the brutal sports of the arena he would avert his eyes from the coup de grace which followed the signal of the upturned thumbs and fix them on some philosophical treatise. Yet his philosophy failed him at a critical moment. Twice during the disastrous Marcomannian war he had recourse to the magic arts of the Egyptian Arnouphis and the impostor Alexander of Abonoteichos. Dr. Bigg in his Introduction, which is brilliantly written and full of matter, writes:

From his cradle he was a beautiful soul, delicate in mind as in body, tender, truthful, docile, sweetly melancholy, a virginal flower, shrinking from the world of which he was to be the master.

A purist in language, he recoils from the use of the word meaning "to gargle," in this reminding us of the euphuists of the Shakespearean age. The most unaccountable phase in his character is his apparently sincere admiration for his wife Faustina, "so obedient, so affectionate, so simple." He even dedicated to her honour a temple in the village under Mount Taurus in which she died, and another in the Capitol in Rome, and established an institution for the support of poor girls who were to be called Novae Puellae Faustinianae. Stoicism had a very large tolerance for wickedness of every kind, as being quite natural. The wicked man is made that way; a bad man cannot injure the philosopher, and even other people cannot be harmed by any one except themselves. The world's good things are indifferent. If the dishonest man deprives others of these good things, he does not injure them but himself. You should not be angry with the dishonest company-promoter or the burglar, but you ought to show them if possible how they are marring their own nature. But if this system may suit the lame slave Epictetus, it ill befits the ruler who is responsible for the security of life and property. Marcus did not exercise successful rule over anything or any one save himself. Dr. Bigg quotes an eloquent passage from Renan, who finds in the Emperor's touching patience "the inner martyrdom of a saint who through tribulation and disillusion arrives at perfect self-renunciation."

We shall never comprehend all that was suffered by that poor blighted heart, all the bitterness hidden behind that pale face, always calm, almost smiling. It is true that the farewell to happiness is the beginning of wisdom, and the surest way to find happiness. There is nothing so sweet as the return of joy, which follows the renunciation of joy; nothing so lively, profound and charming as the enchantment of the disenchanted.

Whence, then, comes the enduring attraction which the book has always had? It is the poetry, not of phrase, but of sentiment, which pervades the Meditations. Dr. Rendall in his admirable edition of 1898 aptly remarks:

Its "physiognomy" is unmistakable; it wins insensibly upon the reader, and becomes part of a familiar personality; the words, as was said truly of St. Paul's, "have hands and feet." The very sense of effort produces a certain uncommonness of phrase, such as gives interest and even distinction to an intelligent foreigner using a tongue and idiom not wholly familiar. Marcus hits off phrases and combinations, which, if not quite felicitous, strike the mind and stick. He never becomes rhetorical like Seneca, or prolix like Epictetus, or glib like Lucian.

To Renan this is "the most human of all books," "the gospel that will never grow old." To Matthew Arnold "the acquaintance of a man like Marcus Aurelius is an imperishable benefit." Dr. Bigg thus sums up the character of the book:

It is not a treatise, but rather the diary of a soul; the daily thoughts of a religious man, jotted down just as they occurred. We may call it a spiritual commonplace book; there are quotations from his day's readings, from Plato, Antisthenes, the poets; the rest consists of reflections upon the doctrines of his school, not reasoned out, but illustrated with an infinity of epigrams and "images." It is most like the de Imitatione, but less orderly. It is not an autobiography, such as the Confessions of Augustine, or the Journals of Wesley or Fox, though it begins with a slight retrospective sketch; nor is it apologetic or controversial like the Pensées of Pascal.

It is time to give some specimens of the translation, which is very clever and spirited. It is a pity that Mr. Jackson did not adopt some of the excellent emendations by which Dr. Rendall has greatly improved the text; for instance, τὸ τοῦ ἐν Καίτη "ὡς περ χρῆση," the Caietan's response that depends on you, which makes sense of a passage obelised in the translation, p. 60; and τοπίαν for ιστορίαν, vi. § 13, l. 13, where ιστορίαν is unintelligible, and ροπείαν (rhetorical) "embroidery" is eminently characteristic of post-classical Greek.

For a fine piece of character-painting we would quote his recognition of all that he owes to Rusticus, i. § 7 (p. 52), or the sketch of his father Antoninus, vi. § 30 (p. 118). We give the latter:

Remember how he would never dismiss any subject until he had gained a clear insight into it and grasped it thoroughly; how he bore with the injustice of his detractors and never retorted in kind; how he did nothing in haste, turned a deaf ear to the professional tale-bearers, and showed himself an acute judge of characters and actions, devoid of all reproachfulness, timidity, suspiciousness, and sophistry: how easily he was satisfied—for instance, with lodging, bed, clothing, food, and servants—how fond of work and how patient; capable, thanks to his frugal diet, of remaining at his post from morning till night, having apparently subjected even the operations of nature to his will; firm and constant in friendship, tolerant of the most outspoken criticism of his opinions, delighted if any one could make a better suggestion than himself, and, finally, deeply religious without any trace of superstition.

Of the more characteristic vein of philosophic reflection this is a good specimen:

O my soul, my soul! wilt thou never attain to goodness and simplicity, oneness and nakedness, and shine through the bars of thy bodily prison? Wilt thou never taste the sweets of a character loving and affectionate? never know satiety and self-sufficiency, with every craving gone and not one lingering desire for aught, quick or dead, that serves the lusts of the flesh; seeking no temporal respite for their longer enjoyment, no pleasant places, no favoured clime, and no congenial society; but content with thy present state, delighted with all about thee, and persuaded that thou holdest all things needful in fee from Heaven, that all is well with thee, and all will be well that God wishes.

In the following extract we have a more subtle comment, and the philosopher's judgment about the desirability of a Palace of Truth:

I have often marvelled how it is that every one loves himself more than the rest of human kind, yet values his own opinion of himself less than that of others. At all events, were some god or some sage to stand by a man and bid him entertain no idea, no thought, within himself without simultaneously uttering it aloud, he could not abide the ordeal for a single day. So true it is that we have more respect for our neighbours and their thoughts of us than we have for ourselves!

Furnished with the Teubner text, Dr. Rendall's translation and the present edition the reader is adequately prepared for that introduction which Matthew Arnold thought such a precious boon. The twenty pages of notes explanatory and illustrative which Mr. Jackson appends to his translation will be found very useful and interesting.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

ANGELS AND BATS

The Life of Walter Pater. By THOMAS WRIGHT. 2 vols (Everett, 24s. net.)

WE have often wished that the law, which protects a man's literary works from unauthorised publication for some years after his death, could also protect his life from the unauthorised biographer. We have before us a book which has revived that wish to a degree almost painfully acute. Such a law would have saved us the unpleasant duty of reading and reviewing Mr. Thomas Wright's life of Walter Pater.

There was no need for a biography of Walter Pater. His was a life which might well have gone unwritten for ever, or have remained briefly described in a note by some old and intimate friend. Mr. Arthur Benson's little book, indeed, though it appeared fifty years too soon, will have an interest for future ages as the judgment passed on one man of letters and gentleman by another of the generation immediately succeeding. Mr. Wright, in one of the most blatant prefaces we have read, makes a show of repairing Mr. Benson's omissions and errors. We would assure him that Mr. Benson's feeblest sentence betrays more knowledge of Pater than his own two volumes. Of the twelve counts of the indictment let us take one or two, and examine their validity. Mr. Benson says that Pater showed no precocious signs in boyhood of a desire to write. "That is to say," comments Mr. Wright, "Pater the author sprang into being like a phoenix." To any one who understands the use of words, it means, of course, nothing of the sort. But what discoveries has Mr. Wright made, what ambitious early works has he heard of, what Lipsian compositions has he rescued from their proper destination? A few poems. If the writing of poetry at school is to be held a sign of precocity, then more than half the educated inhabitants of England were, or are, precocious. Mr. Benson was perfectly right. His point was that Pater "did not arrive at his plentiful vocabulary as some writers have done by the production of large masses of writing that never see the light." Large masses of anything were out of the question with Pater, and there was no need in his case for the laborious discipline of the "sedulous ape." Mr. Benson, we read again, does not mention Harbledown, where Pater lived as boy. Why should he? He was not stringing together unimportant details, but writing the story of the mind of a man of genius, and he kept to the point. Harbledown he could safely leave to the Mr. Wrights who were sure to come after. Mr. Benson, again, "tells nothing about the great central event of Pater's life." What is this event which Mr. Wright thus elegantly exalts to the importance of a railway system? "His connection with St. Austin's monkery"; and to omit St. Austin's monkery is "something like giving an account of Wellington and leaving out the Peninsular War and Waterloo." We have seldom seen the gifts of the chapman and the quack put to worse use. It is better to omit St. Austin's monkery than to claim for your discovery the entirely disproportionate value which, as we shall see shortly, Mr. Wright claims for his.

But enough of this. We are not defending Mr. Benson, because to those who understand and value literature, the merits, like the shortcomings, of his book are obvious; and it is of no concern to him or to the truth whether the public for whom Mr. Wright has written prefer to have their Harbledown or a generally just and sympathetic exposition of Pater's mind and character. Mr. Wright's criticisms of Mr. Benson are only so many proofs of his total failure to understand the object of biography and the man whose biography he has invited himself to write. He lives, it appears, at Olney, within walking distance of the old home of the Pater family. This fact he offers as his credentials. We submit that they are insufficient.

We can put the case in a nutshell in Mr. Wright's own words. "We are inclined to think that Pater did not see any angels at Fish Hall. As we said, we thoroughly explored the place from cellar to roof, but we saw nothing larger than bats." Mr. Wright has explored the life of Walter Pater from cellar to roof, and has seen nothing in it larger than bats. There were angels there; but he could not see them, because, nosing into every corner, he saw nothing but bats; and, at the end of his painful exploration, he offers us with a shout of self-approval—bats.

What is it that he has to tell us about Pater that can justify the publication of these two volumes? We are doing him no injustice when we say that the salient feature of his work is the insistence on two points: that Walter Pater was exceedingly ugly and that he was sadly ignorant. The first is not the quality that most impressed those who knew Pater personally; the second is not the quality that most impresses those who know and understand his work. Mr. Wright, who did not know Pater and has never understood a line of his work, sees little else in him. He loses no chance of assuring his readers that Pater was ugly. His ugliness, his physical infirmity, afford opportunities for the display of the humour than which there is nothing more shocking in these vulgar volumes. "Emerald Uthwart went soldiering. Pater, in a scarlet jacket with black facings, would have been a sight for gods and men." . . . "Some writers have said that he had a military look. God help the British army, and Britain, too, if its military men have Pater's physique and presence." And in a footnote we read: "Pater was none the worse for being extremely plain." We have never seen patronage of a great man by a man of no account carried to a more nauseating extreme. Had Mr. Wright ever spent a moment in Pater's company, no doubt the ugliness of the man is exactly what he would have noticed and remembered—the only thing, probably, that Pater would have given him the opportunity of noticing and remembering. He does not appear to have realised—in spite of a remark made by Mr. R. C. Jackson (vol. ii. p. 20)—that to those who knew and understood Pater his ugliness was not his most prominent characteristic.

The biographer, however, is not satisfied with making Pater of a painful ugliness; he is careful to explain that the subject of his labours was really an ignorant man. He lived, we are to understand, intellectually from hand to mouth, picking up scraps of information from this friend's talk or that friend's books, and writing on Italian art, on English literature, or on Greek philosophy without any honest acquaintance with those matters. If Mr. Wright had been able to understand the lectures on "Plato and Platonism" he would not, we imagine, have declared them the work of a man who would "never take the trouble to go to the root of things." Pater's was not the knowledge of the schools: he was not a profound and exact scholar, nor a compendium of dates and attributions in art; but only those who know more than he are entitled to call him indolent and ignorant, to question the thoroughness of the knowledge which enabled him to illuminate, as he did, metaphysics, literature and art. Least of all should we expect such temerity from an author who writes of an "Aldis" Homer, and of Magdalene College, Oxford; misinterprets the letters O.U.D.S.; does not know what a chasuble is; has nothing to say of the Schloss at Heidelberg except that the tun of Heidelberg is in the cellars; credits Lionel Johnson with a piece of false Latinity, and admits that, but for Pater, Hippolytus would have remained for him (and, by unfair implication, for others) no more than "a black charioteer on a red vase." Complete ignorance of the works of Euripides is not a good recommendation for a writer on the author of "Greek Studies."

The case is still worse when we come to the relations of Pater with what Mr. Wright calls "St. Austin's monkery." A single quotation will serve to show the complete misconception of Pater's ability under which the author of this book labours. But for Camberwell and Walworth (the situations of the "monkery" and of the residence of Mr. R. C. Jackson), we read: "Marius the Epicurean, Greek Studies, and Appreciations, all of which were inspired by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Jackson's books and pictures, could not possibly have been written." We do not doubt that Mr. Jackson possesses a fine library (the "Aldis" Homer forms part of it); we do not doubt that Pater made use of it. To say that without it certain of his works "could not possibly have been written" is to betray woful ignorance not only of those works in particular but of the conditions of literary composition in general. We need not dwell on the point, which will be clear to all intelligent persons. The Essay on Wordsworth in "Appreciations," the passage dealing with Fronto in "Marius," are not the work of a man who had never read Wordsworth or studied philosophy except casually in the library of a friend.

Nothing, perhaps, shows more vividly our author's unfitness to deal with such a mind as Pater's than his humour and his taste. Out of a long list of passages for which offensive is none too strong a term, we will quote but three. "St. Paul, however, who does not seem to have read Pater's 'Renaissance.'" . . . "Mary the Virgin, and Venus, who apparently was not a virgin . . . hobbled together amicably." . . . "The aged Jupiter, who, clad in rabbit-skins—a sort of polar Robinson Crusoe—had for five hundred years pottered about the icebergs of Spitzbergen, was moving southward. In short, Olympus was once more beginning to get saucy." Saucy! That Mr. Wright has never read "The New Republic" is clear, not only from his reference to it in these volumes (in which he shows a blundering misconception of the whole case), but from his use of that single word. And after that no one will be surprised to hear that he considers Pater "the Alma Tadema of English literature," and finds in his prose a "barbaric beauty."

We could, if space permitted, take objection to several mis-statements that arise from want of acquaintance with the subject of the biography and too keen a nose for disparaging gossip. It is, for instance, quite untrue to say that Pater was a bad tutor. With pupils in whose progress he took an interest, his patience and care were infinite. But there is one pernicious statement that must not go uncontradicted. "Though he constantly preached 'restraint' he never practised it." There is only one word that can fitly describe such a gross negation of the truth.

If Mr. Wright finds pleasure and profit in ferreting out minute and unimportant details, there are plenty of possible objects for this kind of biography on which he might exercise his talents without wholly misrepresenting the object of his attentions. What evil angel—what bat—inspired him to choose a man whose mind and character he was totally incapable of understanding, and then to patronise him? No one of responsibility, we imagine, had asked him for a life of Walter Pater. The law we suggested above would have saved him from a grievous mistake, and his readers from pain and annoyance, or from false impressions.

CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS

The Archaeology of the Cuneiform Inscriptions. By the Rev. A. H. SAYCE. (S.P.C.K., 5s.)

PROFESSOR SAYCE'S new book comprises six Rhind lectures delivered last autumn in Edinburgh, together with an article reprinted from the Contemporary Review on Canaan before the Exodus as revealed in the Tel el Amarna tablets. Our author may be trusted to make his subject, whatever it is, extremely interesting. Here he deals mainly with the origin and spread of cuneiform writing and some of its main teachings from the ethnographical point of view. The cuneiform system of writing obtained such wide acceptance in Western Asia amongst peoples of various races and languages that at one period it bid fair to become the standard means of record for the world, until the Phœnician alphabet, possibly derived from Egyptian hieratic, won from it all that it had conquered. The written tablet of clay, after baking, was as indestructible as a brick, and the seal upon it was inseparable, whereas a papyrus might be burnt or torn or devoured by insects, and its fragile seal was a nuisance. But it is more expeditious to write with a pen than with the triangular-headed stick by which the cuneiform scribe impressed his wedges on the damp clay, and in spite of minute and crowded characters a solid tablet weighing half a pound, and requiring at least to be elaborately dried, if not actually burned, scarcely held more text than a sheet of papyrus, which could be folded up small and despatched a few minutes after it was written and would not outweigh the half-ounce of the Postal Union. These were important considerations with the librarian and the archivist, much more so with the business man and the courier; so in the absence of a sufficiently simple type of cuneiform, the superior papyrus allied with the superior alphabet gradually drove the clay tablet and its syllabary out of the field.

The first lecture recounts the story of how the cuneiform scripts were deciphered, from Grotefend's first guess at the name of Darius to the latest find in the Hittite variety. The pictorial origins of all these scripts Professor Sayce traces in a subsequent lecture to a non-Semitic population on the shores of the Persian Gulf when Babylonia was as yet a morass, and the Tigris and Euphrates flowed by separate channels into the sea a hundred miles north of the present coast line. Archæological exploration of a strict sort is only now reaching Babylonia, topography and the hunt for cuneiform tablets having hitherto obscured all other issues to the explorers. In seeking for origins and the influence of the neighbouring nations on each other, Professor Sayce deplors the lack of evidence from pottery and other material remains, such as is available for Egypt. Beginning among the Sumerian Babylonians, the writing was adapted to their own language by the Elamites on the East at a very early date, as well as by the Semitic inhabitants of northern Babylonia. In the fourteenth century B.C. it was in use northward not only in Assyria and Mittani (a kingdom on the east bank of the Euphrates), but also beyond the Euphrates amongst the Hittites in Cappadocia as well as throughout Syria. In the ninth century it was borrowed by the kings of Van in Armenia, and lastly was greatly simplified by the Persians for their Indo-European tongue. Thus cuneiform served to express at least eight distinct languages. The importance of this is seen when it is remembered that only one foreign language, namely, Ethiopian, has been found in hieroglyphic (Egyptian) writing. The cuneiform inscriptions of Darius, which were the starting-point of decipherment, were trilingual and in three scripts—Persian, Babylonian and Elamite, the last being that current in the kingdom of which Susa (Shushan) was the capital.

In the early history of cuneiform, Aryan nations and Indo-European languages had no part. Nor was the Semite the inventor of the script, but the unplaced Sumerian speaking an agglutinative language like the Japanese. Professor Sayce groups the Hittite language with the Vannic and that of Mittani, but the Elamite is sui generis, though of the order to which Sumerian belongs. The former group is inflected and at first might be mistaken for Indo-European, but our author is positive that they are nothing of the kind. Egyptian he allows to have Semitic features, but considers it to be a branch of proto-Semitic distinct from another primary branch to which all the Semitic languages belong; and Babylonian again he would make a branch of the Semitic distinct, though secondary, from that off which the others spring.

While the whole field is full of promise, particularly now that scientific archæology is being carried into the various areas of excavation, we must especially draw attention to the wonderful results of Winckler's expedition last year to Boghas Keui in Cappadocia (briefly referred to in the Preface). That site proves to be Khatti the capital of the "forgotten empire" of the Hittites. The abundant harvest of cuneiform tablets from its citadel, including state papers, appears destined to clear up its history during the most brilliant period of its existence, shedding at the same time a flood of light on the external relations of Syria and Egypt, of Mitanni (another forgotten kingdom), Assyria, and Babylonia in the middle of the second millennium B.C., and helping to bind together the whole story of the nearest East in a manner that previously seemed almost beyond hope. The Hittites had also their own peculiar hieroglyphic writing and the unriddling of this may be expected to follow in due time when the language in which they are presumably written has been learnt from the Hittite cuneiform. Let us hope that Professor Sayce's brilliant insight will secure for England a good share of the honours.

FAMOUS WOMEN

Julie de Lespinasse. Translated from the French of the MARQUIS DE SÉGUR. (Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.)

Women of the Second Empire. By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE. Translated by ALICE IVIMEY. (Lane, 21s. net.)

THE Marquis de Ségur's biography of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse is in every way an admirable piece of work and one which we are glad to see translated. Not only has he discovered much new material, but what is even more important he has a deep knowledge of human nature and the power of applying that knowledge to the past. In consequence his biography is not a mere record of the actions and thoughts of a personality, collected with care and arranged in more or less happy order. He is a genuine biographer: that is to say, he is able to describe those actions and thoughts in such a way that the character behind them is reconstructed and lives again. He has the faculty of expressing one age in the terms of another, and he dispenses with that distressing habit of awarding praise and blame, which turns so many biographies into a hybrid kind of moral treatise, in which you feel a pigmy is making a desperate attempt to explain away the stature of a giant, to cut him to his moral measure. He knows the essential qualities of greatness, and quietly draws attention to their presence, regardless of the tradition which is inclined to ignore them. Tradition generally originates from the gossip of the majority, and the majority always is and always has been mediocre.

Most effective is the manner in which the Marquis de Ségur, after recounting the early misfortunes of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, first lifts the veil and shows the character that had been forming. He makes full use of the opportunity which circumstances offer him; for it is not until Madame du Deffand retired to Champfort in 1752, when Julie was twenty years old, and realised in spite of her approaching blindness that hidden in the girl whom the family systematically suppressed was a very remarkable individuality. The wise old lady's sympathy and encouragement developed it into conscious being. Briefly the story of Madame du Deffand is told, how she gained her knowledge of life and her intimate experience of its realities, and then the girl's character which the older woman's experience and knowledge of the world immediately appreciated. The contrast is enlightening, and lends the warmth of colour to the precise delineation of the girl's characteristics. With unerring instinct the essential features are given, and in three pages you see the portrait of the woman, whose vitality was so great that Guibert used to say of her with as much truth as wit, "You give life to marble: and matter thinks in your hands."

"She was plain but 'all her motions were graceful. She moved with an air. . . . The moment is all her care: she is interested in nothing by halves. The modulations of her voice half betray the secrets of a soul which, as Julie herself bears witness, are too intense and too delicate for her to dare entrust them to the treacherous interpretation of speech. 'How utterly words fail to convey what one really feels! The brain finds sounds, but the soul cries out for a new language.' . . . Tenderness alone evokes real confidence. . . . This is the real key: without it the finest qualities fail to reach her true self. It explains Julie's later criticism of Thomas. 'He is the most virtuous, the most sensible, even the most eloquent of men. His greatest fault is that he is incapable of stupidity. . . . Her standard for judging men is their feeling rather than conduct. Once more in Julie's own words: 'I estimate intentions as others value actions.'"

All this is finely said. And the result is that you cannot fail to be interested in the life of such a person even though you had never before heard of Julie de Lespinasse. For in reading a book on such lines you feel in touch with what Carlyle would call, the great sincerities of life, and they are always interesting, whether realised or not. Through all the famous career of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse the same broad strong view is apparent, and all the notable men and women whom she encountered are treated in the same masterly fashion. The book is a model of wise biography. The translation is on the whole good and clear; but it is marred by occasional lapses which should certainly be amended before the second edition is produced. It is pleasant to know that the excellence of the Marquis de Ségur's work is fully valued, as his recent election to the French Academy sufficiently proves.

Of a different nature is the second book before us. It is a chronicle of the Court of Napoleon III., as sumptuously produced as gossip about magnificent women should be. But gossip it confessedly is, accredited discreet gossip, exceedingly well written and interesting as gossip may be. To it Mr. Richard Whiteing writes a bright preface. He begins by pointing out that the book is profoundly significant with something of the interest of a great tragedy, and he has the following delightful sentence: "It is philosophy and memoir, Court gossip, and sad stories of the fate of kings, turn and turn about." He uses Shakespere's words almost as successfully as the country clergyman who finished a sermon with remarking, "A rose by any other name would smell exactly just the same." Bless thee, Bottom, one is inclined to murmur, how art thou translated!

But M. Loliée's preface and work are more reasonable and without that desperate brightness—of a salesman exhibiting wares. He has been untiring in his search for information and successful. Though he fully realises the difficulties and limitations which press hard on one who is writing about events and people still living and alive he is never overwhelmed by them. He knows that his work cannot by any means be final, and he sets about to make his account as fresh and sound as he is able. He takes full value of the few advantages of an immediate historian. The pageant of his persons defiles before you in all its magnificence. The Empress Eugénie, who set the fashion to the women of Europe, the Countess de Castiglione, Madame de Rutz, Laure de Rothschild, the Princess Mathilde, Countess le Hon and many others—all pass on their way, and the place of each in the procession is defined. As each passes too you learn something of her character and attainments: and in a discreet whisper stories are told of her doings.

It is curious that days lately gone seem often more remote than the distant past. Such is, however, the case. Their very nearness and similarity hide them more effectually than Time itself. The savour of death and old age has not left these people; it still clings to the rustling folds of their dresses. We remember them too well. And yet M. Loliée has put life into his record of them; and his book is as profoundly interesting as Mr. Whiteing avers. The translation is well done. Moreover it is illustrated with fifty-one photographs of the celebrities, superbly reproduced, three of which are in photogravure: and the paper and printing of the book is as excellent as are the illustrations. Everything has been done to realise the splendour of these women of the second empire: the production is in accordance with the proper fitness of things.

MODERN MYSTICISM AND MODERN THOUGHT

Studies in Mysticism and Certain Aspects of the Secret Tradition.
By A. E. WAITE. (Hodder & Stoughton, 10s. 6d. net.)

BETWEEN ancient and modern mysticism there is a profound difference in spirit. Ancient mysticism was generally a movement of enlightenment; modern mysticism is mainly a movement of reaction. Science is now become the transcendent and pacific force in the world, the force which liberates from prejudice and sectarianism the Jew, the Catholic, the Mohammedan and the Protestant, the Vedantist, the Buddhist and the Shintoist, and which reconciles and unites them in an aspiration to a high and common end. But until the Royal Society was founded, it was the pursuit of divine knowledge that bound together in one union the saintliest men of all creeds and ages and countries. It was mysticism which then set free the Jew and the Catholic from traditionalism, the Mohammedan and the Protestant from literalism, the Buddhist from agnosticism, and the Vedantist and the Shintoist from shamanism, and which enabled them to discover, under the diverse symbolism of their theologies, the principle of a universal religion. A genuine catholicity was, indeed, the note of ancient theosophy. The quietism of Chwang Tze, a Chinese sage of the third century B.C., and of Madame Guyon, the friend of Fénelon, the ecstasy of Jelál'uddín Rûmî, a Persian monk contemporary with St. Frances of Assisi, and of St. John of the Cross, the disciple of St. Theresa; these, and the asceticism of Indian and Christian hermits, were various manifestations of a single frame of mind. For the mystic there were but two real things in the universe, his own Spirit and the Divine Spirit from whom he had been parted, and back to whom he longed to turn. Between him and his desire there intervened his baser self with its egoism, sin and imperfectness, and the material world with its glittering misery and vain enchantments. Sometimes, in his struggle to escape from the trammels of the flesh, he set before himself the example of some beloved Master who had found out the way, and being now one with God, might be loved without idolatry. But he was never a theanthropist, like Blake, for whom there was nothing divine except man. Neither was he a pantheist. In ancient times it was the sceptic, unable to find God in his own soul and seeking Him in the sum of things, who was the pantheist. The mystic, and especially the mystic of the ascetic school, was inclined to go to the other extreme and to conceive the universe as a chaos of evil, undivine and unreal. The spirit of the world was his foe. She it was who threw her toils about his body and his soul, dazzling his senses, corrupting his heart and distracting his mind. So perverse and dangerous did she sometimes appear to him that it was only by ignoring her as a kind of illusion that he was able to save himself from becoming a Manichean.

The ancient mystic could not, like the modern man of science, study patiently and impassively the facts of nature, and trace in the seeming chaos a mysterious order, beauty and progression. He was, at best, in this matter, an impassioned philosopher inspired by the great thoughts that come from the heart. Amazed in a world almost as strange, sombre and unrecognisable as that in which the savage dwells, he guarded more carefully the light within in the absence of any light without. To him the external darkness was but the shadow cast by the brightness of God. It was the sense of his own sinfulness that troubled him most deeply. He was too sincere with himself to dismiss as an affair of relative and secondary significance, the inveterate and pervasive element of weakness in his nature. Rather than impair his idea of Divine Perfection he accepted all the limitations under which he laboured as things of man's making. He had yielded to temptation in the Garden of Eden; or he had fallen away from grace in heaven and had come down to earth to work out his salvation; or he was expiating the wrong that he had done in some earlier stage of worldly existence of which he had no remembrance. Inadequate as these simplifications of the mystery of evil may now seem, they were, at least, working hypotheses in the dark ages in which the ancient mystic lived. Indeed, as working hypotheses they have not yet lost all their efficacy. They excite in the soul, in diverse ways and diverse degrees, the feeling of sinfulness and the desire for spiritual regeneration which are part of the essence of genuine religion. In fine, they take into account just those matters of fact and experience overlooked in the sentimental philosophy of the Emersonian school which, in its various forms, is impoverishing the conscience of the English-speaking races at the present day. That philosophy of shoddy optimism and shallow feeling in which there are reflected the complacency and commonness of soul of a bourgeois people whose extreme vice is greed and whose extreme virtue is munificence, is, however, a stagnation rather than a retrogression. Probably it will not be displaced by a more profound view of life until the nature of the whole race is deepened in some great and perilous struggle and revolution. It is the mysticism of the opposite school which is, in our opinion, mainly a movement of reaction: the mysticism in which the ancient point of view in regard to the material universe and the mystery of evil is unwarrantably retained. For though the hypotheses on which the ancient point of view is based are still, to some extent, working hypotheses, yet to make full use of them an enlightened man must now stupefy himself in a manner undreamt of even in Pascal's philosophy. So much has been discovered since the last great movement of mysticism in the middle of the seventeenth century! The ultimate problems remain, but we can no longer honestly simplify them by regarding the world of nature as a thing of meaningless illusion, and the soul of man as the tarnished spirit of a fallen creature. The world of nature, we have learned, is a seat of Divine law and Divine purpose, and the soul of man, we suspect, is the enlarged and ennobled soul of an animal which has fought its way from a lower stage of existence to a higher cruelly, painfully, and slowly in accordance with the Divine law and the Divine purpose.

It is difficult, therefore, for the modern mystic who has acquired this new knowledge of the universe and of his place therein, to impute to himself the entire responsibility for all his imperfectness. Yet he cannot, without enfeebling his conscience, treat these imperfections as things which are ultimately of little consequence. He has more light from without than the ancient mystic and less light from within. The pageantry of the world of nature has become vividly sacramental to him: the sterner message of the Law is there written so plain that even the agnostic cannot help reading it. Few problems in ethics, for instance, are now insoluble when the question of individual conduct is studied in connection with its bearing upon the question of the future welfare of humanity. The law is established as a matter of science as well as a matter of conscience. But what of the Gospel of love? To believe in this the modern mystic must be animated with a faith as transcendent as that which inspired the men of the darker ages. Hence he is sometimes tempted to turn away from the modern movement of enlightenment and to isolate himself from his fellow men and cultivate the simple ignorance amid which the ancient mystics found a way to peace and blessedness. But what in ancient mysticism was simple ignorance becomes in modern mysticism sophisticated obscurantism. In the shadow of this obscurantism there springs up a rank and noisome growth of wild superstitions. These, in turn, provoke in men with minds of a narrow but sane order a further reaction in the direction of bleak and soulless philistinism; and between superstition on the one hand and philistinism on the other, little space is left for the religion of the spirit to develop in.

There would not, we think, be any antinomy between the principles of modern mysticism and the principles of modern thought, if all men of true piety would agree to regard the mystery of evil as a mystery. It is the theologians and the philosophers who do most harm to the cause of religion and the cause of science by attempting, in a vain extravagance of rationalism, to explain everything in earth and heaven. But in spite of the theologians the simple creed of Christ remains the clearest and most catholic of creeds. As Mr. A. E. Waite says, in one of his interesting studies in the history of the secret confraternities that retain somewhat of the traditions of ancient theosophy, the mystic does not need to travel to the East in search of knowledge. In the church of Christ the gospel of Divine love is blended with the gospel of human love in an indissoluble manner that makes Christianity, when the accretions of later theologies are removed, a religion of experience of incomparable depth and universal appeal. For our part, we believe, that as soon as the forces of the New Reformation grow strong enough to sweep away all obstruction, Christian mysticism in conjunction with modern science, will quicken the heart and mind of all the people of the earth, and lift them up, on a wave of common joy and hope, into a state of civilisation far higher than any which has yet existed. But we doubt whether the new reformation is founded on what is called the New Theology.

MORE OF THE DAWN

The Dawn in Britain. Vols. v. and vi. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. (Duckworth, 4s. 6d. net. each.)

WITH these two volumes "The Dawn in Britain" is brought to an end. The poem, which opens before the time of the sacking of Rome by the Gaulish king Brennus, comes down, in the last book, to the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. At this point is the natural and fitting conclusion to the story; the promise contained in the opening lines—to chant “new day-spring, in the Muses’ Isles, of Christ’s eternal kingdom”—has been fulfilled. The island is at peace after the final defeat of Boadicea by the Romans; Joseph of Arimathea has died after depositing the Holy Cup in the mere of Avalon; Christianity is spreading in Britain, owing largely to the conversion of the Roman knight Pudens and his marriage to a converted British maiden; and, what most connects the end with the beginning, King Caractacus, the last of the great successors of Brennus, has died, still heathen, in exile in Rome. Few fresh characters appear in these last volumes, which contain little that is new in kind, with the exception of a passage in which King Caractacus, in a fury reminiscent of that of Ajax, hews the forest trees with his sword, and the exquisite description of Pudens’s meeting with Rosmerla and their subsequent courtship and marriage. So ends the most remarkable poem of the century—in subject and in style as old as it is new, in form and in treatment as traditionally correct as it is unexpected—an epic poem in twenty-four books sprung up in these days of tinkling lyricism.

At the end there is a very terse prose note, in which the author speaks in a self-explanatory mood. All who have learned to love the poem must have turned to this note, as we did, with considerable curiosity and interest. The poets mentioned therein are but three in number—Homer, the father of European literature, Chaucer, “that admirable and estimable Author,” and Spenser, to whom alone the muses “revealed their own golden and intimate tongue . . . Yet, even in his brief lifetime, English speech began somewhat to decay: nor did the daughters of Mnemosyne make him free . . . of mediæval riming.” It is from this point in literary history that the “Dawn in Britain” starts. Its linguistic horizon, as the note goes on to say, “is nearly that of the days of Spenser.” Learning of no mean order is essential to the equipment of a poet. “It is idle to imagine that any man not a well-taught lover of his tongue can enter into the Garden of the Muses.” This and many other kinds of learning Mr. Doughty possesses to an almost prodigious extent. But that is surely not his claim to be called poet, or child of the Muses. True, a great originality and strength of character are manifested by his choice of theme. The subject is so remote and little known that a poem of heroic proportions composed thereon would seem at the first glance to be foredoomed to failure from its very obscurity and unsuitability. And if learning had been Mr. Doughty’s only or chief qualification, he might indeed have aroused our interest and excited our imagination, but he would not have been able to charm our senses or touch our hearts. Other men might perhaps be found with the necessary linguistic and antiquarian acquirements, but in the mere scholar such knowledge is not a vital source of art. Mr. Doughty has been able to produce noble poetry in so far as he has discovered in his material the symptoms of life, or rather, has found himself in his subject and communicated his own life to it. Thus, although the composition of the poem was in a sense a process of compilation, there is a real likeness between “The Dawn in Britain” and a primitive epos. For while research may confirm and explain what the poet describes, it is only the poet who, by imparting life to his subject, can call up a vivid picture of the times he treats of and make us realise to any valuable extent what life was then. And it is because Mr. Doughty has succeeded in doing so that we think him a great poet.

BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA

The Natives of British Central Africa. By A. WERNER.
(Constable, 6s. net.)

THIS volume is one of the series devoted to the study and description of “the Native Races of the British Empire,” and Mr. Northcote Thomas, the editor of the series, makes some caustic remarks in his preface about the neglect with which the British Government and the British public treat the ethnological questions of their own empire. He states that the ethnological collections in the Berlin Museum are ten times as numerous as those in the British Museum, and he seems to foresee the time when English anthropologists may have to go to Berlin for information about races which were once our subjects. The reproach may stir up our sluggish and somnolent authorities.

Miss A. Werner, who has made a special study of the races of the Shire valley, and the country round Lake Nyasa, contributes the first volume of what should be an interesting and instructive series. She groups her information under the heading of British Central Africa, but the races with which she deals are those whose present settlements are found within the narrower limits mentioned. To these people Nyasa is the lake or water par excellence, and Shire is the bank or shore which marked the limit of the influence and expeditions of the Bantu people. This race, scattered over the whole of Central Africa, has representatives to-day as far to the north-west as Nigeria and Kamerun. It is not a negritic race, belonging rather to the brown stock which reveals traces of Asiatic origin or intermixture. The connecting link between all the tribes and clans of this great family is language, and the different dialects due to the conquest by other races, or by intermarriage with them, repose on a foundation of Bantu. This language, and apparently all its ramifications, have one peculiarity in possessing no grammatical gender, the same pronoun standing for male and female. In illustration of this Miss Werner recalls the story of the interpreter who turned to the missionary and asked: “What you say when him son be girl?”

There is a very interesting account of the mysteries of initiation more or less common to all branches of the Bantu family in connection with the transition from boyhood or girlhood to the grown-up state. Miss Werner says that the only systematic teaching of any sort is that given at the “mysteries,” and as these cover for boys only a period of two months, and for girls one month, it would not appear as if much could be learnt in that time. The great feature of this ceremony is seclusion, and no one thinks of intruding in the spot reserved for the initiation of his pupils by the witch-doctor, or in the case of girls by “the cook of the mysteries.” Twigs of trees placed in a certain manner on the paths leading to the place of instruction warn the intruding native not to approach, and the notice is always heeded. It says much for the loyalty of the native or for the strong hold that the mysteries gain over his mind that in spite of many attempts no European has yet succeeded in obtaining any details as to what is taught, or as to the ceremony of initiation. One curious fact is that all the objects or implements used during the mysteries seem to be destroyed at their termination. There is less secrecy about the mysteries in the case of girls. They are instructed in their domestic duties which include house-building, and one of the ceremonies is for ten or a dozen girls to support the roof of a house, which is supposed to typify the fact that women are the prop of the home. The girls are anointed with oil and there is so much dancing in their initiation that the whole ceremony is commonly spoken of as “being danced.”

The proneness to mysticism and the extraordinary capacity of the natives to preserve silence explain the growth of secret societies in Central Africa of recent years. These are by no means confined to the Congo State. They are just as active and tending to increase on British territory. Among the Yaos in the Nyasa region one of the most active of these societies is specially given up to the practice of cannibalism. Up to the present there has been no indication that any of these secret associations on or outside British territory have political aims. They are probably the expiring effort of the fetich doctors to recover the ground lost through the operation of European laws.

Some of the most interesting passages in this work refer to the life of children among the Bantu races. The kindness and consideration shown to children form the redeeming point in the African character. Miss Werner saw a great deal of village life among the Yaos, and she declares that she never saw a child struck or ill-treated. She describes many pretty and touching instances of the happy existence of both boys and girls before they reach the "mystery" stage. At first when they saw a white face they ran away, and the village dogs barked in sympathy, but soon they recovered confidence, accompanying the European lady in her strolls with half a dozen of them trying to hold her hand at the same time. Miss Werner has undoubtedly put together a most interesting collection of ethnographical facts with regard to one of the British divisions of Africa, and if the other volumes of the series are as well done as this is we shall have a very complete survey of the anthropology of the whole British Empire.

THE LIBRARY TABLE

Raphael. Par LOUIS GILLET. (Paris: Librairie de l'Art Ancien et Moderne, 3fr. 50c.)

THE well-known series "Les Maitres de l'Art"—to which this volume forms the latest addition—is published under the patronage of the French Ministry of Fine Arts, and consequently has a semi-official character which demands a high standard to be maintained in the authorship. M. Louis Gillet proves a well-informed and very readable biographer of Raphael, and gives in the main a satisfactory resumé of the results of modern scientific research into the works of this master. It is to be regretted that his own critical judgments are less equal in merit, though many are shrewd and argued with acumen. If it seems extravagant to say that Héliodore and La Messe de Bolsène are works which Titian has not surpassed in colour, M. Gillet nevertheless does well to maintain that here Raphael's art attains its zenith, and that these are his first two works thought out as paintings. Turning from these to the earlier pictures, M. Gillet finely observes:

Au fond, il n'a pas encore entendu la couleur comme la matière de l'art de peindre: il s'en sert, jusqu' alors, comme d'un voile superficiel jeté sur le dessin.

Admirable again is his discriminating appreciation of the superb Ballhazar Castiglione at the Louvre, a portrait in which "the painter face to face with nature, forgets himself and makes himself forgotten; no more methods, no more principles, no more style. Velasquez alone, later, was to speak this supreme language." It is disappointing to find a critic, at times so discerning, following the crowd to sentimentalise over the Dresden Madonna: but his eulogy of this overrated work is a mere slip compared to the headlong fall entailed by an attempt to praise Raphael at the expense of his great contemporary.

Sans doute, un Michel-Ange a fait à la beauté abstraite plus de sacrifices que Raphael. Et pourtant, qui voudrait voir se lever et marcher ses Sibylles?

This rhetorical appeal to the Philistine is unworthy of a serious critic. As well might one seek to extol Greuze over Rembrandt by inquiring what young man would seek in marriage the Dutch master's old women.

Sir Edward Burne-Jones. Second Series. By ARSÈNE ALEXANDRE. (Newnes' Art Library, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE many admirers of Burne-Jones's art will welcome this second volume of reproductions, and few will be inclined to disagree with the distinguished French critic, who in his prefatory essay confidently predicts that "this second harvest will be found no whit inferior to the first." The frontispiece is an admirable photogravure after Vespertina Quies, that strange wistful portrait in which Burne-Jones seems haunted by the memory of Leonardo's Monna Lisa; and among the remaining forty-eight reproductions in the volume are the Pygmalion and Story of Orpheus series, Love Among the Ruins, Love Leading the Pilgrim, The Fall of Lucifer, the portraits of Dorothy Drew and Miss Gaskell, Clara von Bork, the Bath of Venus, and a representative group of his purely decorative illustrations. In his introduction M. Arsène Alexandre institutes an interesting comparison between Whistler and Burne-Jones, "between the artist who suggests and the artist who realises," and while giving to each his due the French critic opines that "some day or other the suggestion will grow weaker and will change, by reason of a diminished preparation or an increased resistance on the part of the spectator; and then the last word is with the artist who realises, even though he be no more than a good workman, while the suggestion, on the other hand, may be full of marvellous charm." Burne-Jones was so much more than "a good workman" that some readers may dispute the justice of the comparison and the conclusion deduced therefrom, but all will find M. Alexandre's arguments of interest and his criticisms stimulating to thought.

IN THE FOREST

THOUGH I have borne the brunt of 'battled spears
Unflinching; 'neath these boughs that writhe and twist,
My heart is as a wren's heart when she hears
The litch-owl calling through the evening mist;
And falters frail—a thing of fluttering fears—
Before some shadow-plumed antagonist.

Quaking, I ride; yet know not what I dread,
Naught stirs the boding silence save the sound
Of beechmast crackling 'neath my horse's tread,
Or some last leaf that rustles to the ground;
And long it seemeth since the sun, blood-red
In sea on sea of night-black boughs was drowned.

Yet dark has not yet fallen; wavering gloom
Sweeps through the brake, and brims each hollow dank;
Empty of light the stirless pinetrees loom
Against the glistering sky; and grey and lank
The shadows rise, as ghosts from out the tomb,
And, closing, follow at my horse's flank.

But them I fear not; nor the beasts that lurk
Beneath the cavernous branches, crouching low,
Whose famished eyes burn on me through the mirk;
Spell-bound they spring not; 'neath the cleaver's blow,
Their desperate fangs would snatch the blinded stirk
Yet quail before the doom to which I go—

The unknown, death-plumed horror that at last
From its old ambush in the heart of night,
Leagued with long-thwarted perils of the past,
Shall swoop upon me with unswerving flight.
Drink, while ye may, the light that fades so fast,
O eyes, that shall not see the morning light!

WILFORD WILSON GIBSON.

THE JADED INTELLECTUALS

A DIALOGUE

SCENE.—The smoking-room of the Elivas Club.

CHARACTERS: LAUDATOR TEMPOREYS, âgé 54, a distinguished literary critic, and LUKE CULLUS, a rich connoisseur of art and life. They are neither smoking nor drinking spirits. The former is sipping barley water, the latter Vichy.

Luke Cullus. You are a dreadful pessimist.

Laudator Temporeys. Alas! there is no such thing in these days. We are merely disappointed optimists. When Walter Pater died I did not realise that English literature had expired. The event excited hardly any remark in the Press. Our leading literary weekly merely mentioned that Brasenose College, Oxford, had lost an excellent Dean.

L.C. I can hardly understand you. Painting, I admit, is entirely a lost art, so far as England is concerned. The death of Burne-Jones brought our tradition to an end. I see no future for any of the arts except needlework, of which, I am told, there is a hopeful revival. But in your fields of literature, what a number of great names! How I envy you!

L.T. Who is there?

L.C. Well, to take the novelists first: you have the great Meredith, Thomas Hardy, Henry James, Rudyard Kipling, Maurice Hewlett . . . I can't remember the names of any others just at present. Then take the poets. The superb Swinburne, one of the great poets of all time; Austin Dobson, my own special favourite; and among the younger men, A. E. Housman, Laurence Housman, Yeats, Arthur Symonds, Francis Thomson, Laurence Binyon, William Watson—

L.T. (interrupting). Who always keeps one foot in Wordsworth's grave. But all the men you mention, my dear Cullus, belong to the last century. They have done their best work. Meredith has become mummy, and Henry James is sold in Balham. Except Hardy, they have become unintelligible. The theory that "to be intelligible is to be found out" seems to have frightened them. The books they issue are a series of "not at home" cards—sort of P.P.C.s on posterity. And the younger poets, too, belong to the last century, or they stand in the same relation to their immediate predecessors, to borrow one of your metaphors, as l'art nouveau does to Chippendale. Oh, for the days of Byron, Keats, and Shelley.

L.C. All of whom died before they were matured. You seem to resent development. In literature I am a mere dilettante. A fastidious reader, but not an expert. I know what I don't like, but I never know what I shall like. At least twice a year I come across a book which gives me much pleasure. As it comes from the lending library it is never quite new. That is an added charm. If it happens to have made a sensation, the sensation is all over by the time it reaches me. The books have matured. A quite new book is always a little crude. It suggests an evening paper. There at least you will agree. But to come across a book which Henry James published, say, last year, is, I assure you, like finding a Hubert Van Eyck in the Brompton Road.

L.T. I wish I could share your enthusiasm or that I could change places with you. Every year the personality of a new artist is revealed to you. I know you only pretend not to admire the modern school of painting. You find it a convenient pose. Your flora and your fauna are always receiving additions; while my garden is withered; my zoo is out of repair: the bars are broken; the tanks have run dry. There is hardly a trace of life except in the snake house, and, as I mentioned, the last giraffe is dead.

L.C. Our friend, Dr. Chalmers Mitchell, is fortunately able to give us a different account of the Institution in Regent's Park. You are quite wrong about modern painting. None of the younger men can paint at all. A few of them can draw, I admit. It is all they can do. The death of Charles Furse blasted all my hopes of English art. Whistler is dead; Sargent is an American.

L.T. Well, so is Henry James, if it comes to that. And so was Whistler. But I have seen the works of several young artists who I understand are carrying out the great traditions of painting, Ricketts, Shannon, Wilson Steer are worthy successors to Turner, Watts, and the Pre-Raphaelites.

L.C. They are merely connoisseurs gifted with expressing their appreciation of the past in paint. They appeal to you as a literary man. You like to detect in every stroke of their brushes an echo of the past. Their pictures have been heard not seen. All the younger artists are committing burglary on the old masters. Mr. Wertheimer's "Gainsborough" will be found in some Chelsea Studio. The "Reynolds" will one day be sent as a new picture to the Society of Portrait Painters. No one however will recognise it. The critics will say it is archaistic.

L.T. It is you who are a disappointed optimist.

L.C. Not about literature or the drama. I seem to hear with Ibsen's "Master Builder" the younger generation knocking at the door.

L.T. It comes in without knocking in my experience; and generally has fig leaves in its hair—a decided advance on the coiffure of Hedda Gabler's lover.

L.C. But look at Bernard Shaw.

L.T. Why should I look at Bernard Shaw? I read his plays and am more than ever convinced that he has gone on the wrong lines. His was the opportunity. He made il gran rifiuto. Some one said that George Saintsbury never got over the first night of Hernani. Shaw never recovered the première of Ghosts. He roofed our ruined Thespian temple with Irish slate. His disciples found English Drama solid brick and covered it with plaster of Paris. Yet Shaw might have been another Congreve.

L.C. Troja fuit. We do not want another. I am sure you have never been to the Court at all.

L.T. Oh, yes, I attended the last levée. But the drama is too large a subject, or in England, too small, a subject to discuss. We live, as Professor Mahaffy has reminded us, in an Alexandrian age. We are wounded with archæology and exquisite scholarship, and must drag our slow length along. . . . We were talking about literature. Where are the essayists, the Lambs, and the Hazlitts? I know you are going to say Andrew Lang. I say it every day; it is like an Amen in the Prayer Book; it occurs quite as frequently in periodical literature. He was my favourite essayist, during the last fifteen years of the last century. What is he now? An historian, a folklorist, an archæologist, a controversialist. I believe he is an expert on portraits of Mary Stuart. You were going on to say G. K. Chesterton—

L.C. No. I was going to say Max Beerbohm. Some of his essays I put beside Lamb's, and above Hazlitt's. He has style: but then I am prejudiced because he is the only modern artist I really admire. He is a superb draughtsman, and our only caricaturist. Then there is George Moore. I don't care much for his novels, but his essays are delightful. George Moore really counts. Few people know so little about art and yet how delightfully he writes about it. Everything comes to him as a surprise. He gives you the same sort of enjoyment as you would derive from hearing a nun preach on the sins of Smart Society.

L.T. Moore is one of many literary Acteons who have mistaken Diana for Aphrodite.

L.C. You mean he is a great dear; but he gets hold of the right end of the stick.

L.T. And he generally soils it. But you know nothing about literature. The age requires blood and Kipling gave it Condry's fluid (drinks barley water). The age requires life, and Moore gave us a gallant show of Montmartre (drinks barley water). Even I require life. To-morrow I am off to Aix.

L.C.—Les Bains?

L.T. No, la Chapelle!

L.C. Oh, then we shall probably meet. Thanks. I can get on my own overcoat. I shall probably be there myself in a few weeks.

ROBERT ROSS.

INSPIRED JOURNALISM

THE greatest misfortune that can overtake the man of real original genius, the creator, the artist, the poet is a too rapid and too universal appreciation. It should console many a conscientious but unintelligent artisan in the dusty ways of journalism to consider that as often as he has damned or failed to appreciate good work he has helped in the development of a talent. There is no spur like that of the contempt and dislike of the vulgar. Art like Nature is very cruel. To produce her best she requires suffering and injustice. Keats did not die of an attack in the Quarterly Review, on the contrary he produced his finest work in answer to the attack. He died of consumption and nothing else. Shelley must have known this, if he had stopped to consider the matter calmly, for he was himself a supreme instance of the splendid results produced on genius by mockery, hatred, calumny, stupidity, and sheer brutality. Nevertheless, he was right to say what he did in "Adonais" and in the perfect piece of noble prose which he prefixed to that perfect poem. He was right, because what he said was beautiful and fine, and because it was also the direct result of the noble rage and indignation that the attack produced in him. Is the author of the Quarterly attack therefore to be accounted twice blessed? By no means except in the sense that according to the Cainite heresy, the apostle Judas was blessed. "The Son of Man indeed goeth as it is written of Him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! Good were it for that man if he had never been born."

It is quite possible that if Byron had not been savagely, and in his case quite justifiably, attacked, in the Edinburgh Review when he published that unfortunate work, "Hours of Idleness," he would never have written his great masterpiece, "Don Juan." He would certainly have achieved greatness in some line, for he had the fire of greatness within him and sooner or later it must have blazed out. But his greatness would probably have taken some other form. He might have been a great statesman and orator, or more likely, for he possessed too much intellectual honesty to be a really successful politician, a great writer of prose. (Incidentally, of course he was a great writer of prose as his letters demonstrate.) What forced him to be a poet was precisely the attack made on his "Hours of Idleness." I might multiply instances, but they will occur readily to my readers. Indifference and neglect produce the same result on Genius as attack, only their effect is more slow and gradual and involves more suffering to their victim, whose torture finds expression in superb creative work just as in Monsieur Maurice Maeterlinck's book ("Life and Flowers." Translated by Teixeira de Mattos. Allen), the violets at Grasse yield their sweetness to "the infinitely varied tortures inflicted upon them to force them at length to surrender the treasure which they desperately hide in the depth of their corollas."

Monsieur Maeterlinck has genius, and he began by producing splendid works of art. But nobody attacked or neglected him. He did undoubtedly incur a certain amount of mockery from the English public when his first work became known in England. L'Intruse and Les Aveugles, in my opinion the best things he ever wrote, were laughed at and parodied in England, but they were almost immediately appreciated and acclaimed in Belgium and France, and England soon followed suit when she found that she had made a fool of herself (a not uncommon experience with her in matters of art and literature); and from the time when some sixteen years ago La Princesse Maleine was privately performed before the students of the University of Ghent, it may be said that, speaking broadly, Monsieur Maeterlinck has scarcely known what it is not to be enthusiastically praised. Under the scorching heat of this universal and often unintelligent praise the flower of his genius has slowly but surely drooped. It has never decayed or ceased to exist, but it has faded. When Monsieur Maeterlinck began to write about bees, and when he produced Le Trésor des Humbles and La Sagesse et la Destinée he abandoned his first manner and the peculiar style which he had used with such beautiful results in L'Intruse, Les Aveugles, Les Sept Princesses, Intérieur, and La Mort de Tintagiles. The inevitable result of the continual appreciation he had received began to manifest itself, and he began to write journalism. It is inspired journalism if you will, but it is journalism in this that it makes a deliberate concession to popular taste. In the present volume Monsieur Maeterlinck discourses beautifully and learnedly on "Immortality," "Our Anxious Morality," "Perfumes," and "Flowers." Most of the pieces contained in the book have appeared, a significant fact, in the Fortnightly Review, Harper's Magazine, the Atlantic Monthly, the New York Critic, the International Quarterly, and the Daily Mail. A great original creative genius should not write newspaper or magazine articles for translation into other languages; it savours of pot-boiling. His essay on the intelligence of flowers is a polished piece of symmetrical and finished prose; it contains much knowledge and is full of ideas and words that suggest ideas, but it is not what one requires and expects from Maeterlinck. Again, Monsieur Maeterlinck writes "In Praise of the Fist." He does it very well, but the thing has already been done (by Sandow and others) and the result is rather distressing. The same effect is produced when he writes about motor-cars; there are so many people who can write about motor-cars, that though I quite admit that Monsieur Maeterlinck does it extremely well, it seems wasteful and wicked that he should squander his genius on such a subject. Of course I shall be told that "any and every subject is proper to art" and all the rest; and I admit that theoretically there is no reason why Monsieur Maeterlinck should not write about motor-cars and boxing contests and beautify them with his art. He does beautify them, in fact he puts more beauty into them than they can carry, and the result is, to me at any rate, frankly irritating. Somebody ought to make such an attack on Monsieur Maeterlinck as would drive him in self-defence into his own natural language, the language of delicate suggestion and mystery and imaginative horror. The Daily Mail and Harper's and the New York Critic can find plenty of people to write "high-class literary matter" for their readers without employing and spoiling a great original genius like Monsieur Maeterlinck.

A. D.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE MYSTERY OF THE CHEAP CLASSICS

WHERE do all the cheap reprints go? Apparently the public buy them, else, you may be sure, the publishers would not continue to issue them. Not that the publishers care where they go, so long as they go. But, all the same, the publishers are undoubtedly entitled to the credit of discovering that the public will buy thousands upon thousands of copies of Gibbons's "Decline and Fall," White's "Selborne," Sir Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici," Carlyle's "French Revolution," and hundreds of other books embraced reverently under the name of "classics." Publishers are a courageous race—all gamblers are. But they do not venture their money except upon a measure of probability, and it remains a mystery how in the name of commercial probability (not to speak of the character of the English people) they found out that the public would buy in enormous quantities the great books of the world even at a shilling a volume. But certain it is that they discovered this amazing fact, and are taking advantage of it with extraordinary energy. It is apparent that they are enjoying a good reward—money, that is, otherwise the supply would cease. For the publisher is so constituted that if the reprinting of classics does not pay, the classics must lie and rot, or fructify painfully in the minds of professors and critics.

But again, what is the destiny of these hoards of cheap reprints? If they are being read with the same eagerness as they are bought we shall very soon see a great change in the mental constitution of the British public. Some change ought to be visible already on this supposition. Can it be that the result of the last Parliamentary General Election is the first outcome of Shilling Classics? This is not a political journal otherwise we might go far with this theory, which affords quite as good an argumentative basis as many theories in those famous classics. If the iron puddler has really taken to reading Macaulay's "England" and Carlyle's "Cromwell" o' nights, while the ironmaster continues as before to buy motor-cars and ancient masters, then truly marvellous things are awaiting us. A big book for the year 2007 will be "The Influence of Cheap Classics on the British Empire." But, as we said above, this is not a political journal, and we desist from the pursuit of this fascinating theory.

Another reason for desisting is that we do not believe it ourselves. The iron-puddler is not reading Grote's "Greece" in shilling volumes; we doubt if he is buying any more copies of the "Pilgrim's Progress" than he did before. And further we do not believe that the members of the Stock Exchange are reading those books at a shilling a volume which they have hitherto neglected, to their great business advantage, at five shillings. Somehow literature is no more a popular, or even possible, subject in dining- or drawing-rooms than it was before those thousands upon thousands of volumes of great works were swallowed up by society. And that is surely an astonishing consideration. For that society is swallowing them is past doubt. You may confidently put your faith in the publishers for the truth of that fact. When the public cease swallowing the publishers may be trusted to stop producing. But whether society is absorbing them is another matter.

The other week in a journal written ostensibly for women, but containing nothing which a man might not read, we observed a statement to the effect that nothing is more decorative in a room—which room we forget—than a hanging bookcase of two shelves filled with books. Fumed-oak was recommended as a good material for the case, while for the books it was added that the various series of cheap reprints offered an inexpensive way of completing the effect. Certainly the amount of gilt bestowed on the back of these shilling books is wonderful for the money. And for all we know the effect of a row of them bounded by fumed-oak may be decorative. But can this be the destination of "Everyman in the World's Universal Classics?" Poets have wished, or have said in verse that they wished, to be the rose in a maiden's hair or the zone that clasps her waist, but they certainly did not write great poems to "decorate" a boudoir, even in days before oak was fumed. . . . No, no; "decoration" may account for a thousand or two copies of the world's classics, but there must be other destinies for the great bulk.

Perhaps the element of cheapness in itself accounts for a great many. For the world is full of people that cannot resist purchasing a thing that is cheap, or, rather, low-priced, although they do not need it. In a corner of a railway-carriage the other day sat a man reading an obviously cheap classic. A friend opposite with nothing to read remarked, "I see you are deep in the 'Pickwick Papers'?" The other assented. "Great book, isn't it," continued the friend; "I've read it through three times." "Yes," was the answer, while the gilt back was displayed, "it is a wonderful shilling's-worth. I never thought of reading it before." There is a deep philosophy in that reply, but it does not cover the whole ground. This man's purchasing-point was one shilling, and it was also his reading-point. You can also buy Finlay's "History of the Byzantine Empire" for a shilling, beautifully gilded, but we doubt if many would read it even at a penny. Grote, Gibbon and Finlay, we think, must be exclusively decorative.

Another possibility is that there are persons who buy, for example, every edition—cheap edition we mean—of "Sartor Resartus." We know a man who possesses seven cheap editions of Shakespeare, but when asked in which play the line, "Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight," were to be found, could not tell but thought it might be Macbeth. But what man in England buys two copies of Burns's Poems? Two copies of Burns are not more intelligible than one.

Clearly, as we proceed, the more we assume intelligence in the purchase of these cheap libraries the more profound becomes the puzzle of their enormous sale. If we could believe that the mass of thought, imagination, and all the beautiful humanities they represent were being mentally absorbed by the British Public we should rejoice, even although we were convinced that the reading-point could not be raised above one shilling. Even at that figure it would be an impressive thought that one thousand people, say, on any evening in this present week were reading Grote's "History of Greece," and being tempted on thereby to MacCarthy's "History of our own Times." But we know it is not so.

Perhaps the secret of the whole business is to be found in the Board of Trade Returns of British Commerce. Unless we read the signs of the times wrongly, and despise the advice of every statesman, and other thoughtful persons, the Board of Trade Returns explain everything if properly interpreted. Obviously out of those thousand million pounds sterling worth of trade the purchase of a few hundred thousand shilling copies of Finlay's "History of the Byzantine Empire" is a mere fleabite. But then again must not the British people be too busy with their trade to read Finlay? After the necessary leisure for a round at golf or gazing at a football match Finlay is no fun. Away with the Board of Trade Returns; they are as dark oracles on this matter as they are on trade.

As a last resort we might ask a publisher. Thinking of it, could there be a more beautiful and appropriate subject of conversation with a publisher than the inquiry, Who buys all those thousands upon thousands of your elegant "Everyman's Universal World's Classics" at one shilling net? An intellectual publisher might be able to throw great light on this terribly obscure problem. But an ordinary publisher, a thoroughly wide-awake business-like publisher, would probably answer, The Public. Which reply merely brings us round to the proposition with which we started out. That the public buys them we know, but whether they read them, perhaps even the Times Book Club could not tell.

ADAM LORIMER.

FICTION

The Barony of Brendon. By E. H. LACON WATSON. (Brown, Langham, 6s.)

THE risk of matrimonial shipwreck is always implied when couples wed at unequal ages, and the remark applies both to the marriages of fiction and to those of actual life. There are many things that fight against the perfect blending of May and December; there is the clash of opposing interests, the desire for repose, on the one hand, conflicting with a youthful eagerness to pursue a butterfly existence on the other. We admit that the disparity between the ages of Erasmus Scholes and Lorna Denison was not so alarming; but the chances of disaster were increased by the difference of their temperaments, Scholes being a sober, slovenly, retiring man of letters, a writer on philosophical subjects, and Lorna a rather thoughtless, pleasure-loving creature. After one tense experience, however, their barque safely enters the desired haven, and their alliance receives its complete justification. The characters are finely drawn throughout. T. K. Rattigan is especially good. The young electrical engineer, with his absorption in works of science and his fervent admiration for his friend Scholes's intellectual attainments, belongs to a type which is being produced in somewhat limited quantities by our board-schools and polytechnics. We have left mention of the Brendon barony to the last. After all, it does not matter much, although Scholes's right to assume the title doubtless had its influence on Lorna's mind when she consented to marry him. Mr. Lacon Watson writes with cultured ease; he has the patrician outlook and the urbane manner.

Her Highness's Secretary. By CARLTON DAWE. (Nash, 6s.)

It is often instructive deliberately to test the rank and file of one of the many regiments of fiction by the touchstone of the more distinguished examples of their kind. Take the "Ruritanian" model, for instance—that modern crack light-cavalry corps in the romantic division. The brilliant qualities necessary to ensure its highest effectiveness are frequently overlooked. But they become apparent at once by setting such a tale as "The Prisoner of Zenda," with its vivid elegance and class, opposite the less happy "Sophy of Kravonia," written, one would think, when Mr. Anthony Hope was for the moment out of the vein. Pleasant and readable as it is the latter story barely qualifies for commissioned rank in the corps which the other deserves to lead, yet compare it again with the book before us, and it is a seasoned captain to an honest full private. To begin with, there is no mystery whatever about Mr. Carlton Dawe's "Romance." The so-much-to-be-commiserated secretary is bound to fall in love with the beautiful, harassed princess upon whom he is, through force of circumstances, compelled to spy in the interests of la haute politique. That is to say, the tale relies for its interest upon its characterisation and upon the excitement to be struck from the clash of wits and wills between the diplomatic and military factions in the Grand Duchy of Stressen. Unfortunately the characterisation is hardly worthy of the name. The men, indeed, do not lack definition. Moltani, the Regent, has his shoulder-shrug and his cynicism, the Duke of Brelitz his ferocity, Prince Victor his arrogance, but they are all stereotyped, and even Princess Irma's beauty and charm have to be taken on trust. The preliminary skirmishes, too, are sluggish and unaided by any distinction of style, so that it is a relief to find the hero and the heroine goaded at last by the exigencies of a desperate situation into really stirring action. The episode of the engine, the railway-bridge, and the river is certainly not wanting in imagination, while the final anti-climax, if slightly disappointing, is both daring and alas for love's young dream!—only too consistent with probability.

The Evolution of Katherine. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

LIFE? Human Nature? Character? By Heaven, no! Here you have no spark. The flint does not strike steel, and there is a wanting for events; the fuse is not baptised with fire. A glance—swift, keen—dazzling light, piercing a chink into darkness? A glance, a glimpse through the chink of a door? By Heaven, no! A Woman? No! By Heaven, again! You see here into the inmost of a man. He thinks he understands woman. Does he? You shall see. You see here a glimpse of the self-sufficient, pen splashing paper as a paddle splashes water, ink flying wildly as a bat flies in the daylight. Here, then, you see, as the picture grows and the colours are not mated, the difference between a rag doll and a woman. Gross exaggeration? But, one moment! Put it to the test. Judge by results. You will find that there is something in it after all. . . . As Mr. Thurston somewhere says: "You see in this, as with a sudden light in darkness, the spark of impulse striking from the flint, igniting the tinder of revolt"; and we hasten to assure our readers that we are not so clever as the foregoing sentences would seem to suggest. The tinder of revolt has been ignited, and we have tried the effect of applying Mr. Thurston's manner and matter to the criticism of his book. It is not pleasing; but it is as pleasing as Mr. Thurston's attempt to paint men and women in this medium. Comment is almost superfluous. We advise Mr. Thurston to learn English; some of his sentences would disgrace the journalist who reported that "in the early hours of the morning a man fell out of the window and broke its thigh." We advise our author, too, to observe life. Men and women do not speak and think as Mr. Thurston writes. Of the evolution of Katherine we see nothing; what we see of the evolution of Mr. Thurston does not inspire us with any confidence as to his future. His characters bear much the same relation to life as do the emerald woods in a penny shooting-gallery.

Under the Pompadour. By E. W. JENNINGS. (Unwin, 6s.)

A STORY told in the first person is hampered by the restricted point of view involved, the impossibility of relating all things as they happen, and the modesty which prevents the hero from eulogising himself. Apart from these drawbacks Mr. Jennings has written a readable story of life in the middle of the eighteenth century, both in England and France. There are plots and counter-plots, political and personal, and although the hero, to judge by his own narration, was the most innocent idiot that ever acted cat's-paw to a lovely woman, and played cup-and-ball with kingdoms without an inkling of it, the reader finishes the book with a distinct liking for him. The heroine is quite out of the common, and very charming, and the love-affair is wisely subdued, as Mr. Jennings is not convincing in this direction. He has a real gift for phrases, if he restrains it; but his sentences are sometimes woefully long.

The Hill of Dreams. By ARTHUR MACHEN. (E. Grant Richards, 6s.)

THERE is something sinister in the beauty of Mr. Machen's book. It is like some strangely shaped orchid, the colour of which is fierce and terrible, and its perfume is haunting to suffocation by reason of its intolerable sweetness. The cruelty of the book is more savage than any of the cruelty which the book describes. Lucian shuddered at the boys who were deliberately hanging an ungainly puppy; he had thrashed the little ruffian who kicked the sick cat, before he wrapped himself away from the contact of such infamy in the shelter of his own imaginings. For in the Hill of Dreams you seem to be shown a lovely sensitive boy who has fashioned himself a white palace of beauty in his own mind. He has had time only to realise its full beauty when disease lays its cold touch upon him, and gathers him into her grip until he lies decaying and horrible, seeing his own decay and seeing that his decay makes the white palace foul. The boys did not chant songs as they looped the string round the neck of the uncouth puppy. Mr. Machen fashions prose out of the writhings of Lucian, who is dear to him: and his prose has the rhythmic beat of some dreadful Oriental instrument, insistent, monotonous, haunting; and still the soft tone of one careful flute sounds on, and keeps the nerves alive to the slow and growing pain of the rhythmic beat. Lucian in ecstasy of worship for the young girl whose lips had given him a new life, pressed his body against sharp thorns until the white flesh of his body was red with drops of blood. That, too, is the spirit of the book. It is like some dreadful liturgy of self-inflicted pain, set to measured music: and the cadence of that music becomes intolerable by its suave phrasing and perfect modulation. The last long chapter with its recurring themes is a masterpiece of prose, and in its way unique.

A Rock in the Baltic. By ROBERT BARR. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

THIS is a commonplace book written in a commonplace way about commonplace people. There is a naval lieutenant, who has committed the foolishness of firing at a Russian rock, which is really a fort. He meets the heroine on the first page, and the heroine has just come into fifteen million dollars. They are set on a dreary round of adventures, and on the last page she is shown leaning her head trustfully on his broad shoulder. The scene changes frequently during the course of the story; but there clings to the story continually a stuffy, vulgar atmosphere that somehow suggests the inside of a motor-omnibus on a wet day.

White Fang. By JACK LONDON. (Methuen, 6s.)

IN spite of the fluency which is apparent in Jack London's writing, he has put a strange atmosphere of life into his story of the wolf-dog, White Fang, and the story in consequence has an interest of his own. He knows his business as well as he knows his public, and he knows both thoroughly. He can make a readable story against any living man. He would invent a story about a carrot as quickly as a man could wittle it into the shape of a face. And there is quality in his work. That comes from the immense pleasure which he takes in telling his tale. It is as apparent as his fluency, and is infectious. White Fang's adventures are ingeniously varied. He mounts the ladder, as it were, of civilisation. He is the son of a bitch by a wolf; he becomes a Red Indian's dog of all work; is sold by the Indian to a lunatic half-breed, who makes him savage and trains him as a fighter, until he is saved from the jaws of a bull-dog by a white man, who tames him by love. White Fang in turn saves his master's life from a desperate, escaped robber, and the book ends happily with the hero licking the nose of his puppy, for he has won the love of the house-collie. It is a capital story, marred a little by the brutality of detail given in the fight with the bull-dog.

The Undertow. By ROBERT KNOWLES. (Anderson & Ferrier, 6s.)

THIS novel belongs to the robust school of sentiment and humour blended with religious feeling that Ralph Connor has made popular on both sides of the Atlantic. Mr. Knowles has an admirable style of his own, simple, dignified, sincere, his sketches of a Scots community in Canada are delightful, and we rarely come across so interesting a household as that of the Wisharts. The story is worth reading for the fine portraiture of Robert Wishart alone; he is the soul of the book, though not the most prominent character. It is for Stephen, his second son, bred for the ministry, a lad of brilliant parts and weak moral fibre, that our sympathies are demanded. His impartial heart sways him with equal force towards good or evil with uncomfortable consequences to himself, and to those who love him best. The author handles Stephen's temptations and struggles with skill and tenderness, but we grudge some of the chapters devoted to his wanderings from grace, while so many more attractive people and their doings are shunted aside. "The Undertow" is a good novel, and a pleasant one, in every respect worthy of the author of "St. Cuthbert of the West."

In the House of the Eye. By W. A. MACKENZIE. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

IN the calm world of "The Grove," Highgate, in a house with a huge transparent eye fixed into the fanlight,

Owen Mannering was murdered with every circumstance of mystery. Very cleverly the author leads us off hot-foot upon a variety of false clues elaborately worked up, everything fitting in up to the latest possible moment. At least half a dozen people might have committed the crime, from Mannering's own daughter to the white nun hidden in the old oak chest. If the reader can refrain from a glance at the end of the volume he will be rewarded by a succession of exciting incidents culminating in a startling sensation. The criminal is the last person he will suspect, and the motive adduced is as strange and unlooked for as the confession itself. The tale is unusually well told, and abounds in ingenious inventions, keeping the reader on tenterhooks of curiosity; even leaving a tantalising doubt whether after all the real murderer is found.

DRAMA

MR. VACHELL'S COMEDY AT THE PLAYHOUSE

AS I walked down Northumberland Avenue last Tuesday after an afternoon spent in watching the first performance of Her Son at Mr. Maude's ingratiatingly comfortable Playhouse, the little girl's prayer kept beating through my heart: "Oh God, please make me pure, quite pure, absolutely pure like Cadbury's Cocoa." The play is so unconscionably noble in sentiment that you must needs try to forget somehow the play's violations of common sense and human nature. It is as though Mr. Vachell had sought out from the highest type of parlour fiction all the most sentimentally moving characters and moments, and had woven them together, rather deftly too, into a play. His comedy is the most genteel melodrama imaginable. There is never a "ha ha" and the villain's villainy evokes not a single hiss. Besides, there is no pit at the Playhouse.

Richard Gascoyne is beloved by two women. Poor fellow, it was not his fault. Crystal Wride nursed him back to life: and was not a lady. She was a bad woman with brains, an adventuress, an actress, who was actually keen on her profession. Of course when she learns that he is going to marry Dorothy Fairfax, she does not submit. She goes to that lady, who is good and stupid, and makes her promise not to see or write to Richard for a year. And Richard goes to Africa: is taken prisoner by the natives and does not come back for eight years. Many things have happened. Crystal has had a baby, and Dorothy has changed her name to Mrs. Armin to adopt it. No one knows anything of what has happened to the others, and of course each thinks the other faithless or dead or married, whereas all are really staunch and true. Except poor Richard.

He must have regretted the playful Africans many times after that eventful day when they all meet on the sands at Bournemouth. Painful Richard is no sooner out of one muddle than he finds himself deep in another. And all the time he is trying his very best to be noble. He kneels to one, and apologises to the other, and wants the little boy to say his prayers at his knee. But it is no good. He is hopelessly outplayed in nobility, scored off, in fact, on every side, as a man in the realm of pure sentiment indubitably should be.

Mr. Cyril Maude played Richard Gascoyne with convincing pathos. The scene in the second act where he strikes up a friendship with his little son on the beach he made really charming. He put a note of gay bravery into his performance of poor Richard, which was very suitable and pleasant. Miss Winitred Emery played the "rowdy kind of little woman" as well as the part could have been played. Many of the effects she gained were simple and delightful. Strangely enough Miss Wynne Matthison took the part of Crystal Wride. She struggled courageously with that impossible adventuress: but the part is beyond the reach of interpretation. It was amazing that Miss Wynne Matthison should have been able to clothe it with as much semblance of reality as she did. The company included Miss Florence Haydon, who was admirable in a small character-study, and Mr. Alfred Bishop, as an old gentleman who is put into his proper place immediately he dares to make a suggestion bordering upon common sense.

Certainly no one who has a palate for sentiment should miss these matinées of Her Son. Never probably has a better company been engaged to present such a noble piece, so pure, so unadulterated by anything approaching to human nature, which is well known to be base and contaminating.

H. DE S.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. FROWDE is about to publish for the Royal Society of Literature Coleridge's "Christabel," illustrated by a facsimile of the manuscript, and by textual and other notes by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge. A pastel drawing of the poet forms the frontispiece of the volume.

A work on "The Bulgarian Exarchate" translated from the German of Herr Richard von Mach will be published on March 18 by Mr. Unwin. This account of the history and present position of the Bulgarian Church in Turkey should be of interest to people who study the Balkan question, since it throws light on several problems in the politics of the Near East. The Secretary of State for India has just appointed Mr. T. Fisher Unwin agent for the sale of the publications of the Indian Governments. It is perhaps not widely known that these publications include a variety of books in Indian history and archaeology, art and architecture, botany and forestry; grammars of the various Indian languages—Dafli, Kurukh, Lepcha, Lais, etc.; and the valuable series of Maps of the Indian Ordnance Survey.

"Doctor Gordon," a new novel by Mrs. Wilkins-Freeman—better known as Mary E. Wilkins—will be published on March 18 by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. Doctor Gordon, of Alton, New Jersey, the hero of the story, is a man of mystery, even to the villagers and farmers among whom he lives. The book is full of weird incidents and unexpected complications; its ending is tragic, but humour and kindly satire abound; and much of the interest depends on a curiously uncommon and delicately told love-story.

Mr. Thomas W. Lawson has with Mr. Heinemann a novel in the press entitled "Friday, the 13th." His "Frenzied Finance" caused the last great panic on the New York Exchange, and he claims for this novel that it will end stock gambling in Wall Street.

In "The Invader," a novel which Mr. Heinemann is to publish, Mrs. Woods the author of "A Village Tragedy," has broken new ground and deals with a psychological subject. The very interesting problems as they touch human lives are treated by her with seriousness as they affect the heroine, but a strong vein of fantasy runs through the book.

Under the title of "Pen, Patron and Public," Messrs. Greening are publishing a book which deals with journalism and literary life behind the scenes, and records the unpublished history of several great newspapers, both London and provincial.

Admirers of Zola's work will welcome the publication by Messrs. Greening, in their Lotus Library, of "Drink," an English version of "L'Assommoir" which many readers of Zola consider his most powerful book. The book is very attractively produced, and is of a size convenient for carrying in the pocket. Among the new novels in Messrs. Greening's list are "The Mascotte of Park Lane," by prolific Lucas Cleeve; "The Gold Worshippers," by Harris Burland; "For this Cause," by George Irving; and "Dinevah the Beautiful," by Elliott O'Donnell.

"The Love Letters of King Henry VIII. to Queen Anne Boleyn" will be published shortly by Mr. Francis Griffiths. They have been edited by Mr. Ladbroke Black from the Harleian Miscellany, and Mr. Black has also written an Introduction on "The Royal Lover."—"The Dickens Concordance," by Mary Williams, which has been promised for a long time, is at length to make its appearance. It contains a complete list of the characters and places mentioned in the works of Charles Dickens, and also a full alphabetical list. It will be published shortly by Mr. Francis Griffiths.

Mr. John Long will shortly publish "The Man with the Amber Eyes," by Florence Warden. Miss Florence Warden's invariable object is to interest and amuse her public, and not to teach or to bore them. In "The Man with the Amber Eyes" there is a mystifying plot which the most experienced must fail to pierce, and the numerous characters are well and truly drawn.

During the month of April Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will issue several novels by well-known writers, including "The Flying Cloud," a complete romance by Morley Roberts; "Needles and Pins," a sequel to "If I were King," by Justin Huntly McCarthy; "The Strongest of All Things," by Madame Albanesi; and "Colonel Dameron," by Percy White. Mr. W. W. Jacobs' new volume "Short Cruises" will appear early in April.

Messrs. Methuen announce the publication of a new book by the author of "Stephen Remarx," the Hon. and Rev. James Adderley. It is entitled "Behold the Days Come: a Fancy in Christian Politics," and is an attempt to give expression to the feelings of Christian Socialists. It contends equally against official Liberalism and contented Toryism.—The same publishers also announce the publication of Mr. Ronald MacDonald's new novel "A Human Trinity," which is a story of the intrinsic unity of father, mother, and child—of the bond, spiritual as well as natural, amongst them, apart even from the ties of custom.

In "The Churchman's Treasury of Song," which Messrs. Methuen are also publishing, the Rev. J. H. Burn has brought together a large and varied anthology gathered from a wide range of devotional poetry.

CORRESPONDENCE

CAUSERIE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—I venture to suggest that we have an exact English equivalent for "Causerie" in "A Talk" which conveys the conversational tone required and is often a monologue. When the headmaster tells one of his pupils he wants a talk with him we may be sure it will be one-sided. The readers of the ACADEMY however obtain amusement as well as instruction when a "Literary talk" is signed Jane Barlow. This lady truly says that to borrow a word from a neighbour is not included in the anti-borrowing missions of Polonius but why borrow, when we have the word we want in our vocabulary?

H. D. BARCLAY.

INSCRIPTIONS IN MEDIÆVAL LATIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Of course I am aware that mediæval Latin does not conform to classical standards: but I cannot think that any mediæval scribe would write, e.g., oc opus or fontes aquarium. And I hope that Mr. Hamilton Jackson will not take it amiss if I adhere to the opinion that a revision of these inscriptions is advisable whether he himself or Schultz be responsible for the copies. Such a revision would remove a small blemish in a brilliant book.

THE WRITER OF THE REVIEW.

March 11.

"THE GATES OF PARADISE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I constantly read in modern books and reviews of Italian Art a much reiterated phrase, which is attributed by writers to Vasari, and used by him to describe the beautiful doors of the Baptistery, of S. Giovanni in Florence by Lorenzo Ghiberti. Vasari relates that Michel-Angelo called them "fit to be the Gates of Paradise."

Some years before Vasari wrote (1511–1574) this expression can be found at p. 239 of the early edition of Benvenuto Cellini's autobiography, who reports it to be used in praise of his own handiwork by Francis I., his patron (1545 A.D.).

It stands in the original as follows:

"Io credo certamente che se il Paradiso avesse ad avere porte—piu bella di questa non sarebbe giammai."

Doubtless these fulsome words originated with Cellini, and were fresh in the mind of Vasari, when he probably unconsciously appropriated them.

WILLIAM MERCER.

March 11.

BRAKES OF ICE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am surprised that a critic of Mr. Cunningham's moderation has allowed himself to be led astray by ingenious parallels which show on his part much learning and research. If such passages however afford no help to the explanation of a crux like "Brakes of Ice" all the ingenuity expended in hunting them up is wasted. Through two columns of your valuable paper the argument runs and its crown is such a passage as

"Some furr'd on backs of Vice, and answer none"; which I venture to think the veriest tyro among Hindoo Baboos struggling with the intricacies of our tongue would blush to own. What does Mr. Cunningham's emendation mean? Is it not confusion worse confounded? Are we to take "furr'd" as the past tense and predicate to "some," or is it merely a participle qualifying "backs"? If the latter, where is the predicate to "backs." Mr. Cunningham airily remarks that the substantive verb is omitted but carefully refrains from telling us what the missing word is.

He states further that "brake" was pronounced by Shakespeare as we pronounce "bracken." Where does he obtain such information? A reference to Ellis, Victor or Sweet will I think show him that "a" was then sounded like "a" in "father" and not as the diphthong which we now use.

I submit that this passage is not a crux and much less is it intractable; "brakes" are surely bits, curbs, or restraints and "ice" is simply "cold chastity." The passage therefore simply means:

Some throw aside all restraints of chastity and are not called to any account, whilst some are condemned for a single fault.

The use of "ice," "snow" and "cold" as indicating chastity and continence is one of the commonest similes in Shakespeare, witness:

He hath bought a pair of cast lips of Diana; a nun of winter's sisterhood kisses not more religiously; the very ice of chastity is in them,

As You Like It, iii. 4, 16-19.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny.

Hamlet, iii. 1, 140, 141.

Chaste as the icicle
That's cardied by the frost from purest snow
And hangs on Dian's temple.

Coriolanus, v. 3, 65-67.

These boys are boys of ice, they'll none have her.
All's Well, ii. 3, 99, 100.

His urine is congealed ice; [of Angelo]
Measure, iii. 2, 118.

As chaste as unsunn'd snow,
Cymb. ii. 5, 13.

Whose blush doth thaw the consecrated snow
That lies on Dian's lap!
Timon, iv. 3, 386, 387.

Lord Angelo; a man whose blood
Is very snow-broth.
Measure, i. 5, 57, 58.

She sent him away as cold as a snowball.
Pericles, iv. 6, 148, 149.

Snowballs for pills to cool the reins.
Merry Wives, iii. 5, 24.

Cold nymphs chaste crowns.
Tempest, iv. 1, 66.

Cold, cold, my girl! Even like thy chastity.
Othello, v. 2, 275, 276.

And compare Lear iv. 6, 120, 121.

Surely the colossal failures of commentaries like those of Zachary Jackson, Bailey, Lord Chedworth, Kinnear and Bulloch based upon misleading and far-fetched parallels should have warned Mr. Cunningham of the danger of his line of argument. What we know of Shakespeare misprints where Quarto and Folio copies have come down to us clearly shows that the solution of most cruxes is not a forced, far-fetched or crabbed passage like this of Mr. Cunningham but a plain and simple expression as most of Shakespeare's are. In many cases passages have been put down as cruxes owing to the inability of critics to see what was staring them plainly in the face and I submit that the passage in question is one of them.

FRANCIS JOHN PAYNE.

SHELLEY AND HIS PUBLISHER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—After reading Mr. Andrew Lang's article and Mr. Haswell's remarks on the disputed stanza in the "Revolt of Islam," I cannot help thinking that, after all, the publisher, and not the poet, was in the right. To me it seems that what Shelley really meant to say in this passage was that Love was the solace of man's meditations, during which his ideas of truth, justice and pleasure became purified and exalted; and that so Mr. Ollier viewed the matter, preferring in this instance to leave the ungrammatical "can" when he altered "those" to "thou"; thus putting "justice, or truth or joy" in opposition to "calm." If to the verses thus amended we add Rossetti's substitution of "heart" and "man" for "hearts" and "men"—which of course Shelley never intended—the stanza at any rate becomes no longer "an impenetrable jungle" as Mr. Lang describes it, and the scansion is certainly improved:

O love! who to the heart of wandering man
Art as the calm to Ocean's weary waves—
Justice, or truth or joy! thou only can
From slavery and religion's labyrinth caves
Guide us, etc.

Considering the purging that "Laon and Cythna" was subjected to in order to make the poem fit for publication under its new name, it is not perhaps to be wondered at that the final production should have retained traces here and there of the treatment accorded it; or that the poet's ideas were occasionally other than chaotic, when dealing with a subject so unnatural and revolting. In such a context as this the Earl of Roscommon's precept should not be lost sight of:

Immodest words admit of no defence;
For want of decency is want of sense.

UGOLINO.

A CORRECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Commenting upon Mr. Cole's version of the line in Juvenal—"Graeculus esuriens in caelum, jussus, ibi"—the reviewer goes on to say: "The rendering 'and bid him go to hell, etc.,' though attractive, is not to be endured." But this is an imitation, not a translation; it comes from Dr. Johnson's "London," an imitation of Juvenal's Third Satire, and the correct text of the couplet is: "All sciences afeasting Monsieur knows, and bid him go to hell, to hell he goes," not "he'll go," as quoted in the review of Mr. Cole's book.

C. S. JERRAM.

March 12.

LITERARY FORGERIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your admirable review of Mr. J. A. Farrer's "Literary Forgeries" you rightly take exception to his including Chatterton—"the sleepless soul that perished in his pride," in his "rogues' gallery."

It is so seldom that any writer dealing with that unfortunate genius can refrain from flinging a stone at his alleged forgeries, that all admirers and students of his work are very much your debtor for so ably vindicating his memory.

Apropos of which, with your kind permission, I quote the following passage from a book of mine passing through the press of Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith, entitled "Bristol and Its Famous Associations":

"In regard to the Rowley poems, it has often been asserted that they are forgeries, which term implies the counterfeiting of work already in existence. But Chatterton did no such thing, he simply hid his own genius behind a fictitious personality. When we view all the circumstances of his brief and sordid life, and take into consideration the sterile age in which he lived, with its pseudo love of the antique, it is not surprising that he masked the rich outpourings of his wondrous imagination in hoar antiquity, as the one and only way to obtain that recognition for which he longed.

"It is not without interest to note that an actual Thomas Rowley did exist in Bristol in the fifteenth century, in the person of a merchant of that name who died January 23, 1478; his tomb is in St. John's Church."

STANLEY HUTTON.

March 13.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART

Brinton, Selwyn. Humanism and Art. Being Part IV. of the Renaissance in Italian Art, and containing a separate analysis of Artists and their works in sculpture and painting. Second edition. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 79. Arnold Fairbairns, 2s. 6d. net.

DRAMA

The Works of Shakespeare: Pericles. Edited by K. Deighton $8\frac{1}{2} \times 6$. Pp. xxix, 147. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION

Pryce, Richard. Towing-Path Bess, and other Stories. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
[Fifteen short stories, mostly reprinted from various magazines.]

Butler, Ellis Parker. Mr. Perkins of Portland. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5$. Pp. 171. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.

Scudder, Veda D. The Disciple of a Saint. $7\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$. Pp. 383. Dent, 4s. 6d. net.

